Mr. Giese has never been heard here under such favorable circumstances, and he seemed inspired by the surroundings as well as by the marked favor which he won in the opening movement of the concerto. His playing of the concerto was one of the most masterly efforts in this line heard here in later years, and the enthusiasm which the audience showed upon its conclusion was fully warranted by the merits of the performance. The Chopin nocturne was presented with a beauty of expression rarely equalled by the best violinists, and the bright Popper number was given with delightful effect. No doubt the possession of such an instrument as that used by this artist has much to do with the purity and richness of the tone given out in his playing, but none but a player of the best ability can give such pleasure as was experienced in listening to the 'cello numbers on this occasion. Mr. Henschel kindly took the piano part in the solo numbers, and added not a little to the success of the 'celloist by so doing. The symphony was played with a charming grace throughout its several movements, making the pastoral scenes depicted by the composer easily apparent to the hearer, and the melodious overture was played with equal success. The Godard "Danse" was heard for the first time, and did not prove a remarkable effort in this line of composition. Of course, "the line must be drawn somewhere," but why such a poor selection of this sort should be admitted to these programmes, to the exclusion of the merry measures by Strauss, which find a place on almost all continental programmes, remains an unsolved conundrum.

Now that the dreadful danger has passed, and the reputation of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Henschel's direction, is unblemished beyond a doubt, it will do no harm to give publicity to the fact that it was at one time contemplated to add a Strauss waltz to its repertoire of this season. This waltz was to be given in some of the provincial cities visited by the orchestra, and, though the reason for abandoning the plan has not gained publicity, it is presumable that the enormity of the evil which might follow such a new departure deterred Mr. Henschel from carrying out his plan. Boston can still hold up her head as the centre of musical culture, and deplore, with propriety, the wickedness of Brooklyn and its Philharmonic society.

226

AT THE LAST CONCERT OF THIS SEASON,
ON MARCH 22d,

SCHUMANN'S MUSIC TO BYRON'S "MANFRED"

AND

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY

WILL BE PERFORMED.

Ladies and gentlemen desirous of singing in the chorus on that occasion, and willing to attend all the necessary rehearsals, are invited to write their names and addresses in a book provided for this purpose at Mr. Peck's Office, Music Hall.

The list will be closed at 6 P.M. on Tuesday, January 29th, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified.

The Chorus Rehearsals will take place from 7.30 to 9 P. M. on

MONDAYS, February 4th, 11th, 18th, 25th,
March 3d, 10th, and 17th,

at the Apollo Hall, (Chickering's), 152 Tremont Street, and will be conducted by MR. HENSCHEL.

Complimentary Tickets can be given to the members of the Chorus to the Public Rehearsal,—March 21st—only.

J. P. LYMAN, Secretary.

227

I shall be brief in speaking of the Symphony concert this week. The programme was:

Overture (Olympia). Spontini
(First time.)
Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor. W. S. Bennett
No. 4, op. 19.
Allegro con maestà—Barcarole. (Andante cantabile.)—Presto.—
(Mr. Perabo.)
Symphony in E flat, (No. 3 of Breitkopf's edition). Mozart Adagio, Allegro.—Andante.—Menuetto.—Finale. (Allegro.)—
Piano Solo.
a. Gavotte in A. Gluck-Brahms.
b. Idyl in F. op. 6. Rheinberger.
c. Caracole, "Auf dem Wasser zu singen." . . . Schubert-Liszt.
Mr. Perabo.
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2. Liszt
(Orchestrated by K. Muelier-Berghaus.)

The orchestral numbers were well given, especially the sumptuously scored Rhapsody, which received a rendering full of verve and fire. I thought the final movement of the symphony too fast for a Mozart Allegro, and the minuet also was taken rather boisterously. The overture was well played, with just the lightness and grace suited to this melodious and symmetrical school. Of the pianist I can speak chiefly in praise. He is not a great bravura player, but his work is always intelligent, and in emotional passages he is at his best, although he sometimes goes to excess even in these. The second movement of the concerto was the gem of his performance, and with the exception that sometimes the pp figures were rather inaudible, it deserves only praise. Of the group of solos one can say that Mr. Perabo came to the compositions in a reverent spirit, and sank himself in the music. His rendering of the "Barcarole" was not a tone-picture of a boat-race, as Joseffy gives it, but a calm and gentle picture of a rippling lake, and the composer's mark, Mässig Geschwind (moderately fast) was not metamorphosed into a Presto.

Next week comes that first of programme pieces, the Pastoral Symphony, and I am glad to hear that Paine's Spring Symphony is soon to be played. When all the European composers of the second rank are given a hearing, why should not an American composer of the first rank have a chance? Echo answers: "Give them a chance too." L. C. E.
Key note Feb 2/84

The Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

observed Feb 2/84
If last week's programme was interesting from its novelty, the Symphony on Saturday was welcomed from the opposite reason. The E Flat Symphony of Mozart is probably better known than any we have had this season, and is always delightful, no matter how often it may be repeated. It is, moreover, one of those in the playing of which Mr. Henschel's orchestra excels, especially in the rendering of the andante, in which the superiority of the strings, of which we have had occasion to speak before, is apparent from the absence of the brass and wood.

The Olympia overture of Spontini was new to us here, and set a good many of the critics to work upon the story of the unhappy queen, in their endeavor—just as successful as such endeavors usually are—to find the music descriptive of her sad story. I too know the story of the binding of Olympia to the rock by the pirates, and her subsequent rescue by Orlando Furioso. But I found in the music only a somewhat commonplace overture, easily, if not too brilliantly, scored, and nicely played, with excellent phrasing, by the orchestra.

228

One of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies, arranged for orchestra, failed to please, as such rearrangements invariably do fail to please a cultured audience. Although I cannot agree with my friend, the critic of the Daily Advertiser, that when these things of Liszt are taken from the pianoforte and given to a mass of instruments, all the coarseness and cheapness which is in them come out, and cannot be lost sight of, in spite of all the music which there may be in them. I have the misfortune to fail in discovering either cheapness or coarseness in the work, although I confess myself out of sympathy with the orchestral treatment of an essentially pianoforte work, which gives neither work nor author fair play.

I have left till the last the most interesting event of the evening, which was undoubtedly the reappearance of Mr. Ernest Perabo as the solo pianist. Mr. Perabo is heard far too seldom amongst us for our own good, although it may be that his very absence from the concert stage ensures him a warmer reception when he does appear, as was undoubtedly the case last night. Mr. Perabo played as solos, Liszt's transcription of Schubert's well known song "Auf dem Wasser zu singen," given with a poetic feeling and warmth of color which were equally delightful, and his smaller pieces a gavotte of Gluck's and an idyl of Rheinberger's. But his performance of Sterndale Bennett's F minor concerto with the orchestra was one those musical treats to which even at these concerts we are seldom invited. The concerto is justly a favorite with all musicians, and gives to both a rare opportunity, especially in the andante cantabile of the second movement, to display that delicacy and refinement of feeling which is often lost sight of in the hurry and bustle which absorbs so much of modern pianoforte playing. Here Mr. Perabo showed to special advantage, while in the presto he conquered the difficulties of the execution with an ease which enabled him to introduce a variety of phrasing as unexpected as it was charming.

The soloist of next week will be Mr. Fritz Giese, who will play a concerto for violoncello and orchestra. The Symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," the overture one of Mendelssohn's, and the only new feature a Bohemian dance of Godard's.

230

THE CONCERT WILL CLOSE AT 9.30. THOSE OBLIGED TO LEAVE BEFORE THEN WILL PLEASE
DO SO DURING THE LAST INTERMISSION — AFTER MR. GIESE'S LAST SOLO.

231

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883 - 84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 2D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE in C. op. 101. MENDELSSOHN.

CONCERTO FOR VIOLONCELLO. op. 33. VOLKMANN.
Allegro moderato. Vivace. Tempo primo.—

SYMPHONY in F. (Pastorale.) No. 6, op. 68. BEETHOVEN.
AWAKENING OF CHEERFUL FEELINGS ON ARRIVING IN THE COUNTRY.
(Allegro ma non troppo.)—SCENE BY THE BROOK. (Andante molto moto.)—
MERRY GATHERING OF THE COUNTRY PEOPLE. (Allegro.) STORM.
TEMPEST. (Allegro.) HERDSMAN'S SONG. BLITHE AND THANKFUL
FEELINGS AFTER THE TEMPEST. (Allegretto.)

CELLO SOLO WITH PIANO.

a) NOCTURNE. op. 9. No. 2. CHOPIN-SERVAIS.
b) PAPILLON. D. POPPER.

DANSE DES BOHÉMIENS. (Le Tasse.) B. GODARD.
[First time.]

SOLOIST:

MR. FRITZ GIESE.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

THE SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert of Saturday evening was, to our thinking, the most unequal and least satisfactory one of the present series. It began with Mendelssohn's concert overture in C, opus 101—a composition in which it is not easy to find those qualities by which the author is best known and which have most endeared him to the world. He could not write altogether unwisely, nor could he develop so long a work without giving it beauty and thought, and resting these upon a foundation of practised knowledge; but still the overture sounds as though not written with full conviction—certainly not with inspiration. It is often hard and loud and self-assertive, and its very last chords have a sequence which has a flavor of aggressive inquiry about it. The orchestra did not attack the first few bars with their usual aptness, but they then carried on the overture with appropriate force and determination. Possibly it was owing to the mood of the overture, but sure it is that somehow the performance of the symphony fell below the standard which the previous concerts have established. It was not the fault of the symphony, for that was Beethoven's sixth,—the "Pastoral,"—which never even suggests harsh, rough and labored playing, such as characterized nearly all the movements. Except that Mr. Henschel had apparently overlooked the little negative in the titular allegro ma non troppo of the first movement,—which was in itself a pity, because the plane of emotion was thus lowered from poetic cheerfulness to trivial hilarity,—his direction did not appear to be at fault. The andante molto moto moved pleasantly, although a little heavily; but all the rest was dull and monotonous, in spite of the evident earnestness and desire of the conductor to give life and light, so that the tempest and the thankfulness at its cessation sounded pretty much alike, so far as anything but the notes went.

The violoncello playing of Mr. Fritz Giese, who was the soloist of the evening, stood out in doubly pleasant relief against the principal orchestral numbers. He is a player who more nearly approaches Mr. Fischer in many particulars than any one who has been heard here since that gentleman's visit in Mr. Listemann's time of leadership. He has not Mr. Fischer's depth, nor his great polish; but he has a brilliant and trustworthy technique; freedom and taste in phrasing; ease, as well as a suggestion of conscious power, in manner; a beautiful tone through all the compass of a very fine instrument, and a fervor which makes his playing more than mere skill, and better than virtuosity. It was no wonder, then, that he was interrupted and recalled by applause which was astonishing when compared with the numbers of the unusually small audience. Mr. Giese first played an orchestral concerto by Volkmann, which, if not continuously interesting, had many delightful moments, presented its romance or cantabile simply within the allegro, and was so brief as not to exceed any reasonable listener's power of attention. Afterwards he played—Mr. Henschel accompanying sympathetically—an arrangement by Servais of Chopin's nocturne No. 2, in opus 9, and the dashing little caprice, the "Butterfly," by Popper, in distinct and well-adapted readings.

The only novelty of the concert was the last number, a "Bohemian Dance," from B. Godard's "Tasso"—a pleasant thing enough, but in no wise remarkable. It begins with an andantino, in which the violins now and then pass with mild attempts at activity across the melancholy droning of the wooden wind; then, upon the fortunate accession of the brass and drums, spurred on by the occasional piquancy of the triangle, the pace is rapidly accelerated to about that of the whirling dervishes, and the number ends, leading any imaginative person in soul-distracting doubt as to whether or no the stimulated Bohemians are to dance until they drop.

At this week's concert Professor Fälden, of whom our readers have already heard something, and whose own recital follows on the succeeding Monday, will make his Boston debut as a pianist, playing a concerto by Raff, and solos by Chopin and Liszt. The orchestra will play the unfinished B minor symphony of Schumann, Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" overture, and a suite by Bizet, entitled "Rome," which is new here.

Notes.

The seventeenth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, with Mr. Fritz Giese, the violoncello player, as the soloist. The programme was made up of the following selections: Overture in C, op. 101, Mendelssohn; Concerto for violoncello, op. 33, Volkmann; Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; Cello solo, with piano—a Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2, Chopin; 6 Papillon, D. Popper; Danse des Bohémiens ("Le Tasse"), B. Godard. The work of the orchestra was not as perfect as at several concerts which preceded that of Saturday night, and in the performance of Beethoven's well-known pastoral symphony there were a number of shortcomings. The other orchestral numbers, however, were very well played. The solos of Mr. Giese were nobly played, and in the Volkmann concerto for the 'cello he was heard to the very best advantage, and won the immediate favor of his audience. His other numbers on the programme were charmingly done, and the interest in them was heightened by the masterly manner in which Mr. Henschel played the piano parts. The eighteenth concert is to be given on Saturday evening next, with the following programme: Overture, "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; Concerto for piano, in C minor, op. 185, Raff; Unfinished Symphony, Schubert; a group of piano solos by Chopin and Liszt, and Bizet's suite, No. 3, entitled "Roma." The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Faelten.

(7075.) 1. Can you inform me if Mr. Georg Henschel has ever sung in opera?

2. Also, if there is to be a change in the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next year?

H. W. T.

[1. To the best of our knowledge, no. 2. Yes. The name of the new conductor is Gericke. He comes from Vienna, where he has been conductor at the opera and also for the Philharmonic Society, succeeding Brahms in the latter position. These particulars have already been published in the Transcript.]

It is stated that Sucher, the conductor of the Hamburg opera, will succeed Gericke, who has resigned his post at the Vienna Opera, having been appointed conductor of the Boston symphony concerts for next season.

The Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth symphony concert took place in Music Hall, Saturday evening. The following programme was performed: Overture in C, op. 101, Mendelssohn; Concerto for violoncello, op. 33, Volkmann; Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; Cello solo with piano: a, Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2, Chopin; b, Papillon, D. Pepper; Danse des Bohémiens ("Le Tasse"), B. Godard. The opening number, Mendelssohn's concert overture in C, opus 101, is not one of the author's most characteristic, as it certainly is not one of his best compositions. It is, of course, skillfully written, and contains many fine, and some masterly passages, but it lacks inspiration and feeling, and has a sort of mechanical movement, as if it had been made to order when the gifted composer was not in his best mood. The first part was indifferently played, the last part alone being done as it should be. The symphony in F by Beethoven was not quite up to the level established by the previous concerts. This is greatly to be regretted, as the symphony itself is one of Beethoven's best, and never should be rendered at all unless it can be done in a manner expressive of its excellence. The playing of the violoncello by Mr. Fritz Giese, the soloist of the evening, atoned for every other lack, however. It was superb, displaying every possible resource of technique and expression. Only at rare intervals have we ever had a player equal to him. What he lacks in depth and finish, he makes up in brilliancy and freedom. His taste and earnestness and power of expression are marvelous. The Volkmann concerto, a beautiful thing in itself, was magnificently rendered, as was also the less pleasing, but difficult nocturne of Chopin. The gay and dashing little caprice by Popper, entitled "The Butterfly," was charming. The real novelty of the evening was the "Bohemian Dance," from B. Godard's "Tasso." It is not anything extraordinary, but it is unique and piquant, and was given in a very expressive and attractive style. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; Concerto for piano, in C minor, op. 185, Raff; Unfinished Symphony, Schubert; a group of piano solos, by Chopin and Liszt, and Bizet's suite, No. 3, entitled "Roma." The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Faeltten.

— Herr und Frau Georg Henschel, das berühmte Piederfängerpaar, geben im Monat Juli von Boston nach Deutschland zu kommen, um die nächste Concertsaison hier zuzurufen. Vor seiner Abreise unternimmt das Künstlerpaar noch eine große Concert-Tournee durch die Vereinigten Staaten, welche sich bis nach San Francisco erstrecken und vom 15. April bis 15. Juni dauern wird.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There was an excellent audience. The symphony was Beethoven's in F, (Pastoral). We cannot say much in favor of the reading or of the performance that was vouchsafed it. The former was eccentric and the latter coarse. The opening movement was taken at a tempo so rapid that the intended meaning of the music was lost. It absolutely sounded vulgar. Placidity, grace and suavity disappeared, and in their place we had something very closely resembling—dreadful as it may be to write it!—a French opera bouffe tune. The orchestra was very rough and rasping in effect. Its playing throughout may be pronounced the poorest of the season. We have rarely, if ever, heard so unsatisfactory an interpretation of the symphony. The other orchestral selections were Mendelssohn's overture in C, op. 101, to which ample justice was done; and a bit of quaint and melodious, but musically unimportant, "Danse de Bohémiens," by B. Godard, which was new. The soloist was Mr. Fritz Giese, who afforded some magnificent violoncello playing. His technique is extraordinary, his tone large and manly, and his style broad, sympathetic and wholly artistic. His performances were brilliant, interesting and admirable in every essential. He played a concerto by Volkmann, one of the brightest, most spirited and clearest works we have heard by this composer; an arrangement by Servais of Chopin's Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2, and "Papillon," a pretty and amazingly difficult bit of fireworks by Popper. In each and all of these Mr. Giese manifested the highest powers, not only in respect to virtuosity, but in the finer and deeper qualities of his art as well. He was tremendously applauded achieving an instant and a deserved success. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; Concerto for piano, in C minor, op. 185, Raff; Unfinished Symphony, Schubert; a group of piano solos by Chopin and Liszt; and Bizet's suite, No. 3, entitled "Roma." The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Faeltten.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert of the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before a large audience. The following programme was performed: Overture in C, op. 101, Mendelssohn; Concerto for violoncello, op. 33, Volkmann; Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; Cello solo, with piano, a Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2, Chopin; b Papillon, D. Pepper; Danse des Bohémiens ("Le Tasse"), B. Godard. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Fritz Giese, who gave a splendid violoncello performance, showing nearly every resource of expression and technique. The Volkmann concerto was a beautiful and charming work, full of expression and grace, and was superbly played. The Chopin nocturne was unimportant, but the very difficult and dainty caprice by Popper was played with extraordinary skill and great show of technical ability. The orchestral playing of the evening was good as a whole, although the performance of the Symphony left much to be desired. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; Concerto for piano, in C minor, op. 185, Raff; Unfinished Symphony, Schubert; a group of piano solos by Chopin and Liszt, and Bizet's suite, No. 3, entitled "Roma." The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Faeltten.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the seventeenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—
Overture in C, Op. 101... Mendelssohn
Concerto for Violoncello, Op. 33... Volkmann
Symphony in F (Pastoral), No. 6, Op. 68... Beethoven
Cello Solo with Pianoforte—
(a) Nocturne, Op. 9, No. 2... Chopin-Servais
(b) Papillon... D. Popper
Danse des Bohémiens from Le Tasse... B. Godard
(First time.)

Mr. Fritz Giese was the cellist.

Mendelssohn's concert overture in C (known as the "Trumpet Overture," from the ever-recurring fanfare theme on the trumpets and trombones) has generally been rated as one of the composer's lesser works. Except for the easy mastery over musical form displayed in it, one would say that there was little in the work that recalled Mendelssohn. Like the overture to "Ruy Blas," it smacks strongly of the theatre; one almost expects to see the curtain rise when it ends; and if there be one musical trait that is more utterly un-Mendelssohnish than another, this is that one. The themes are in no wise characteristic of the composer, and only at rare moments does that song-without-words sort of melody, which runs through almost all of Mendelssohn's orchestral music, show itself at all. Were it not for a few characteristic passages in the middle part, which betray the work's parentage, one would be sorely puzzled to guess who wrote this overture. Some of the themes have even a certain taint of triviality. Yet, with all this, the trumpet overture, especially when so well played as it was last Saturday evening, is a highly enjoyable work; perhaps all the more enjoyable from the absence of certain characteristically Mendelssohnish traits, which have, in general, begun rather to pall upon the musical taste of the present day. The music is so brilliant, so truly vivacious, the interest is strongly sustained to the end. The performance of the symphony showed, as it seemed to us, a considerable backsliding on the part of the orchestra. There was a good deal of rough and apparently careless playing throughout. In the slow movement, too, the conductor seemed curiously undecided in his tempo, while many important figures in the more elaborate parts of the movement were so drowned out that it took a careful eye upon the score to lead the ear to detect their presence at all. After the previous week's really superb performance of the Mozart symphony, all this was a disappointment. The Godard ballet music is brilliant and pleasing in the modern French vein; the orchestration is elaborate and full of piquant details; at times of overwhelming sonority. The selection was capitally played. Mr. Giese more than renewed his former triumphs. Such cello playing really exhausts superlatives. Faultless technique, admirable beauty and variety of tone, pure intonation, inimitable grace of phrasing, warmth of sentiment, brilliancy and musicianly good taste were all there to a unique degree. Comparisons do not always mean much, but one is tempted to say that Mr. Giese must occupy very much the position among cellists that Sarasate does among violinists. The Volkmann concerto must rank as one of the very best works in the concerto form for the cello. Yet in the midst of Mr. Giese's superb playing,

THE CONCERT WILL CLOSE DURING THE I

The Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth symphony concert took place in Music Hall, Saturday evening. The following programme was performed: Overture in C, op. 101, Mendelssohn; Concerto for violoncello, op. 33, Volkmann; Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; 'Cello solo with piano: a, Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2, Chopin; b, Papillon, D. Pepper; Danse des Bohémiens ("Le Tasse"), B. Godard. The opening number, Mendelssohn's concert overture in C, opus 101, is not one of the author's most characteristic, as it certainly is not one of his best compositions. It is, of course, skillfully written, and contains many fine, and some masterly passages, but it lacks inspiration and feeling, and has a sort of mechanical movement, as if it had been made to order when the gifted composer was not in his best mood. The first part was indifferently played, the last part alone being done as it should be. The symphony in F by Beethoven was not quite up to the level established by the previous concerts. This is greatly to be regretted, as the symphony itself is one of Beethoven's best, and never should be rendered at all unless it can be done in a manner expressive of its excellence. The playing of the violoncello by Mr. Fritz Giese, the soloist of the evening, atoned for every other lack, however. It was superb, displaying every possible resource of technique and expression. Only at rare intervals have we ever had a player equal to him. What he lacks in depth and finish, he makes up in brilliancy and freedom. His taste and earnestness and power of expression are marvelous. The Volkmann concerto, a beautiful thing in itself, was magnificently rendered, as was also the less pleasing, but difficult nocturne of Chopin. The gay and dashing little caprice by Popper, entitled "The Butterfly," was charming. The real novelty of the evening was the "Bohemian Dance," from B. Godard's "Tasso." It is not anything extraordinary, but it is unique and piquant, and was given in a very expressive and attractive style. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; Concerto for piano, in C minor, op. 185, Raff; Unfinished Symphony, Schubert; a group of piano solos, by Chopin and Liszt, and Bizet's suite, No. 3, entitled "Roma." The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Faeltten.

— Herr und Frau Georg Henschel, das berühmte Piederfängerpaar, gedenken im Monat Juli von Boston nach Deutschland zu kommen, um die nächste Concertsaison hier zuzurufen. Vor seiner Abreise unternimmt das Künstlerpaar noch eine große Concert-Tournee durch die Vereinigten Staaten, welche sich bis nach San Francisco erstrecken und vom 15. April bis 15. Juni dauern wird.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There was an excellent audience. The symphony was Beethoven's in F, (Pastoral). We cannot say much in favor of the reading or of the performance that was vouchsafed it. The former was eccentric and the latter coarse. The opening movement was taken at a tempo so rapid that the intended meaning of the music was lost. It absolutely sounded vulgar. Placidity, grace and suavity disappeared, and in their place we had something very closely resembling—dreadful as it may be to write it!—a French opera bouffe tune. The orchestra was very rough and rasping in effect. Its playing throughout may be pronounced the poorest of the season. We have rarely, if ever, heard so unsatisfactory an interpretation of the symphony. The other orchestral selections were Mendelssohn's overture in C, op. 101, to which ample justice was done; and a bit of quaint and melodious, but musically unimportant, "Danse de Bohémiens," by B. Godard, which was new. The soloist was Mr. Fritz Giese, who afforded some magnificent violoncello playing. His technique is extraordinary, his tone large and manly, and his style broad, sympathetic and wholly artistic. His performances were brilliant, interesting and admirable in every essential. He played a concerto by Volkmann, one of the brightest, most spirited and clearest works we have heard by this composer; an arrangement by Servais of Chopin's Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2, and "Papillon," a pretty and amazingly difficult bit of fireworks by Popper. In each and all of these Mr. Giese manifested the highest powers, not only in respect to virtuosity, but in the finer and deeper qualities of his art as well. He was tremendously applauded achieving an instant and a deserved success. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; Concerto for piano, in C minor, op. 185, Raff; Unfinished Symphony, Schubert; a group of piano solos by Chopin and Liszt, and Bizet's suite, No. 3, entitled "Roma." The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Faeltten.

Gardner

Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert of the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before a large audience. The following programme was performed: Overture in C, op. 101, Mendelssohn; Concerto for violoncello, op. 33, Volkmann; Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; 'Cello solo, with piano, a Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2, Chopin; b Papillon, D. Pepper; Danse des Bohémiens ("Le Tasse"), B. Godard. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Fritz Giese, who gave a splendid violoncello performance, showing nearly every resource of expression and technique. The Volkmann concerto was a beautiful and charming work, full of expression and grace, and was superbly played. The Chopin nocturne was unimportant, but the very difficult and dainty caprice by Popper was played with extraordinary skill and great show of technical ability. The orchestral playing of the evening was good as a whole, although the performance of the Symphony left much to be desired. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; Concerto for piano, in C minor, op. 185, Raff; Unfinished Symphony, Schubert; a group of piano solos by Chopin and Liszt, and Bizet's suite, No. 3, entitled "Roma." The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Faeltten.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the seventeenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Overture in C, Op. 101... Mendelssohn
Concerto for Violoncello, Op. 33... Volkmann
Symphony in F (Pastoral), No. 6, Op. 68... Beethoven
'Cello Solo with Pianoforte—
(a) Nocturne, Op. 9, No. 2... Chopin-Servais
(b) Papillon... D. Popper
Danse des Bohémiens from Le Tasse... B. Godard
(First time.)

Mr. Fritz Giese was the 'cellist.

Mendelssohn's concert overture in C (known as the "Trumpet Overture," from the ever-recurring fanfare theme on the trumpets and trombones) has generally been rated as one of the composer's lesser works. Except for the easy mastery over musical form displayed in it, one would say that there was little in the work that recalled Mendelssohn. Like the overture to "Ruy Blas," it smacks strongly of the theatre; one almost expects to see the curtain rise when it ends; and if there be one musical trait that is more utterly un-Mendelssohnish than another, this is that one. The themes are in no wise characteristic of the composer, and only at rare moments does that song-without-words sort of melody, which runs through almost all of Mendelssohn's orchestral music, show itself at all. Were it not for a few characteristic passages in the middle part, which betray the work's parentage, one would be sorely puzzled to guess who wrote this overture. Some of the themes have even a certain taint of triviality. Yet, with all this, the trumpet overture, especially when so well played as it was last Saturday evening, is a highly enjoyable work; perhaps all the more enjoyable from the absence of certain characteristically Mendelssohnish traits, which have, in general, begun rather to pall upon the musical taste of the present day. The music is so brilliant, so truly vivacious, the interest is strongly sustained to the end. The performance of the symphony showed, as it seemed to us, a considerable backsliding on the part of the orchestra. There was a good deal of rough and apparently careless playing throughout. In the slow movement, too, the conductor seemed curiously undecided in his tempo, while many important figures in the more elaborate parts of the movement were so drowned out that it took a careful eye upon the score to lead the ear to detect their presence at all. After the previous week's really superb performance of the Mozart symphony, all this was a disappointment. The Godard ballet music is brilliant and pleasing in the modern French vein; the orchestration is elaborate and full of piquant details; at times of overwhelming sonority. The selection was capably played. Mr. Giese more than renewed his former triumphs. Such 'cello playing really exhausts superlatives. Faultless technique, admirable beauty and variety of tone, pure intonation, inimitable grace of phrasing, warmth of sentiment, brilliancy and musicianly good taste were all there to a unique degree. Comparisons do not always mean much, but one is tempted to say that Mr. Giese must occupy very much the position among 'cellists that Sarasate does among violinists. The Volkmann concerto must rank as one of the very best works in the concerto form for the 'cello. Yet in the midst of Mr. Giese's superb playing,

THE CONCERT WILL CLOSE DURING THE I

and of the boundless enthusiasm it aroused, there was one thought which would obtrude itself upon the mind. We express this thought now, because in Mr. Giese's playing we have probably as fine an example of what a 'cellist can do as can well be found anywhere. The march of musical feeling and taste, in the direction it has taken in the present age, is gradually, but none the less surely, leaving solo players on orchestral instruments out in the cold. Virtuosity, as such, is still admired, to be sure, and still strikes fire from an audience; but the musician, the general music-lover even, is less willing than formerly to accept the natural and inevitable limitations of a particular instrument as a valid excuse for an effect which leaves anything to be desired on purely musical grounds. The immense progress which modern virtuosity has made in playing upon all sorts of instruments and in treating them to the best musical purpose, both singly and in combination, has had the effect of restricting rather than extending the legitimate musical field of individual instruments. Nowadays, one finds it irksome to hear any one instrument trying to do a thing which would really sound better if done by another.

The next programme is—
Overture to "The Ruins of Athens," op. 113. Beethoven
Concert for pianoforte in C minor, op. 185. Raff
Symphony in B minor (unfinished). Schubert
Pianoforte solo—
a. Ballad in G minor, op. 23. Chopin
b. Polonaise in E. Liszt
"Roma." No. 3 of the Suites. Bizet
Mr. Carl Faelten will be the pianist.

The Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

It is unpleasant to have to speak of a symphony concert as a "weariness to the spirit," such as last Saturday's undoubtedly was. There are, of course, occasions on which men, like their instruments, get out of tune, flat, disagreeable to themselves and their neighbors, and complain of the weather—perhaps not always without cause. Such a feeling of depression may be said to have marked the playing of the orchestra at the last concert. It was hardly the fault of Mr. Henschel, who seemed, unless I am mistaken, to feel the drag of his forces, and to exert all his efforts to rouse them from their lethargy; but he was only partially successful. Neither was it decidedly the fault of the programme, which contained the "Pastoral" symphony and Mendelssohn's concert-overture in C, which, though perhaps not one of his most characteristic works, is, when played by a sympathetic orchestra, thoroughly enjoyable, at least by as great a lover of Mendelssohn as I am not ashamed to confess myself. But the orchestra, unfortunately, were not at all sympathetic,—anything but,—and the result was a general sigh of relief at the close of an unsatisfactory number.

The symphony fared very little better. Mr. Henschel hurried the first movement rather too much, but otherwise no fault could be found with his conducting of the work, but he was poorly seconded by the orchestra, whose mechanical work seemed to be at fault, and who played throughout with a dullness and a monotony which rendered all Mr. Henschel's efforts to differentiate the tempi, or to inspire life and activity into the playing, of no avail.

The novelty of the evening was a "Bohemian Dance," from the Tasso of B. Godard. It is wild and fantastic to a degree, which gives it a certain fascination, although there is little about it which is sufficiently remarkable to be capable of description. The orchestra here were apparently raised up somewhat from their torpor, and entered more into the spirit of the dance, which was in consequence given with a good deal of snap, which told in its favor.

I have left till the last any mention of the bright spot in a somewhat dull concert,—the violoncello playing of Mr. Fritz Giese, who was the soloist of the occasion. Mr Giese played a concerto for violoncello and orchestra by Volkmann, which contains several beautiful passages, notably in the solo part of the allegro, which was charmingly rendered.

consumptive "Violetta." substituted for The Pro-March, with Sembrich ening repetition of Gia- in why every operatic towards the close, was at times. The chief as the singing of the nas has reason to be es her first concert on Hall, and on the same ert will be tendered to contralto, at Chicker-amed artists have vol-iss Henrietta Beebe. n, tenor; Mr. William ininger violin and the

BOSTON

MR.

SATURDAY

HORNPIPE in B

RECITATIVE AND Israel

SYMPHONY in A

ADAGIO
ALLEGRO
SCHERZO.
ADAGIO.
ALLEGRO

BALLAD FOR VOICE

HANS SACHS' M

DANSE DES BAC

MR. BER

And now to speak of my regular Saturday night dose, the Boston Symphony concert. I was glad to see that the combined influence of the pastoral symphony and the 'cello playing of Mr. Giese, had an appreciable effect on the size of the audience. But why is it that the Pastoral should be to many of the public the best beloved of the nine? Must the general public always be prompted in regard to the emotions it shall feel? Does the guide-book add to the general delight? It really seems so. I always feel when listening to this symphony that Beethoven was drawn deeper into the tone picture business than he intended at first. His opening apology, "More a picture of impressions than of objects," shows that he intends a subjective work rather than a bit of objective programme music. And the first movement keeps to this resolution, but the second, third and fourth movements grow more and more photographic. But what an observer of nature Beethoven was. How impressive is the hush before the Thunderstorm; what a lesson does the master read to the more modern composers when he is able to give a glorious representation of a tempest with only trombones added to the instruments of the most simple score, producing effects which MM. Berlioz and St. Saens vainly strive to reach with multitudes of timpani, great drums, trombones, tam-tams, etc., etc. But perhaps it is a little late in the day for me to eulogize Beethoven, so I will at once sober down to business by giving the programme, on the same principle that the musical enthusiast was calmed down by a professional musician, when, all aglow with delight at a beautiful piece played at the Peace Jubilee twelve years ago, he inquired: "What is that sublime, that soulful composition which you have just played?" "Dot," responded the Teutonic horn player, "Dot vos number seex, in de green books."

Here is the list:

Overture in C, op. 101. Mendelssohn
Concerto for Violoncello, op. 33. Volkmann
Allegro moderato. Vivace. Tempo primo—
Mr. Fritz Giese.
Symphony in F (Pastorale) No. 6, op. 68. Beethoven
'Cello Solo with Piano.
(a) Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2. Chopin-Servais
(b) Papillon. D. Popper.
Mr. Fritz Giese.
Danse Des Bohémiens. (Le Tasse.) B. Godard
(First time.)

The "Trumpet Overture" was given with all possible power and effect. Like a wasp, its most powerful part was in its Coda. Of Mr. Giese I cannot say enough in praise. To wake up an iced symphony audience to shouts of "bravo" and wild enthusiasm is certainly a great triumph, and he achieved this and deserved it too. Both in legato playing and in the most brilliant bravura works he seems equally at home. His tone is broad, and full and most sympathetic. Even in the playful moods, there is nothing lumbering or awkward in his performance. A violinist could not have made more out of the sugarplum (op. 9), by Chopin. With the full recollection of De Munck and Popper, I can say that he was, in this performance at least, the equal of any violoncellist I have ever heard in America. His instrument too is one of the finest it has ever been my good fortune to hear. The contrast of his two last numbers made his versatility self-apparent. Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniment was, especially in the last number, very masterly.

As to the Symphony, I can briefly say that the orchestra played it excellently, being better together than in the last performance of the work, and giving a splendid (I cannot help superlative adjectives this time) rendering of the "Thunderstorm." But the first movement was taken much too slow, and even the finale lagged a little, although here it did not weaken the effect as in the beginning, for the quiet pace at "cheerful feelings on arriving in the country" seemed to intimate that the summer boarder did not find the country all that was stated in the advertisement. It might have stood, however, for a tone picture of the in-

and of the boundless enthusiasm it aroused, there was one thought which would obtrude itself upon the mind. We express this thought now, because in Mr. Giese's playing we have probably as fine an example of what a 'cellist can do as can well be found anywhere. The march of musical feeling and taste, in the direction it has taken in the present age, is gradually, but none the less surely, leaving solo players on orchestral instruments out in the cold. Virtuosity, as such, is still admired, to be sure, and still strikes fire from an audience; but the musician, the general music-lover even, is less willing than formerly to accept the natural and inevitable limitations of a particular instrument as a valid excuse for an effect which leaves anything to be desired on pure musical grounds. The immense progress which modern virtuosity has made in playing upon all sorts of instruments and in treating them to the best musical purpose, both singly and in combination, has had the effect of restricting rather than extending the legitimate musical field of individual instruments. Nowadays, one finds it irksome to hear any one instrument trying to do a thing which would really sound better if done by another.

The next programme is—
Overture to "The Ruins of Athens," op. 113. Beethoven
Concert for pianoforte in C minor, op. 185. Raff
Symphony in B minor (unfinished) Schubert
Pianoforte solo—
a. Ballad in G minor, op. 23. Chopin
b. Polonaise in E. Liszt
"Roma." No. 3 of the Suites. Bizet
Mr. Carl Faeltten will be the pianist.

The Seventeenth Symphon cert.

It is unpleasant to have to speak of a concert as a "weariness to the spirit," Saturday's undoubtedly was. There are occasions on which men, like their instruments, are out of tune, flat, disagreeable to their neighbors, and complain of the weariness not always without cause. Such depression may be said to have marked of the orchestra at the last concert. It was the fault of Mr. Henschel, who seemed, mistaken, to feel the drag of his forces, and all his efforts to rouse them from their lethargy were only partially successful. Neither was it decidedly the fault of the programme, which contained the "Pastoral" symphony and Mendelssohn's concert-overture in C, which, though perhaps not one of his most characteristic works, is, when played by a sympathetic orchestra, thoroughly enjoyable, at least by as great a lover of Mendelssohn as I am not ashamed to confess myself. But the orchestra, unfortunately, were not at all sympathetic,—anything but,—and the result was a general sigh of relief at the close of an unsatisfactory number.

The symphony fared very little better. Mr. Henschel

hurried the first movement rather too much, but otherwise no fault could be found with his conducting of the work, but he was poorly seconded by the orchestra, whose mechanical work seemed to be at fault, and who played throughout with a dullness and a monotony which rendered all Mr. Henschel's efforts to differentiate the tempi, or to inspire life and activity into the playing, of no avail.

The novelty of the evening was a "Bohemian Dance," from the Tasso of B. Godard. It is wild and fantastic to a degree, which gives it a certain fascination, although there is little about it which is sufficiently remarkable to be capable of description. The orchestra here were apparently raised up somewhat from their torpor, and entered more into the spirit of the dance, which was in consequence given with a good deal of snap, which told in its favor.

I have left till the last any mention of the bright spot in a somewhat dull concert,—the violoncello playing of Mr. Fritz Giese, who was the soloist of the occasion. Mr Giese played a concerto for violoncello and orchestra by Volkmann, which contains several beautiful passages, notably in the solo part of the allegro, which was charmingly rendered. He was, hence, even more successful—partly, perhaps, by reason of Mr. Henschel's accompaniment in Chopin's second Nocturne (arranged by Servais) and Popper's charming morceau, "The Butterfly," in both of which he displayed a perfection of tone and a gracefulness of execution, which won him most enthusiastic recall from the audience.

At this week's concert Professor Faeltten, whose own recital follows on the succeeding Monday, will make his Boston debut as a pianist, playing a concerto by Raff and solos by Chopin and Liszt. The orchestra will play the unfinished B minor symphony of Schumann, Beethoven's Ruins of Athens overture and a suite by Bizet, entitled Rome, which is new here.

BOSTON

MR.

SATURDAY

HORNPIPE in B

RECITATIVE AND
Israel

SYMPHONY in A

{ ADAGIO
ALLEGRO
SCHERZO.
ADAGIO.
ALLEGRO

BALLAD FOR VIOLIN

HANS SACHS' MARCH

DANSE DES BALLETS

MR. BERLIOZ

And now to speak of my regular Saturday night dose, the Boston Symphony concert. I was glad to see that the combined influence of the pastoral symphony and the 'cello playing of Mr. Giese, had an appreciable effect on the size of the audience. But why is it that the Pastoral should be to many of the public the best beloved of the nine? Must the general public always be prompted in regard to the emotions it shall feel? Does the guide-book add to the general delight? It really seems so. I always feel when listening to this symphony that Beethoven was drawn deeper into the tone picture business than he intended at first. His opening apology, "More a picture of impressions than of objects," shows that he intends a subjective work rather than a bit of objective programme music. And the first movement keeps to this resolution, but the second, third and fourth movements grow more and more photographic. But what an observer of nature Beethoven was. How impressive is the hush before the Thunderstorm; what a lesson does the master read to the more modern composers when he is able to give a glorious representation of a tempest with only trombones added to the instruments of the most simple score, producing effects which MM. Berlioz and St. Saens vainly strive to reach with multitudes of timpani, great drums, trombones, tubas, etc., etc. But perhaps it is a little late in the day for me to eulogize Beethoven, so I will at once sober down to business by giving the programme, on the same principle that the musical enthusiast was calmed down by a professional musician, when, all aglow with delight at a beautiful piece played at the Peace Jubilee twelve years ago, he inquired: "What is that sublime, that soulful composition which you have just played?" "Dot," responded the Teutonic horn player, "Dot vos number seex, in de green books."

Here is the list:

Overture in C, op. 101 Mendelssohn
Concerto for Violoncello, op. 33 Volkmann
Allegro moderato. Vivace. Tempo primo—
Mr. Fritz Giese.
Symphony in F (Pastorale) No. 6, op. 68 Beethoven
'Cello Solo with Piano.
(a) Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2 Chopin-Servais
(b) Papillon D. Popper.
Mr. Fritz Giese.
Danse Des Bohémiens. (Le Tasse.) B. Godard
(First time.)

The "Trumpet Overture" was given with all possible power and effect. Like a wasp, its most powerful part was in its Coda. Of Mr. Giese I cannot say enough in praise. To wake up an iced symphony audience to shouts of "bravo" and wild enthusiasm is certainly a great triumph, and he achieved this and deserved it too. Both in legato playing and in the most brilliant bravura works he seems equally at home. His tone is broad, and full and most sympathetic. Even in the playful moods, there is nothing lumbering or awkward in his performance. A violinist could not have made more out of the sugarplum (op. 9), by Chopin. With the full recollection of De Munck and Popper, I can say that he was, in this performance at least, the equal of any violoncellist I have ever heard in America. His instrument too is one of the finest it has ever been my good fortune to hear. The contrast of his two last numbers made his versatility self-apparent. Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniment was, especially in the last number, very masterly.

As to the Symphony, I can briefly say that the orchestra played it excellently, being better together than in the last performance of the work, and giving a splendid (I cannot help superlative adjectives this time) rendering of the "Thunderstorm." But the first movement was taken much too slow, and even the finale lagged a little, although here it did not weaken the effect as in the beginning, for the quiet pace at "cheerful feelings on arriving in the country" seemed to intimate that the summer boarder did not find the country all that was stated in the advertisement. It might have stood, however, for a tone picture of the interior of New Jersey.

238

The final number was largely made up of bass drum and piccolo. It had more "bangs" than even the fashionable girl of the period.

The arrangements for the first production of the new comic opera "Uncle Sam," by the Webber Comic Opera Company, at the Academy of Music, Chelsea, Feb. 12th, are rapidly approaching completion. The stage management will be in the hands of the veteran manager, Leon J. Vinant, late of Booth's Theater. Amongst those already under engagement for leading rôles are: Sig. A. Montegriffo, Miss Amy Gordon, Henri Laurent, Miss W. Scote Junes, Miss Christine Brunheild, Mr. Logan Paul, William Paul Brown, Mr. J. H. Connor. The chorus is made up of forty picked voices, and has been in training under the directorship of Mr. Julius E. Ward, a conductor of well-known ability. The choruses are strongly written, and in method and style quite different from what is usually heard in comic opera.

Key note Feb. 9. 84

L C. E.

242

THE CONCERT WILL CLOSE AT 9.45. THOSE OBLIGED TO LEAVE BEFORE THEN WILL PLEASE DO SO DURING THE LAST INTERMISSION — AFTER THE ALLEGRETTO VIVACE OF BIZET'S SUITE.

Carl Faelten

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883-84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (The Ruins of Athens.) op. 113. BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE in C minor. op. 185. RAFF.
Allegro.—Andante quasi Larghetto.—Allegro.—

SYMPHONY in B minor. (Unfinished.) SCHUBERT.
Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—

PIANO SOLO.

a) BALLAD in G minor. op. 23. CHOPIN.
b) POLONAISE in E. LISZT.

"ROMA." No. 3 of the Suites. BIZET.
Andante. Allegro. Andante.—Allegretto vivace.—
Allegro vivacissimo. (Carnaval.)—
[First time.]

SOLOIST:

MR. CARL FAELTEN.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

Carl Faelten

THE CONCERT WILL CLOSE AT 9.45. THOSE OBLIGED TO LEAVE BEFORE THEN WILL PLEASE DO SO DURING THE LAST INTERMISSION — AFTER THE ALLEGRETTO VIVACE OF BIZET'S SUITE.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883-84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (The Ruins of Athens.) op. 113. BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE in C minor. op. 185. RAFF.
Allegro.—Andante quasi Larghetto.—Allegro.—

SYMPHONY in B minor. (Unfinished.) SCHUBERT.
Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—

PIANO SOLO.

a) BALLAD in G minor. op. 23. CHOPIN.
b) POLONAISE in E. LISZT.

"ROMA." No. 3 of the Suites. BIZET.
Andante. Allegro. Andante.—Allegretto vivace.—
Allegro vivacissimo. (Carnaval.)—
[First time.]

SOLOIST:

MR. CARL FAELTEN.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The eighteenth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was—

Overture to "The Ruins of Athens".....Beethoven
Concerto in C minor, op. 185.....Raff
Symphony in B minor (unfinished).....Schubert
Pianoforte solo—
a. Ballad in G minor, op. 23.....Chopin
b. Polonaise in E.....Liszt
"Roma," Suite No. 3.....Bizet

Mr. Carl Faelten was the pianist.

The overture to "The Ruins of Athens" is a pretty little overture, in which Beethoven got as near to the trivial as he conveniently could. In listening to it one understands why it is so rarely played. Yet it is not without a certain graceful, almost infantine charm; although Beethoven at his smallest, it is still Beethoven. It was capitally played. The ever-beautiful two movements of Schubert's unfinished symphony were exquisitely given. The orchestra got the full meaning out of the wonderful second part of the first movement without any extravagance in tempo. Those dangerous A's, too, of the first violins, in the second movement, were played with a precision and smoothness that left nothing to be desired. Upon the whole, we cannot remember to have heard a more finished, sympathetic and exhaustive performance of this unique work. Bizet's "Roma" has been played here before, either by Mr. Thomas, or the Philharmonic Society, or both, but made by no means so strong an impression as it did last Saturday evening. It has not the thorough originality of matter that one finds in "L'Arlésienne," but it is full of brilliancy, grace and fascination. In one or two places fantastic ornamentation is pushed to excess, which one wonders at all the more because the composer shows no lack of invention or strength of grasp. The little fugato near the end of the carnival scene is managed with consummate skill, and is immensely effective. The treatment of the orchestra is masterly throughout. The performance was very fine, and was calculated to raise high hopes of a good performance of Berlioz's "Harold" at the next concert. Not that a thorough comprehension of the disciple necessarily implies an equally complete understanding of the master; but Berlioz and Bizet are so alike in many points of style, that to play the one well is a good step in the direction of playing the other not badly.

Would that Mr. Faelten's admiration for his teacher had not induced him to play the Raff concerto. This work is hardly what one can call familiar here, but it is still sufficiently well known. In common with many modern concertos, it has the fault of the solo part seeming like an intruder. One feels continually that Raff had begun by irrevocably fixing his intent to write a pianoforte concerto, come of it what might; and, that after once setting to work upon the composition, he wished his pianoforte to the deuce. We have said that many modern concertos make a similar impression; but this one of Raff's goes even further. The pianoforte part bristles with sheer trivialities, of the most commonplace salon order; things such as composers of self-respect do not usually stoop to. That the thematic material upon which the work is based is often fine may readily be acknowledged. There is much good, solid work in it, too; but the pianoforte plays too merely ornamental a rôle, and the ornamentation is too often in bad taste. Mr. Faelten played it superbly, and had a real ovation. He has great technique, of a solid, efficient sort, enabling him to feel at ease in the midst of all sorts of difficulties. His touch is sympathetic and vital, his phrasing masterly. He plays, moreover, with infinite zest and fire. In the Chopin ballad we could have wished for something more of that indescribable element which is called poetry, for lack of a better name; but the Liszt Polonaise was grandly played. Strange, however, that the fairy-like arpeggi and trills in the pianissimo episode in the middle were less effective than the rest of the piece. One is forced to think that Mr. Faelten's technique has more robustness than it has fine finish.

The next programme is—

Prelude to "Parsifal".....R. Wagner
Walther's Prelied, from "The Mastersingers".....R. Wagner
Good Friday's Spell, to "Parsifal".....R. Wagner
(First time.)
Songs with Pianoforte: Nina.....Pergolesi.
The Lark.....Rubinstein.
"Du bist wie eine Blume".....Liszt.
Symphony, Harold in Italy, op. 16.....Berlioz.
Solo Viola. Mr. Henry Heindl.
Mr. Theodore J. Toedt will be the singer.

Summary The Symphony Concert. Stob
The audience at the symphony concert last evening was large and the programme was excellent. Mr. Carl Faelten played Raff's concerto for pianoforte in C minor from memory in a style at once forcible and delicate. His work amid the bristling difficulties of the score was such that the applause which greeted him at the close was unusually strong and enthusiastic. He was recalled twice after the concerto. Later in the evening some solo performances made a similar good impression. His complete mastery of the technical difficulties, the clearness of his playing, with no small degree of delicacy and finish, combined to make the occasion in a measure a triumph for the soloist. That unrivalled fragmentary work of Schubert, the B minor symphony, was the chief purely orchestral number of the evening, and was played with delicacy and exactness. One of Bizet's pleasing suits brought the attractive programme to a close. An odd and unusual bill is to be presented next week as follows:

Prelude (Parsifal).....R. Wagner
Walther's Prelied (The Mastersingers).....R. Wagner
Good Friday's Spell (Parsifal).....R. Wagner
(First time.)
Songs with Piano—Nina.....Pergolesi
The Lark.....Rubinstein
"Du bist wie eine Blume".....Liszt
Symphony (Harold in Italy) op. 16.....Berlioz
Solo viola, Mr. Henry Heindl.
Harold in the Mountains. Scenes of melancholy, of happiness and of joy.
March of the Pilgrims, chanting the evening prayer.
Serenade of a Mountaineer to his Beloved.
Bacchanale of the Brigands. Reminiscences of the previous scenes.
Soloist, Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1884.

The eighteenth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was—

Overture to "The Ruins of Athens".....Beethoven
Concerto in C minor, op. 185.....Raff
Symphony in B minor (unfinished).....Schubert
Pianoforte solo—
a. Ballad in G minor, op. 23.....Chopin
b. Polonaise in E.....Liszt
"Roma," Suite No. 3.....Bizet

Mr. Carl Faelten was the pianist.

The overture to "The Ruins of Athens" is a pretty little overture, in which Beethoven got as near to the trivial as he conveniently could. In listening to it one understands why it is so rarely played. Yet it is not without a certain graceful, almost infantine charm; although Beethoven at his smallest, it is still Beethoven. It was capitally played. The ever-beautiful two movements of Schubert's unfinished symphony were exquisitely given. The orchestra got the full meaning out of the wonderful second part of the first movement without any extravagance in tempo. Those dangerous 4's, too, of the first violins, in the second movement, were played with a precision and smoothness that left nothing to be desired. Upon the whole, we cannot remember to have heard a more finished, sympathetic and exhaustive performance of this unique work. Bizet's "Roma" has been played here before, either by Mr. Thomas, or the Philharmonic Society, or both, but made by no means so strong an impression as it did last Saturday evening. It has not the thorough originality of matter that one finds in "L'Arlésienne," but it is full of brilliancy, grace and fascination. In one or two places fantastic ornamentation is pushed to excess, which one wonders at all the more because the composer shows no lack of invention or strength of grasp. The little fugato near the end of the carnival scene is managed with consummate skill, and is immensely effective. The treatment of the orchestra is masterly throughout. The performance was very fine, and was calculated to raise high hopes of a good performance of Berlioz's "Harold" at the next concert. Not that a thorough comprehension of the disciple necessarily implies an equally complete understanding of the master; but Berlioz and Bizet are so alike in many points of style, that to play the one well is a good step in the direction of playing the other not badly.

Would that Mr. Faelten's admiration for his teacher had not induced him to play the Raff concerto. This work is hardly what one can call familiar here, but it is still sufficiently well known. In common with many modern concertos, it has the fault of the solo part seeming like an intruder. One feels continually that Raff had begun by irrevocably fixing his intent to write a pianoforte concerto, come of it what might; and, that after once setting to work upon the composition, he wished his pianoforte to the deuce. We have said that many modern concertos make a similar impression; but this one of Raff's goes even further. The pianoforte part bristles with sheer trivialities, of the most commonplace salon order; things such as composers of self-respect do not usually stoop to. That the thematic material upon which the work is based is often fine may readily be acknowledged. There is much good, solid work in it, too; but the pianoforte plays too merely ornamental a rôle, and the ornamentation is too often in bad taste. Mr. Faelten played it superbly, and had a real ovation. He has great technique, of a solid, efficient sort, enabling him to feel at ease in the midst of all sorts of difficulties. His touch is sympathetic and vital, his phrasing masterly. He plays, moreover, with infinite zest and fire. In the Chopin ballad we could have wished for something more of that indescribable element which is called poetry, for lack of a better name; but the Liszt Polonaise was grandly played. Strange, however, that the fairy-like arpeggi and trills in the pianissimo episode in the middle were less effective than the rest of the piece. One is forced to think that Mr. Faelten's technique has more robustness than it has fine finish.

The next programme is—

Prelude to "Parsifal".....R. Wagner
Walther's Prelied, from "The Mastersingers".....R. Wagner
Good Friday's Spell, to "Parsifal".....R. Wagner
(First time.)
Songs with Pianoforte:
a. Nina.....Pergolesi.
b. The Lark.....Rubinstein.
c. "Du bist wie eine Blume".....Liszt.
Symphony. Harold in Italy, op. 16.....Berlioz.
Solo Viola. Mr. Henry Heindl.

Mr. Theodore J. Toedt will be the singer.

Summary The Symphony Concert. Robe
The audience at the symphony concert last evening was large and the programme was excellent. Mr. Carl Faelten played Raff's concerto for pianoforte in C minor from memory in a style at once forcible and delicate. His work amid the bristling difficulties of the score was such that the applause which greeted him at the close was unusually strong and enthusiastic. He was recalled twice after the concerto. Later in the evening some solo performances made a similar good impression. His complete mastery of the technical difficulties, the clearness of his playing, with no small degree of delicacy and finish, combined to make the occasion in a measure a triumph for the soloist. That unrivalled fragmentary work of Schubert, the B minor symphony, was the chief purely orchestral number of the evening, and was played with delicacy and exactness. One of Bizet's pleasing suits brought the attractive programme to a close. An odd and unusual bill is to be presented next week as follows:

Prelude (Parsifal).....R. Wagner
Walther's Prelied (The Mastersingers).....R. Wagner
Good Friday's Spell (Parsifal).....R. Wagner
(First time.)
Songs with Piano—Nina.....Pergolesi
The Lark.....Rubinstein
"Du bist wie eine Blume".....Liszt
Symphony (Harold in Italy) op. 16.....Berlioz
Solo viola, Mr. Henry Heindl.
Harold in the Mountains. Scenes of melancholy, of happiness and of joy.
March of the Pilgrims, chanting the evening prayer.
Serenade of a Mountaineer to his Beloved.
Bacchanale of the Brigands. Reminiscences of the previous scenes.
Soloist, Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Reigning Attractions of Stage and Concert Hall.

The Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth symphony concert took place in Music Hall on Saturday night last. The audience was large. The programme was as follows; Overture (The Ruins of Athens), op. 113, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte in C minor, op. 185, Raff; symphony in B minor (unfinished), Schubert; piano solo, (a) ballad in G minor, op. 23, Chopin, (5) polonaise in E, Liszt; "Roma," No. 3 of the suites (first time), Bizet. Mr. Carl Faelten was of course the novelty and the chief attraction of the evening it being his first appearance before a Boston audience as a pianist. It is not always that a stranger is able to justify his reputation, especially if that reputation is very great. But Mr. Faelten more than met the expectations of the audience. His playing was strong, earnest and brilliant, at times a little showy, not perhaps designedly so, but in elegant technique and expression, almost marvelous. His enunciation was particularly noticeable, even the orchestra in full chorus could not drown it, not because it was violent, but because it was so perfect. He played Raff's concerto which it is well known has many intricate and difficult passages, entirely from memory and with a mastery that could not be surpassed. In the selection from Liszt, he was very felicitous. in the Chopin ballad in (G minor opp. 23) he displayed great taste and skill, and throughout the whole portion of the programme in which he had any part, he attracted the profound attention, and won the enthusiastic applause of the audience. The three symphony numbers were admirably rendered by the orchestra, which did better work than at any previous concert. The novelty of the evening was Bizet's suite "which if not equal to the same author's suite "Artésienne," is certainly very fine, and might seem even finer on a second hearing. At the concert this week Wagner and Berlioz will be largely represented. The programme will be as follows:

Prelude (Parsifal)	R. Wagner
Walther's Preislied (The Mastersingers)	R. Wagner
Good Friday's Spell (Parsifal)	R. Wagner
First Time.
Songs with Piano—Nina	Pergolesi
The Lark	Rubinstein
"Du bist wie eine Blume"	Liszt
Symphony (Harold in Italy) op. 16	Berlioz
Solo viola, Mr. Henry Heindi.
Harold in the Mountains. Scenes of melancholy, of happiness and of joy.
March of the Pilgrims, chanting the evening prayer.
Serenade of a mountaineer to his Beloved.
Bacchanale of the Brigands. Reminiscences of the previous scenes.

Soloist, Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.

THE EIGHTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert of Saturday evening was unusually long; but it was none the less agreeable for that. The orchestra had quite recovered from the mauvais quart d'heure which militated against the success of the previous programme, and did their work as we now expect them to do,—with strength, spirit, grace or reserve, according to the requirement of the moment. The novelty of the evening was Bizet's suite, "Roma," which would sound as sweet by any other name, and which, quaint and bright as it is, we cannot on a single hearing prefer to the same author's suite Artésienne, introduced by the Philharmonic Society during their first season. The first movement is tripartite,—an andante, built upon a horn quartet, a streaming allegro, and a resumption of the andante. If we had to seek a Roman explanation for it, we should say that a group of calmly chanting monks had been suddenly caught in an autumn temporale, when the horn gets all entangled in the violins, but soon, by some pious spell, had gotten the better of the tempest, which obediently joined itself with their psalmody. An allegretto vivace follows, and the last movement is an allegro vivacissimo, labelled "carnival," which led off with a tune that (quite irrelevantly, we dare say) reminded us of "The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington," and thence worked itself to a wild pitch of excitement upon which the orchestra put no restraint. The other orchestral numbers were Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" overture and Schubert's ever-welcome unfinished symphony in B minor.

The soloist, Mr. Carl Faelten, pleased the audience greatly; nor was he undeserving of the applause they gave him. He is one of the pianists in whom technique predominates, and his manner of playing makes that technique obvious in the continual swaying of the body and tossing of the hands. But his style is elegant and refined; if it glitters almost too much, it does not glare; and if it rings almost too clear, it does not roar or rasp. It is the perfection of enunciation; in long trills, in runs and turns, as also in double octaves, the articulation is infinitely clear. Mr. Faelten's powers are not, however, limited to his manual skill. He reads with taste, discretion and thoughtful intelligence, and his playing affords high intellectual satisfaction, though it fails to go much below the surface of the composition. Possessing such a command of the instrument as he does, and taking two of his selections from Raff and Liszt, who certainly give a pianist opportunities for excess, it is an evidence of his artistic good sense that he sought no personal display and exhibited no tours de force. The Chopin ballad (G minor, opus 23) satisfied us least; beautifully turned and varied as it was, the interpretation impressed as being somewhat too studied, and we should have preferred "more matter with less art" in many of its pages. It is possible that something of the coldness we have noticed may have been due to the piano-forte,—a Knabe,—which was very limpid, pure, and even, but which seemed deficient in body for the concerto, and in voicing more suited for execution than for expression.

At the concert of this week there will be a strong representation of Wagner and Berlioz. From the former, three numbers are to be given—the prelude and "Good Friday's spell" from "Parsifal," and Walther's "Prize-song" from the "Mastersingers;" this will be sung by Mr. Toedt, who also is to give songs by Pergolesi, Liszt and Rubinstein. The Berlioz selection is his "Harold in Italy" symphony.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The soloist of the occasion was Mr. Carl Faelten, who proved to be a pianist of remarkably fine powers. His technique is wonderfully brilliant and finished, and appears to be fully equal to the most trying demands that can be made upon it. He plays with great fire, frankness and sincerity and without a trace of affectation. His style is large and thoughtful, and his performances generally are distinguished by delightful clearness, virility, and refined artistic taste. His touch is extremely beautiful, and his phrasing masterly. Unfortunately, the selections he chose for performance, Raff's Concerto in C minor, Chopin's Ballad in G minor, and Liszt's Polonaise in E, did not afford him any marked opportunities for the display of much else than technique. In this, as we have already stated, he is exceedingly fine. Of his command over the deeper and more intellectual qualities of his art, we have not yet had an opportunity to judge; but an early occasion, already announced, will permit a clearer insight into Mr. Faelten's talents. In the meanwhile we may freely concede that we have rarely heard more beautiful, more brilliant or more perfect piano technique than his performances of last night presented. He was heartily applauded and recalled, and made a most pleasing impression. The symphony was Schubert's in B minor (Unfinished). Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" overture, and Bizet's suite "Roma" were the other orchestral selections. Bizet's work is full of charm, brilliancy, musicianship, melody, taste, and artistic sentiment. If we are not mistaken, it has been heard here before at one of the concerts of the Philharmonic Society of Boston. The playing of the orchestra through the entire concert may be commended. The symphony in particular was performed in a very chaste manner. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Prelude, "Parsifal," Walther's Preislied, from "Die Meistersinger," and "Good Friday's Spell" from "Parsifal," Wagner; and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold in Italy." The soloist is to be Mr. T. J. Toedt.

Notes.

The eighteenth of the symphony concerts was given in the Music Hall on Saturday night, under the directorship of Mr. Georg Henschel, and the following programme was interpreted: Overture (The Ruins of Athens), op. 113, Beethoven; Concerto for Pianoforte in C minor, op. 185, Raff; Symphony in B minor (unfinished), Schubert; Piano Solo (a) Ballad in G minor, op. 23, Chopin; (b) Polonaise in E, Liszt; "Roma," No. 3 of the Suites (first time), Bizet. The piano soloist was Herr Carl Faelten, of the Peabody Institute Conservatory of Baltimore, one of the best pianists on the continent, as was evidenced by the masterly manner in which he discharged the work assigned him. His playing was intelligent and refined; it was invested with a wonderful degree of vitality; everything was conceived with the best possible taste and executed with rare technical skill. He awoke the utmost enthusiasm in his audience, and in the Raff concerto, the Chopin ballad and the Liszt polonaise showed his masterly abilities to the very best. He was recalled a number of times after his various numbers, and received that hearty applause which was no more than his just due. The orchestral feature of the evening was the "Roma," No. 3 of the suites by Bizet, heard for the first time. It is a composition full of lovely movements, abounding in fascinating themes, which are treated with much original skill. The suite was finely played by the orchestra, and will be heard with an added pleasure whenever again placed on a programme. The other work of the orchestra was well done, and especially was this the case with the now familiar symphony of Schubert in B minor, which was heard with as much delight as ever. The nineteenth concert takes place at the Music Hall on Saturday evening next, when the following programme is to be given: Prelude (Parsifal), Walther's Preislied (the Mastersingers) and Good Friday's Spell (Parsifal), first time, Wagner; Songs with piano: (a) Nina, Pergolesi; (b) The Lark (Rubinstein); (c) "Du bist wie eine Blume," Liszt; Symphony (Harold in Italy), op. 16, Berlioz. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, the New York tenor, is to be the soloist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Sunday Herald
Eighteenth Programme of the Season, Carl Faelten Soloist.

The 18th programme of the season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, was presented at Music Hall last evening. The soloist was Mr. Carl Faelten of Baltimore, pianist, and the selections were:

Overture ("The Ruins of Athens"), op. 113, Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in C minor, op. 185, Raff
Symphony in B minor, Schubert
Piano solo—(a) Ballad in G minor, op. 23, Chopin
(b) Polonaise in E, Liszt
"Roma," No. 3 of the suites, Bizet

As a whole, the programme was one of the most enjoyable of the season, and merited a more general attendance of ticket holders. Mr. Faelten was heard for the first time here on this occasion, and proved to be an artist of sterling ability, well worthy the prominence given him in the programme. His playing is characterized by genuine vitality, rare intelligence and excellent taste, all of which give a keen sense of pleasure in listening to his work. His masterly exhibition of his technical ability aroused the enthusiasm of the audience to some grand demonstrations, and his thoroughly artistic interpretation of the several numbers assigned him was fully appreciated by his hearers. A notable feature of his playing of the brilliant opening allegro of the concerto was the clearness and beauty of his phrasing, and this excellence was equally noticeable throughout the melodious composition of Raff. The Chopin ballad was less suited to display the artist's merits, as there is little that is poetic or sentimental in his playing, and the full beauty of this number was not realized in his rendering. The Liszt polonaise, however, was exactly suited to show Mr. Faelten's technical skill and his brilliant performance of the selection fairly electrified the audience. He was recalled repeatedly after his numbers. The novelty of the evening, the "Roma," by Bizet, presents this talented composer at his best, the composition being crowded with bright, melodious ideas which are treated with all the skill, originality and richness of coloring for which the composer of "Carmen" is noted. Each of the three movements has a distinctive beauty, but the concluding "Carnaval" is one of the most striking compositions of this class heard here for many years, its ever changing and always fascinating themes giving a realistic tone picture full of interest and pleasure to the listener. The beauty of the orchestral scoring is as notable as in Bizet's other works, and altogether "Roma" is a work well worthy the talented composer who did not live long enough to enjoy the pleasure of knowing that his merits were recognized. The grand movements of the Schubert unfinished symphony were as pleasing as ever, and the Beethoven overture made a happy introduction to the musical pleasures of the evening.

Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening, and was one of the most interesting of the series. The programme was as follows: Overture (The Ruins of Athens), op. 113, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte in C minor, op. 185, Raff; symphony in B minor (unfinished), Schubert; piano solo, (a) ballad in G minor, op. 23, Chopin, (b) polonaise in E, Liszt; "Roma," No. 3 of the suites (first time), Bizet. The chief interest of the occasion centred upon the performance of Mr. Carl Faelten, who made his first appearance in Boston as a pianist. His success was unqualified and thoroughly well deserved, and he showed himself to be a player of remarkable power and knowledge. Some exception might be taken with his selections in that they afforded no great opportunity for the display of any other than his technical abilities, although his rendering of portions of the second movement—andante quasi larghetto—of the concerto gave something more than a hint of great ability in the field of sympathetic and refined expression as well. Concert-goers here have rarely heard a performance so confident, strong and satisfying as his on Saturday night. No exception could be taken to it, so perfect and brilliant, yet modest and restrained was it. His playing was beautifully clear, clean-cut and precise, fluent and rippling in rapid passages, and so strong throughout that, even in the loudest sounds of the orchestral accompaniment, the piano was distinctly heard to maintain its own place and effect. Mr. Faelten received a hearty welcome, and at the conclusion of each of his numbers was warmly applauded and several times recalled. He used a Knabe piano, a fine instrument, which responded perfectly to the very exacting demands he made upon it. The work of the orchestra during the evening was very good indeed, the symphony receiving much more satisfactory treatment than was accorded to it last season. Bizet's suite, which closed the concert and was performed for the first time in Boston on this occasion, proved to be an interesting work, finely scored and exhilarating, but without the power to produce any particularly strong effect upon the mind. The next concert will present Mr. Theodore J. Toedt as soloist and the following programme: Prelude (Parsifal), Walther's Preislied (the Mastersingers) and Good Friday's Spell (Parsifal), (first time), Wagner; Songs with piano: (a) Nina, Pergolesi; (b) The Lark, Rubinstein; (c) "Du bist wie eine Blume," Liszt; Symphony (Harold in Italy), op. 16, Berlioz.

The Concert Room.

Boston Herald
"Where you shall hear music."
July 16 1884

An artful mechanic can so manage that mighty machine, the trip-hammer, as to crush a boulder or only crack an egg-shell with it.

Yet some critics, and even some musicians, would exclude from their examination of a pianist any consideration of his touch. It is a congenital quality, they say, like the color of his eyes or the length of his legs, and being thus incapable of modification, it ought not to be discussed.

A piano-forte is a machine, to be sure; but it is no less susceptible to various manipulation than a trip-hammer. And if a machinist can be taught the balances of the latter, it would seem to be clear that a pianist's handiwork is also capable of development or alteration.

At any rate, everybody knows that different hands produce very different sounds in merely formal or simple thoughtless motion of the keys. And it was apparent to the MUSIC HALL audience at the last symphony concert (and the to company at the MEIGNAON on Monday evening,) that Mr. Carl Faelten, of Baltimore, knows how to produce very delightful sounds.

Clear, pure and individual tones are perhaps the first and foremost characteristic of his playing. The development of modern technique is so great and so widespread, that certainty is expected of all artists, and a real blunder made by a soloist would come upon an audience like lightning out of a fair sky. But between getting all the notes in, and getting them in beautifully and delicately, there is a distinction; and it is the latter ability which Mr. Faelten possesses. He is a little showy in his manner, but he is also gentle, graceful and refined.

But what else? Let us see. There are many pictures of the Düsseldorf school, well drawn and exquisitely finished, which do not move him who looks at them to any imagination of reality. They are pictures, not scenes. So Mr. Faelten's most carefully studied and wrought passages do not give the real body of the thoughts they purport to convey. Intellectual, appreciative, elegant, and honest, his playing is not vital nor influential. But it is delightful, nevertheless.

At the Saturday concert the symphony was apparently at a discount, being represented only by those two movements of the unfinished Schubert in B minor. But there is a world of beauty in them which we would not give for the two biggest symphonies Brahms ever wrote. How beautiful, in the first movement, the gradual preparation for the final ripresa of the theme! And what a contrast between the themes of the second—as if between worldly toil and heavenly rest!

Bizet who is nought if not odd and piquant, was represented by a suite called "Roma," given for the first time. There is not anything particularly suggestive of Rome rather than Portland unless it be the final vivacissimo, which is put forward to do duty for the Carnival, but which grows into such a genial fury at last as rather to suggest the Befana. The first movement interpolates between two versions of a serious-minded andante an allegro that comes rattling down from the strings like a shower of confetti on couple of New England deacons. The other a movement is of a more tempered speed and of terpsichorean insinuation.

These things and Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" overture, the orchestra played with that sustained excellence which is fast growing to be a habit with them.

Music Hall.

1883-84.

ONY ORCHESTRA.

CHEL, CONDUCTOR.

NCERT.

RY 19TH, AT 8, P. M.

RAMME.

etheus.) . . . BEETHOVEN.

nd Dalila.) . . . SAINT-SAËNS.
st time.)

er.) No. 11, op. 214. . . RAFF.
st time.)
legretto.—

op. 23. . . HENSCHEL.
st time.)
ale.

WAGNER.

SOIST:

LY WINANT.

PLEASE SEE 4TH PAGE.

Thuringian schoolboy having all could not therefore, by entering Germany at it, Thuringian year, being ctory labor, &c. se of many violin and chestras in enty-second fort-on-the-no playing, prominent us Schoch, rgy; he re-gress when He had to in the Ger-fingers had s had aban-is pianistic did not lose always hav-He played he was his to the posi-a few years f the most y. In the ys very suc-r first-class ls at Berlin, a, London lly fond of vocation as sults. f the cele-pened after i was con-Raff was Frankfort, ano classes f perfectly-ial training ber of lec-

ing in fascinating themes, which are treated with much original skill. The suite was finely played by the orchestra, and will be heard with an added pleasure whenever again placed on a programme. The other work of the orchestra was well done, and especially was this the case with the now familiar symphony of Schubert in B minor, which was heard with as much delight as ever. The nineteenth concert takes place at the Music Hall on Saturday evening next, when the following programme is to be given: Prelude (Parsifal), Walther's Preislied (the Mastersingers) and Good Friday's Spell (Parsifal), first time, Wagner; Songs with piano: (a) Nina, Pergolesi; (b) The Lark (Rubinstein); (c) "Du bist wie eine Blume," Liszt; Symphony (Harold in Italy), op. 16, Berlioz. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, the New York tenor, is to be the soloist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Sunday Herald
Eighteenth Programme of the Season, Carl Faelten Soloist.

The 18th programme of the season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, was presented at Music Hall last evening. The soloist was Mr. Carl Faelten of Baltimore, pianist, and the selections were:

Overture ("The Ruins of Athens"), op. 113, Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in C minor, op. 185, Raff
Symphony in B minor, Schubert
Piano solo—(a) Ballad in G minor, op. 23, Chopin
(b) Polonaise in E, Liszt
"Roma," No. 3 of the suites, Bizet

As a whole, the programme was one of the most enjoyable of the season, and merited a more general attendance of ticket holders. Mr. Faelten was heard for the first time here on this occasion, and proved to be an artist of sterling ability, well worthy the prominence given him in the programme. His playing is characterized by genuine vitality, rare intelligence and excellent taste, all of which give a keen sense of pleasure in listening to his work. His masterly exhibition of his technical ability aroused the enthusiasm of the audience to some grand demonstrations, and his thoroughly artistic interpretation of the several numbers assigned him was fully appreciated by his hearers. A notable feature of his playing of the brilliant opening allegro of the concerto was the clearness and beauty of his phrasing, and this excellence was equally noticeable throughout the melodious composition of Raff. The Chopin ballad was less suited to display the artist's merits, as there is little that is poetic or sentimental in his playing, and the full beauty of this number was not realized in his rendering. The Liszt polonaise, however, was exactly suited to show Mr. Faelten's technical skill and his brilliant performance of the selection fairly electrified the audience. He was recalled repeatedly after his numbers. The novelty of the evening, the "Roma," by Bizet, presents this talented composer at his best, the composition being crowded with bright, melodious ideas which are treated with all the skill, originality and richness of coloring for which the composer of "Carmen" is noted. Each of the three movements has a distinctive beauty, but the concluding "Carnaval" is one of the most striking compositions of this class heard here for many years, its ever changing and always fascinating themes giving a realistic tone picture full of interest and pleasure to the listener. The beauty of the orchestral scoring is as notable as in Bizet's other works, and altogether "Roma" is a work well worthy the talented composer who did not live long enough to enjoy the pleasure of knowing that his merits were recognized. The grand movements of the Schubert unfinished symphony were as pleasing as ever, and the Beethoven overture made a happy introduction to the musical pleasures of the evening.

Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening, and was one of the most interesting of the series. The programme was as follows: Overture (The Ruins of Athens), op. 113, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte in C minor, op. 185, Raff; symphony in B minor (unfinished), Schubert; piano solo, (a) ballad in G minor, op. 23, Chopin, (b) polonaise in E, Liszt; "Roma," No. 3 of the suites (first time), Bizet. The chief interest of the occasion centred upon the performance of Mr. Carl Faelten, who made his first appearance in Boston as a pianist. His success was unqualified and thoroughly well deserved, and he showed himself to be a player of remarkable power and knowledge. Some exception might be taken with his selections in that they afforded no great opportunity for the display of any other than his technical abilities, although his rendering of portions of the second movement—andante quasi larghetto—of the concerto gave something more than a hint of great ability in the field of sympathetic and refined expression as well. Concert-goers here have rarely heard a performance so confident, strong and satisfying as his on Saturday night. No exception could be taken to it, so perfect and brilliant, yet modest and restrained was it. His playing was beautifully clear, clean-cut and precise, fluent and rippling in rapid passages, and so strong throughout that, even in the loudest sounds of the orchestral accompaniment, the piano was distinctly heard to maintain its own place and effect. Mr. Faelten received a hearty welcome, and at the conclusion of each of his numbers was warmly applauded and several times recalled. He used a Knabe piano, a fine instrument, which responded perfectly to the very exacting demands he made upon it. The work of the orchestra during the evening was very good indeed, the symphony receiving much more satisfactory treatment than was accorded to it last season. Bizet's suite, which closed the concert and was performed for the first time in Boston on this occasion, proved to be an interesting work, finely scored and exhilarating, but without the power to produce any particularly strong effect upon the mind. The next concert will present Mr. Theodore J. Toedt as soloist and the following programme: Prelude (Parsifal), Walther's Preislied (the Mastersingers) and Good Friday's Spell (Parsifal), (first time), Wagner; Songs with piano: (a) Nina, Pergolesi; (b) The Lark, Rubinstein; (c) "Du bist wie eine Blume," Liszt; Symphony (Harold in Italy), op. 16, Berlioz.

The Concert Room.

Boston Herald
"Where you shall hear music."

An artful mechanic can so manage that mighty machine, the trip-hammer, as to crush a boulder or only crack an egg-shell with it.

Yet some critics, and even some musicians, would exclude from their examination of a pianist any consideration of his touch. It is a congenital quality, they say, like the color of his eyes or the length of his legs, and being thus incapable of modification, it ought not to be discussed.

A piano-forte is a machine, to be sure; but it is no less susceptible to various manipulation than a trip-hammer. And if a machinist can be taught the balances of the latter, it would seem to be clear that a pianist's handiwork is also capable of development or alteration.

At any rate, everybody knows that different hands produce very different sounds in merely formal or simple thoughtless motion of the keys. And it was apparent to the MUSIC HALL audience at the last symphony concert (and the to company at the MEIONAON on Monday evening,) that Mr. Carl Faelten, of Baltimore, knows how to produce very delightful sounds.

Clear, pure and individual tones are perhaps the first and foremost characteristic of his playing. The development of modern technique is so great and so widespread, that certainty is expected of all artists, and a real blunder made by a soloist would come upon an audience like lightning out of a fair sky. But between getting all the notes in, and getting them in beautifully and delicately, there is a distinction; and it is the latter ability which Mr. Faelten possesses. He is a little showy in his manner, but he is also gentle, graceful and refined.

But what else? Let us see. There are many pictures of the Düsseldorf school, well drawn and exquisitely finished, which do not move him who looks at them to any imagination of reality. They are pictures, not scenes. So Mr. Faelten's most carefully studied and wrought passages do not give the real body of the thoughts they purport to convey. Intellectual, appreciative, elegant, and honest, his playing is not vital nor influential. But it is delightful, nevertheless.

At the Saturday concert the symphony was apparently at a discount, being represented only by those two movements of the unfinished Schubert in B minor. But there is a world of beauty in them which we would not give for the two biggest symphonies Brahms ever wrote. How beautiful, in the first movement, the gradual preparation for the final ripresa of the theme! And what a contrast between the themes of the second—as if between worldly toil and heavenly rest!

Bizet who is nought if not odd and piquant, was represented by a suite called "Roma," given for the first time. There is not anything particularly suggestive of Rome rather than Portland unless it be the final vivacissimo, which is put forward to do duty for the Carnival, but which grows into such a genial fury at last as rather to suggest the Befana. The first movement interpolates between two versions of a serious-minded andante an allegro that comes rattling down from the strings like a shower of confetti on couple of New England deacons. The other a movement is of a more tempered speed and of terpsichorean insinuation.

These things and Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" overture, the orchestra played with that sustained excellence which is fast growing to be a habit with them.

Music Hall.

1883-84.

ONY ORCHESTRA.

CHEL, CONDUCTOR.

NCERT.

RY 19TH, AT 8, P. M.

RAMME.

etheus.) . . . BEETHOVEN.

nd Dalila.) . . . SAINT-SAËNS.
st time.)

er.) No. 11, op. 214. . . RAFF.
st time.)
legretto.—

op. 23. . . HENSCHEL.
st time.)
ale.

WAGNER.

SOIST:

LY WINANT.

PLEASE SEE 4TH PAGE.

Thuringian schoolboy having always could not therefore, by entering Germany at it, Thuringian year, being ctory labor, &c. se of many violin and chestras in enty-second fort-on-the-no playing, prominent us Schoch, rgy; he re-gress when He had to in the Ger-fingers had; had aban-is pianistic did not lose always hav-He played he was his to the posi-a few years f the most y. In the ys very suc-r first-class ls at Berlin, a, London lly fond of vocation as sults. f the cele-pened after i was con-Raff was Frankfort, ved himself ano classes f perfectly-ial training b-r of lec-

ing in fascinating themes, which are treated with much original skill. The suite was finely played by the orchestra, and will be heard with an added pleasure whenever again placed on a programme. The other work of the orchestra was well done, and especially was this the case with the now familiar symphony of Schubert in B minor, which was heard with as much delight as ever. The nineteenth concert takes place at the Music Hall on Saturday evening next, when the following programme is to be given: Prelude (Parsifal), Walther's Preislied (the Mastersingers) and Good Friday's Spell (Parsifal), first time, Wagner; Songs with piano: (a) Nina, Pergolesi; (b) The Lark (Rubinstein); (c) "Du bist wie eine Blume," Liszt; Symphony (Harold in Italy), op. 16, Berlioz. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, the New York tenor, is to be the soloist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Sunday Harold
Eighteenth Programme of the Season, Carl Faelten Soloist.

The 18th programme of the season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, was presented at Music Hall last evening. The soloist was Mr. Carl Faelten of Baltimore, pianist, and the selections were:

Overture ("The Ruins of Athens"), op. 113, Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in G minor, op. 185, Raff
Symphony in B minor, Schubert
Piano solo—(a) Ballad in G minor, op. 23, Chopin
(b) Polonaise in E, Liszt
"Roma," No. 3 of the suites, Bizet

As a whole, the programme was one of the most enjoyable of the season, and merited a more general attendance of ticket holders. Mr. Faelten was heard for the first time here on this occasion, and proved to be an artist of sterling ability, well worthy the prominence given him in the programme. His playing is characterized by genuine vitality, rare intelligence and excellent taste, all of which give a keen sense of pleasure in listening to his work. His masterly exhibition of his technical ability aroused the enthusiasm of the audience to some grand demonstrations, and his thoroughly artistic interpretation of the several numbers assigned him was fully appreciated by his hearers. A notable feature of his playing of the brilliant opening allegro of the concerto was the clearness and beauty of his phrasing, and this excellence was equally noticeable throughout the melodious composition of Raff. The Chopin ballad was less suited to display the artist's merits, as there is little that is poetic or sentimental in his playing, and the full beauty of this number was not realized in his rendering. The Liszt polonaise, however, was exactly suited to show Mr. Faelten's technical skill and his brilliant performance of the selection fairly electrified the audience. He was recalled repeatedly after his numbers. The novelty of the evening, the "Roma," by Bizet, presents this talented composer at his best, the composition being crowded with bright, melodious ideas which are treated with all the skill, originality and richness of coloring for which the composer of "Carmen" is noted. Each of the three movements has a distinctive beauty, but the concluding "Carnaval" is one of the most striking compositions of this class heard here for many years, its ever changing and always fascinating themes giving a realistic tone picture full of interest and pleasure to the listener. The beauty of the orchestral scoring is as notable as in Bizet's other works, and altogether "Roma" is a work well worthy the talented composer who did not live long enough to enjoy the pleasure of knowing that his merits were recognized. The grand movements of the Schubert unfinished symphony were as pleasing as ever, and the Beethoven overture made a happy introduction to the musical pleasures of the evening.

Beethoven
The eighteenth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening, and was one of the most interesting of the series. The programme was as follows: Overture (The Ruins of Athens), op. 113, Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, op. 185, Raff; symphony in B minor (unfinished), Schubert; piano solo, (a) ballad in G minor, op. 23, Chopin, (b) polonaise in E, Liszt; "Roma," No. 3 of the suites (first time), Bizet. The chief interest of the occasion centred upon the performance of Mr. Carl Faelten, who made his first appearance in Boston as a pianist. His success was unqualified and thoroughly well deserved, and he showed himself to be a player of remarkable power and knowledge. Some exception might be taken with his selections in that they afforded no great opportunity for the display of any other than his technical abilities, although his rendering of portions of the second movement—andante quasi larghetto—of the concerto gave something more than a hint of great ability in the field of sympathetic and refined expression as well. Concert-goers here have rarely heard a performance so confident, strong and satisfying as his on Saturday night. No exception could be taken to it, so perfect and brilliant, yet modest and restrained was it. His playing was beautifully clear, clean-cut and precise, fluent and rippling in rapid passages, and so strong throughout that, even in the loudest sounds of the orchestral accompaniment, the piano was distinctly heard to maintain its own place and effect. Mr. Faelten received a hearty welcome, and at the conclusion of each of his numbers was warmly applauded and several times recalled. He used a Knabe piano, a fine instrument, which responded perfectly to the very exacting demands he made upon it. The work of the orchestra during the evening was very good indeed, the symphony receiving much more satisfactory treatment than was accorded to it last season. Bizet's suite, which closed the concert and was performed for the first time in Boston on this occasion, proved to be an interesting work, finely scored and exhilarating, but without the power to produce any particularly strong effect upon the mind. The next concert will present Mr. Theodore J. Toedt as soloist and the following programme: Prelude (Parsifal), Walther's Preislied (the Mastersingers) and Good Friday's Spell (Parsifal), first time, Wagner; Songs with piano: (a) Nina, Pergolesi; (b) The Lark, Rubinstein; (c) "Du bist wie eine Blume," Liszt; Symphony (Harold in Italy), op. 16, Berlioz.

The Concert Room.

Beethoven
"Where you shall hear music." July 16 1884

An artful mechanic can so manage that mighty machine, the trip-hammer, as to crush a boulder or only crack an egg-shell with it.

Yet some critics, and even some musicians, would exclude from their examination of a pianist any consideration of his touch. It is a congenital quality, they say, like the color of his eyes or the length of his legs, and being thus incapable of modification, it ought not to be discussed.

A piano-forte is a machine, to be sure; but it is no less susceptible to various manipulation than a trip-hammer. And if a machinist can be taught the balances of the latter, it would seem to be clear that a pianist's handiwork is also capable of development or alteration.

At any rate, everybody knows that hands produce very different sounds in formal or simple thoughtless motion. And it was apparent to the musical audience at the last symphony concert to company at the MEIIONAON on Monday evening, that Mr. Carl Faelten, of Baltimore, how to produce very delightful sounds.

Clear, pure and individual tones are the first and foremost characteristic of the development of modern technique. The development of modern technique is so great and so widespread, that certainly expected of all artists, and a real blunder by a soloist would come upon an audience lighting out of a fair sky. But betwixt all the notes in, and getting them tidily and delicately, there is a difference and it is the latter ability which Mr. Faelten possesses. He is a little showy in his playing, but he is also gentle, graceful and refined.

But what else? Let us see. There are pictures of the Düsseldorf school, well and exquisitely finished, which do not show him who looks at them to any imagination. They are pictures, not scenes. Mr. Faelten's most carefully studied and passages do not give the real body of thoughts they purport to convey. Intelligent, appreciative, elegant, and honest, his playing is not vital nor influential. But it is nevertheless.

At the Saturday concert the symphony apparently at a discount, being represented only by those two movements of the unfinished Schubert in B minor. But there is a beauty in them which we would not have expected. How beautiful, in the first movement, the gradual preparation for the final ripiet theme! And what a contrast between the themes of the second—as if between toil and heavenly rest!

Bizet who is nought if not odd and piquant, represented by a suite called "Roma" for the first time. There is not anything particularly suggestive of Rome rather than unless it be the final vivacissimo, which forward to do duty for the Carnival, but grows into such a genial fury at last to suggest the Befana. The first movement interpolates between two versions of a minded andante an allegro that comes down from the strings like a shower of rain on a couple of New England deacons. The movement is of a more tempered spirit, a terpsichorean insinuation.

These things and Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" overture, the orchestra played with sustained excellence which is fast growing into a habit with them.

Carl Faelten.

CARL FAELTEN was born in Ilmenau, Thuringia, December 21, 1846. He received as a schoolboy some good instruction in the piano and theory of music, having always the aim to become a good pianist. His parents could not afford to give him a higher musical education; he had, therefore, to utilize an inexpensive chance to become a musician by entering one of those primitive orchestra schools, known in Germany as "Stadtpefereien." In such an institution at Arnstadt, Thuringia, he remained from his fifteenth to his nineteenth year, being daily compelled to do the hardest and most unsatisfactory labor of the musical profession, such as playing dance music, &c.

However, young Faelten acquired the practical use of many orchestral instruments, giving the preference to the violin and clarinet. Afterward he took positions in several orchestras in Germany and Switzerland as violin player. In his twenty-second year he happened to join a little orchestra in Frankfort-on-the-Main, and there he succeeded in taking up his piano playing, which had been neglected for seven years. Some prominent musicians took an interest in him, especially Herr Julius Schoch, an excellent pupil of Alois Schmitt.

Faelten practised now on the piano with great energy; he received also some pupils, and had just made some progress when he was again seriously interrupted in his efforts. He had to serve as a private soldier for a year, and to take part in the German invasion of France. He returned safely, but his fingers had become stiff by the handling of the gun; his pupils had abandoned him, and he was again at the beginning of his pianistic career at the age of twenty-five years. However, he did not lose his courage; he resumed his studies very diligently, always having the object of his endeavors clearly before his eyes. He played occasionally before Julius Schoch, although in general he was his own teacher.

After a few years we find the young man advanced to the position of a noted soloist and music teacher, and after a few years more we find him acknowledged in Frankfort as one of the most prominent musicians of that very musical community. In the years 1874-77, he appeared also occasionally and always very successfully in symphony concerts, in concerts with other first-class artists, such as George Henschel, or in his own recitals at Berlin, Bremen, Cassel, Haag, Schwerin, Wiesbaden, Vienna, London and other European cities. He never was especially fond of traveling, but he got more and more interested in his vocation as an instructor, in which branch he met with unusual results.

At Wiesbaden, Faelten made the acquaintance of the celebrated composer, Joachim Raff. This acquaintance ripened after a short while into a very intimate friendship, which was continued during Raff's lifetime. When in the year 1877, Raff was engaged to create and lead a conservatory of music in Frankfort, one of his first appointments was that of Faelten, who proved himself an excellent acquisition for the new institute. His piano classes were always crowded and he turned out a number of perfectly-trained students. He was also charged with the special training of teachers, and had to deliver annually a great number of lectures on "Method of Piano Playing," embracing all the theoretical and practical attainments for piano teachers.

250

After Raff's sudden death in the summer of 1882, Faelten completed a plan which he had contemplated for many years, to make the United States his home. He accepted an invitation to join the Conservatory of Music of the Peabody Institute, in Baltimore, where he arrived in September, 1882, and has remained until now. He made himself at once very useful in the cultivation of music in his new home. He devoted himself to lessons to a great extent and gave sixty piano recitals, in which he displayed an almost inexhaustible repertoire and a remarkable memory. As he does not care much for concert tours, he has been heard only on a few occasions in other cities of our country; but wherever he appeared, as in New York in the Symphony Society concerts and in Boston, he was recognized unanimously as a pianist and musician of the foremost rank.

To the great regret of many cultivated Baltimoreans, Mr. Faelten recently resigned his position at the Peabody Institute, and will make Boston his future home. He has accepted there an important position in the New England Conservatory. His picture graces the frontispice of THE MUSICAL COURIER of to-day.

The Symphony Concert.

Saturday's concert was chiefly interesting from the reception accorded to the new-comer, Mr. Carl Faelton, of whom we have already spoken, and who had good reason to be pleased with the unusually warm welcome accorded him. Mr. Faelten displayed very unusual powers of technique united to an intelligence of phrasing and a delicacy of shading which place him at once in the highest ranks as a pianist. If he is wanting in anything it is in that magnetic power which is granted only to few. His playing is beyond criticism so far as the actual performance is concerned. But he lacks the power to move the man within us, however much the musician may applaud his really excellent work. He was heard on Saturday at his best in the selections from Raff and Liszt, the latter of whom especially offers temptations for more meritorious display, which Mr. Faelton showed himself artist enough to put aside. In fact, his entire abstinence from personal display makes his playing exceedingly pleasant to listen to. But in the Chopin G minor ballade, he seemed to fall somewhat short of that spirituality which is needed for the understanding of the master, whose beauties lie beneath the surface, and whose music needs more than a carefully studied reproduction of the score to bring it home to us.

The playing of the orchestra had recovered all that

SEASON,

"MANFRED"

PHONY

us on that occasion, and o write their names and s Office, Music Hall.

y 29th, after which date ction will be made and

P. M. on

5th,

, and will be conducted s of the Chorus to the

P. LYMAN, Secretary.

251
vim and crispness, the lack of which I lamented at the last concert, and the playing of the instrumental numbers could hardly have been improved.

The novelty of the concert was a suite of Bizet's, "Rome," which I heard for the first time, not without some misgivings as to the title. My friend of the Advertiser is possessed of a sufficiently vigorous imagination to grapple with it, and explains that a group of calmly chanting monks have been suddenly caught in an autumn temporale, when the horn gets all entangled in the violins; but soon, by some pious spell, have gotten the better of the tempest, which obediently joins itself with their psalmody. That is quite Roman enough for me. I think we will leave it at that.

The rest of the programme was made up of the "Ruins of Athens" overture (Beethoven) and Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor.

This week we are to have three Wagner selections, to prepare our minds presumably for the coming festival. Mr. Toedt is to be the vocalist, and to sing amongst other things the prize song from Die Meistersaenger. In addition we are promised the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Belioz.

Key Note

FEBRUARY 16, 1884.

The weekly Symphony Concert introduced to us a pianist new to Boston, Professor Carl Faelten, of whom I shall have more to say next week, as he gives a recital this evening. The programme was as follows:

Overture (The Ruins of Athens). op. 113. Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte in C minor. op. 185. Raff
Allegro—Adante quasi Larghetto—Allegro.—

Prof. Carl Faelten.

Symphony in B minor. (Unfinished) Schubert
Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—

Piano Solo.

a. Ballad in G minor. op. 33. Chopin.
b. Polonaise in E. Liszt.

Prof. Faelten.

"Roma," No. 3 of the Suites Bizet
Andante. Allegro. Andante.—Allegretto vivace.—

Allegro vivacissimo. (Carnaval).—

(First time.)

The overture was well played, but it is not one of the inspirations of Beethoven. By the way, if we are to hear the lesser works of Beethoven it would be a most interesting thing to give the "Battle of Vittoria," which is new to most concert goers. Professor Faelten created a great enthusiasm. Some of his works as well as his mannerisms (the mild swoop of the hands from on high in strong effects, and the sudden flourish of them into mid-air at the close of a phrase) remind me of Rubinstein, but he seems to lack the gentler and sweeter style of playing, and seldom gives a real legato. But his work is broad, manly and majestic. There is never a slip, and never a note blurred, every passage is given with crystal clearness, and the excellent balance of the hands, the power of his octave playing, the clearness of the scale work, in double sixth and third runs, show that in case, a masterly technic is united to an artistic nature. The work itself is one of the most virile (I pray that the printer will not make me say "vile") that ever came from the pen of Raff. It requires breadth of treatment, and it received it at the hand of this leonine pianist.

252

The orchestra was rather slow in the first movement and seemed to be drawn on by the soloist. The brilliant last movement was thorough throughout. In the second part of the Chopin Ballade I somewhat regretted the lack of a real legato, but in the Liszt number the pianist played wonderfully well, giving the first theme with grandiose effect, and its final variation in the most showy fioriture with artistic thoroughness. But when the final reappearance of the theme took place, he had no chance to work it up to greater power than its fortissimo. In this he was somewhat excelled by Sherwood, who manages to reserve an unexpected degree of force for the finale. In this case the true climax became an anti-climax. The symphony was correctly, but somewhat stolidly, played. The interruption of the light-hearted melody by a momentous pause, followed by a dissonant crash, was not done with much unanimity, and we should have liked more elasticity in the tempo of this portion. Mr. Zerrahn's reading of the work about a year ago is the best that I can remember, and was peculiarly effective in this portion.

I do not need to describe Bizet's "Roma" to you, since you have heard it in New York long ago; but I cannot refrain from remarking that the merry-makers seem to have a much better time in the "Carnival" of this work than of that of Raff's Winter Symphony. The work was well given, and the carnival became a regular jamboree. What a headache the Romans must have had the next morning!

L. C. E.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883 - 84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 16TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

PRELUDE. (Parsifal.)

WALTHER'S PREISLIED. (The Mastersingers.)

GOOD FRIDAY'S SPELL. (Parsifal.) *

[First time.]

R. WAGNER.
Died Feb. 13th, 1883.

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a) NINA.

b) THE LARK.

c) "DU BIST WIE EINE BLUME."

PERGOLESI.

RUBINSTEIN.

LISZT.

SYMPHONY. (Harold in Italy.) op. 16.

BERLIOZ.

[Solo Viola: MR. HENRY HEINDL.]

I. HAROLD IN THE MOUNTAINS. Scenes of melancholy, of happiness and of joy.

II. MARCH OF THE PILGRIMS, chanting the evening prayer.

III. SERENADE OF A MOUNTAINEER to his beloved.

IV. BACCHANALE OF THE BRIGANDS. Reminiscences of the previous scenes.

SOLOIST:

MR. THEODORE J. TOEDT.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

* SEE LAST PAGE.

THE CONCERT WILL CLOSE AT 9.30. THOSE OBLIGED TO LEAVE BEFORE THEN WILL PLEASE DO SO DURING THE LAST INTERMISSION — AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

WALTHER'S PREISLIED.

WAGNER.

Morning was gleaming with roseate light,
The air was filled with scent distilled,
When beauty beaming, past all dreaming,
A garden did invite, wherein,
Beneath a wondrous tree,
With fruit superbly laden,
In blissful love-dream I could see
The rare and tender maiden,
Whose charms beyond all price entranced my heart,
Eva in Paradise.

Evening was darkling and night closed around:
By rugged way my feet did stray
Towards a mountain where a fountain
Enslaved me with its sound:
And there beneath a laurel tree,
With starlight glinting under,
In waking vision greeted me
A sweet and solemn wonder;
She tossed on me the fountain dew—
That woman fair, Parnassus' glorious Muse!

Thrice happy day, to which my poet's trance gave place!
That Paradise of which I dreamed,
In radiance new before my face glorified lay.
To point out the path the laughing brooklet streamed
She stood beside me, who shall my bride be,
The fairest sight earth e'er gave,
My Muse to whom I bow, so angel-sweet and grave;
I'll woo her boldly now,
Before the world remaining.

By might of music gaining Parnassus and Paradise.
(Translated by F. Corder.)

NINA.

PERGOLESI.

'Tis now three days since Nina
In slumber deep is laying.
Flutes and cymbels and drums, resound
And wake me my Ninetta,
That she may sleep no more.

THE LARK.

RUBINSTEIN.

See the lark rise in her song,
Thro' the heav'n's blue vault upwinging,
And as fresh as buds upspringing,
Sounds her song.

Rich in freedom streams it down,
From above flows ever song's dominion.
Strives she not with upward pinion
Mute her lay.

Still in song she mounteth high,
Strains from upper air she taketh,
Then o'er earth exulting shaketh, —
Poet like.

DU BIST WIE EINE BLUME.

LISZT.

Thou'rt like a lovely flower,
So beauteous, fair and pure,
But yet my heart feels sorrow,
For what thou may'st endure.

My hands in fancy I'm placing
Upon thy head so rare,
Praying that thy God may keep thee
So beauteous, pure and fair.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the nineteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was—

Prelude to "Parsifal"..... }
Walther's Preislied, from "Die Meistersinger." }
Good Friday's Spell, from "Parsifal"..... }
(First time.) } Wagner
Songs with Pianoforte:
a. Nina..... Pergolesi.
b. Die Lerche..... Rubinstein.
c. "Du bist wie eine Blume"..... Liszt.
Symphony. "Harold in Italy," op. 16..... Berlioz.
Solo Viola. Mr. Henry Heindl.

Mr. Theodore J. Toedt was the singer.

The Wagner selections were in commemoration of the poet-composer's death, Feb. 13, 1883. The prelude to "Parsifal" began a little roughly, the attack of the wind instruments not being always quite simultaneous in the first few phrases. But as soon as these introductory passages had been got over, the playing was superb, full of dignity and majesty, and in the later portion of the work wonderfully expressive. The orchestral music to "Good Friday's Spell," in Act III., had not been heard here before. It proved to be one of the most serenely beautiful, well-nigh ecstatic pieces of writing that we have yet heard from Wagner's pen. It was exquisitely played, and made a profound impression. In Walther's prize song, from the third act of "Die Meistersinger," Mr. Toedt had a task for which he was better fitted by his artistic sensibility and cultivation than by his physique. The song is calculated for a tenor voice of the largest calibre, and this is just what Mr. Toedt's voice is not, with all its beauty of timbre. The young artist sang the music very soulfully, and with evident appreciativeness—in short, wholly beautifully. Only there was certain sense of effort which obstructed itself now and then, and one felt at times that the rhythm dragged a little. The tempo sounded somewhat too slow. We say sounded, because we suspect that the greater vitality of tone of a fuller and richer voice might have made this same tempo seem full of life and vigor, whereas with Mr. Toedt's slighter organ it seemed a thought heavy. We think that Mr. Toedt would find it to his advantage to take the song a little faster than would be desirable had he the heroic voice of a Niemann or a Winkelmann. The group of smaller songs was delightfully sung.

Berlioz's "Harold" symphony has not been heard here since Mr. Thomas gave it several years ago, and was virtually new to almost every listener. We had the advantage of hearing it both at the public rehearsal and at the evening performance. At the former it impressed us as being about the most incomprehensible and outrageous thing we had ever listened to; at the latter, we found it full of beauties of a high order. The loveliness and poetic atmosphere of the pilgrims' march, the quaint beauty of the serenade, must have been felt by all. The fitful outbursts of fury, the rhythmic complications of the first and last movements are such that it takes a certain amount of familiarity with the music to enable one to see the coherence of the composer's thought. Suffice it to say that something of coherent artistic design did impress us at the second hearing; just enough to suggest that a third and fourth hearing would make everything perfectly plain.

Mr. Heindl has the advantages of a very beautiful tone, sure intonation and perfect rhythmic security. What he most lacks is precisely that vitality of accent and phrasing, above all, that innate magnetic power which Berlioz's music, of all others, most demands. With the exception of Chopin, no composer needs so much "rendering" (as the phrase goes) as Berlioz; the mere printed notes are but the skeleton of his musical thought. Such precise, and in most ways excellent playing as Mr. Heindl's is calculated to show itself in a fairer light in almost any other sort of work. To play the viola part in "Harold" one must be possessed with a devil, as Paganini was.

The next programme contains a new symphony by Grimm, and Liszt's A-major concerto, played by Mr. Carl Baermann. The public rehearsal will be on Thursday afternoon, not on Friday.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The exceedingly well-played programme of Saturday evening's symphony concert had a peculiar interest, because it brought side by side—with only the slight intercalation of some little songs—characteristic examples of those two masters of musical effect, who may be said, in general terms, to particularly represent and address the moods and emotions of men. We mean Berlioz and Wagner; of whom the former was represented by his early symphonic poem, "Harold in Italy," and the latter by selections from his latest work, "Parsifal,"—the one all fire, hurry, excitement, unrest, and the other calm, grave, forceful and dominant.

Arguing from merely the premisses of probability, it should appear strange that the audience evidently understood and enjoyed Wagner better than Berlioz. Of the two "Parsifal" numbers, one, the prelude, had been heard before, while the long extract from the third act, the "Good Friday's Spell," was new; the "Harold" had been given here not very long ago. Yet, after most of the movements of the symphony, the audience were evidently in doubt as to whether they were more pleased or perplexed, and their applause was more a compliment to the skilful work of the conductor and orchestra and to the careful, wise and sweet playing by Mr. Henry Heindl of the solo viola, than a spontaneous confession of pleasure. Berlioz's writing, splendid as it is and full of his genius for orchestration, does have here a theatrical way with it, and recalls the earlier years of that hot, ill-regulated, brilliant man when his pegasus had still the bits between his teeth and was taking his own pace, even though he condescended to fly toward the poet's goal.

But the Wagner music made such an impression as its author would have liked to see. Rolling on continuously, with gradual accretion of volume from the first smooth stream of melody in the violins, it bears the listener who once submits to its influence, on and on, into a kind of holy lotus-land, fit for such deep dramas as those in the sequence of the "Holy Grail" and the "Twilight" of the Gods. Reminiscent in scores of passages, constant in the repetition of the author's peculiarly sudden dropping from major to minor chords, imitative of effects original in earlier works; yet the two selections gave a delight that was none the less true and full, because even the sonority of its brass was grave and prolonged.

THE PUBLIC REHEARSAL FOR THIS CONCERT, WILL TAKE PLACE—AS INDICATED ON THE SEASON—on Thursday, Feb. 21st, at 2.30, P. M.
(Music Hall being otherwise occupied on Friday, Feb. 22d, Washington's Birthday.)

WALTHER'S PREISLIED.

WAGNER.

Morning was gleaming with roseate light,
The air was filled with scent distilled.
When beauty beaming, past all dreaming,
A garden did invite, wherein,
Beneath a wondrous tree,
With fruit superbly laden,
In blissful love-dream I could see
The rare and tender maiden,
Whose charms beyond all price entranced my heart,
Eva in Paradise.

Evening was darkling and night closed around:
By rugged way my feet did stray
Towards a mountain where a fountain
Enslaved me with its sound:
And there beneath a laurel tree,
With starlight glinting under,
In waking vision greeted me
A sweet and solemn wonder;
She tossed on me the fountain dew—
That woman fair, Parnassus' glorious Muse!

Thrice happy day, to which my poet's trance gave place!
That Paradise of which I dreamed,
In radiance new before my face glorified lay.
To point out the path the laughing brooklet streamed
She stood beside me, who shall my bride be,
The fairest sight earth e'er gave,
My Muse to whom I bow, so angel-sweet and grave;
I'll woo her boldly now,
Before the world remaining,
By might of music gaining Parnassus and Paradise.
(Translated by F. Corder.)

NINA.

PERGOLESI.

'Tis now three days since Nina
In slumber deep is laying.
Flutes and cymbels and drums, resound
And wake me my Ninetta,
That she may sleep no more.

THE LARK.

RUBINSTEIN.

See the lark rise in her song,
Thro' the heav'n's blue vault upwinging,
And as fresh as buds upspringing,
Sounds her song.

Rich in freedom streams it down,
From above flows ever song's dominion.
Strives she not with upward pinion
Mute her lay.

Still in song she mounteth high,
Strains from upper air she taketh,
Then o'er earth exulting shaketh, —
Poet like.

DU BIST WIE EINE BLUME.

LISZT.

Thou'rt like a lovely flower,
So beauteous, fair and pure,
But yet my heart feels sorrow,
For what thou may'st endure.

My hands in fancy I'm placing
Upon thy head so rare,
Praying that thy God may keep thee
So beauteous, pure and fair.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the nineteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was—

Prelude to "Parsifal"..... }
Walther's Preislied, from "Die Meistersinger." }
Good Friday's Spell, from "Parsifal"..... }
(First time.) Wagner
Songs with Pianoforte:
a. Nina..... Pergolesi.
b. Die Lerche..... Rubinstein.
c. "Du bist wie eine Blume"..... Liszt.
Symphony. "Harold in Italy," op. 16..... Berlioz.
Solo Viola. Mr. Henry Heindl.

Mr. Theodore J. Toedt was the singer.

The Wagner selections were in commemoration of the poet-composer's death, Feb. 13, 1883. The prelude to "Parsifal" began a little roughly, the attack of the wind instruments not being always quite simultaneous in the first few phrases. But as soon as these introductory passages had been got over, the playing was superb, full of dignity and majesty, and in the later portion of the work wonderfully expressive. The orchestral music to "Good Friday's Spell," in Act III., had not been heard here before. It proved to be one of the most serenely beautiful, well-nigh ecstatic pieces of writing that we have yet heard from Wagner's pen. It was exquisitely played, and made a profound impression. In Walther's prize song, from the third act of "Die Meistersinger," Mr. Toedt had a task for which he was better fitted by his artistic sensibility and cultivation than by his physique. The song is calculated for a tenor voice of the largest calibre, and this is just what Mr. Toedt's voice is not, with all its beauty of timbre. The young artist sang the music very soulfully, and with evident appreciativeness—in short, wholly beautifully. Only there was certain sense of effort which obstructed itself now and then, and one felt at times that the rhythm dragged a little. The tempo sounded somewhat too slow. We say sounded, because we suspect that the greater vitality of tone of a fuller and richer voice might have made this same tempo seem full of life and vigor, whereas with Mr. Toedt's slighter organ it seemed a thought heavy. We think that Mr. Toedt would find it to his advantage to take the song a little faster than would be desirable had he the heroic voice of a Niemann or a Winkelmann. The group of smaller songs was delightfully sung.

Berlioz's "Harold" symphony has not been heard here since Mr. Thomas gave it several years ago, and was virtually new to almost every listener. We had the advantage of hearing it both at the public rehearsal and at the evening performance. At the former it impressed us as being about the most incomprehensible and outrageous thing we had ever listened to; at the latter, we found it full of beauties of a high order. The loveliness and poetic atmosphere of the pilgrims' march, the quaint beauty of the serenade, must have been felt by all. The fitful outbursts of fury, the rhythmic complications of the first and last movements are such that it takes a certain amount of familiarity with the music to enable one to see the coherence of the composer's thought. Suffice it to say that something of coherent artistic design did impress us at the second hearing; just enough to suggest that a third and fourth hearing would make everything perfectly plain.

Mr. Heindl has the advantages of a very beautiful tone, sure intonation and perfect rhythmic security. What he most lacks is precisely that vitality of accent and phrasing, above all, that innate magnetic power which Berlioz's music, of all others, most demands. With the exception of Chopin, no composer needs so much "rendering" (as the phrase goes) as Berlioz; the mere printed notes are but the skeleton of his musical thought. Such precise, and in most ways excellent playing as Mr. Heindl's is calculated to show itself in a fairer light in almost any other sort of work. To play the viola part in "Harold" one must be possessed with a devil, as Paganini was.

The next programme contains a new symphony by Grimm, and Liszt's A-major concerto, played by Mr. Carl Baermann. The public rehearsal will be on Thursday afternoon, not on Friday.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The exceedingly well-played programme of Saturday evening's symphony concert had a peculiar interest, because it brought side by side—with only the slight intercalation of some little songs—characteristic examples of those two masters of musical effect, who may be said, in general terms, to particularly represent and address the moods and emotions of men. We mean Berlioz and Wagner; of whom the former was represented by his early symphonic poem, "Harold in Italy," and the latter by selections from his latest work, "Parsifal,"—the one all fire, hurry, excitement, unrest, and the other calm, grave, forceful and dominant.

Arguing from merely the premisses of probability, it should appear strange that the audience evidently understood and enjoyed Wagner better than Berlioz. Of the two "Parsifal" numbers, one, the prelude, had been heard before, while the long extract from the third act, the "Good Friday's Spell," was new; the "Harold" had been given here not very long ago. Yet, after most of the movements of the symphony, the audience were evidently in doubt as to whether they were more pleased or perplexed, and their applause was more a compliment to the skilful work of the conductor and orchestra and to the careful, wise and sweet playing by Mr. Henry Heindl of the solo viola, than a spontaneous confession of pleasure. Berlioz's writing, splendid as it is and full of his genius for orchestration, does have here a theatrical way with it, and recalls the earlier years of that hot, ill-regulated, brilliant man when his pegasus had still the bits between his teeth and was taking his own pace, even though he condescended to fly toward the poet's goal.

But the Wagner music made such an impression as its author would have liked to see. Rolling on continuously, with gradual accretion of volume from the first smooth stream of melody in the violins, it bears the listener who once submits to its influence, on and on, into a kind of holy lotus-land, fit for such deep dramas as those in the sequence of the "Holy Grail" and the "Twilight" of the Gods. Reminiscent in scores of passages, constant in the repetition of the author's peculiarly sudden dropping from major to minor chords, imitative of effects original in earlier works; yet the two selections gave a delight that was none the less true and full, because even the sonority of its brass was grave and prolonged.

THE PUBLIC REHEARSAL for this Concert, will take place—as indicated on the season—on Thursday, Feb. 21st, at 2.30, P. M.
(Music Hall being otherwise occupied on Friday, Feb. 22d, Washington's Birthday.)

258

GOOD FRIDAY'S SPELL. (PARSIFAL. Act III.) WAGNER.

In the Grail's domain.—Open, pleasant spring landscape with flowery meadows.

.
.
.

PARSIFAL.

(Scoops up some water from the spring, bends down to the kneeling Kundry and sprinkles her head.)

I first fulfil my duty thus:—
Be thou baptised,
And trust in the Redeemer!

(Kundry bows her head to the earth and appears to weep bitterly.)

PARSIFAL.

(Turns round and gazes with gentle rapture on the woods and meadows.)

How fair the field and meadows seem to-day!—
Many a magic flow'r I've seen,
Which sought to clasp me in its baneful twinings.
But none I've seen so sweet as here,
These shoots that burst into blossom,
Whose odour recalls my childhood's days
And speaks of loving trust to me.

GURNEMANZ.

That is Good-Friday's Spell, my lord!

.
.

and the very roll of its drums low, and, as it were, remote.

Mr. Toedt was the soloist of the concert. To complete the Wagner half of the programme, he sang between the instrumental numbers Walter's "Prize Song" from the "Mastersingers." He did his best, and was clear and positive in some parts, as he was conscientious in all. But his voice is lost in such orchestration, and his best efforts could only result in a suggestion. Later he sang Pergolesi's "Nina," Rubinstein's "Lark" and Liszt's "Du bist wie eine Blume," with his own beauty of style and enunciation, but with too cloying a sweetness, which he should have relieved by the choice of one song of more manly sturdiness. Mr. Henschel's accompaniments to these songs enhanced their best qualities. And we must say yet again how thoroughly well he followed and showed the spirit of the instrumental music of the evening; even the difficultly suited Berlioz could not have complained that the mountain bacchanale lacked its rushing haste.

At the next concert Professor Baermann, for whom we have waited all too long, will play, having selected Liszt's concerto in A, and Beethoven's fifteen variations in E flat. The overture will be Cherubini's "Water-Carrier," the finale a Slavonian dance of Dvorak, and the symphony an unheard one by Grimm.

Summary THE SYMPHONY CONCERT. Handel

The nineteenth of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, tenor, as soloist, and the following as the programme:

Prelude ("Parsifal")..... } R. Wagner
Walter's Preislied ("The Mastersingers") }
Good Friday's Spell ("Parsifal")..... }
Songs with piano:
(a) "Nina"..... Pergolesi
(b) "The Lark"..... Rubinstein
(c) "Du bist wie eine Blume"..... Liszt
Symphony ("Harold in Italy"), op. 16..... Berlioz

The unusually large attendance was fully warranted by this particularly interesting programme; one of its attractive features being the opportunity it offered to contrast the work of the composer who lived to have his merits recognized in the most enthusiastic fashion by even his own countrymen, and he who constantly fought for a place among the world's geniuses, which was only accorded him after his life struggles were ended. The justice which rewarded Wagner so bounteously during his life for his musical labors was scantily meted out to Berlioz, and yet the future may atone for this unequal distribution of the world's commendation between these two musicians. The performance of the "Parsifal" prelude, heard at these concerts last season, confirmed the opinion gained of its merits at that time, though the presentation showed the result of a better acquaintance with this introduction to the last great effort of the composer. The selection from the third act of the opera, given for the first time here, occurs in the drama as Parsifal, the holy knight, has returned from his long wandering, to the path of the Grail, his mission yet unfulfilled. Kundry, an evil-possessed woman, whose allurements, because of the arts of Klingsor, Parsifal has in his purity withstood, and, in resisting her, has freed her from Klingsor's spell—is awakened from sleep as Parsifal enters, weary and exhausted by his fruitless search after the Grail's castle. She leads him to a fountain, and with ointment bathes his feet and dries them with her hair. Gurnemanz recognizes the spear. Parsifal carries and hails him as the deliverer, and receives him into the brotherhood of the Holy Knights of the Grail. Parsifal's first act is to baptize the penitent, sin-relieved Kundry. The day of Parsifal's return is Good Friday. The striking characteristics of this number were instantly realized, and the fascinating beauty of the composer's work was shown by the almost breathless silence which attended its performance. The Berlioz symphony was heard for the first time since it was played by the Thomas orchestra, some 10 years ago. The work has a somewhat interesting history, as it was at first merely a sketch of a viola solo, prepared by the composer for Paganini. In his examination of the sketch, Paganini found that the viola was not given sufficient prominence, and so Berlioz completed his sketch in the present form. Last evening the solo passages for viola were played with admirable elegance by Mr. Henry Heindl, and the stupendous difficulties of the score were overcome with generally excellent results by the body of musicians so ably led by Mr. Henschel. Of the four movements the "March of the Pilgrims" and the "Serenade" have a singular and fascinating charm in their tuneful measures, and there are fewer of the eccentricities of the composer in these movements than are usually found in his works. The marvellous originality, genius and learning of Berlioz, his masterly control of the fullest resources of the modern orchestra, and the melodious character of all his musical ideas, are shown unmistakably in this composition, and display the great abilities of the composer in the clearest fashion. Mr. Toedt's singing was thoroughly enjoyed and appreciated, the "Preislied" and the songs with Mr. Henschel at the piano suiting his voice in an admirable way. The Wagner number displayed quite an added strength in the singer's voice, and his artistic delivery of the other songs gave genuine pleasure, and fully warranted the enthusiastic applause of the audience after each of his efforts.

Summary The Symphony Concert. Gluck

The programme presented by Mr. Henschel, at the nineteenth symphony concert, in Music Hall, last evening, was, as a whole, a novelty. It was made up, outside of the two or three vocal selections, with piano accompaniment, entirely from the works of Wagner and Berlioz. The Parsifal prelude, with a vocal passage from the Mastersingers, and "Good Friday's Spell," from the first works, occupied the first part of the evening, and the "Harold in Italy" symphony the last part. "Good Friday's Spell" was heard here for the first time. The same peculiar character of orchestration which distinguishes the prelude are found throughout, and it is written in such a similar mood that the insertion of the Mastersingers extract between it and the opening number seemed but an interruption of the same strain. It is not at all an elaborate piece of work, and it awakened last evening no more than a languid interest. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt was the soloist and sang his several numbers with the finest feeling and expressive interpretation of their artistic meaning. He was well received, but not asked to repeat anything. A Berlioz symphony is at least a novelty. It was all listened to with the greatest interest, and much of it with enthusiasm. Mr. Henry Heindl played the viola solo very acceptably. The programme for next week will be as follows:

Overture (The Water Carrier)..... Cherubini
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2 in A..... Liszt
Symphony in D minor, op. 19..... J. O. Grimm
First time.
Piano Solo—
XV. Variations (with a fugue) in E flat, op. 35..... Beethoven
Slavonic Dance No. 8..... Dvorak
Soloist, Mr. Carl Baermann.

260
Review

The Nineteenth Symphony Concert.

adwate

The nineteenth symphony concert took place in Music Hall on Saturday evening. The programme consisted chiefly of selections from those two great masters of musical composition, Berlioz and Wagner, the only additional selections being some songs of a pleasing order. Berlioz was represented by his "Harold in Italy" which is not new in Boston, having been presented here not a great while ago under other auspices. A portion of it is very enjoyable, but the greater part of it is involved and perplexing, and but for its very skillful rendering by the orchestra and the very remarkable excellence of Mr. Henry Heindl's violin solos, it would hardly have elicited the interest that it did. The Wagner music was much better liked, and for the simple reason that it was really much more enjoyable. It made not only a pleasing, but a profound impression. The movement was smooth, undulating and continuous, rolling on like a majestic stream, increasing in volume and intensity to the climax which was a marvel of effect. The author's great powers, peculiarities, musical manipulations are everywhere displayed to the best possible advantage. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Toedt. Between the numbers he sang Walter's "Prize Song" from the "Master Singers" with fine effect. He has a good clear voice, but not strong enough for the orchestration. As the concert went on he sang at intervals Perzolesi's "Nina," Rubenstein's "Lark," Liszt's "Du bist wie eine Blume," with all the grace and force and charm of which he was capable. Mr. Henschel's accompaniments were, as usual, accurate, forcible and in his best style.

Nineteenth Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's present season, which was given at Music Hall before a large audience on Saturday evening, was devoted to the following programme: Prelude ("Parsifal"), R. Wagner; Walther's Prelied ("The Mastersingers"), R. Wagner; Good Friday's Spell ("Parsifal"), R. Wagner; Songs with piano—(a) "Nina," Pergolesi; (b) "The Lark," Rubinstein; (c) "Du bist wie eine Blume," Liszt; Symphony ("Harold in Italy"), op. 16, Berlioz. The occasion was in one sense commemorative of the death of Wagner—who died on February 13—which accounts for the prominence this composer's works held in the programme. The last of the three selections—the "Good Friday's Spell"—was given for the first time in Boston at this concert and proved a very rich, sympathetic and beautiful work. It was excellently played, as was also the other orchestral Wagnerian number. The very striking Berlioz symphony was the chief event of the evening, and was listened to with close and careful attention. It was finely performed, especially the brilliant finale, whose difficulties were overcome with rare success and every appearance of ease. Mr. Henry Heindl played the solo viola, which figures so prominently in the part, with great taste and animation. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, always a favorite tenor soloist here, repeated his former successes in the Wagner "Prelied" and the group of songs, although at some disadvantage through huskiness. At the next concert the programme will be as follows: Overture, "Water Carrier," Cherubini; Concerto for Piano, No. 2, in A, Liszt; Symphony, D minor, J. O. Grimm (first time); XV. Variations in E flat for Piano, Beethoven; Slavonic Dance, No. 8, Dvorak. The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Baermann.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, in the presence of the usual crowded audience. The programme included the following selections: Prelude ("Parsifal"), R. Wagner; Walther's Prelied ("The Mastersingers"), R. Wagner; Good Friday's Spell ("Parsifal"), R. Wagner; Songs with piano (a) "Nina," Pergolesi; (b) "The Lark," Rubenstein; (c) "Du bist wie eine Blume," Liszt; Symphony ("Harold in Italy"), op. 16, Berlioz. The death of Wagner occurred on the 13th of February of last year and this occasion was partly commemorative of him. The selection entitled "Good Friday's Spell" was given for the first time in Boston, and proved a work of great merit and beauty. The chief event of the evening of course was the Berlioz Symphony, which was delightfully given by the noble orchestra. The solo viola was given by Mr. Henry Heindl, and the tenor soloist, Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, reproduced his former brilliant successes in the Wagner "Prelied" and other songs. At the next concert the soloist will be Mr. Carl Baermann, and the following programme will be given: Overture, "Water Carrier," Cherubini; Concerto for Piano, No. 2, in A, Liszt; Symphony, D minor, J. O. Grimm (first time); XV. Variations in E flat for Piano, Beethoven; Slavonic Dance, No. 8, Dvorak.

MUSICAL. Gaithe

Boston Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The date closely coinciding with the anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner, the occasion was commemorated by the performance of the prelude to "Parsifal," Walther's Prelied from "The Mastersingers," and "Good Friday's Spell" from "Parsifal," the last-named selection being given for the first time here. It is a graceful and suggestive bit of writing, as varied and unconventional in its harmonies, and as rich and refined in its scoring, as is all of its composer's later music. It contained nothing that he has not said many times before, and as far as flow and general effect are concerned, it was so like many other selections that we have had from his works as to differ from them but little save in the title it bears. It was smoothly and sympathetically interpreted. The symphony was Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," which is scarcely entitled to be called a symphony in the true sense of the word. However, it is somewhat late in the day to criticize a work which has been exhaustively analyzed again and again, and which has been attacked with fully as much energy as it has been praised. It is always interesting for its clean-cut and remarkably poetic and expressive instrumentation, with its masterly combinations and effects, though the alto solo that runs through it imparts a lugubrious and monotonous color to the work. Strangely enough, it has lost much of that bizarre extravagance of effect that formerly marked it. In truth it is quite sober and in some respects old-fashioned when compared with many works in its kind that have succeeded it; and accustomed as we have become to the wild vagaries of the modern school it is hard to believe that some twenty years ago this now peaceful but still eccentric symphony could have been considered revolutionary and incomprehensible. It was carefully and satisfactorily performed, Mr. Henry Heindl playing the solo viola. The vocalist was Mr. T. J. Toedt, who acquitted himself in his familiar and popular manner, and met with the success that always attends him here. At the next concert the programme will be as follows: Overture, "Water Carrier," Cherubini; Concerto for Piano, No. 2, in A, Liszt; Symphony, D minor, J. O. Grimm (first time); XV. Variations in E-flat for piano, Beethoven; Slavonic Dance, No. 8, Dvorak. The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Baermann.

MUSIC.

Courier

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The performance of so great a work as the "Harold" Symphony, the greatest of Berlioz's five symphonies, constituted naturally the chief attraction of the concert of last night. In drawing his inspiration from Byron's "Childe Harold," Berlioz has been more successful than when treating subjects taken from either Shakespeare (the "Romeo and Juliette" Symphony) or Goethe ("La Damnation de Faust"), and has even excelled the "Sinfonie Fantastique" in so far that he central theme, that first announced in the viola part, is not antagonistic to the different portions of the work, but rather a development of the orchestral ideas. The viola part, in fact, is a thorough representation of Byron's half-sentimental, half-sensual wanderer, and pictures him at times in sympathy with good, at times with evil. Of all Berlioz's great works this symphony was the most rapidly composed, and it is therefore only natural that portions should be more crude than in some of his more carefully written works. But at the same time it contains instrumental effects which are among the most striking that the composer has ever given forth. The combination of harp with the horns, for example, is a color which is found, so far as we know, in no other work, and is strikingly impressive. The pre-eminence given to the viola was partially an accident. It arose in this manner: Paganini, a devoted friend and admirer of Berlioz, had come into possession of a magnificent Stradivarius viola, which he wished to perform in public. He sought out Berlioz and begged him to write a solo for this instrument, (the viola musical repertoire is very limited, only Methul having given any prominence to the instrument) which Berlioz rather reluctantly promised to do. When Paganini saw the first movement of the resultant work he expressed disappointment; he had desired a work of concerto character, where the viola should be playing, as he expressed it, "all the time." Berlioz, however, did not change his scheme, but rather elaborated it, and caused the prominent instrument to typify Byron's erratic traveller and melancholy dreamer. If one studies the caprices and contrasts of the poet's work one can understand the constant irregularity of the complication. In the last movement we find the sensational Berlioz as pictured in the Ride to Hades in the "Damnation de Faust." All the resources of the modern orchestra, all the strange and unusual combinations in which Berlioz revelled, are present in this furious finale. The performance of the work was an excellent one. Mr. Henry Heindl played the solo viola part in a musicianly manner, if without any great degree of fire, still with true feeling and excellent shading. In the broken chords of the second movement more spirit might have been demanded. The tempo of the first movement was admirably suited to the work, especially the accelerando of the close, but the third movement would have been improved by a slower finale. But on the whole it was wonderful to observe how well the orchestra kept together. The beautiful central theme first given out by viola was charmingly shaded, and the subsequent fierce interruptions of brass were promptly done. The thrilling effect of the combination of harp and horn in the solemn bell tone of the march movement was fully brought out, and the final nuances were admirable. The lightness of the Abruzzian Serenade afforded an agreeable contrast to the sombre and frenzied movements which precede and follow it. The finale gives the true Berlioz, however; complex rhythms and mild dissonances follow each other constantly. The orchestra kept well under control save in one very awkward rhythm, where a momentary aberration took place. The whole movement seems to picture

"The frenzy whose convulsion blinds
To all save carnage."

It is a sort of brigand's tea party, and after hearing the amount of percussion used one is content to believe that Berlioz could have written a concerto for bass drum and tam-tam, had he tried. The earlier numbers on the programme, were chiefly Wagnerian in honor of the anniversary of the composer's death (February 13). The Parsifal Prelude was rather roughly played.

Review

The Nineteenth Symphony Concert.

adulate

The nineteenth symphony concert took place in Music Hall on Saturday evening. The programme consisted chiefly of selections from those two great masters of musical composition, Berlioz and Wagner, the only additional selections being some songs of a pleasing order. Berlioz was represented by his "Harold in Italy" which is not new in Boston, having been presented here not a great while ago under other auspices. A portion of it is very enjoyable, but the greater part of it is involved and perplexing, and but for its very skillful rendering by the orchestra and the very remarkable excellence of Mr. Henry Heindl's violin solos, it would hardly have elicited the interest that it did. The Wagner music was much better liked, and for the simple reason that it was really much more enjoyable. It made not only a pleasing, but a profound impression. The movement was smooth, undulating and continuous, rolling on like a majestic stream, increasing in volume and intensity to the climax which was a marvel of effect. The author's great powers, peculiarities, musical manipulations are everywhere displayed to the best possible advantage. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Toedt. Between the numbers he sang Walther's "Prize Song" from the "Master Singers" with fine effect. He has a good clear voice, but not strong enough for the orchestration. As the concert went on he sang at intervals Perzolesi's "Nina," Rubenstein's "Lark," Liszt's "Du bist wie eine Blume," with all the grace and force and charm of which he was capable. Mr. Henschel's accompaniments were, as usual, accurate, forcible and in his best style.

The Nineteenth Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's present season, which was given at Music Hall before a large audience on Saturday evening, was devoted to the following programme: Prelude ("Parsifal"), R. Wagner; Walther's Preislied ("The Mastersingers"), R. Wagner; Good Friday's Spell ("Parsifal"), R. Wagner; Songs with piano—(a) "Nina," Pergolesi; (b) "The Lark," Rubinstein; (c) "Du bist wie eine Blume," Liszt; Symphony ("Harold in Italy"), op. 16, Berlioz. The occasion was in one sense commemorative of the death of Wagner—who died on February 13—which accounts for the prominence this composer's works held in the programme. The last of the three selections—the "Good Friday's Spell"—was given for the first time in Boston at this concert and proved a very rich, sympathetic and beautiful work. It was excellently played, as was also the other orchestral Wagnerian number. The very striking Berlioz symphony was the chief event of the evening, and was listened to with close and careful attention. It was finely performed, especially the brilliant finale, whose difficulties were overcome with rare success and every appearance of ease. Mr. Henry Heindl played the solo viola, which figures so prominently in the part, with great taste and animation. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, always a favorite tenor soloist here, repeated his former successes in the Wagner "Preislied" and the group of songs, although at some disadvantage through huskiness. At the next concert the programme will be as follows: Overture, "Water Carrier," Cherubini; Concerto for Piano, No. 2, in A, Liszt; Symphony, D minor, J. O. Grimm (first time); XV. Variations in E flat for Piano, Beethoven; Slavonic Dance, No. 8, Dvorak. The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Baermann.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, in the presence of the usual crowded audience. The programme included the following selections: Prelude ("Parsifal"), R. Wagner; Walther's Preislied ("The Mastersingers"), R. Wagner; Good Friday's Spell ("Parsifal"), R. Wagner; Songs with piano (a) "Nina," Pergolesi; (b) "The Lark," Rubenstein; (c) "Du bist wie eine Blume," Liszt; Symphony ("Harold in Italy"), op. 16, Berlioz. The death of Wagner occurred on the 13th of February of last year and this occasion was partly commemorative of him. The selection entitled "Good Friday's Spell" was given for the first time in Boston, and proved a work of great merit and beauty. The chief event of the evening of course was the Berlioz Symphony, which was delightfully given by the noble orchestra. The solo viola was given by Mr. Henry Heindl, and the tenor soloist, Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, reproduced his former brilliant successes in the Wagner "Preislied" and other songs. At the next concert the soloist will be Mr. Carl Baermann, and the following programme will be given: Overture, "Water Carrier," Cherubini; Concerto for Piano, No. 2, in A, Liszt; Symphony, D minor, J. O. Grimm (first time); XV. Variations in E flat for Piano, Beethoven; Slavonic Dance, No. 8, Dvorak.

MUSICAL. Gault

Boston Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The date closely coinciding with the anniversary of the death of Richard Wagner, the occasion was commemorated by the performance of the prelude to "Parsifal," Walther's Preislied from "The Mastersingers," and "Good Friday's Spell" from "Parsifal," the last-named selection being given for the first time here. It is a graceful and suggestive bit of writing, as varied and unconventional in its harmonies, and as rich and refined in its scoring, as is all of its composer's later music. It contained nothing that he has not said many times before, and as far as flow and general effect are concerned, it was so like many other selections that we have had from his works as to differ from them but little save in the title it bears. It was smoothly and sympathetically interpreted. The symphony was Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," which is scarcely entitled to be called a symphony in the true sense of the word. However, it is somewhat late in the day to criticize a work which has been exhaustively analyzed again and again, and which has been attacked with fully as much energy as it has been praised. It is always interesting for its clean-cut and remarkably poetic and expressive instrumentation, with its masterly combinations and effects, though the alto solo that runs through it imparts a lugubrious and monotonous color to the work. Strangely enough, it has lost much of that bizarre extravagance of effect that formerly marked it. In truth it is quite sober and in some respects old-fashioned when compared with many works in its kind that have succeeded it; and accustomed as we have become to the wild vagaries of the modern school it is hard to believe that some twenty years ago this now peaceful but still eccentric symphony could have been considered revolutionary and incomprehensible. It was carefully and satisfactorily performed, Mr. Henry Heindl playing the solo viola. The vocalist was Mr. T. J. Toedt, who acquitted himself in his familiar and popular manner, and met with the success that always attends him here. At the next concert the programme will be as follows: Overture, "Water Carrier," Cherubini; Concerto for Piano, No. 2, in A, Liszt; Symphony, D minor, J. O. Grimm (first time); XV. Variations in E flat for piano, Beethoven; Slavonic Dance, No. 8, Dvorak. The soloist is to be Mr. Carl Baermann.

MUSIC.

Courier

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The performance of so great a work as the "Harold" Symphony, the greatest of Berlioz's five symphonies, constituted naturally the chief attraction of the concert of last night. In drawing his inspiration from Byron's "Childe Harold," Berlioz has been more successful than when treating subjects taken from either Shakespeare (the "Romeo and Juliette" Symphony) or Goethe ("La Damnation de Faust"), and has even excelled the "Symphonie Fantastique" in so far that he central theme, that first announced in the viola part, is not antagonistic to the different portions of the work, but rather a development of the orchestral ideas. The viola part, in fact, is a thorough representation of Byron's half-sentimental, half-sensual wanderer, and pictures him at times in sympathy with good, at times with evil. Of all Berlioz's great works this symphony was the most rapidly composed, and it is therefore only natural that portions should be more crude than in some of his more carefully written works. But at the same time it contains instrumental effects which are among the most striking that the composer has ever given forth. The combination of harp with the horns, for example, is a color which is found, so far as we know, in no other work, and is strikingly impressive. The pre-eminence given to the viola was partially an accident. It arose in this manner: Paganini, a devoted friend and admirer of Berlioz, had come into possession of a magnificent Stradivarius viola, which he wished to perform in public. He sought out Berlioz and begged him to write a solo for this instrument, (the viola musical repertoire is very limited, only Methul having given any prominence to the instrument) which Berlioz rather reluctantly promised to do. When Paganini saw the first movement of the resultant work he expressed disappointment; he had desired a work of concerto character, where the viola should be playing, as he expressed it, "all the time." Berlioz, however, did not change his scheme, but rather elaborated it, and caused the prominent instrument to typify Byron's erratic traveller and melancholy dreamer. If one studies the caprices and contrasts of the poet's work one can understand the constant irregularity of the complication. In the last movement we find the sensational Berlioz as pictured in the Ride to Hades in the "Damnation de Faust." All the resources of the modern orchestra, all the strange and unusual combinations in which Berlioz revelled, are present in this furious finale. The performance of the work was an excellent one. Mr. Henry Heindl played the solo viola part in a musicianly manner, if without any great degree of fire, still with true feeling and excellent shading. In the broken chords of the second movement more spirit might have been demanded. The tempo of the first movement was admirably suited to the work, especially the accelerando of the close, but the third movement would have been improved by a slower finale. But on the whole it was wonderful to observe how well the orchestra kept together. The beautiful central theme first given out by viola was charmingly shaded, and the subsequent fierce interruptions of brass were promptly done. The thrilling effect of the combination of harp and horn in the solemn bell tone of the march movement was fully brought out, and the final nuances were admirable. The lightness of the Abruzzian Serenade afforded an agreeable contrast to the sombre and frenzied movements which precede and follow it. The finale gives the true Berlioz, however; complex rhythms and mild dissonances follow each other constantly. The orchestra kept well under control save in one very awkward rhythm, where a momentary aberration took place. The whole movement seems to picture

"The frenzy whose convulsion blinds
To all save carnage."

It is a sort of brigand's tea party, and after hearing the amount of percussion used one is content to believe that Berlioz could have written a concerto for bass drum and tam-tam, had he tried. The earlier numbers on the programme, were chiefly Wagnerian in honor of the anniversary of the composer's death (February 13). The Parsifal Prelude was rather roughly played.

and at a slower pace than we heard it taken in Bayreuth. The Good Friday music was better played, but demands the scenic adjuncts to be admired. The scene is an illustration of the Saviour and Mary Magdalen, under a thin allegorical veil. Mr. Toedt, the tenor soloist, was still husky, but he sang Walther's "Preislied" in an unaffected and broad style. We cannot say as much for his other songs. In "Nina" he made a bad slip at accio non dorme piu, having forgotten either the words or the melody, and in the Liszt song he indulged in the unhealthy, saccharine style which may, on account of its overshadowing, be called the "inaudible school." He used the falsetto artistically, but the whole drift of this kind of singing is pernicious, and cannot be classed as true art. As regards the "Parsifal" selection, we must wait to hear the second act before we can judge of its worth. Then we shall hear Wagner in a new light and one which will place him high in the romantic school. Next week Professor Baermann will be the soloist. Public rehearsal on Thursday.

And now for my symphonic essay. The programme of Saturday night's concert (Boston Symphony Orchestra) was:

Prelude, (Parsifal)	R. Wagner,
Walther's Preislied. (The Mastersingers.) Mr. Toedt.	died Feb. 13, 1883
Good Friday's Spell. (Parsifal) First Time
Songs with Piano
(a) Nina	Pergolesi
(b) The Lark	Rubinstein
(c) "Du bist wie eine Blume."	Liszt
Mr. Toedt.

Symphony. (Harold in Italy,) op. 16 Berlioz
(Solo Viola: Mr. Henry Heindl.)

1. Harold in the Mountains; scenes of melancholy, of happiness and of joy
2. March of the Pilgrims, chanting the evening prayer.
3. Serenade of a mountaineer to his beloved.
4. B echanale of the Brigands. Reminiscences of the previous scenes.

The Wagnerian numbers were given to commemorate Wagner's death, which occurred Feb. 13th, 1883.

The orchestral selections were taken somewhat slower than I heard them rendered in Bayreuth, and there was also occasional confusion among the brasses. Mr. Toedt's singing of the "Preislied," was intelligent enough, but his voice was still husky. In "Nina" he made a slip, however, forgetting seemingly the Italian words. He recovered almost immediately and few noticed the flaw. I do not like the treacley school of sweetness, which this singer is beginning to over-use, perhaps to cover the deterioration of his voice.

This shading down to nothing and then going beyond it, this treating of a tone as a candy puller does a mass of candy is a bad art, even if it does catch the applause of the uncultured and the unthinking. Mr. Toedt is, I believe, too much of a musician, and too far removed from Philisterei, not to see some justice in this criticism, and to wean himself from such a valueless triumph. The Symphony went well. What a work it is! Begun originally as a sort of viola concerto for Paganini to display his Stradivarius in, Berlioz completed it with a view that the instrument should display Childe Harold's character and musings, and the gloomy-toned instrument suits well for depicting Byron's melancholy wanderer, who was, in fact, the poet's self. Spite of the fact that it was the most rapidly composed of Berlioz's Symphonies, it contains some of his best effects of instrumentation. What, for example, can be more thrilling than the combination of harp and horn in producing the solemn bell tone in the second movement. It is also more melodious than much of Berlioz's work. The chief theme, announced at the first part of the viola solo, is remarkably beautiful, and the light rhythms of the serenade are very effective in their contrast with the melancholy which precedes, and the frenzy which follows them. The sensational Berlioz is apparent in the final "orgie." The brigands seem to be holding a church sociable or a conference meeting or something, and the way that the percussion is let loose adds much to the percussedness of the proceeding. Berlioz could, I think, have written a concerto for bass drum, with delight. Mr. Heindl played the solo part conscientiously but somewhat coldly. I could have borne much more fire in the arpeggios of the second movement. But it was well done when one considers the difficulties of the work. The orchestra kept well under control, which speaks well for Mr. Henchel's leadership, and only broke away a little in the finale. But I have exceeded my usual length (though I should wish to say more), and will not analyze further this week. Your readers will welcome the fact that, as regards prolixity, I am going to turn over a new leaf, and will join in singing "When the leaves begin to turn." L. C. E.

The Nineteenth Symphony Concert.

Mrs. Hornum

I spoke last week of the prospective interest of this concert in the opportunity afforded us of hearing on one evening selections from two workers in pretty much the same school, although often widely different in the manner they employ to reach their end—Wagner and Berlioz. The latter may be said to be the founder of the new school of orchestration, which, disregarding all conventional rules and studied methods, sets itself to produce an effect which shall appeal most strongly to the emotions, no matter by what means. Wagner, in turn, may be said to be the first to apply this principle to the operatic drama, of which he was in a certain sense the inventor. Opposed utterly to the restrictions of so-called legitimate scoring, they and their followers have succeeded, at least, in persuading us that the end justifies the means, and to go further, they have converted a large portion of the world to the belief that music appeals most properly to the emotions, and is good or bad according to the effect produced upon them.

Last Saturday an evident comparison was instituted between the two, with a result apparently in favor of Wagner, whose selections from the Parsifal were received, if not with enthusiasm, at least with that serious attention which, to works of that nature, is the highest praise. With the Berlioz symphony, that entitled "Harold in Italy," the effect produced appeared to be more uncertain in its expression, although the excellent playing of the orchestra, and especially the fine rendering of the viola solo, by Mr. Heindl, won for it a well deserved applause.

The Wagner music, which comprised the Parsifal prelude which has been heard before, and the "Good Friday's Spell" from the third act, and was supplemented by Mr. Toedt's singing of Walther's prize ong from Die Meistersaenger, was given as I have seldom heard it except in Germany. Mr. Henschel has evidently placed himself en rapport with the composer, and the result was an even and consistent rendering of that wonderful river of sound, which, whatever be Wagner's faults, carries all before it for the time being.

254

Mr. Toedt's singing was hardly powerful enough for the orchestra, which unavoidably drowned his best efforts. He was far more successful in the latter part of the concert, when he gave Liszt's "Du bist nie wie Blume" with charming sweetness and tenderness, and two songs by Pergolesi and Rubinstein, respectively, to Mr. Henschel's always sympathetic accompaniment.

At the next concert Professor Carl Baermann is announced as the soloist, with Liszt's A major concerto, and Beethoven's variations in E flat. The symphony will be a novelty, by Grimm, and the programme will be completed by Dvorak's "Slavonian dance," and Cherubini's Water Carriers overture.

TIGHT BINDING

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883-84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 23D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (The Water-Carrier.) CHERUBINI.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE. No. 2, in A. LISZT.

SYMPHONY in D minor. op. 19. J. O. GRIMM.

[First time.]
Sostenuto. Allegro.—Trauermarsch. (Andante).—
Scherzo. (Presto).—Finale. (Vivace.)

PIANO SOLO.

XV VARIATIONS (with a fugue) in E flat, op. 35. BEETHOVEN.

SLAVONIC DANCE. No. 8. DVOŘÁK.

SOLOIST:

MR. CARL BAERMANN.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

THE CONCERT WILL CLOSE AT 9.35. THOSE OBLIGED TO LEAVE BEFORE THEN WILL PLEASE DO SO DURING THE LAST INTERMISSION—AFTER MR. BAERMANN'S SOLO NUMBER.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twentieth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being:
Overture to "The Water-Carrier".....Cherubini
Concerto No. 2, in A.....Liszt
Symphony in D minor, Op. 19.....J. O. Grimm
[First time.]

Pianoforte solo:
XV Variations with a fugue, in E-flat,
Op. 35.....Beethoven
Slavonic Dance No. 8.....Dvorák
Mr. Carl Baermann was the pianist.

The Cherubini overture was excellently played, saving that the opening slow movement might have been taken somewhat slower to advantage. The new Grimm symphony cannot be said to have made a very favorable impression. The composer, who graduated at the Leipzig Conservatory some time ago, and who after a few years of professional life at Göttingen moved to Münster to exercise the functions of conductor of the Musikverein there, is best known throughout Germany and in this country by his Suite in canon-form—a work which is more noted for solid technical workmanship than for anything else. His D-minor symphony strikes one as a well-written composition, with no very salient characteristics either to praise or to condemn. It sounds like a good deal of Kapellmeister music, of the sort that one is glad to hear once when well nerved for the occasion by a personal interest in the composer. But, as our Boston public has not the advantage of such a stimulus in the case of Grimm, one wonders a little what special claims his symphony has to be played here. After all, the worst than can be said of it is, that it takes up time which might be spent more profitably and agreeably. True, this may be said of a good many works which one is not sorry to hear, for the hearing them satisfies a legitimate curiosity; but we do not think that anybody had much curiosity to hear this symphony. Grimm was nothing to Boston before the symphony was played, and he is surely nothing more now. The Liszt concerto is a horse of another color; it has been played here before, but still can hardly be called familiar to our concert-going public. Of Liszt's two concertos we confess to liking this one best; in it the composer shows his peculiar genius in all its glory; no other man either could or would have written any part of it. We can call to mind no other effect-piece that seems so sincerely written as this one. It is one succession of magical effects from beginning to end; it sounds the whole gamut of musical jugglery; but so spontaneous does it all seem that one feels that the composer was not so much calculating the effectiveness of his extraordinary feats of tone coloring, when he wrote it, as that he had really got into some Palace of Truth in which he could not but show his real self. Now the very fact that in this work Liszt evidently takes himself perfectly seriously, and that it is one of the most characteristic compositions he ever wrote, implies a good deal that the performer should consider in his manner of playing it. Take Liszt for all in all, he may be called as overwrought and sophisticated a genius as ever had to do with notes. Now Mr. Baermann took the concerto seriously and earnestly enough in all conscience; he threw his whole heart and soul into his playing. In one sense he has never played more finely, with more royal command over bristling technical difficulties, with more sustained power, warmth of feeling, or noble unity and totality of conception. It was truly superb playing of an exceptionally taxing work; the impression it made was overwhelmingly brilliant. Yet, with all this, there was a side to the whole performance that gave one a certain sense of incongruity. Between a man like Liszt taking his own work seriously, and a man like Mr. Baermann taking Liszt's work seriously there is a considerable distance. Taking the two men as we know them, the one from his playing and the other from his writing, one would say that there could hardly be two musical natures of more utterly different instincts. Mr. Baermann, the truest, simplest most unspoiled and artless of warm musical natures, throws himself wholly without mental reservation into a Liszt concerto, which is the spontaneous outpouring of a man whose very life-breath is sophistication, whose musical palate is so jaded that anything short of cayenne seems more tasteless food to him, and who cannot be artless to save himself. The result is that we instinctively ask of Mr. Baermann, que diable aussi faisait il dans cette galère? With all the beauty and splendor of his playing, we could not find the peculiar Liszt spirit in it. That earnest simplicity and directness of purpose seemed wholly out of place in the tormented and wellnigh outrageous music. How beautifully Mr. Baermann played the Beethoven variation need hardly be said. The selection, however, seemed strangely unwise in the circumstances.

A symphony concert is not conducive to that state of mental aloofness from all disturbing thoughts in which alone such music is to be enjoyed. It demands a severer strain upon the attention than one is capable of except at certain rare moments.

The next programme is—
Hornpipe in B-flat (from the Concerto grosso No. VII.).....Haendel
Recitative and Aria from "The Children of Israel in the Desert".....C. Ph. E. Bach
[First time.]
Symphony in A. (Spring.) No. 2, op. 34..J. K. Paine
[Conducted by the composer.]
Ballad for Violin in F-sharp minor. (MS.)...Henschel
[First time.]
Hans Sach's Monologue from "The Mastersingers".....Wagner
Danse des Bacchantes, from "Phlémon et Baucis".....Gounod
[First time.]

Mr. Bernhard Listemann will be the violinist, and Mr. Georg Henschel the singer.

There is little question that Wilhelm von Gericke has the appointment as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. It is said that he was recommended to Mr. Higginson by Mr. Henschel. Not much is known about him outside of Vienna, but from there comes word that he is about forty-five years old, has for eight years directed the orchestra at the Imperial Opera, and succeeded Brahms as conductor of the Philharmonic Society.

GEORG HENSCHEL.

Rogers

MUSIC AND DRAMA. Admire

Reigning Attractions of Stage and Concert Hall.

The Twentieth Symphony Concert.

The twentieth symphony concert took place in Music Hall, Saturday evening. The pianist was Mr. Carl Baermann. The opening piece was Cherubini's well-known overture entitled "The Water Carrier." It is very charming, and was excellently rendered, save that it was a little too fast and spirited for the author's intention, as that intention is manifested in the written score. Liszt's Concerto in A, was next played by Professor Baermann. Of the concerto itself, it may be said that it is in its authors best vein, which is high enough praise. Of its performance by Professor Baermann it is simple justice to say that it was masterly in every respect. With its marvelous technique, he combined the sincerest, deepest feeling, and gave in continuous succession all the musical effects that are characteristic. The audience was so carried away with enthusiasm, that it could not content itself with recalling Mr. Baermann either once or twice, but persisted in doing it the third time. Grimm's symphony is well written, has some brilliant passages, is by turns grave and gay, stately and simple, but it is not calculated to awaken any very great or profound interest. A great many better things might have been selected. It was however well rendered, the orchestra presenting it for all that it was worth. The Beethoven "Variations" were superbly played by Mr. Baermann. They are classical, dignified, and at times almost severe and yet they are full of sentiment and tenderness and fine effects, setting off the great composer's wonderful versatility to excellent advantage. The fugue especially was splendidly interpreted. The last piece was the "Slavonic Dance" by Dvorak, a strange, wild, incongruous, but effective composition, which was rendered in the spirit in which was written, and well received. The programme this evening will be as follows:

- No. VII Handel
- Recitative and Aria from "The Children of Israel in the Desert" C. Ph. E. Bach
- [First time.]
- Symphony in A, (Spring.) No. 2, Op. 34. J. K. Paine
- [Conducted by the composer.]
- Ballad for Violin in F-sharp minor. (MS.) Henschel
- [First time.]
- Hans Sach's Monologue from "The Mastersingers" Wagner
- Danse des Bacchantes, from "Philemon et Baucis" Gounod
- [First time.]

Mr. Bernard Listeman will be the violinist, and Mr. Georg Henschel the singer.

THE TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony by J. O. Grimm which was introduced to Boston at the last concert of the Symphony orchestra did not prove to be a particularly interesting work. The author, who must now be a man of about 50 years of age, enjoys a respectable though not very extended reputation as a sound musician, and his chamber music is esteemed. This symphony is scholarly, and it certainly never offends, unless by that length of the first movement which is so frequent a fault in modern symphony writing. The movements are: A sostenuto and allegro: an andante entitled a Trauersmarsch; the scherzo, which is marked presto, and the finale, which is vivace. The themes are pleasant enough, but bear no impress of positive originality; the rhythm of the beginning of the scherzo is perhaps the most marked in the whole work, and the vivace, although more current and continuous, seems to succeed this like its second part, and is the most satisfactory portion of the work. There is not much freshness or light in the orchestration, although there is a steady smoothness about it which fills the ear agreeably. Altogether, it seems such a composition as many musicians of taste, education and leisure might write. The orchestra played admirably, and Mr. Henschel lost no opportunity of giving such variety as was possible. The other orchestral numbers were Cherubini's "Water-Carrier" overture, and the eighth of Dvorak's Slavonian dances, the clash and jingle of which had quite a relish after the tamer effects of the other two numbers.

To say that Professor Baermann played, is to imply how delightful the other two numbers of the programme became under his hands and because of them. The Liszt concerto (No. 2 in A), which was his principal selection, is, first and foremost, a test of virtuosity. It sounds from beginning to end as if written by a pianist to show what can be done with the pianoforte. The scheme of the concerto seems to lack both coherence and stability, although the furious finale has a relationship to the strong phrases which follow after the calm introduction. The orchestral part sounds as if it were composed to give the pianist a chance to show, one after another, all the possibilities of a perfect command of the instrument,—its arpeggios, its runs, its trills, its octaves, its skips and its full chords. Fortunately for the concerto, Professor Baermann dignifies it and gives it a character greater than its own. His technique is so wonderful in its extent and variety, that it leaves him free to shape a hundred passages of little more value than bravura, into such artistic forms, that they appear to be almost gems, and his conscientiousness makes one think, from the earnestness of his playing, that the work must be as great and good as it is difficult and startling. Much more worthy of his talent, and no less a proof of his wise reading and perfect playing, was the set of fifteen Beethoven variations, opus 35, which he delivered with splendid clearness and vigor. The pianoforte (a Chickering) supported him superbly: under a less remarkable touch than his it would have appeared less pure and fine, of course; but it was, apart from this advantage, an exceptionally equal and rich instrument.

At the next concert Mr. Paine's "Spring" symphony will be played under the composer's own direction: Mr. Listemann will play a MS. ballad for violin by Mr. Henschel; the orchestra will play a hornpipe from Handel's great concerto No. 7, and a Bacchanalian dance (first time) from Gounod's "Philemon and Baucis;" and Mr. Henschel will sing Hans Sach's monologue from the "Master Singers," and (first time) an air from C. Ph. E. Bach's "Children of Israel" oratorio.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Neither "wind nor snow and ice" on Saturday evening kept away the usual large audience that a Boston Symphony Concert always attracts. The programme presented Professor Carl Baermann as piano soloist, and was as follows: Overture, "The Water Carrier," Cherubini; concerto for pianoforte (No. 2, in A), Liszt; symphony in D minor (op. 19), J. O. Grimm; piano solo (fifteen variations, with a fugue in E flat, op. 35), Beethoven; Slavonic dance (No. 8), Dvorak. To listen to Prof. Baermann is always an artistic event, but when to this is added a new symphony, never before performed in this country, the interest is heightened. This symphony in D minor, from Herr Grimm, is a composition that possesses an enduring value, which will grow with familiarity. Its author is not widely known outside of Germany, but he shows the spirit of the true musician and develops his effects with genuine force and strength rather than with brilliancy. The two last movements were very fine and delightfully performed by the orchestra. Professor Baermann's selection presented some of his greatest effects, and his technical skill and wonderful power of interpretation were never heard to better advantage. The audience recognized with enthusiasm this master-hand, and nothing that has ever been heard in Boston equals Professor Baermann's playing. Next Saturday's concert will present Mr. B. Listemann and Mr. Henschel as the soloists, and Prof. Paine will conduct his own symphony. The programme is as follows: Hornpipe in B flat (from concerto No. 7), Handel; recitative and aria (The Children of Israel in the Desert), C. Ph. E. Bach (first time); symphony in A (Spring), No. 2, op. 34, J. K. Paine; ballad for violin in F sharp minor (MS.), Henschel (first time); Hans Sach's Monologue (The Mastersingers), Wagner; Danse des Bacchantes (Philemon et Baucis), Gounod (first time).

Twentieth Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, the programme, which presented Professor Carl Baermann as piano soloist, being as follows: Overture, "The Water Carrier," Cherubini; concerto for pianoforte (No. 2, in A), Liszt; symphony in D minor (op. 19), J. O. Grimm; piano solo (fifteen variations, with a fugue, in E flat, op. 35), Beethoven; Slavonic dance (No. 8), Dvorak. The occasion was a particularly interesting one, both because of the always enjoyable playing of Professor Baermann and the presentation of a new symphony. This work, which is the production of a man rather well known in Germany but with little reputation outside that country, proved to be of considerable interest, but made no very great impression on first hearing. It is a composition which in solidity and force shows the hand of a true musician, and is developed with much ingenuity and skill. It has not much brilliancy or inspirational force, and only the last two movements are especially interesting. It was excellently performed on Saturday night, and the orchestral work was calculated to present it with every possible advantage. The most important event of the evening was Prof. Baermann's piano playing, of which almost nothing but admiring praise can with justice be said. His selections presented his method in every point of advantage, and he displayed to the utmost his extraordinary combination of technical and emotional power. The strength and feeling of his performance were admirable, and no difficulties seemed to be too great for his easy mastery of them. His playing was the finest that has been heard in Boston this season, and its merit was recognized by the greatest marks of enthusiasm on the part of the audience.

Rogham

MUSIC AND DRAMA. Adminto

Reigning Attractions of Stage and Concert Hall.

The Twentieth Symphony Concert.

The twentieth symphony concert took place in Music Hall, Saturday evening. The pianist was Mr. Carl Baermann. The opening piece was Cherubini's well-known overture entitled "The Water Carrier." It is very charming, and was excellently rendered, save that it was a little too fast and spirited for the author's intention, as that intention is manifested in the written score. Liszt's Concerto in A, was next played by Professor Baermann. Of the concerto itself, it may be said that it is in its authors best vein, which is high enough praise. Of its performance by Professor Baermann it is simple justice to say that it was masterly in every respect. With its marvelous technique, he combined the sincerest, deepest feeling, and gave in continuous succession all the musical effects that are characteristic. The audience was so carried away with enthusiasm, that it could not content itself with recalling Mr. Baermann either once or twice, but persisted in doing it the third time. Grimm's symphony is well written, has some brilliant passages, is by turns grave and gay, stately and simple, but it is not calculated to awaken any very great or profound interest. A great many better things might have been selected. It was however well rendered, the orchestra presenting it for all that it was worth. The Beethoven "Variations" were superbly played by Mr. Baermann. They are classical, dignified, and at times almost severe and yet they are full of sentiment and tenderness and fine effects, setting off the great composer's wonderful versatility to excellent advantage. The fugue especially was splendidly interpreted. The last piece was the "Slavonic Dance" by Dvorak, a strange, wild, incongruous, but effective composition, which was rendered in the spirit in which was written, and well received. The programme this evening will be as follows:

- No. VII Handel
 Recitative and Aria from "The Children of Israel in the Desert" C. Ph. E. Bach
 [First time.]
 Symphony in A, (Spring.) No. 2, Op. 34. J. K. Paine
 [Conducted by the composer.]
 Ballad for Violin in F-sharp minor. (MS.) Henschel
 [First time.]
 Hans Sach's Monologue from "The Mastersingers" Wagner
 Danse des Bacchantes, from "Philemon et Baucis" Gounod
 [First time.]

Mr. Bernard Listeman will be the violinist, and Mr. Georg Henschel the singer.

THE TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony by J. O. Grimm which was introduced to Boston at the last concert of the Symphony orchestra did not prove to be a particularly interesting work. The author, who must now be a man of about 50 years of age, enjoys a respectable though not very extended reputation as a sound musician, and his chamber music is esteemed. This symphony is scholarly, and it certainly never offends, unless by that length of the first movement which is so frequent a fault in modern symphony writing. The movements are: A sostenuto and allegro: an andante entitled a Trauersmarsch; the scherzo, which is marked presto, and the finale, which is vivace. The themes are pleasant enough, but bear no impress of positive originality; the rhythm of the beginning of the scherzo is perhaps the most marked in the whole work, and the vivace, although more current and continuous, seems to succeed this like its second part, and is the most satisfactory portion of the work. There is not much freshness or light in the orchestration, although there is a steady smoothness about it which fills the ear agreeably. Altogether, it seems such a composition as many musicians of taste, education and leisure might write. The orchestra played admirably, and Mr. Henschel lost no opportunity of giving such variety as was possible. The other orchestral numbers were Cherubini's "Water-Carrier" overture, and the eighth of Dvorak's Slavonian dances, the clash and jingle of which had quite a relish after the tamer effects of the other two numbers.

To say that Professor Baermann played, is to imply how delightful the other two numbers of the programme became under his hands and because of them. The Liszt concerto (No. 2 in A), which was his principal selection, is, first and foremost, a test of virtuosity. It sounds from beginning to end as if written by a pianist to show what can be done with the pianoforte. The scheme of the concerto seems to lack both coherence and stability, although the furious finale has a relationship to the strong phrases which follow after the calm introduction. The orchestral part sounds as if it were composed to give the pianist a chance to show, one after another, all the possibilities of a perfect command of the instrument,—its arpeggios, its runs, its trills, its octaves, its skips and its full chords. Fortunately for the concerto, Professor Baermann dignifies it and gives it a character greater than its own. His technique is so wonderful in its extent and variety, that it leaves him free to shape a hundred passages of little more value than bravura, into such artistic forms, that they appear to be almost gems, and his conscientiousness makes one think, from the earnestness of his playing, that the work must be as great and good as it is difficult and startling. Much more worthy of his talent, and no less a proof of his wise reading and perfect playing, was the set of fifteen Beethoven variations, opus 35, which he delivered with splendid clearness and vigor. The pianoforte (a Chickering) supported him superbly: under a less remarkable touch than his it would have appeared less pure and fine, of course; but it was, apart from this advantage, an exceptionally equal and rich instrument.

At the next concert Mr. Paine's "Spring" symphony will be played under the composer's own direction; Mr. Listemann will play a MS. ballad for violin by Mr. Henschel; the orchestra will play a hornpipe from Handel's great concerto No. 7, and a Bacchanalian dance (first time) from Gounod's "Philemon and Baucis;" and Mr. Henschel will sing Hans Sach's monologue from the "Master Singers," and (first time) an air from C. Ph. E. Bach's "Children of Israel" oratorio.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Neither "wind nor snow and ice" on Saturday evening kept away the usual large audience that a Boston Symphony Concert always attracts. The programme presented Professor Carl Baermann as piano soloist, and was as follows: Overture, "The Water Carrier," Cherubini; concerto for pianoforte (No. 2, in A), Liszt; symphony in D minor (op. 19), J. O. Grimm; piano solo (fifteen variations, with a fugue in E flat, op. 35), Beethoven; Slavonic dance (No. 8), Dvorak. To listen to Prof. Baermann is always an artistic event, but when to this is added a new symphony, never before performed in this country, the interest is heightened. This symphony in D minor, from Herr Grimm, is a composition that possesses an enduring value, which will grow with familiarity. Its author is not widely known outside of Germany, but he shows the spirit of the true musician and develops his effects with genuine force and strength rather than with brilliancy. The two last movements were very fine and delightfully performed by the orchestra. Professor Baermann's selection presented some of his greatest effects, and his technical skill and wonderful power of interpretation were never heard to better advantage. The audience recognized with enthusiasm this master-hand, and nothing that has ever been heard in Boston equals Professor Baermann's playing. Next Saturday's concert will present Mr. B. Listemann and Mr. Henschel as the soloists, and Prof. Paine will conduct his own symphony. The programme is as follows: Hornpipe in B flat (from concerto No. 7), Handel; recitative and aria (The Children of Israel in the Desert), C. Ph. E. Bach (first time); symphony in A (Spring), No. 2, op. 34, J. K. Paine; ballad for violin in F sharp minor (MS.), Henschel (first time); Hans Sach's Monologue (The Mastersingers), Wagner; Danse des Bacchantes (Philemon et Baucis), Gounod (first time).

Twentieth Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, the programme, which presented Professor Carl Baermann as piano soloist, being as follows: Overture, "The Water Carrier," Cherubini; concerto for pianoforte (No. 2, in A), Liszt; symphony in D minor (op. 19), J. O. Grimm; piano solo (fifteen variations, with a fugue, in E flat, op. 35), Beethoven; Slavonic dance (No. 8), Dvorak. The occasion was a particularly interesting one, both because of the always enjoyable playing of Professor Baermann and the presentation of a new symphony. This work, which is the production of a man rather well known in Germany but with little reputation outside that country, proved to be of considerable interest, but made no very great impression on first hearing. It is a composition which in solidity and force shows the hand of a true musician, and is developed with much ingenuity and skill. It has not much brilliancy or inspirational force, and only the last two movements are especially interesting. It was excellently performed on Saturday night, and the orchestral work was calculated to present it with every possible advantage. The most important event of the evening was Prof. Baermann's piano playing, of which almost nothing but admiring praise can with justice be said. His selections presented his method in every point of advantage, and he displayed to the utmost his extraordinary combination of technical and emotional power. The strength and feeling of his performance were admirable, and no difficulties seemed to be too great for his easy mastery of them. His playing was the finest that has been heard in Boston this season, and its merit was recognized by the greatest marks of enthusiasm on the part of the audience.

AMUSEMENTS. Herald

The Symphony Concert—Mr. Carl Baermann, Soloist.

The 20th of the present season's programmes by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening. The soloist was Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist, and the selections were as follows:

Overture—"The Water Carrier".....Cherubini
Concerto for pianoforte. No. 2, in A.....Liszt
Symphony in D minor, op. 19.....J. O. Grimm
Piano solo—XV. Variations, with a fugue,
in E flat, op. 35.....Beethoven
Slavonic dance, No. 8.....Dvorak

The reappearance of Mr. Baermann was the event of the evening, and the quick applause which followed his entrance showed the kindly feeling of the audience toward this talented artist. Mr. Baermann's presentation of the pianoforte score of the Liszt concerto displayed his masterly abilities in the clearest fashion, and his delightfully clean, elastic touch, his intelligent reading and distinct phrasing gave such keen enjoyment that the enthusiasm shown in the applause which rewarded his effort was well merited. The sterling quality of Mr. Baermann's playing was again displayed in the Beethoven variations, in which the theme was at all times given a just prominence, while the marvellous technique of the performer was displayed with admirable effect. The symphony by Grimm was heard here for the first time, and proved a very interesting composition. The composer is a native of Saxony, and at first accounts was a teacher of singing and of the pianoforte at Munster, in Germany. He has published a number of compositions for pianoforte and orchestra, and is a well known song writer. His symphony shows him to be a follower of the older forms of composition, and his melodious writing gives a very pleasing character to its movements. His skill is very apparent in the scoring of this work, and his musical ideas are presented in a well defined and enjoyable manner. Of the four movements—Sostenuto (allegro), Trauermarsch (andante), Scherzo (presto), Finale (vivace)—the first has the greatest originality, but the tendency to an overelaboration of his themes is more apparent in this than in the latter portions of the composition. The scherzo is a very graceful bit of composition, and the finale gives a very brilliant ending to the work. The melodious overture and the stirring measures of the Slavonic dance made these enjoyable numbers of the programme, and the work of the orchestra was of a very generally even excellence throughout the evening.

MUSICAL. Gazette

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. Cherubini's always delightful overture to "The Water Carrier" opened the concert. It was followed by Liszt's Concerto No. 2 in A, the solo part of which was played by Mr. Carl Baermann, who made his first public appearance of the season on this occasion. He received a very hearty and sincere welcome. The concerto is misnamed. It is rather a fantasia or a rhapsody than a concerto. It is very interesting, nevertheless, and, despite its frequent leanings towards mere effect and its attempts to dignify commonplace, it has many beautiful moments, and is always brilliant and often impressive. Its difficulties are very great, and it requires exceptional strength of wrist in the artist to bring it all out clearly, the orchestration being very heavy at times during some of the most important solo passages. Mr. Baermann, it is hardly necessary to say, did full justice to its demands upon his technique, and it is equally unnecessary to add that he read and interpreted it with delightful fidelity to the composer's spirit. His performance throughout was broad, massive and clear, and was distinguished by that pure artistic sentiment, that refinement of taste and that spirited mastery over the resources of the piano which have always so satisfactorily characterized his playing here. Not only were the difficulties with which the work bristles overcome without apparent effort, but they were made subordinate to the general sentiment of the whole. It is in this that Mr. Baermann differs from most other pianists, and it is in this character of an interpreter as well as a master of technique that he has won the right to be ranked high among the best artists who have been heard on our concert stage. At the end of the concerto he was recalled four times with the most stormy enthusiasm. His other contribution to the concert was Beethoven's fifteen variations with a fugue upon the theme of the finale of the Kreica symphony. These he both played and interpreted with masterly effect, and with rare charm, variety and appropriateness of expression. His delicacy of touch, grace of sentiment, fire, brilliancy, tenderness, and clear and refined execution, in turn delighted his hearers. It was not a mere display of virtuosity, but a consistent and beautiful reading of the work as well. It has not been heard here in public since it was performed by Von Bulow, and it is not music to listen to unless interpreted with the artistic feeling such performers bring to bear upon it. At the end of this selection Mr. Baermann was recalled twice. The symphony was by J. O. Grimm, Op. 19, in D minor. Upon a first hearing we found it rather noisy, dry, and lacking in refinement. It is manifestly the work of a fine musician, is solidly and brilliantly scored, and is never lacking in fire; but it is what is generally known as kappelmelster music, and is correct, learned and able, but without inspiration, after the fashion of such music. The scherzo, with its clever cross rhythms, is the most interesting and the most spontaneous movement in effect. The finale is full of spirit, and opens with a brilliant and pleasing theme for the strings; but it presently partakes of the laborious noisiness which distinguishes the work generally. The concert ended with Dvorak's Slavonic Dance, No. 8. The performances of the orchestra throughout were excellent. We must not conclude without a word of praise for the power, the rich tone and the brilliancy and sonority of the fine Chickering piano upon which Mr. Baermann played. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Hornpipe from concerto No. 7, Handel; Recitative and Aria by C. P. E. Bach; Spring Symphony, J. K. Paine (to be conducted by the composer); Ballad for violin (M. S.), Henschel; Hans Sachs's monologue, Wagner; Danse des Bacchantes, Gounod. The soloists will be Mr. B. Listemann and Mr. Henschel.

BOSTON

MI

SATURD.

OVERTURE. (E

SCENA from "O

CONCERTO FOR

SONGS W

SYMPHONY in

Allegro co

Allegro. 2

MISS L

And now to my usual symphonic c da. The programme Saturday was hus:

Overture, ("The Water-Carrier.").....Cherubini
Concerto for Pianoforte. No. 2, in A.....Liszt
(Professor Baermann.)

Symphony in D minor, op. 19.....J. O. Grimm
(First time.)

Sostenuto. Allegro.—Trauermarsch. (Andante.)—

Scherzo. (Presto.)—Finale. (Vivace.)

Piano Solo. XV. Variations (with a fugue) in E flat, op. 35...Beethoven
(Professor Carl Baermann.)

Slavonic Dance. No. 8.....Dvorak

Professor Baermann never played better than he did in the Liszt concerto. I was unprepared for the grandeur and power with which he invested the piano part. Even in the most heavily scored portions the chords of the piano rang out clear and decisive above the din, and his work in the runs, octave passages, and especially in the light but brilliant fioriture, was thoroughly artistic. Not only was all possible technic present, but there was also a warmth and feeling which is not always found in connection with a great technic. His work in the Beethoven number was in excellent contrast of style. He gave the fugue with admirable clearness, and if I except a slight slip in the first portion, and a trifle of over-accentuation, was equally perfect throughout. He aroused the rather slim audience (the weather was frightful) to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, and achieved the honor of being thrice recalled, which is wonderful when the apathetic nature of a symphony audience is considered. But, after all, this apathy has changed greatly in recent years. As to the symphony, it was not as grim as its name. It was a musicianly work, rather elaborate and studied in its first movement; lofty and more inspired in its second; having some bright and skipping figures in its scherzo, and a well rounded final movement. As for myself, I found the second movement the best, as it was broad and dignified, yet free from that mawkishness of grief with which composers generally fill a Trauermarsch. But no part of the symphony was sufficient to arouse any very great enthusiasm in anybody, and if Mr. Henschel had been wise he would have allowed the work of the German singing teacher of Münster "to remain on the shelf," and would have given our Whitings, Parkers, Bucks and other American composers a chance. Next week, however, the American muse is to be represented at the concerts by Professor Paine's Spring Symphony, conducted by the composer. Thanks, at least, for so much.

Key note

L. C. E.

BOSTON.

FEB. 18.—Valentine's Day was observed by the musicians of Boston with great unanimity and with the enterprise which belongs to an associate of THE KEYNOTE. I have found out just what each composer and conductor has received. Mr. Henschel obtained the following:

Oh, Henschel, cease thy higher flight!
And give thy public something light;
Let no more Wagner themes thy bill enhance
And give the native workers just one chance.
Don't give the Dvorak symphony again;
If you would give us joy, oh, give us Paine!
And if as leader you do not yet shine,
Your singing is an attribute divine—
So you shall ever be our valentine.

Mr. Lang received a hairless cupid shooting off a number of violin bows and director's batons, instead of arrows, and the following verses:

Thou foe of everything sensational
Thou lover of all music educational,
Thou art the Nestor of our tuneful hub,
And like the athlete, swingest many a club;

Sunday AMUSEMENTS. Herald

The Symphony Concert—Mr. Carl Baermann, Soloist.

The 20th of the present season's programmes by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening. The soloist was Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist, and the selections were as follows:

Overture—"The Water Carrier".....Cherubini
Concerto for pianoforte. No. 2, in A.....Liszt
Symphony in D minor, op. 19.....J. O. Grimm
Piano solo—XV. Variations, with a fugue,
in E flat, op. 35.....Beethoven
Slavonic dance, No. 8.....Dvorak

The reappearance of Mr. Baermann was the event of the evening, and the quick applause which followed his entrance showed the kindly feeling of the audience toward this talented artist. Mr. Baermann's presentation of the pianoforte score of the Liszt concerto displayed his masterly abilities in the clearest fashion, and his delightfully clean, elastic touch, his intelligent reading and distinct phrasing gave such keen enjoyment that the enthusiasm shown in the applause which rewarded his effort was well merited. The sterling quality of Mr. Baermann's playing was again displayed in the Beethoven variations, in which the theme was at all times given a just prominence, while the marvellous technique of the performer was displayed with admirable effect. The symphony by Grimm was heard here for the first time, and proved a very interesting composition. The composer is a native of Saxony, and at last accounts was a teacher of singing and of the pianoforte at Munster, in Germany. He has published a number of compositions for pianoforte and orchestra, and is a well known song writer. His symphony shows him to be a follower of the older forms of composition, and his melodious writing gives a very pleasing character to its movements. His skill is very apparent in the scoring of this work, and his musical ideas are presented in a well defined and enjoyable manner. Of the four movements—Sostenuto (allegro), Trauermarsch (andante), Scherzo (presto), Finale (vivace)—the first has the greatest originality, but the tendency to an overelaboration of his themes is more apparent in this than in the latter portions of the composition. The scherzo is a very graceful bit of composition, and the finale gives a very brilliant ending to the work. The melodious overture and the stirring measures of the Slavonic dance made these enjoyable numbers of the programme, and the work of the orchestra was of a very generally even excellence throughout the evening.

MUSICAL. Gazette

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. Cherubini's always delightful overture to "The Water Carrier" opened the concert. It was followed by Liszt's Concerto No. 2 in A, the solo part of which was played by Mr. Carl Baermann, who made his first public appearance of the season on this occasion. He received a very hearty and sincere welcome. The concerto is misnamed. It is rather a fantasia or a rhapsody than a concerto. It is very interesting, nevertheless, and, despite its frequent leanings towards mere effect and its attempts to dignify commonplace, it has many beautiful moments, and is always brilliant and often impressive. Its difficulties are very great, and it requires exceptional strength of wrist in the artist to bring it all out clearly, the orchestration being very heavy at times during some of the most important solo passages. Mr. Baermann, it is hardly necessary to say, did full justice to its demands upon his technique, and it is equally unnecessary to add that he read and interpreted it with delightful fidelity to the composer's spirit. His performance throughout was broad, massive and clear, and was distinguished by that pure artistic sentiment, that refinement of taste and that spirited mastery over the resources of the piano which have always so satisfactorily characterized his playing here. Not only were the difficulties with which the work bristles overcome without apparent effort, but they were made subordinate to the general sentiment of the whole. It is in this that Mr. Baermann differs from most other pianists, and it is in this character of an interpreter as well as a master of technique that he has won the right to be ranked high among the best artists who have been heard on our concert stage. At the end of the concerto he was recalled four times with the most stormy enthusiasm. His other contribution to the concert was Beethoven's fifteen variations with a fugue upon the theme of the finale of the Eroica symphony. These he both played and interpreted with masterly effect, and with rare charm, variety and appropriateness of expression. His delicacy of touch, grace of sentiment, fire, brilliancy, tenderness, and clear and refined execution, in turn delighted his hearers. It was not a mere display of virtuosity, but a consistent and beautiful reading of the work as well. It has not been heard here in public since it was performed by Von Bulow, and it is not music to listen to unless interpreted with the artistic feeling such performers bring to bear upon it. At the end of this selection Mr. Baermann was recalled twice. The symphony was by J. O. Grimm, Op. 19, in D minor. Upon a first hearing we found it rather noisy, dry, and lacking in refinement. It is manifestly the work of a fine musician, is solidly and brilliantly scored, and is never lacking in fire; but it is what is generally known as kappelmeister music, and is correct, learned and able, but without inspiration, after the fashion of such music. The scherzo, with its clever cross rhythms, is the most interesting and the most spontaneous movement in effect. The finale is full of spirit, and opens with a brilliant and pleasing theme for the strings; but it presently partakes of the laborious noisiness which distinguishes the work generally. The concert ended with Dvorak's Slavonic Dance, No. 8. The performances of the orchestra throughout were excellent. We must not conclude without a word of praise for the power, the rich tone and the brilliancy and sonority of the fine Chickering piano upon which Mr. Baermann played. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Hornpipe from concerto No. 7, Handel; Recitative and Aria by C. P. E. Bach; Spring Symphony, J. K. Paine (to be conducted by the composer); Ballad for violin (M. S.), Henschel; Hans Sachs's monologue, Wagner; Danse des Bacchantes, Gounod. The soloists will be Mr. B. Listemann and Mr. Henschel.

BOSTON

MI

SATURD.

OVERTURE. (E

SCENA from "O

CONCERTO FO

SONGS W

SYMPHONY in

Allegro co

Allegro. 4

MISS L

And now to my usual symphonic coda. The programme Saturday was thus:

Overture, ("The Water-Carrier").....Cherubini
Concerto for Pianoforte. No. 2, in A.....Liszt
(Professor Baermann.)

Symphony in D minor, op. 19.....J. O. Grimm
(First time.)

Sostenuto. Allegro.—Trauermarsch. (Andante.)—

Scherzo. (Presto.)—Finale. (Vivace.)

Piano Solo. XV. Variations (with a fugue) in E flat, op. 35...Beethoven
(Professor Carl Baermann.)

Slavonic Dance. No. 8.....Dvorak

Professor Baermann never played better than he did in the Liszt concerto. I was unprepared for the grandeur and power with which he invested the piano part. Even in the most heavily scored portions the chords of the piano rang out clear and decisive above the din, and his work in the runs, octave passages, and especially in the light but brilliant fortissimo, was thoroughly artistic. Not only was all possible technique present, but there was also a warmth and feeling which is not always found in connection with a great technic. His work in the Beethoven number was in excellent contrast of style. He gave the fugue with admirable clearness, and if I except a slight slip in the first portion, and a trifle of over-accentuation, was equally perfect throughout. He aroused the rather slim audience (the weather was frightful) to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, and achieved the honor of being thrice recalled, which is wonderful when the apathetic nature of a symphony audience is considered. But, after all, this apathy has changed greatly in recent years. As to the symphony, it was not as grim as its name. It was a musicianly work, rather elaborate and studied in its first movement; lofty and more inspired in its second; having some bright and skipping figures in its scherzo, and a well rounded final movement. As for myself, I found the second movement the best, as it was broad and dignified, yet free from that mawkishness of grief with which composers generally fill a Trauermarsch. But no part of the symphony was sufficient to arouse any very great enthusiasm in anybody, and if Mr. Henschel had been wise he would have allowed the work of the German singing teacher of Münster "to remain on the shelf," and would have given our Whitings, Parkers, Bucks and other American composers a chance. Next week, however, the American muse is to be represented at the concerts by Professor Paine's Spring Symphony, conducted by the composer. Thanks, at least, for so much.

My note

L. C. E.

BOSTON.

FEB. 18.—Valentine's Day was observed by the musicians of Boston with great unanimity and with the enterprise which belongs to an associate of THE KEYNOTE. I have found out just what each composer and conductor has received. Mr. Henschel obtained the following:

Oh, Henschel, cease thy higher flight!
And give thy public something light;
Let no more Wagner themes thy bill enhance
And give the native workers just one chance.
Don't give the Dvorak symphony again;
If you would give us joy, oh, give us Paine!
And if as leader you do not yet shine,
Your singing is an attribute divine—
So you shall ever be our valentine.

Mr. Lang received a hairless cupid shooting off a number of violin bows and director's batons, instead of arrows, and the following verses:

Thou foe of everything sensational
Thou lover of all music educational,
Thou art the Nestor of our tuneful hub,
And like the athlete, swingest many a club;

274
Don't let them carol songs in praise of wine,
And you shall be my placid valentine.

Mr. Zerrahn received this:

Thou art the demigod of every maiden
Who sings soprano in the "Handel and Haydn."
But we must have you in some other post.
Why is our old conductor almost lost?
Come, draw your old orchestra into line,
And you shall be our active Valentine.

I have not space to give the others, particularly as the week has been a very active one. It began Monday with Professor Faelten's piano recital. If I speak somewhat of the coldness of this pianist, and of the lack of true legato work in his school of performance, it must nevertheless be understood that he is to be ranked head and shoulders above the general run of solo pianists; for such an admirable technique, such power in grand effects, such musical intelligence and perfect aplomb, are not often found in one more. His performance of the Liszt Sonata, and of Schumann's Fantasia in C, was in every sense noble. The mere fact of playing such works, [and the great opus 111, by Beethoven, entirely from

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883 - 84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 1ST, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HORNPIPE in B flat (from the Concerto grosso No. VII.) . HÆNDEL.

RECITATIVE AND ARIA. (The Children of Israel in the desert.) . C. PH. E. BACH.
[First time.]

SYMPHONY in A. (Spring.) No. 2, op. 34. . J. K. PAINE.
[Conducted by the composer.]
{ ADAGIO SOSTENUTO. Departure of Winter.
ALLEGRO MA NON TROPPO. Awakening of Nature.
SCHERZO. (ALLEGRO.) May-Night Fantasy.
ADAGIO. A Romance of Springtime.
ALLEGRO GIOJOSO. The Glory of Nature.

BALLAD FOR VIOLIN in F sharp minor. (MS.) . G. HENSCHEL.
[First time.]

HANS SACHS' MONOLOGUE. (The Mastersingers.) . WAGNER.

DANSE DES BACCHANTES. (Philémon et Baucis.) . GOUNOD.
[First time.]

SOLOISTS:

MR. BERNHARD LISTEMANN.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL.

THE CONCERT WILL CLOSE AT 9.35. THOSE OBLIGED TO LEAVE BEFORE THEN WILL PLEASE DO SO
DURING THE LAST INTERMISSION — AFTER THE MONOLOGUE FROM THE MASTERSINGERS

RECITATIVE AND ARIA. (The Children of Israel in the desert.)

C. PH. E. BACH.

MOSES:

RECIT: God of my fathers, what lettest Thou me see, what must I hear?
Beholding, Lord, the anguish of Thy people, my heart forgets that their lament transgression is, Lord against Thee. Almighty One, forgive!
unfold now, Lord, to these Thy children the treasures of Thy grace.
If in anger Thou wilt punish, punish me, Thy servant, but unto these,
Lord, grant Thy forgiveness.

AIR: Lord, behold Thy children in dust before Thee. Father of Compassion, hearken to my fervent prayer; do not refuse me and cast me not away from Thee. Let from this rock, God of power, pour forth the assuaging help in affliction. Let the sons of Jacob live to magnify Thee, to adore Thee. Look in mercy down on us.

HANS SACHS' MONOLOGUE. (The Mastersingers.) WAGNER.

SACHS,

(Arranges his work, sits on his stool at the door of his workshop and then, laying down his tools again, leans back, resting his arm on the closed lower half of the door, and ponders on Walther's "competition-singing" at the meeting of the Mastersingers that morning.)

The elder's scent is waxing
So mild, so full and strong!
Its charm my limbs relaxing:
Words unto my lips would throng.—
What boot such thoughts as I can span?
I'm but a poor, plain-minded man!
When work's despised altogether,
Thou, friend, settest me free;
But I'd better stick to my leather
And let all this poetry be!—

(He tries again to work. Leaves off and reflects.)

And yet—it haunts me still.—
I feel, but comprehend ill;—
Cannot forget it—and yet cannot grasp it;—
I measure it not, e'en when I clasp it.—
But how then would I gauge it?
No rule could fit it or cage it,
Yet there was no fault to find.
It seemed so old, yet new in its chime,
Like songs of birds in sweet May-time:—
He who heard and, fancy-stirr'd,
Sought to repeat the strain,
But shame and scorn would gain,—
Spring's command and gentle hand
His soul with this did entrust:
He sang, because he must!
His power rose as needed;
That virtue well I heeded.
The bird who sang to-day
Has got a throat that rightly waxes;
Masters may feel dismay,
But well content with him Hans Sachs is.

(English version by H. & F. Corder.)

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, MARCH 3, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twenty-first concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was:
Hornpipe in B-flat; from the concerto grosso,
No. 7.....Händel
Recitative and Air, from "The Children of Israel in the Desert".....C. Ph. E. Bach
Symphony in A, "Spring," No. 2, Op. 34.....J. K. Paine
(Conducted by the composer.)
Ballad for Violin in F-sharp minor (MS.).....Henschel
Hans Sachs's Monologue, from "Die Meistersinger," Act II.....Wagner Danse des Bacchantes, from "Philemon et Baucis".....Gounod

Mr. Georg Henschel was the singer, and Mr.
Bernhard Listemann the violinist.

It was good and interesting to hear Mr. Paine's "Spring" Symphony once more. At each successive hearing the work shows new beauties, albeit the full significance of the music, the perfect reason of being of every detail in the working out of the several movements is not yet wholly clear, to our comprehension at least. A work so individual in its prime essence and its general physiognomy needs study of no superficial sort, especially when its form is so complex as is the case of this symphony. Everything that Mr. Paine writes bears the stamp of his peculiar individuality, and the composer's instinct habitually leads him into unusual melodic paths. Now and then one meets with a familiar device which recalls more or less definitely the manner (and far more commonly the manner than the matter) of some other composer;
take, for instance, the eminently Beethovenish beginning of the first Allegro ma non troppo. But upon the whole, the music has little similarity of aspect with that of other writers. At every turning one meets with something unexpected and out of the common run; and this strangeness is all the more baffling to the average musical understanding, in that it is evidently a prime element in the composer's mode of musical thought, and is in no case merely wilful. A man who grasps at the extraordinary with malice presence, and merely for the sake of avoiding everyday triviality, is pretty sure to betray himself, and you know well enough where to have him.
The reason of being of his strangeness lies on the surface; you see at once that he is strange simply for the sake of being so. But the case is very different when a man is unusual because that is the instinctive bent of his genius, and because he is utterly unable to do things in the common way. It takes some time to acclimate one's self in such a man's music, and to feel at home in it. If the Scherzo of the "Spring" symphony seems wholly fine, draws blood at once and for good and all, there is much in the other movements which we, for one, have not yet digested.
The impression produced is fine and inspiring, save that the broad melody in 3-2 time in the Finale sounds a little commonplace; indeed it is this very impression that the work makes of having so much more in it than lies on the surface, that renders it highly inexpedient for any one to pass snap judgment on either its merits or its possible defects. Mr. Paine conducted with his usual unshaken firmness in vigorously asserting his own will. The performance was spirited and earnest, if at times lacking smoothness. Mr. Paine was twice recalled with rapturous applause. Mr. Henschel's Ballad, which was played in absolutely masterly style by Mr.

Listemann, is a strongly effective composition in which a certain quaintness of melody is united with unflagging energy in development. It struck home at once. Mr. Henschel sang the recitative and air by Philipp Emanuel Bach with great depth of sentiment. The composition itself contains much that is very beautiful;
strangely enough, also, much that sounds like Mendelssohn! The beautiful monologue of Hans Sachs, with its entrancing background of orchestral color and sensuous melody, was delightfully given, but, for some reason hard to explain, it failed to make much impression upon the audience. The Handel Hornpipe was thoroughly enjoyable, and put one into the best of humors for musical pleasure.

The next programme is—

Overture. (The peasant a rogue.).....Dvorak
Cavatina. (La Reine de Saba.).....Gounod
Symphony in A. No. 7, op. 92.....Beethoven
Scherzo in F. (MS. First time.).....G. W. Chadwick
Scena e Melodia. (Aida.).....Verdi
Entr'acte and Finale. (Les Erinnyes.).....Massenet
[First time.]

Mrs. Humphrey-Allen will be the singer.

Twenty-first Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening. Mr. Henschel, the conductor, appearing also as vocal soloist, and Mr.
Bernhard Listemann playing a violin solo. The programme was as follows: Hornpipe in B flat
(from the concerto grosso No. 7), Händel; Recitative and aria ("The Children of Israel in the Desert"), C. Ph. E. Bach; Symphony in A ("Spring"), No. 2, op. 34, J. K. Paine; ballad for violin in F sharp minor (MS), G. Henschel; Hans Sachs's Monologue ("The Mastersingers"), Wagner; Danse des Bacchantes ("Philemon et Baucis")
Gounod.
On several accounts the concert was one of the most interesting of the season. For one reason, it was so because of the prominent place which local composers and performers held in it, Mr.
Henschel appearing in the three roles of conductor, composer and soloist, Mr. Listemann, leader of the orchestra, playing a work of Mr. Hen-schel's composition, and Professor Paine appearing as conductor of his own symphony. Mr.
Listemann also showed his ability as a conductor
by taking charge of the orchestra during Mr.
Henschel's singing, so that the audience was treated to the unusual experience of observing the methods of three different conductors in one concert. Professor Paine's symphony, although not new, afforded the chief interest of the evening. Renewed hearings give a fresh and increasing appreciation of its beauty and power. It was admirably interpreted, and the composer was warmly applauded at its close. Mr.
Listemann played Mr. Henschel's brilliant and difficult composition with great effect, and Mr.
Henschel sang his two solos with much expressiveness and decided success.

At the next concert the following programme will be performed: Overture (The peasant a rogue), Dvorak; Cavatina (La Reine de Saba), Gounod;
Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; Scherzo in F (MS, first time), G. W. Chadwick; Scena & Melodia (Aida), Verdi; Entr'acte and Finale (Les Erinnyes, first time), Massenet; soloist, Mrs. Humphrey-Allen.

RECITATIVE AND ARIA. (The Children of Israel in the desert.)

C. PH. E. BACH.

MOSES:

RECIT: God of my fathers, what lettest Thou me see, what must I hear? Beholding, Lord, the anguish of Thy people, my heart forgets that their lament transgression is, Lord against Thee. Almighty One, forgive! unfold now, Lord, to these Thy children the treasures of Thy grace.

If in anger Thou wilt punish, punish me, Thy servant, but unto these, Lord, grant Thy forgiveness.

AIR: Lord, behold Thy children in dust before Thee. Father of Compassion, hearken to my fervent prayer; do not refuse me and cast me not away from Thee. Let from this rock, God of power, pour forth the assuaging help in affliction. Let the sons of Jacob live to magnify Thee, to adore Thee. Look in mercy down on us.

HANS SACHS' MONOLOGUE. (The Mastersingers.) WAGNER.

SACHS,

(Arranges his work, sits on his stool at the door of his workshop and then, laying down his tools again, leans back, resting his arm on the closed lower half of the door, and ponders on Walther's "competition-singing" at the meeting of the Mastersingers that morning.)

The elder's scent is waxing
So mild, so full and strong!
Its charm my limbs relaxing:
Words unto my lips would throng.—
What boot such thoughts as I can span?
I'm but a poor, plain-minded man!
When work's despised altogether,
Thou, friend, settest me free;
But I'd better stick to my leather
And let all this poetry be!—

(He tries again to work. Leaves off and reflects.)

And yet—it haunts me still.—
I feel, but comprehend ill;—
Cannot forget it—and yet cannot grasp it;—
I measure it not, e'en when I clasp it.—
But how then would I gauge it?
No rule could fit it or cage it,
Yet there was no fault to find.
It seemed so old, yet new in its chime,
Like songs of birds in sweet May-time:—
He who heard and, fancy-stirr'd,
Sought to repeat the strain,
But shame and scorn would gain,—
Spring's command and gentle hand
His soul with this did entrust:
He sang, because he must!
His power rose as needed;
That virtue well I heeded.
The bird who sang to-day
Has got a throat that rightly waxes;
Masters may feel dismay,
But well content with him Hans Sachs is.

(English version by H. & F. Corder.)

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, MARCH 3, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twenty-first concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was:

Hornpipe in E-flat; from the concerto grosso, No. 7.....Handel
Recitative and Air, from "The Children of Israel in the Desert".....C. Ph. E. Bach
Symphony in A, "Spring," No. 2, Op. 34.....J. K. Paine
(Conducted by the composer.)
Ballad for Violin in F-sharp minor (MS.).....Henschel
Hans Sachs's Monologue, from "Die Mastersingers," Act II.....Wagner
Danse des Bacchantes, from "Philemon et Baucis".....Gounod

Mr. Georg Henschel was the singer, and Mr. Bernhard Listemann the violinist.

It was good and interesting to hear Mr. Paine's "Spring" Symphony once more. At each successive hearing the work shows new beauties, albeit the full significance of the music, the perfect reason of being of every detail in the working out of the several movements is not yet wholly clear, to our comprehension at least. A work so individual in its prime essence and its general physiognomy needs study of no superficial sort, especially when its form is so complex as is the case of this symphony. Everything that Mr. Paine writes bears the stamp of his peculiar individuality, and the composer's instinct habitually leads him into unusual melodic paths. Now and then one meets with a familiar device which recalls more or less definitely the manner (and far more commonly the manner than the matter) of some other composer; take, for instance, the eminently Beethovenish beginning of the first Allegro ma non troppo. But upon the whole, the music has little similarity of aspect with that of other writers. At every turning one meets with something unexpected and out of the common run; and this strangeness is all the more baffling to the average musical understanding, in that it is evidently a prime element in the composer's mode of musical thought, and is in no case merely wilful. A man who grasps at the extraordinary with malice prepense, and merely for the sake of avoiding everyday triviality, is pretty sure to betray himself, and you know well enough where to have him. The reason of being of his strangeness lies on the surface; you see at once that he is strange simply for the sake of being so. But the case is very different when a man is unusual because that is the instinctive bent of his genius, and because he is utterly unable to do things in the common way. It takes some time to acclimate one's self in such a man's music, and to feel at home in it. If the Scherzo of the "Spring" symphony seems wholly fine, draws blood at once and for good and all, there is much in the other movements which we, for one, have not yet digested. The impression produced is fine and inspiring, save that the broad melody in 3-2 time in the Finale sounds a little commonplace; indeed it is this very impression that the work makes of having so much more in it than lies on the surface, that renders it highly inexpedient for any one to pass snap judgment on either its merits or its possible defects. Mr. Paine conducted with his usual unshaken firmness in vigorously asserting his own will. The performance was spirited and earnest, if at times lacking smoothness. Mr. Paine was twice recalled with rapturous applause. Mr. Henschel's Ballad, which was played in absolutely masterly style by Mr. Listemann, is a strongly effective composition in which a certain quaintness of melody is united with unflagging energy in development. It struck home at once. Mr. Henschel sang the recitative and air by Philipp Emanuel Bach with great depth of sentiment. The composition itself contains much that is very beautiful; strangely enough, also, much that sounds like Mendelssohn! The beautiful monologue of Hans Sachs, with its entrancing background of orchestral color and sensuous melody, was delightfully given, but, for some reason hard to explain, it failed to make much impression upon the audience. The Handel Hornpipe was thoroughly enjoyable, and put one into the best of humors for musical pleasure.

The next programme is—

Overture. (The peasant a rogue.).....Dvorak
Cavatina. (La Reine de Saba.).....Gounod
Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92.....Beethoven
Scherzo in F. (MS. First time.).....G. W. Chadwick
Scena e Melodia. (Aida.).....Verdi
Entr'acte and Finale. (Les Erinnyes.).....Massenet
(First time.)

Mrs. Humphrey-Allen will be the singer.

Twenty-first Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening. Mr. Henschel, the conductor, appearing also as vocal soloist, and Mr. Bernhard Listemann playing a violin solo. The programme was as follows: Hornpipe in B flat (from the concerto grosso No. 7), Handel; Recitative and aria ("The Children of Israel in the Desert"), C. Ph. E. Bach; Symphony in A ("Spring"), No. 2, op. 34, J. K. Paine; ballad for violin in F sharp minor (MS), G. Henschel; Hans Sachs's Monologue ("The Mastersingers"), Wagner; Danse des Bacchantes ("Philemon et Baucis") Gounod.

On several accounts the concert was one of the most interesting of the season. For one reason, it was so because of the prominent place which local composers and performers held in it, Mr. Henschel appearing in the three roles of conductor, composer and soloist, Mr. Listemann, leader of the orchestra, playing a work of Mr. Henschel's composition, and Professor Paine appearing as conductor of his own symphony. Mr. Listemann also showed his ability as a conductor by taking charge of the orchestra during Mr. Henschel's singing, so that the audience was treated to the unusual experience of observing the methods of three different conductors in one concert. Professor Paine's symphony, although not new, afforded the chief interest of the evening. Renewed hearings give a fresh and increasing appreciation of its beauty and power. It was admirably interpreted, and the composer was warmly applauded at its close. Mr. Listemann played Mr. Henschel's brilliant and difficult composition with great effect, and Mr. Henschel sang his two solos with much expressiveness and decided success.

At the next concert the following programme will be performed: Overture (The peasant a rogue), Dvorak; Cavatina (La Reine de Saba), Gounod; Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; Scherzo in F (MS, first time), G. W. Chadwick; Scena e Melodia (Aida), Verdi; Entr'acte and Finale (Les Erinnyes, first time), Massenet; soloist, Mrs. Humphrey-Allen.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Reigning Attractions of Stage and Concert Hall.

The Twenty-First Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first symphony concert was given in Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Hornpipe in B-flat (from the concerto grosso, No. 7. Handel Recitative and aria ("The Children of Israel in the Desert.") C. Ph. E. Bach
 Symphony in A ("Spring") No. 2, op. 34 J. K. Paine
 Ballad for violin in F-sharp minor (MS.) G. Henschel
 Hans Sachs' Monologue ("The Mastersingers") Wagner
 Danse des Bacchantes ("Philemon et Baucis") Gounod

Mr. Henschel was not only the conductor, but also the vocal soloist. The concert was one of the very best of the season. Local talent was more than usually prominent. Paine's "Spring" symphony happily surprised all who had entertained doubts in regard to it. There were so many meritorious things in it, and the general standard throughout was so high, that it places Mr. Paine among the very best American composers, and entitles him to rank high on the list of modern foreign authors. In sweetness, melodiousness, strength and harmony the "Spring" symphony is certainly a remarkable work. Its treatment is thoughtful, fresh and skillful. Mr. Paine conducted the symphony himself, which not only added to the interest connected with it, but gave him an opportunity to interpret and emphasize all its best features and qualities, as no one but the author could so well have done. Its rendering was superb. At its close Mr. Paine was greeted with a perfect ovation. Next in interest was Mr. Henschel's ballad for violin. This was played by Mr. Listemann. To say that it is a composition of great and varied excellence, and that it was rendered magnificently by Mr. Listemann, is to speak the simple truth. The Bach and Wagner numbers were not familiar, but were sung by Mr. Henschel with his accustomed taste and power. They were favorably received and generously applauded. The Handel and Gounod selections were pleasant features of the entertainment. The "Danse des Bacchantes" was heard for the first time and gave great satisfaction. The orchestration was effective, and the whole entertainment was of a high and delightful character.

May 5.—I cannot give you much musical intelligence from this centre of musical culture, for the reason that there is none to give. I might write you several columns about the Henschel concerts of last Saturday and Monday, but I fear you would condemn them to the waste paper basket, or even if they should accidentally find their way into print your readers would not care to see them. The Henschels have received more than their share of notice. Mrs. Henschel is certainly a pretty little singer, but is she anything more? Mr. Henschel seems to me to be clad in such a triple conceit that he does not begin to dream of appreciating his own natural disadvantages. He is essentially Teutonic with a rough, guttural voice, and I agree with you in the expression of disapproval of the flattery he has received. Key note

MUSICAL. Galette
 Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The audience was not very large, probably owing to the counter attractions of importance at some of the other places of amusement. The programme was curiously made up—Handel, Philip Emanuel Bach, Wagner, Gounod, Paine, and Henschel being represented there. There was, perhaps, something overmuch of Mr. Henschel, whose name appeared on it as conductor, composer and soloist. Mr. B. Listemann also officiated as conductor, Mr. Henschel conducting when Mr. Listemann played a violin solo by Mr. Henschel, and Mr. Listemann conducting when Mr. Henschel sang solos by somebody else. The privilege of hearing Mr. Henschel is doubtless a great one, but as he has been heard in profusion in public of late, it might, perhaps, have been advisable to give another bass singer an opportunity to be heard at these concerts, especially as bass singers have not had any too generous a showing at them. However, the public evidently likes to hear Mr. Henschel sing, and as it is also evident that Mr. Henschel likes to hear Mr. Henschel sing, everybody should be satisfied that Mr. Henschel sang. The symphony was Mr. J. K. Paine's, in A (Spring), No. 2, which was conducted by the composer. This fine work, which improves more and more on each successive hearing, was admirably interpreted, the Scherzo and the Adagio in particular receiving very good treatment. The audience enjoyed it greatly, and was heartily demonstrative in its applause throughout. Mr. Paine was recalled twice at the end of the performance. Mr. Listemann played a Ballad for violin in F-sharp minor (MS.), which was given for the first time. It is a well-written work by Mr. Henschel, but it is not of marked musical value, and is somewhat conventional in style, and vague in effect when it departs from the leading themes. It is difficult and showy, and lies well on the instrument. It was played with great vigor, brilliancy and power by Mr. Listemann. The other purely instrumental selection was the Danse des Bacchantes from Gounod's "Philemon et Baucis." Mr. Henschel sang a recitative and aria from C. P. E. Bach's "The Children of Israel," of which the recitative is strikingly broad and dramatic. The air is pleasing and tender, and were its leading theme not repeated until it begins to pall through monotony, it would have amply repaid the hearing. The orchestration of this was evidently by a modern hand. Mr. Henschel sang it with his usual fine dramatic expressiveness, and with his customary appreciation of the spirit of his composer; but his voice was more than ordinarily nasal in quality, and harsh in effect. His other contribution to the concert was Hans Sachs's monologue from "The Mastersingers."

The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "The Peasant a Rogue," Dvorak; Cavatina, "Queen of Sheba," Gounod; Symphony in A, No. 7, Beethoven; Scherzo in F, G. W. Chadwick; Scene and Aria, "Aida," Verdi; Entr'acte and Finale, "Les Erinnyes," Masseret.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 21st of the present season's concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the conductor appearing also as vocal soloist, and Mr. Bernhard Listemann playing a violin solo. The programme numbers were as follows:

Hornpipe in B flat (from the concerto grosso No. 7. Handel
 Recitative and aria ("The Children of Israel in the Desert") C. Ph. E. Bach
 Symphony in A ("Spring"), No. 2, op. 34. J. K. Paine
 Ballad for violin in F sharp minor (MS.) G. Henschel
 Hans Sachs' Monologue, ("The Mastersingers") Wagner
 Danse des Bacchantes ("Philemon et Baucis") Gounod

This proved one of the most notable programmes of the season, and few of more general interest have been presented under Mr. Henschel's direction. The prominence of what may be called local talent gave a peculiarly pleasant character to the events of the evening, and the cordial good feeling shown between the three conductors of the occasion was also notable. Whatever of doubt there may have been as to the merits of Prof. Paine's "Spring" symphony was fully removed by this hearing, and, after the examples of this class of compositions from the German composers of today which have found a place in these programmes during the last few months, there is good cause for pride in the work of this native born musician. The rare beauty, strength and melodious character of its themes, with the skillful and scholarly treatment given them, makes all of the movements a source of genuine delight to the hearer, and the advantage of having the work interpreted under the baton of the composer gave an added interest to its performance. Prof. Paine was the recipient of a great ovation at the conclusion of the symphony, and finally retired bearing a bouquet tied with a blue satin ribbon of such proportions that it formed a sort of drapery for his retreating figure. Next in point of interest in the evening's selections came the ballad for violin, written by Mr. Henschel, which had its first hearing at the hands of Mr. Listemann. The composition is one of great beauty, and has many difficulties even for the skilled player. In style it has much of the character of Vieuxtemps' writings, though it has the individuality so plainly shown in all of Mr. Henschel's work, and is a composition well worthy the admirable presentation given it by Mr. Listemann. Mr. Henschel's singing of the unfamiliar Bach and Wagner selections was as excellent as could be desired, and both these soloists were rewarded with enthusiastic applause for their efforts. The Handel and Gounod selections added a pleasant element to the evening's programme, and the "Danse des Bacchantes," played for the first time, proved an admirable composition of this sort. The work of the orchestra was excellent, notwithstanding the frequent changes in its direction, and altogether the evening was one of rare enjoyment.

Reigning Attractions of Stage and Concert Hall.

The Twenty-First Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first symphony concert was given in Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Hornpipe in B-flat (from the concerto grosso, No. 7 Handel
 Recitative and aria ("The Children of Israel in the Desert") C. Ph. E. Bach
 Symphony in A ("Spring") No. 2, op. 34 J. K. Paine
 Ballad for violin in F-sharp minor (MS.) G. Henschel
 Hans Sachs' Monologue ("The Mastersingers") Wagner
 Dance des Bacchantes ("Philemon et Baucis") Gounod

Mr. Henschel was not only the conductor, but also the vocal soloist. The concert was one of the very best of the season. Local talent was more than usually prominent. Paine's "Spring" symphony happily surprised all who had entertained doubts in regard to it. There were so many meritorious things in it, and the general standard throughout was so high, that it places Mr. Paine among the very best American composers, and entitles him to rank high on the list of modern foreign authors. In sweetness, melodiousness, strength and harmony the "Spring" symphony is certainly a remarkable work. Its treatment is thoughtful, fresh and skillful. Mr. Paine conducted the symphony himself, which not only added to the interest connected with it, but gave him an opportunity to interpret and emphasize all its best features and qualities, as no one but the author could so well have done. Its rendering was superb. At its close Mr. Paine was greeted with a perfect ovation. Next in interest was Mr. Henschel's ballad for violin. This was played by Mr. Listemann. To say that it is a composition of great and varied excellence, and that it was rendered magnificently by Mr. Listemann, is to speak the simple truth. The Bach and Wagner numbers were not familiar, but were sung by Mr. Henschel with his accustomed taste and power. They were favorably received and generously applauded. The Handel and Gounod selections were pleasant features of the entertainment. The "Danse des Bacchantes" was heard for the first time and gave great satisfaction. The orchestration was effective, and the whole entertainment was of a high and delightful character.

May 5.—I cannot give you much musical intelligence from this centre of musical culture, for the reason that there is none to give. I might write you several columns about the Henschel concerts of last Saturday and Monday, but I fear you would condemn them to the waste paper basket, or even if they should accidentally find their way into print your readers would not care to see them. The Henschels have received more than their share of notice. Mrs. Henschel is certainly a pretty little singer, but is she anything more? Mr. Henschel seems to me to be clad in such a triple conceit that he does not begin to dream of appreciating his own natural disadvantages. He is essentially Teutonic with a rough, guttural voice, and I agree with you in the expression of disapproval of the flattery he has received. Key note

MUSICAL. Gazette
March 2, 84
 Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The audience was not very large, probably owing to the counter attractions of importance at some of the other places of amusement. The programme was curiously made up—Handel, Philipp Emanuel Bach, Wagner, Gounod, Paine, and Henschel being represented there. There was, perhaps, something overmuch of Mr. Henschel, whose name appeared on it as conductor, composer and soloist. Mr. B. Listemann also officiated as conductor, Mr. Henschel conducting when Mr. Listemann played a violin solo by Mr. Henschel, and Mr. Listemann conducting when Mr. Henschel sang solos by somebody else. The privilege of hearing Mr. Henschel is doubtless a great one, but as he has been heard in profusion in public of late, it might, perhaps, have been advisable to give another bass singer an opportunity to be heard at these concerts, especially as bass singers have not had any too generous a showing at them. However, the public evidently likes to hear Mr. Henschel sing, and as it is also evident that Mr. Henschel likes to hear Mr. Henschel sing, everybody should be satisfied that Mr. Henschel sang. The symphony was Mr. J. K. Paine's, in A (Spring), No. 2, which was conducted by the composer. This fine work, which improves more and more on each successive hearing, was admirably interpreted, the Scherzo and the Adagio in particular receiving very good treatment. The audience enjoyed it greatly, and was heartily demonstrative in its applause throughout. Mr. Paine was recalled twice at the end of the performance. Mr. Listemann played a Ballad for violin in F-sharp minor (MS.), which was given for the first time. It is a well-written work by Mr. Henschel, but it is not of marked musical value, and is somewhat conventional in style, and vague in effect when it departs from the leading themes. It is difficult and showy, and lies well on the instrument. It was played with great vigor, brilliancy and power by Mr. Listemann. The other purely instrumental selection was the Danse des Bacchantes from Gounod's "Philemon et Baucis." Mr. Henschel sang a recitative and aria from C. P. E. Bach's "The Children of Israel," of which the recitative is strikingly broad and dramatic. The air is pleasing and tender, and were its leading theme not repeated until it begins to pall through monotony, it would have amply repaid the hearing. The orchestration of this was evidently by a modern hand. Mr. Henschel sang it with his usual fine dramatic expressiveness, and with his customary appreciation of the spirit of his composer; but his voice was more than ordinarily nasal in quality, and harsh in effect. His other contribution to the concert was Hans Sachs's monologue from "The Mastersingers."

The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "The Peasant a Rogue," Dvorak; Cavatina, "Queen of Sheba," Gounod; Symphony in A, No. 7, Beethoven; Scherzo in F, G. W. Chadwick; Scene and Aria, "Aida," Verdi; Entr'acte and Finale, "Les Erinnyes," Masseret.

JANUARY THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 21st of the present season's concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the conductor appearing also as vocal soloist, and Mr. Bernhard Listemann playing a violin solo. The programme numbers were as follows:

Hornpipe in B flat (from the concerto grosso No. 7 Handel
 Recitative and aria ("The Children of Israel in the Desert") C. Ph. E. Bach
 Symphony in A ("Spring"), No. 2, op. 34 J. K. Paine
 Ballad for violin in F sharp minor (MS.) G. Henschel
 Hans Sachs' Monologue, ("The Mastersingers") Wagner
 Danse des Bacchantes ("Philemon et Baucis") Gounod

This proved one of the most notable programmes of the season, and few of more general interest have been presented under Mr. Henschel's direction. The prominence of what may be called local talent gave a peculiarly pleasant character to the events of the evening, and the cordial good feeling shown between the three conductors of the occasion was also notable. Whatever of doubt there may have been as to the merits of Prof. Paine's "Spring" symphony was fully removed by this hearing, and, after the examples of this class of compositions from the German composers of today which have found a place in these programmes during the last few months, there is good cause for pride in the work of this native born musician. The rare beauty, strength and melodious character of its themes, with the skillful and scholarly treatment given them, makes all of the movements a source of genuine delight to the hearer, and the advantage of having the work interpreted under the baton of the composer gave an added interest to its performance. Prof. Paine was the recipient of a great ovation at the conclusion of the symphony, and finally retired bearing a bouquet tied with a blue satin ribbon of such proportions that it formed a sort of drapery for his retreating figure. Next in point of interest in the evening's selections came the ballad for violin, written by Mr. Henschel, which had its first hearing at the hands of Mr. Listemann. The composition is one of great beauty, and has many difficulties even for the skilled player. In style it has much of the character of Vieuxtemps' writings, though it has the individuality so plainly shown in all of Mr. Henschel's work, and is a composition well worthy the admirable presentation given it by Mr. Listemann. Mr. Henschel's singing of the unfamiliar Bach and Wagner selections was as excellent as could be desired, and both these soloists were rewarded with enthusiastic applause for their efforts. The Handel and Gounod selections added a pleasant element to the evening's programme, and the "Danse des Bacchantes," played for the first time, proved an admirable composition of this sort. The work of the orchestra was excellent, notwithstanding the frequent changes in its direction, and altogether the evening was one of rare enjoyment.

Twenty-first Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening. Mr. Henschel, the conductor, appearing also as vocal soloist, and Mr. Bernhard Listemann playing a violin solo. The programme was as follows: Hornpipe in B flat (from the concerto grosso No. 7), Handel; Recitative and aria ("The Children of Israel in the Desert"), C. Ph. E. Bach; Symphony in A ("Spring"), No. 2, op. 34, J. K. Paine; ballad for violin in F sharp minor (MS), G. Henschel; Hans Sachs's Monologue ("The Mastersingers"), Wagner; Danse des Bacchantes ("Philemon et Baucis") Gounod.

On several accounts the concert was one of the most interesting of the season. For one reason, it was so because of the prominent place which local composers and performers held in it, Mr. Henschel appearing in the three roles of conductor, composer and soloist, Mr. Listemann, leader of the orchestra, playing a work of Mr. Henschel's composition, and Professor Paine appearing as conductor of his own symphony. Mr. Listemann also showed his ability as a conductor by taking charge of the orchestra during Mr. Henschel's singing, so that the audience was treated to the unusual experience of observing the methods of three different conductors in one concert. Professor Paine's symphony, although not new, afforded the chief interest of the evening. Renewed hearings give a fresh and increasing appreciation of its beauty and power. It was admirably interpreted, and the composer was warmly applauded at its close. Mr. Listemann played Mr. Henschel's brilliant and difficult composition with great effect, and Mr. Henschel sang his two solos with much expressiveness and decided success.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The twenty-first symphony concert on Saturday evening was enhanced by the production of Professor Paine's work, "Spring," a symphony in five movements, embracing the close of the winter, the coming of spring, a Maynight fantasy, a romance of spring and the glory of summer. The symphony is varied, and reveals new beauties at every repetition. Among other matters on the programme was a bass recitative and aria from Bach, from the oratorio of "The Children of Israel in the Desert." This was rendered by Mr. Henschel, who also gave, with fine expression, the monologue of Hans Sachs, from "The Mastersingers." A new performance was the "Danse des Bacchantes," from Gounod's "Philemon and Baucis," full of undulating rhythm, rising and falling like the swell of the sea.

A violin ballad by Mr. Henschel was played on the violin by Mr. Listemann and the programme also introduced a hornpipe from Handel's "Concerto grosso." The programme for the twenty-second concert will include selections from Gounod and Verdi, rendered by Mrs. Humphrey Allen; a manuscript scherzo by Mr. Chadwick will be played for the first time, as will also be a selection from Massenet's "Erynnés;" Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be given, and Dvorak's "Peasant Rogue" will form the overture.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE TWENTY-FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The nucleus of last Saturday evening's concert was Professor J. K. Paine's "Spring" symphony, which the composer conducted. With each repetition this work gains in interest. The writing is learned, and the harmonic treatment often requires close attention; but on better acquaintance many fine things came out which at first observation did not catch, and the vein of melody proves to be richer and more varied than a single hearing would imply. The symphony was received with evident pleasure, and Mr. Paine was presented with a handsome bouquet, from which depended an exuberance of broad blue ribbon.

The programme embraced some novelties. One was a bass recitative and air from Emmanuel Bach's oratorio of "The Children of Israel in the Desert;" the air was scarcely so interesting as the recitative, which, although long, and necessarily sounding in parts like all recitatives, yet offers liberal scope for a dramatic coloring, which is heightened by the plaintive figuration of the accompaniment. Mr. Henschel sang this number with strongly marked expression, as he also did, later in the evening, the monologue of Hans Sachs, from the "Mastersingers." Another new thing was the "Danse des Bacchantes" from Gounod's "Philemon and Baucis," full of a swaying, rhythmic motion, and warming up toward the close into quite the true fervor. The third new contribution was a ballad for violin, written by Mr. Henschel and played by Mr. Listemann. A morceau of half-melancholy, half-romantic character, which returns at the end, after a little episode, to the first subject; not a large composition, but well put upon the instrument, and admirably played by Mr. Listemann. The only other number on the programme was the hornpipe from Handel's "Concerto grosso," No. 7, which began the concert.

On Saturday next Mrs. Humphrey Allen, returned from her Southern trip, will sing from Gounod and Verdi; a manuscript schërzo by Mr. Chadwick will be played for the first time, as will also be the case with a selection from Massenet's "Erynnés;" the symphony will be Beethoven's seventh, and the overture Dvorak's "Peasant Rogue."

The Concert Room.

"Where you shall hear music."

"A very forward March-chick," said the dissatisfied Don John, of "Much Ado about Nothing," as he read over the programme of last Saturday's orchestral concert, and saw a "Spring" symphony set down upon it.

And, to tell the truth, to accept even Professor Paine's vernal composition, with a foot of snow on the ground, and a bitter wind blowing from the regions of zero, in defiance of all the shorn lambs of State Street, did require something of the spirit which used to be inculcated in that dogmatic old ditty, "The Pilot." To be sure, Spring does not have altogether too easy a time of it in this same symphony. Winter is supposed to depart in an adagio so-tenuto, and Nature to awaken in a closely consequent allegro, which is wisely tempered as a non troppo. We should think not! Winter grumbles, and roars, and protests, and hangs back, with all the unwillingness of the "melancholy Jaques's" school-boy, "creeping like snail." And Spring comes in with a good deal of hesitancy and of peeping round Park Street corner to see if the wind has fallen. It is all delightful music, profound harmonies threaded through with melody; but it was none too encouraging on Saturday night, when one thought of the positive world which awaited him when he stepped outside from the world of imagination.

The pretty schërzo is itself distrustful of the season, and pushes the date of its fantasy on to a May night; the adagio gives a "Romance of Springtime," but sensibly leaves the epoch undetermined; and the final allegro gioioso contents itself with exalting "the glory of nature" in terms which savor quite as much of the rich fulfillment of autumn as of the fluent promises of spring. But still it cannot be gainsaid that Professor Paine's symphony is both interesting and beautiful. At first, its scholarship makes, perhaps, the strongest impression; but as one becomes acquainted with it, he sees down to the strong, fresh spirit which underlies it, and finds much quietly moving melody where he had thought to perceive only an unusually full harmonic progression.

There were two new instrumental numbers on this same programme. First, a ballad for violin, of Mr. Henschel's composition, the melody beginning in a serious barytone range, accompanied by the wooden wind and lower strings, the indicated time being an allegretto, but the movement of the theme being in longer-drawn notes; as the other orchestral instruments are added, and the horn approaches the melody, the solo voice speaks with more impetuosity; but only for a few moments, and the ballad ends much as it began. Mr. Listemann played with unusual fullness and sweetness of tone, with adequate expression, and with that perfect execution which made such technical difficulties as are contained in the piece appear as trifles.

The other novelty was the "Danse des Bacchantes" from Gounod's "Philemon and Baucis,"—a very pretty composition in its genre, and unqualified by any suggestion of too great freedom of demeanor, or too great familiarity with the flowing bowl, on the part of the participants. A kind of weaving movement, most marked at the beginning, runs through it, emphasized sometimes by the violoncellos and sometimes by the harp, and at the close the clink of the triangle and the subdued jingle of the bells come in to signify to all intelligent auditors that the revelry is nearing its height, and that it is time to be reaching for hat and overshoes.

Mr. Henschel sang the monologue of Hans Sachs from Wagner's "Mastersingers," with the skill he always displays in such music, and also introduced a scene from Emmanuel Bach's oratorio of "The Children of Israel in the Desert,"—and wanting to get out. The recitative is long, but given interest by its possibilities of strong expression and by the occasional pleading semi-tonic accents of the accompaniment; the air seemed dry and almost monotonous after a little.

Mr. Listemann conducted for Mr. Henschel's vocal numbers, and Professor Paine directed his own symphony; but we cannot honestly say we think this was to its advantage. A composer doubtless knows best what effects he desires, but he can sometimes better obtain those effects by communicating his desires to the players through their usual leader, and Professor Paine does not seem always to obtain an expressive result commensurate with his evident care.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

One of the most interesting concerts of the series was given in Music Hall last evening. At last the American muse has been given a hearing, and the second symphony by Professor Paine proved its right to a place on the programme, and was certainly a broader and greater work than the symphonies of Grimm, Svendsen & Company. Three conductors lent variety to the proceedings, and each one was greeted by the audience with enthusiasm. Even as a mere study of conducting, the concert was brimful of interest. Of Mr. Henschel's style of leading we need not speak. After him came, in vivid contrast, the nervous, energetic beating of Mr. Listemann, who seemed to be entirely in his element in the Wagner music; then came the rather square-cut directing of Professor Paine, who led his own great work, and led it well. We have never seen him hold the orchestra so well under control and give such an intelligible and firm beat. There were slips here and there, but these were due rather to the intricate character of the work itself than to any laxity in conducting. The programme itself was also of sustained and brilliant interest. It began with an old hornpipe by Handel, which was bright, pleasing and novel. The old hornpipes were practically the same as the Bourrees used by Bach and the writers in the ancient German dance forms. It was, in fact, a British reproduction of the self-same rhythm. Following this came a vocal number by that most melodious of old German composers—Philip Emanuel Bach (known as the Berlin-Hamburg Bach), second son of the great J. Sebastian Bach, and more than a rival to his father in symmetry of form and grace of expression. It is a pity that this little-known composer could not have been heard in his piano works rather than in a vocal number, for it is in these that he won his enduring fame, being almost the father of the modern sonata. The selection which was given was an aria di chiesa, a selection from his "Children of Israel in the Desert," and bore considerable resemblance to some of the old Italian works of Marcello or Pergolesi. The melody was full of pathos, while the accompaniment had a constantly recurring figure, chiefly upon the violins. Mr. Henschel was the vocalist, and sang with that wealth of expression which we always expect from him. His second vocal number was in the greatest possible contrast to the foregoing, being "Hans Sachs's Monologue" from Wagner's "Mastersinger." This number, in its sturdy, manly, but

284 Twenty-first Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening. Mr. Henschel, the conductor, appearing also as vocal soloist, and Mr. Bernhard Listemann playing a violin solo. The programme was as follows: Hornpipe in B flat (from the concerto grosso No. 7), Handel; Recitative and aria ("The Children of Israel in the Desert"), C. Ph. E. Bach; Symphony in A ("Spring"), No. 2, op. 34, J. K. Paine; ballad for violin in F sharp minor (MS), G. Henschel; Hans Sachs's Monologue ("The Mastersingers"), Wagner; Danse des Bacchantes ("Philemon et Baucis") Gounod.

On several accounts the concert was one of the most interesting of the season. For one reason, it was so because of the prominent place which local composers and performers held in it, Mr. Henschel appearing in the three roles of conductor, composer and soloist, Mr. Listemann, leader of the orchestra, playing a work of Mr. Henschel's composition, and Professor Paine appearing as conductor of his own symphony. Mr. Listemann also showed his ability as a conductor by taking charge of the orchestra during Mr. Henschel's singing, so that the audience was treated to the unusual experience of observing the methods of three different conductors in one concert. Professor Paine's symphony, although not new, afforded the chief interest of the evening. Renewed hearings give a fresh and increasing appreciation of its beauty and power. It was admirably interpreted, and the composer was warmly applauded at its close. Mr. Listemann played Mr. Henschel's brilliant and difficult composition with great effect, and Mr. Henschel sang his two solos with much expressiveness and decided success.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The twenty-first symphony concert on Saturday evening was enhanced by the production of Professor Paine's work, "Spring," a symphony in five movements, embracing the close of the winter, the coming of spring, a Maynight faerie, a romance of spring and the glory of summer. The symphony is varied, and reveals new beauties at every repetition. Among other matters on the programme was a bass recitative and aria from Bach, from the oratorio of "The Children of Israel in the Desert." This was rendered by Mr. Henschel, who also gave, with fine expression, the monologue of Hans Sachs, from "The Mastersingers." A new performance was the "Danse des Bacchantes," from Gounod's "Philemon and Baucis," full of undulating rhythm, rising and falling like the swell of the sea.

A violin ballad by Mr. Henschel was played on the violin by Mr. Listemann and the programme also introduced a hornpipe from Handel's "Concerto grosso." The programme for the twenty-second concert will include selections from Gounod and Verdi, rendered by Mrs. Humphrey Allen; a manuscript scherzo by Mr. Chadwick will be played for the first time, as will also be a selection from Massenet's "Erynnés;" Beethoven's Seventh Symphony will be given, and Dvorak's "Peasant Rogue" will form the overture.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE TWENTY-FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The nucleus of last Saturday evening's concert was Professor J. K. Paine's "Spring" symphony, which the composer conducted. With each repetition this work gains in interest. The writing is learned, and the harmonic treatment often requires close attention; but on better acquaintance many fine things came out which at first observation did not catch, and the vein of melody proves to be richer and more varied than a single hearing would imply. The symphony was received with evident pleasure, and Mr. Paine was presented with a handsome bouquet, from which depended an exuberance of broad blue ribbon.

The programme embraced some novelties. One was a bass recitative and air from Emmanuel Bach's oratorio of "The Children of Israel in the Desert;" the air was scarcely so interesting as the recitative, which, although long, and necessarily sounding in parts like all recitatives, yet offers liberal scope for a dramatic coloring, which is heightened by the plaintive figuration of the accompaniment. Mr. Henschel sang this number with strongly marked expression, as he also did, later in the evening, the monologue of Hans Sachs, from the "Mastersingers." Another new thing was the "Danse des Bacchantes" from Gounod's "Philemon and Baucis," full of a swaying, rhythmic motion, and warming up toward the close into quite the true fervor. The third new contribution was a ballad for violin, written by Mr. Henschel and played by Mr. Listemann. A moreau of half-melancholy, half-romantic character, which returns at the end, after a little episode, to the first subject; not a large composition, but well put upon the instrument, and admirably played by Mr. Listemann. The only other number on the programme was the hornpipe from Handel's "Concerto grosso," No. 7, which began the concert.

On Saturday next Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, returned from her Southern trip, will sing from Gounod and Verdi; a manuscript schërzo by Mr. Chadwick will be played for the first time, as will also be the case with a selection from Massenet's "Erynnés;" the symphony will be Beethoven's seventh, and the overture Dvorak's "Peasant Rogue."

The Concert Room.

"Where you shall hear music."

"A very forward March-chick," said the dissatisfied Don John, of "Much Ado about Nothing," as he read over the programme of last Saturday's orchestral concert, and saw a "Spring" symphony set down upon it.

And, to tell the truth, to accept even Professor Paine's vernal composition, with a foot of snow on the ground, and a bitter wind blowing from the regions of zero, in defiance of all the shorn lambs of State Street, did require something of the spirit which used to be inculcated in that dogmatic old ditty, "The Pilot." To be sure, Spring does not have altogether too easy a time of it in this same symphony. Winter is supposed to depart in an adagio sos-

tenuto, and Nature to awaken in a closely consequent allegro, which is wisely tempered as a non troppo. We should think not! Winter grumbles, and roars, and protests, and hangs back, with all the unwillingness of the "melancholy Jaques's" school-boy, "creeping" like snail." And Spring comes in with a good deal of hesitancy and of peeping round Park Street corner to see if the wind has fallen. It is all delightful music, profound harmonies threaded through with melody; but it was none too encouraging on Saturday night, when one thought of the positive world which awaited him when he stepped outside from the world of imagination.

The pretty schërzo is itself distrustful of the season, and pushes the date of its fantasy on to a May night; the adagio gives a "Romance of Springtime," but sensibly leaves the epoch undetermined; and the final allegro gioioso contents itself with exalting "the glory of nature" in terms which savor quite as much of the rich fulfilment of autumn as of the fluent promises of spring. But still it cannot be gainsaid that Professor Paine's symphony is both interesting and beautiful. At first, its scholarship makes, perhaps, the strongest impression; but as one becomes acquainted with it, he sees down to the strong, fresh spirit which underlies it, and finds much quietly moving melody where he had thought to perceive only an unusually full harmonic progression.

There were two new instrumental numbers on this same programme. First, a ballad for violin, of Mr. Henschel's composition, the melody beginning in a serious barytone range, accompanied by the wooden wind and lower strings, the indicated time being an allegretto, but the movement of the theme being in longer-drawn notes; as the other orchestral instruments are added, and the horn approaches the melody, the solo voice speaks with more impetuosity; but only for a few moments, and the ballad ends much as it began. Mr. Listemann played with unusual fullness and sweetness of tone, with adequate expression, and with that perfect execution which made such technical difficulties as are contained in the piece appear as trifles.

The other novelty was the "Danse des Bacchantes" from Gounod's "Philemon and Baucis,"—a very pretty composition in its genre, and unqualified by any suggestion of too great freedom of demeanor, or too great familiarity with the flowing bowl, on the part of the participants. A kind of weaving movement, most marked at the beginning, runs through it, emphasized sometimes by the violoncellos and sometimes by the harp, and at the close the clink of the triangle and the subdued jingle of the bells come in to signify to all intelligent auditors that the revelry is nearing its height, and that it is time to be reaching for hat and overshoes.

Mr. Henschel sang the monologue of Hans Sachs from Wagner's "Master-Singers," with the skill he always displays in such music, and also introduced a scene from Emmanuel Bach's oratorio of "The Children of Israel in the Desert,"—and wanting to get out. The recitative is long, but given interest by its possibilities of strong expression and by the occasional pleading semi-tonic accents of the accompaniment; the air seemed dry and almost monotonous after a little.

Mr. Listemann conducted for Mr. Henschel's vocal numbers, and Professor Paine directed his own symphony; but we cannot honestly say we think this was to its advantage. A composer doubtless knows best what effects he desires, but he can sometimes better obtain those effects by communicating his desires to the players through their usual leader, and Professor Paine does not seem always to obtain an expressive result commensurate with his evident care.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

One of the most interesting concerts of the series was given in Music Hall last evening. At last the American muse has been given a hearing, and the second symphony by Professor Paine proved its right to a place on the programme, and was certainly a broader and greater work than the symphonies of Grimm, Svendsen & Company. Three conductors lent variety to the proceedings, and each one was greeted by the audience with enthusiasm. Even as a mere study of conducting, the concert was brimful of interest. Of Mr. Henschel's style of leading we need not speak. After him came, in vivid contrast, the nervous, energetic beating of Mr. Listemann, who seemed to be entirely in his element in the Wagner music; then came the rather square-cut directing of Professor Paine, who led his own great work, and led it well. We have never seen him hold the orchestra so well under control and give such an intelligible and firm beat. There were slips here and there, but these were due rather to the intricate character of the work itself than to any laxity in conducting. The programme itself was also of sustained and brilliant interest. It began with an old hornpipe by Handel, which was bright, pleasing and novel. The old hornpipes were practically the same as the Bourrees used by Bach and the writers in the ancient German dance forms. It was, in fact, a British reproduction of the self-same rhythm. Following this came a vocal number by that most melodious of old German composers—Philip Emanuel Bach (known as the Berlin-Hamburg Bach), second son of the great J. Sebastian Bach, and more than a rival to his father in symmetry of form and grace of expression. It is a pity that this little-known composer could not have been heard in his piano works rather than in a vocal number, for it is in these that he won his enduring fame, being almost the father of the modern sonata. The selection which was given was an aria di chiesa, a selection from his "Children of Israel in the Desert," and bore considerable resemblance to some of the old Italian works of Marcello of Pergolesi. The melody was full of pathos, while the accompaniment had a constantly recurring figure, chiefly upon the violins. Mr. Henschel was the vocalist, and sang with that wealth of expression which we always expect from him. His second vocal number was in the greatest possible contrast to the foregoing, being "Hans Sachs's Monologue" from Wagner's "Mastersinger." This number, in its sturdy, manly, but at times brusque, character, exactly suited the voice of the singer. Mr. Henschel made an excellent contrast in the passages where, after the shoemaker-poet roughly thrusts aside the thoughts of the morning's singing, he then, spite of himself, again lapses into poetic musing. Mr. Henschel's enunciation of the German words was excellent. Perhaps we should have been less pleased had he sung the terrifying English translation, where "waxes" is thrust into rhyme with "Hans Sachs is."

Of the symphony we need say but little, since it is no new work to Boston, but that little may be strong. Professor Paine's works have not yet met with a tithe of the just recognition due them. In his two symphonies and his "Oedipus" music he has placed the American muse beside that of Europe, for the first time. Loftier conceptions, more masterly treatment, more effective orchestration, it is impossible to imagine. It is interesting, too, to observe, in these works, how the amount of learning which ruled the composer in his "Saint Peter" is now ruled by him. Of this particular work we like the first movement least. It seems to have less of spontaneity and power than the other three, although its long sustained note at the beginning, gradually dissolving into harmonies, as if frozen nature were beginning to thaw out into spring, is a strong effect. The genial scherzo, with its tender and well contrasted trio; the broadly laid out and rather Wagnerian andante; the noble chorale-like theme of the finale, like a great outpouring of thanksgiving; all these are thoughts which place the work above the correct and methodical, but less earnest, works of the lesser foreign composers which we have recently heard at these concerts. Decidedly, all that Professor Paine needs to do to achieve immortality in a double sense, is to die. But we prefer that the living composer should be honored. Following the symphony came a new work for violin by Mr. Henschel, finely performed by Mr. Listemann, although it did not give the eminent violinist many opportunities to display aught but his tenderness of expression, not having much bravura work save in the central portion. Its first theme introduced a short but expressive figure on the violin, which was responded to by the orchestra in imitations. It was mournful and somewhat oriental in character, and was contrasted with a second part which was full of agitation and fire, in the Hungarian style. The interruption of the solo theme twice by fierce dissonances in the orchestra, previous to the return of the first melody, was one of the cleverest points of this graceful and well-constructed composition, one of the most romantic the composer has yet given us. The concert closed with a feast of tambourine and triangle in the shape of some bacchanalian music by Gounod. Mr. Henschel must beware lest the Law and Order League interfere with his programmes, on the plea that he is mixing too much rum with his music.

Twenty-First Symphony Concert.

A casual perusal of the programme of last Saturday's Symphony Concert, could not fail to impress one with the idea, that the announcement was a little unseasonable the general aspect of the weather being somewhat at odds with a "Spring Symphony." The work itself, by Professor J. K. Paine, was a genuine treat, and will well repay a second hearing, being rich in harmonious beauties, which the average patron of the Symphony series would fail to appreciate on a first hearing. A very scholarly work, it demands the closest attention of its auditors, in fact appealing to a degree of thoughtful criticism, which cannot be justly given on a first acquaintance. As we think of it now its melody seems richer than at first, and its harmonic treatment furnishes abundant topic for studious thought. Professor Paine conducted the symphony, and is to be congratulated upon the impression which he made. A most appreciative audience testified its approval in many ways, an elegant floral tribute being among the welcome tokens.

Mr. Henschel sang one of the few marked novelties of the programme, a bass recitative and air from Bach's oratorio of "The Children of Israel." The great feature of this number was the strongly marked expression and dramatic interpretation of Mr. Henschel, as compared to the plaintive solemnity of the accompaniment. The recitative was by far the most interesting part of the number, although the air was not devoid of interesting passages. Another novelty was the "Danse des Bacchantes" (Gounod's) which was noticeable for a progressive and ever increasing fervor, and a delicate rhythmic quality rarely met with in works of this kind. To Mr. Listemann was confided the rendering of the latest contribution, however, a ballad for violin, written by Mr. Henschel. The charm of the work is its apparent incompleteness. A delicate semi-romantic gem, it requires the most skilful treatment, and Mr. Listemann won well deserved commendation for his artistic work.

On Saturday next Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, returned from her Southern trip, will sing from Gounod and Verdi; a manuscript scherzo by Mr. Chadwick will be played for the first time, as will also be the case with a selection from Massenet's "Erynnés;" the symphony will be Beethoven's seventh, and the overture Dvorak's "Peasant Rogue."

BOSTON

MR.

SATURD

HORNPIPE in B flat

RECITATIVE AND
Israel in

SYMPHONY in A.

{ ADAGIO SO
{ ALLEGRO M SCHERZO. (A
ADAGIO. A
ALLEGRO G

BALLAD FOR VIO

HANS SACHS' MO

DANSE DES BACC

MR. BERN

The Herald, Feb. 1884

THE month has been prolific in concerts, symphonic, club, and chamber; but few remarkable new works have been given. At the Symphony Concerts, the chief new work has been a symphony by Svendsen and the suite Roma, by Bizet. The former is full of charming themes, is in symmetrical form, and is adequately but not lengthily developed. But its instrumentation, particularly the constant use of the trombone, soon palls. The latter is full of life, color, and vigor, and makes one more than ever regret the early death of the composer. It is probable that the reawakened interest in Bizet's works will yet lead to the performance of his less-known operas, especially the Jolie Fille de Perth. We must not omit mentioning a third important new work,—Raff's "Winter" symphony,—one of his set of the Seasons, which are among his later works. In this symphony, which we do not like as well as "In Summer," of the same set, everything is easy and graceful; and, if there is a certain lack of depth, one can readily pardon it, because of the symmetry and elegance with which the composer presents his symphonic thoughts. But there is always a danger of mistaking Raff's facility of expression for profundity and spontaneity of thought. He is like a brilliant conversationalist, who carries all before him at the time, while afterward one searches in vain for the cause of the deep impression made. The playing of the orchestra requires no criticism, for the ensemble has never been better; and Mr. Henschel's readings show more judgment than in any previous season. The chief successes among the soloists have been Messrs. Perabo and Giese. The former, while not a remarkable bravura player, won great applause by his refined work in emotional passages. The latter gave some of the finest 'cello playing that has been heard in Boston for years. He is great, both in slow legato work and in the most brilliant flights of virtuosity. He is yet a young man, and, we feel sure, will achieve a great name in the highest records of art.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883-84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 8TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (The peasant a rogue.) . . . DVOŘÁK.

CAVATINA. (La Reine de Saba.) . . . GOUNOD.

SYMPHONY in A. No. 7, op. 92. . . . BEETHOVEN.

Poco sostenuto; Vivace.—Allegretto.—

Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.—Allegro con brio.—

SCHERZO in F. (MS. First time.) . . . G. W. CHADWICK.

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a) "WHEN THY BLUE EYES ARE BEAMING." . . . LASSEN.

b) GREETING TO THE WOODS. }

c) SPRING FLOWERS. } . . . REINECKE.

VIOLIN OBLIGATO: MR. B. LISTEMANN.

ENTR'ACTE AND FINALE. (Les Érinnyes.) . . . MASSENET.

[First time.]

SOLOIST:

MRS. HUMPHREY-ALLEN.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

THE CONCERT WILL CLOSE AT 9.30. THOSE OBLIGED TO LEAVE BEFORE THEN WILL PLEASE DO SO DURING LAST INTERMISSION—AFTER THE ENTR'ACTE FROM MASSENET'S "LES ERINNYES."—

CAVATINA.

GOUNOD.

RECIT: Me voilà seule enfin. De quelle ardente flamme brillaient les yeux de ce fier étranger! Son orgueil, son courage en face du danger ont attendri mon âme. Pour être reine, hélas, cesse-t-on d'être femme?

ARIA: Plus grand dans son obscurité
Qu'un Roi paré du diadème
Il semblait porter en lui même
Sa grandeur et sa royauté
Funeste serment qui me lie
Resigne toi, mon cœur oublie.
L'oublier, lui que j'ai pu voir,
De son bras dominant l'espace
Du Roi braver le vain pouvoir

Et l'effrayer par son audace
L'oublier quand hier encore
Au caprice de son génie
Ses mains dans le porphyre et l'or
Créaient la forme et l'harmonie!
Aux lueurs d'un ciel embrasé
Je l'admira domptant la flamme
A mes pieds je l'ai vu brisé
Et l'amour envahit mon âme.

WHEN THY BLUE EYES ARE BEAMING. LASSEN.

Thine eyes so blue and tender
Glow with a mystic spell,
And silence in happiest dreaming
Thoughts that I dare not tell.
Thine eyes so blue and tender
Still haunt me where I go,
And ever over my spirit
Their blue waves sparkle and flow.

Thy hair so soft and shining,
Like to a chain of gold,
Is winding its fetters around me
Never to lose its hold.
Thy hair so soft and shining,
A golden web so fair,
Forever holds my spirit,
A willing captive there.

Thy lips are like the roses,
Oh Maiden dost thou know
What poison on them lingers
To fill my heart with woe!
Thy lips are like the roses,
Under an azure sky
Allured by their marvelous sweetness
How can I pass them by.

GREETING TO THE WOODS. REINECKE.

Through the autumn woods, deep silence falling, comes a sigh,
Leaflets listen to the sound appalling, so do I;
Ah! it warns me that my feet are flying past life's noon
And that I too, like the year, am dying, soon, ah! soon!

As the magic tones come gently blending, woes depart,
Soft I feel sweet joy and peace descending o'er my heart,
Like the treetops, I, all lowly bending, yield life's boon,
Murm'ring not, that my sad life is ending, soon, ah! soon.

SPRING FLOWERS. REINECKE.

Now Spring has released from their wintry dream
The buds and the leaves, and the sparkling stream.
The Snowdrops are wet with the morning dew,
And Violets unveil their leaflets of blue,
The gay flaunting Tulips with bright hues glare
And Iris and Jonquil, so modest and fair,
The sweet-scented Lilies, with petals white,
And Daisies and Heartsease so fresh and bright.

ING, MARCH 10, 1884.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, MARCH 10, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

[See Page 6.]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twenty-second concert given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening brought the following programme:

Overture to "The Peasant a Rogue".....Dvorák
Scena et Cavatina from "La Reine de Saba".....Gounod
Symphony No. 7 in A.....Beethoven
Scherzo in F (MS.).....Chadwick
Songs, with pianoforte:
(a) "When thy blue eyes are beaming".....Lassen
(b) "Greeting to the Woods,".....Reinecke
(c) "Spring Flowers,".....Reinecke
Entr'acte and finale from "Les Erinnyes".....Massenet
Mrs. Humphrey-Allen was the singer.

The programme was perhaps the brightest and most sparkling of the season. Dvorák's new overture may count among the most exhilarating of its kind. So the art of writing light comedy overtures is not dead after all! The thing seems excellently written, and is full of buoyant life and effervescent humor. It was played in capital style. The performance of the Seventh Symphony was one of the best we have ever heard. This great "Apoteosis of the Dance" was played with a brilliancy, a vigor and unanimity of accent that carried all before it, saving alone the wish that Mr. Henschel had only taken the assai meno presto in the third movement a little slower. The last movement was taken not too fast for electric effect, albeit somewhat too fast for perfect clearness; the little whirling figure was lost to hearing whenever it got down to the violas. Yet the movement went with so much snap, the sharp cross-accent were asserted with such decision, even by the wind instruments, that one could not but be carried away by it. Mr. Chadwick's new Scherzo is a gem. The themes on which it is built up are both original and taking—the first theme, with its quasi-Irish humorousness (it positively winks at you), is peculiarly happy. The working up of the movement sounds clear and coherent, even at a first hearing; the piquant charm of the whole is irresistible. The orchestration is that of a master, and is full of delicious bits of color, without ever becoming outrageous. The impression the Scherzo made was instantaneous, and as favorable as the composer himself could have wished. The Entr'acte from Massenet's "Les Erinnyes" is a very beautiful piece of melodious writing, richly, but, upon the whole, soberly instrumental. In the Finale the composer lets slip the dogs of war with a vengeance, and bombards a poor little dancetune with all his heaviest artillery.

Of Mrs. Allen's singing of the Gounod scene, it can only be said that, from some cause or other, her voice was not under her control for the nonce, and she sang sharp almost throughout. Such a performance from a singer with so good a record as Mrs. Allen is only to be passed over as one of those unfortunate and unforeseen accidents that will occur at times. In the smaller songs, notably in the last one by Reinecke (the violin obligato to which was charmingly played by Mr. Listemann), she sang far better, but still not quite like herself.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. G. W. Chadwick and M. Massenet may be said to have divided the honors of applause for the author at the symphony concert of last Saturday evening; but, as les absents ont toujours tort, Mr. Chadwick got the larger share from an audience which made a persistent demand for an encore. His new contribution to the department of instrumental music was a "scherzo," which it would really have been pleasant to hear repeated, because there was so much that was good and fresh in it. Like many recent works of similar name, this composition of Mr. Chadwick's does not keep closely within the lines which—conventionally, perhaps—mark out its exact field. It has its distinctly humorous movements and its phrases of quaint turning, but it has also passages which, if not absolutely serious, are very quiet and restrained. It shows originality beyond question, and the orchestration is strong and good; but the author has not, it seems to us, always made the best choice from his stock of materials, for one theme is far too trivial and sing-songish for the rest. But, as we have already said, the work is welcome and worth repetition.

The other novelty was a selection—entr'acte and finale—from Massenet's "Les Erinnyes,"—the former smooth and long-drawn in measure, the latter resonant of drums, cymbals, triangle, bass-tuba and piccolo; that selection of instruments which (aided by an occasional general crash) serves to express the tipsy bacchanal, the barbaric East, or the effervescent Furies, according to the requirements of the moment. There is no lack either of melody or of movement, and the color is resplendent. The symphony was Beethoven's seventh, and the reading of it excellent. The allegretto seemed a shade too slow, but the presto and vivace were full of life, the lead between the first and second parts of the first movement very suggestive, and all the difficult work of the double-basses clear and neat. The orchestra was that life-ful, delightful one of Dvorák, "The Peasant a Rogue," which does not picture (to us, at least) either peasant or a rogue, but goes on with brilliant freedom, better and better to the end.

Mrs. Humphrey-Allen was the vocalist, her selections being a scena from Gounod's "Reine de Saba," and three songs which she substituted for the scene from Verdi's "Aida," which she had previously proposed to sing. Mrs. Allen has so often well earned the favor which she enjoys, that it is only just to assume that some occult cause prevented her doing justice to herself and her music at this time. Her voice was full and rich, but it seemed not to be thoroughly under control, and both in intonation and expression was often unfaithful. Two of her songs were by Reinecke, with a violin obligato, which Mr. Listemann played very sweetly, and all the pianoforte accompaniments were Mr. Henschel's own.

At the next concert Mr. Lang is to play a new pianoforte concerto by Brahms and some Schumann morceaux. The symphony will be Beethoven's eighth, and the other orchestral numbers will be taken from Schubert and Wagner.

Reigning Attractions of Stage and Concert Hall.

The Twenty-Second Symphony Concert.

The twenty-second concert took place in Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "The Peasant a Rogue"	Dvorak
Scena et Cavatina from "La Reine de Saba"	Gounod
Symphony No. 7 in A	Beethoven
Scherzo in F (MS.)	Chadwick
Songs with piano-forte:
(a). "When thy eyes are beaming"	Lassen
(b). "Greeting to the Woods,"	Reinecke
(c). "Spring Flowers,"	Reinecke
Entr'acte and finale from "Les Erinnyes"	Massenet

Mrs. Humphrey-Allen was the vocal soloist. Notwithstanding the criticism to which Dvorak's music has been subjected, he must be accorded high rank among modern authors of light comedy overture. The overture to "The Peasant Rogue" is very brilliant, buoyant and sparkling. It was rendered very much in the spirit in which it is written. The two novelties of the evening were the "Scherzo in F" by Chadwick, which is admirably written, and an entr'acte and finale from "Les Erinnyes," which is uncommonly bright. The "Scherzo" is a gem, full of humor, piquancy and impressive effects. In orchestral work, it is clear, coherent, harmonious and forceful. The performance of the "Seventh Symphony" from Beethoven was excellent. It is seldom, indeed, that even under Mr. Henschel's direction, anything is done so well. It was masterly in all respects, and swept the audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. Mrs. Allen's singing in the Gounod scene was not as good as usual. She was evidently not quite herself. In the "songs," especially in the last one by Reinecke, the violin obligato of which was delightfully rendered by Mr. Listemann, she did a great deal better, and gave good satisfaction.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Two novelties were on the programme for the Symphony concert on Saturday evening at Music Hall. These were the first performance of a "scherzo in F," from the manuscript score by Mr. G. W. Chadwick, a fine piece of writing, and second, an entr'acte and finale from Massenet's "Les Erinnyes," very brilliant in most of its parts. Mrs. Humphrey Allen was the soloist, whose work was good, and warmly applauded. Beethoven's seventh symphony was the one presented, and it was very finely played by Mr. Henschel's orchestra. The performance for next Saturday night, which will be publicly rehearsed on Friday afternoon, will be as follows:

Prelude (Lohengrin)	Wagner
Concerto for pianoforte in B flat, No. 2, op. 83	Brahms
(First time.)
Andante from the Tragic Symphony	Schubert
Piano solo—
Romance. A Vision	Schumann
Aria. Laendler. The Elf	Schumann
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93	Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. B. J. Lang.

The Symphony Concert.

There was a fairly good house at the symphony concert last evening. There were two novelties on the programme. The first was the first performance of a "scherzo in F," from the manuscript score by G. W. Chadwick, a thoroughly good and pleasing bit of writing. The second was an entr'acte and finale from Massenet's "Les Erinnyes," very brilliant at times, but not exactly an even piece of work. Mrs. Humphrey Allen was the soloist. Her work was good, and her efforts were warmly applauded. The symphony was Beethoven's seventh. The great work was finely played throughout. Next week the programme will be as follows:

Prelude (Lohengrin)	Wagner
Concerto for pianoforte, in B flat, No. 2, op. 83	Brahms
(First time.)
Andante from the Tragic Symphony	Schubert
Piano solo—
Romance. A Vision	Schumann
Aria. Laendler. The Elf	Schumann
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93	Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. B. J. Lang.

Twenty-second Symphony Concert.

The twenty-second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall on Saturday evening, was sparsely attended. Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen was the soloist, and the programme was as follows: Overture ("The Peasant a Rogue"), Dvorak; cavatina ("La Reine de Saba"), Gounod; symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; scherzo in F (MS.), G. W. Chadwick; songs with piano: (a) "When Thy Blue Eyes Are Beaming," Lassen; (b) "Greeting to the Woods," (c) "Spring Flowers," Reinecke; entr'acte and finale (Les Erinnyes), Massenet. The opening selection was the best played of anything that the orchestra attempted during the evening, especially fine being the way in which the stringed instruments performed the exceedingly difficult work which the composer has set them. The symphony was well played, but without as much spirit and variety as might be desired, and the final selection, by Massenet, was given for all its noise and violent effects were worth. The remaining orchestral work, a new composition by Mr. Chadwick, was given for the first time and made a decidedly favorable impression as a graceful and solid piece of musical writing, and was warmly applauded. The singing of Mrs. Allen was good, although she has often been heard to better advantage. Her voice seemed somewhat less full and clear than usual in the Gounod selection, although she made much more of a success in the group of songs. In the songs by Reinecke the violin accompaniment was beautifully played by Mr. B. Listemann. At the next concert the programme will be as follows: Prelude, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Concerto No. 2 for piano, Brahms; Andante from the Tragic Symphony, Schubert; piano solos by Schumann and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F. Mr. B. J. Lang will be the soloist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 22d of the present season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall, last evening, had for its programme the following selections:

Overture ("The Peasant a Rogue")	Dvorak
Cavatina ("La Reine de Saba")	Gounod
Symphony in A No. 7, op. 92	Beethoven
Scherzo in F (MS.)	G. W. Chadwick
Songs with piano:
(a) "When Thy Blue Eyes Are Beaming"	Lassen
(b) "Greeting to the Woods"	Reinecke
(c) "Spring Flowers"	Reinecke
Entr'acte and Finale (Les Erinnyes)	Massenet

Mrs. Humphrey Allen was the soloist, and her numbers were all quite enjoyable, though the charming manner in which she sang the Reinecke selections, with Mr. Henschel at the piano and Mr. Listemann's delightful violin obligato, gave a special pleasure to the hearing of these numbers. The Gounod cavatina was an admirable bit of vocal work also, and well merited the applause which rewarded the singer. Mr. Chadwick's scherzo was heard for the first time and proved a very meritorious composition, the quaintness of its leading theme, its skilful embellishments and the freedom from any sensational effects, all showing anew the sterling abilities of this resident composer. It is worthy of note that the only encore granted in three seasons during Mr. Henschel's direction of these concerts was accorded this composition at its public rehearsal on Friday, when the audience would not be satisfied with a single hearing. The beauties of the Beethoven symphony have never been more clearly presented than on this occasion, as the musicians played with a precision which has rarely been equalled this season. The overture by Dvorak is the most enjoyable specimen of this composer's orchestral composition which has been heard of late, and its performance gave a brilliant opening to the programme, which had an equally brilliant ending in Massenet's entr'acte and finale, also a novelty here. The beauty of the entr'acte and the elaborate effects of the finale were alike enjoyable, and the richness of the instrumentation in the final movement recalled some of the scenes of Bizet's "Carmen." The disagreeable weather caused a small attendance.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The audience was among the smallest that have attended these entertainments. Dvorak's brilliant, spirited and effective overture, "The Peasant a Rogue," opened the concert. The work for the strings, which is very exacting, was done with excellent precision and clearness. The symphony was Beethoven's in A, No. 7, which was accorded a fair if somewhat colorless reading. It was by no means the best of the season's renderings of Beethoven. A Scherzo (MS.) by Mr. G. W. Chadwick, was performed for the first time. It proved to be quite unconventional, graceful in design, with some charming bits of delicate scoring, and an admirable solidity in the orchestration generally. We could have wished one or two little moments of commonplace in melody had not come to the surface to mar the earnestness and the artistic musicianship that so pleasingly characterized the work as a whole. It was in all things creditable to the composer's skill and knowledge of his art, and created a very favorable impression, which manifested itself in a prolonged and hearty call for Mr. Chadwick; who, however, did not come to the stage, but modestly blushed the gratification he experienced from the retired place he occupied in the upper gallery. The other instrumental selection was an entr'acte and finale from "Les Erinnyes," by Massenet, which were also given for the first time. It is chiefly noise, vulgarity and conventional bathos. The soloist was Mrs. Humphrey Allen, who sang a recitative and cavatina from Gounod's "La Reine de Saba." The recitative is weak, but the cavatina is a broad and flowing melody of much beauty and warmth. Mrs. Allen, whose voice seemed worn and dry, was not heard to especial advantage in the recitative, which was given without dramatic force, and her singing was far from faultless in respect to intonation, especially in the closing phrase, where some of her notes were painfully inaccurate. In the cavatina she was more successful, though even here there was overmuch of faulty intonation and an excess of portamento. In her later contributions to the programme, a song by Lassen and two songs by Reinecke, with violin obligato, she was more at home, and sang with greater freedom and ease, though still with an occasional untunefulness and without much warmth or expressiveness. She was recalled after each appearance. The violin solos in the Reinecke songs were delightfully played by Mr. B. Listemann. At the next concert the programme will be as follows: Prelude, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Concerto No. 2 for piano, Brahms; Andante from the Tragic Symphony, Schubert; piano solos by Schumann, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, in F. Mr. B. J. Lang will be the soloist.

The symphony concert of last evening was as interesting as its predecessors. Beethoven's seventh symphony was well rendered, although somewhat too rapidly in its finale. A delightful Scherzo by Chadwick won hearty applause, and deserved it. Mrs. Allen, although out of time in her operatic selection, was excellent in her lieder. The usual French dessert of piccolo and bass drum closed the performance.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Reigning Attractions of Stage and Concert Hall.

The Twenty-Second Symphony Concert.

The twenty-second concert took place in Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "The Peasant a Rogue"	Dvorak
Scena et Cavatina from "La Reine de Saba"	Gounod
Symphony No. 7 in A	Beethoven
Scherzo in F (MS.)	Chadwick
Songs with piano-forte:
(a). "When thy eyes are beaming"	Lassen
(b). "Greeting to the Woods,"	Reinecke
(c). "Spring Flowers,"	Reinecke
Entr'acte and finale from "Les Erinnyes"	Massenet

Mrs. Humphrey-Allen was the vocal soloist. Notwithstanding the criticism to which Dvorak's music has been subjected, he must be accorded high rank among modern authors of light comedy overture. The overture to "The Peasant Rogue" is very brilliant, buoyant and sparkling. It was rendered very much in the spirit in which it is written. The two novelties of the evening were the "Scherzo in F" by Chadwick, which is admirably written, and an entr'acte and finale from "Les Erinnyes," which is uncommonly bright. The "Scherzo" is a gem, full of humor, piquancy and impressive effects. In orchestral work, it is clear, coherent, harmonious and forceful. The performance of the "Seventh Symphony" from Beethoven was excellent. It is seldom, indeed, that even under Mr. Henschel's direction, anything is done so well. It was masterly in all respects, and swept the audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. Mrs. Allen's singing in the Gounod scene was not as good as usual. She was evidently not quite herself. In the "songs," especially in the last one by Reinecke, the violin obligato of which was delightfully rendered by Mr. Listemann, she did a great deal better, and gave good satisfaction.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Two novelties were on the programme for the Symphony concert on Saturday evening at Music Hall. These were the first performance of a "scherzo in F," from the manuscript score by Mr. G. W. Chadwick, a fine piece of writing, and second, an entr'acte and finale from Massenet's "Les Erinnyes," very brilliant in most of its parts. Mrs. Humphrey Allen was the soloist, whose work was good, and warmly applauded. Beethoven's seventh symphony was the one presented, and it was very finely played by Mr. Henschel's orchestra. The performance for next Saturday night, which will be publicly rehearsed on Friday afternoon, will be as follows:

Prelude (Lohengrin)	Wagner
Concerto for pianoforte in B flat, No. 2, op. 83.	Brahms
(First time.)
Andante from the Tragic Symphony	Schubert
Piano solo—
Romance. A Vision	Schumann
Aria. Laendler. The Elf	Schumann
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93	Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. B. J. Lang.

The Symphony Concert.

There was a fairly good house at the symphony concert last evening. There were two novelties on the programme. The first was the first performance of a "scherzo in F," from the manuscript score by G. W. Chadwick, a thoroughly good and pleasing bit of writing. The second was an entr'acte and finale from Massenet's "Les Erinnyes," very brilliant at times, but not exactly an even piece of work. Mrs. Humphrey Allen was the soloist. Her work was good, and her efforts were warmly applauded. The symphony was Beethoven's seventh. The great work was finely played throughout. Next week the programme will be as follows:

Prelude (Lohengrin)	Wagner
Concerto for pianoforte, in B flat, No. 2, op. 83.	Brahms
(First time.)
Andante from the Tragic Symphony	Schubert
Piano solo—
Romance. A Vision	Schumann
Aria. Laendler. The Elf	Schumann
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93	Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. B. J. Lang.

Twenty-second Symphony Concert.

The twenty-second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall on Saturday evening, was sparsely attended. Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen was the soloist, and the programme was as follows: Overture ("The Peasant a Rogue"), Dvorak; cavatina ("La Reine de Saba"), Gounod; symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92, Beethoven; scherzo in F (MS.), G. W. Chadwick; songs with piano: (a) "When Thy Blue Eyes Are Beaming," Lassen; (b) "Greeting to the Woods," (c) "Spring Flowers," Reinecke; entr'acte and finale (Les Erinnyes), Massenet. The opening selection was the best played of anything that the orchestra attempted during the evening, especially fine being the way in which the stringed instruments performed the exceedingly difficult work which the composer has set them. The symphony was well played, but without as much spirit and variety as might be desired, and the final selection, by Massenet, was given for all its noise and violent effects were worth. The remaining orchestral work, a new composition by Mr. Chadwick, was given for the first time and made a decidedly favorable impression as a graceful and solid piece of musical writing, and was warmly applauded. The singing of Mrs. Allen was good, although she has often been heard to better advantage. Her voice seemed somewhat less full and clear than usual in the Gounod selection, although she made much more of a success in the group of songs. In the songs by Reinecke the violin accompaniment was beautifully played by Mr. B. Listemann. At the next concert the programme will be as follows: Prelude, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Concerto No. 2 for piano, Brahms; Andante from the Tragic Symphony, Schubert; piano solos by Schumann and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F. Mr. B. J. Lang will be the soloist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 22d of the present season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall, last evening, had for its programme the following selections:

Overture ("The Peasant a Rogue")	Dvorak
Cavatina ("La Reine de Saba")	Gounod
Symphony in A No. 7, op. 92	Beethoven
Scherzo in F (MS.)	G. W. Chadwick
Songs with piano:
(a) "When Thy Blue Eyes Are Beaming"	Lassen
(b) "Greeting to the Woods"	Reinecke
(c) "Spring Flowers"	Reinecke
Entr'acte and Finale (Les Erinnyes)	Massenet

Mrs. Humphrey Allen was the soloist, and her numbers were all quite enjoyable, though the charming manner in which she sang the Reinecke selections, with Mr. Henschel at the piano and Mr. Listemann's delightful violin obligato, gave a special pleasure to the hearing of these numbers. The Gounod cavatina was an admirable bit of vocal work also, and well merited the applause which rewarded the singer. Mr. Chadwick's scherzo was heard for the first time and proved a very meritorious composition, the quaintness of its leading theme, its skilful embellishments and the freedom from any sensational effects, all showing anew the sterling abilities of this resident composer. It is worthy of note that the only encore granted in three seasons during Mr. Henschel's direction of these concerts was accorded this composition at its public rehearsal on Friday, when the audience would not be satisfied with a single hearing. The beauties of the Beethoven symphony have never been more clearly presented than on this occasion, as the musicians played with a precision which has rarely been equalled this season. The overture by Dvorak is the most enjoyable specimen of this composer's orchestral composition which has been heard of late, and its performance gave a brilliant opening to the programme, which had an equally brilliant ending in Massenet's entr'acte and finale, also a novelty here. The beauty of the entr'acte and the elaborate effects of the finale were alike enjoyable, and the richness of the instrumentation in the final movement recalled some of the scenes of Bizet's "Carmen." The disagreeable weather caused a small attendance.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The audience was among the smallest that have attended these entertainments. Dvorak's brilliant, spirited and effective overture, "The Peasant a Rogue," opened the concert. The work for the strings, which is very exacting, was done with excellent precision and clearness. The symphony was Beethoven's in A, No. 7, which was accorded a fair if somewhat colorless reading. It was by no means the best of the season's renderings of Beethoven. A Scherzo (MS.) by Mr. G. W. Chadwick, was performed for the first time. It proved to be quite unconventional, graceful in design, with some charming bits of delicate scoring, and an admirable solidity in the orchestration generally. We could have wished one or two little moments of commonplace in melody had not come to the surface to mar the earnestness and the artistic musicianship that so pleasingly characterized the work as a whole. It was in all things creditable to the composer's skill and knowledge of his art, and created a very favorable impression, which manifested itself in a prolonged and hearty call for Mr. Chadwick; who, however, did not come to the stage, but modestly blushed the gratification he experienced from the retired place he occupied in the upper gallery. The other instrumental selection was an entr'acte and finale from "Les Erinnyes," by Massenet, which were also given for the first time. It is chiefly noise, vulgarity and conventional bathos. The soloist was Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, who sang a recitative and cavatina from Gounod's "La Reine de Saba." The recitative is weak, but the cavatina is a broad and flowing melody of much beauty and warmth. Mrs. Allen, whose voice seemed worn and dry, was not heard to especial advantage in the recitative, which was given without dramatic force, and her singing was far from faultless in respect to intonation, especially in the closing phrase, where some of her notes were painfully inaccurate. In the cavatina she was more successful, though even here there was overmuch of faulty intonation and an excess of portamento. In her later contributions to the programme, a song by Lassen and two songs by Reinecke, with violin obligato, she was more at home, and sang with greater freedom and ease, though still with an occasional untunefulness and without much warmth or expressiveness. She was recalled after each appearance. The violin solos in the Reinecke songs were delightfully played by Mr. B. Listemann. At the next concert the programme will be as follows: Prelude, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Concerto No. 2 for piano, Brahms; Andante from the Tragic Symphony, Schubert; piano solos by Schumann, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, in F. Mr. B. J. Lang will be the soloist.

The symphony concert of last evening was as interesting as its predecessors. Beethoven's seventh symphony was well rendered, although somewhat too rapidly in its finale. A delightful Scherzo by Chadwick won hearty applause, and deserved it. Mrs. Allen, although out of time in her operatic selection, was excellent in her Lieder. The usual French dessert of piccolo and bass drum closed the performance. Comins March 9, 84

MARCH 15. 84 Mrs. Otis

The Twenty-Second Symphony Concert.

The reading of Beethoven's seventh symphony was generally excellent, in the presto and vivace passages being noticeably brilliant, but at other points and especially in the allegretto shadings, the interpretation was a little heavy and dull. Aside from this first thought, the programme was almost faultless. One of the newest items was an entr'acte and finale selection, compounded from "Les Erinnyes." The Entr'acte selection was very smooth and deliberate in measure, while the finale is more resonant and abounds in moments of confusion and crash, where one loses threads of detail in the ensemble. The orchestration is somewhat hackneyed and rings changes upon the harsher instruments which are inspiring, while far from agreeable. But there is no lack of movement, no absence of color, and rich melody rivets the attention of the hearer from first to last.

It is said that absence of person begets nearness of thought, and if there is anything in the theory of soul communication, the absent composer of the "scherzo," must have felt a thrill of joy about the time that his many Boston friends were clamoring for an encore, which, as usual, they did not get. Mr. Chadwick may well award the credit of a good share of his applause to this generous sentiment. But let us state here, that we make the statement rather as an evidence of the gentleman's popularity than with any idea of belittling his work, which evinces many features of unusual excellence. It is marked by a spirit of originality that more than offsets its few faults, which are a noticeably trivial style of treatment, and a strong suggestion of monotony at times. But it is absolutely unconventional, novel, and original. Its movements range from quaintly humorous to serious, although the latter phase rarely appears, and as a whole the work is bright, humorous, and interesting.

The vocalist of the evening, Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, was very satisfactory, but hardly seemed to have her usual control over her voice, which for full richness is rarely surpassed. It was noticeable that her intonation and expression were occasionally commonplace. Mr. Listemann played the violin obbligato to two of her songs, and Mr. Henschel all of the pianoforte accompaniments, both gentlemen acquitting themselves with credit.

TIGHT BINDING

302

THE CONCERT WILL CLOSE AT 9.45. THOSE OBLIGED TO LEAVE BEFORE THEN WILL PLEASE DO SO DURING LAST INTERMISSION—AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.—

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883-84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 15TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

PRELUDE. (Lohengrin.) WAGNER.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE in B flat. No. 2, op. 83. BRAHMS.

[First time.]

Allegro non troppo.—Allegro appassionato.—
Andante.—Allegretto grazioso.—

ANDANTE from the TRAGIC SYMPHONY. SCHUBERT.

PIANO SOLO.

Romance. A Vision. }
Aria. Laendler. The Elf. } SCHUMANN.

SYMPHONY in F. No. 8, op. 93. BEETHOVEN.

Allegro vivace e con brio.—Allegretto scherzando.—
Tempo di menuetto.—Allegro vivace.—

SOLOIST:

MR. B. J. LANG.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

THE TWENTY-THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The audience at the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert of Saturday evening last had an opportunity to hear a work which, before them, no American, and few European audiences have heard. We refer to the second concerto for pianoforte by Brahms—his opus 83, in B flat. We recall at this writing two foreign performances—by Von Bülow and by the author; of these the latter was not favorably spoken of, as Brahms is not a sufficiently strong master of the pianoforte to do justice to his own score, or always even to sketch it out according to his own prescribed conditions of time and force. On the present occasion the pianist was Mr. B. J. Lang, whose playing, in spite of the admirable characteristics which we shall go on to note, left something to be desired. So far as this sense of desire was personal to us, we can half blame Mr. Lang for it. We had previously heard him play the concerto in an intimate circle of a few friends, where no responsibility weighed upon him, and where he felt nothing of that great nervousness which oppresses him in public, and we were then so struck by the solo part,—supported by Mr. Foote, with a sketch of the score on a second pianoforte,—that our expectations of the complete rendering were high. Mr. Lang went to his task with a thorough conviction of the value of the music, a thorough understanding of it, a strong purpose almost to exact approval of it, and a technical command of all its many and great difficulties of accent and execution. But somehow, in the Music Hall, he did not seem able to get quite deep enough, either in intensity of tone or of expression, in spite of his earnestness and correctness; and as the orchestra did not always seem quite clear in its relations with the solo instrument, we often failed to find what we were looking for with good reason, as we thought. Let us hasten to say, however, that the audience generally accepted the concerto with pleasure, and commended with much applause the playing of Mr. Lang, who surely deserved much.

There can be no question that the concerto is a great work, and more interesting and valuable than its author's first concerto. It shows the profound learning and philosophic tendency of Brahms, and it also furnishes many instances of his apparent irrelevancy and abstruseness. The orchestration, though often intricate, is not overwhelming; the piano frequently stands quite alone, and the scoring of the tutti passages is usually light, although this lightness of volume is sometimes paid for in shrillness. The form is almost symphonic, there being four distinct movements,—allegro non troppo; allegro appassionnato; andante; and allegretto grazioso. Of these the second is least pleasing, and the third the most so; the latter being peaceful and proportionate, the former restless and irregular. The theme of the first movement has more intrinsic beauty of character than was apparent in the playing, and there was scarcely grace enough in the reading of the last to justify its fame. But the general impression is that of a work which will live and grow in appreciation and regard. We can only add the vain wish that the concerto might have been heard earlier in the season, so that a repetition of it could have been accorded.

The other orchestral works were the prelude to "Lohengrin," and the andante—not particularly suggestive of tragedy—from Schubert's "Tragic" symphony,—both beautifully read,—and Beethoven's eighth symphony, the performance of which was not altogether delicate. The band played as if a little wearied, either by the long sequence of concerts or by the considerable labor of the evening, and although there was sufficient life to their work, it labored a little, especially in the scherzo, which was too heavily accented. Mr. Lang's further contribution was a half-dozen of Schumann's smaller pieces,—the "Vision," the "Ländler," the "Elf," etc.,—which he played with delicacy and fine taste, but which were in themselves rather slender for such a great hall.

At the last concert, on Saturday next, the ninth symphony of Beethoven and the "Manfred" music of Schumann will make up the programme. Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rollwagen, Mr. Toedt and Mr. Heinrich will sing the solo parts, and Mr. Howard M. Ticknor will read the illustrative and melodramatic scenes of Byron's poem.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, MARCH 17, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twenty-third concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

- Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
- Concerto for pianoforte, in B-flat, No. 2, op. 83.....Brahms
- (First time.)
- Andante from the "Tragic Symphony".....Schubert
- Pianoforte solo—
- Romance. A Vision. }
- Aria. Ländler. The Elf. }.....Schumann
- Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93.....Beethoven

Mr. B. J. Lang was the pianist.

The Prelude to "Lohengrin" was played very beautifully indeed; the orchestra has done nothing finer than its rendering of this poetic composition. The interest of the evening, however, centred naturally enough in the Brahms concerto. The better one becomes acquainted with the works of this wonderful man, the firmer faith has one that each new composition of his will bring with it a fresh revelation of true power and greatness. One looks instinctively to him, among living composers, as to the man who has really the most weighty word to say. The B-flat concerto is no disappointment, even to the highest hopes one may have built on the composer's previous works. Ever since Schumann's great A minor concerto the world has been waiting for a fresh work in this form which could fairly be ranked in the same class with it and with the great Beethoven concerto in G and E-flat; a work which for largeness of design, earnestness of purpose and nobility of musical spirit, should be recognizable as the worthy companion of the greatest classic compositions in the concerto form. For a long time the world waited in vain; the right man did not appear. Liszt represented a too utterly different direction; Rubinstein, from whom most was to be hoped in a certain sense, failed to strike the right keynote, probably more from a lack of stability of character and the want of thoroughness and faithfulness of work resulting therefrom, than from a lack of heaven-sent gift; Saint-Saëns showed, in his G minor concerto that he was capable of technical workmanship which could compare favorably with the very best, but he lacked the due depth of sentiment, the "Gemüth," without which nothing truly great can be accomplished in art. As for Raff, his concertos made no very hopeful showing, and the excellent works of Broussart and Scharwenka, not to mention the Tchaikowski concerto in B-flat minor, did not, as we have said of Rubinstein, strike the keynote of true greatness. Even Brahms in his first concerto, with all its largeness of design, did not succeed in producing a work in which the pianoforte was treated sympathetically and in accordance with its true character. But, in the B-flat concerto, one is fain to believe that he has at last given to the world the "great concerto" for which it has been waiting so long; a work which can fairly be called the fit companion of the Beethoven and Schumann concertos. Do not mistake our meaning. It were wholly premature to say yet that this second concerto of Brahms's is entirely the equal of Beethoven's "Emperor" or Schumann's A minor; all that can rationally be said is that Brahms has treated an equally large musical form, and has risen to and maintained himself on a plane of lofty musical thought, which entitles his work to be ranked in the same class, to be mentioned in the same breath, with the few very great concertos which have been given to the world. On this exalted plane he walks with absolute security, as to the manner born. His treatment of both pianoforte and orchestra is as masterly as possible; since the great classic concertos we have mentioned, we know of no composition in this form in which each of these two forces preserves its own individuality so perfectly, and yet in which both are so harmoniously blended together in pursuing a common purpose. At last do we feel that the pianoforte is no millstone around the neck of the composer's inspiration, but that he has really something to impart to us which the pianoforte can say better than any other instrument, and in the saying of which, the orchestra can efficiently help it. Of all the recent concertos that we have heard, Saint-Saëns in G minor seems to us the only one of which this can be said with equal truth. As for the essential beauty and grandeur of Brahms's work, what can be said on paper, save that they both appear unspeakable? This truly great concerto found in Mr. Lang a thoroughly able and sympathetic interpreter. As this was decidedly the severest task Mr. Lang has imposed upon himself for years (for, even apart from the immense and exceptional technical difficulties of the work, the intellectual problems it presents to the performer are of the most taxing description), so was his playing of it the very finest that we can remember having heard from him since he played the Saint-Saëns concerto. He overcame the technical difficulties of the work without the appearance of effort—which, on the whole, does not happen to him too often. In the higher artistic sense, too, he rose to the full height of his task. Such exhaustive rendering of a great and noble work is rare; such exquisite finish and beauty of detail work, united with such noble breadth of style, such genuine depth of sentiment, and such ample totality of conception. One not unimportant detail should not be forgotten: Mr. Lang played with the full orchestra, not with that diminished force of strings which is usually detailed to "play accompaniments." This was a piece of devotion to his task which it were well for other pianists to imitate. Mr. Lang played the little Schumann pieces with the perfection of grace. The movement from the Schubert symphony, and the whole of the ever-wonderful No. 8 of Beethoven, were played in the orchestra's very best manner.

The programme of the next, and last, concert, is:

The music to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115. Schumann
The Ninth (choral) Symphony in D minor, op. 125. Beethoven

Soloists—Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, tenor; Mr. Max Heinrich, bass; Mr. Howard M. Ticknor, reader; Mr. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. A. F. Harlow, Mr. D. M. Babcock, basses.

This concert will begin at a quarter before eight o'clock, and end shortly before ten.

Twenty-third Symphony Concert.

The last concert but one in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, with the following programme, Mr. B. J. Lang being the soloist: Prelude (Lohengrin), Wagner; Concerto for pianoforte in B flat, No. 2, op. 83 (first time), Brahms; Andante from the Tragic Symphony, Schubert; Piano solo—Romance, a Vision; Aria, Laendler, the Elf, Schumann; Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven. The chief interest of the evening centered upon the Brahms concerto and Mr. Lang's playing of it. It proved to be a striking and beautiful work, very strongly and harmoniously constructed, melodious, and of a decidedly romantic character. It would probably, however, prove to be capable of full understanding by professional musicians and accomplished students of music, who should possess knowledge enough to perceive its extraordinary technical merit. It is a great work in this respect, but to credit it with decided fire and genius would probably be going too far. It was finely played by Mr. Lang, who easily attacked and conquered its remarkable difficulties. The orchestral part of the programme was very well performed, although the symphony has often been better done here. The next concert, which will begin at a quarter of eight, will be devoted to Schumann's music to "Manfred" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with the assistance of Mrs. Georg Henschel, Miss Louise Rollwagen, Mr. T. J. Toedt, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mr. E. Hubbard, Mr. A. F. Harlow and Mr. D. M. Babcock. Mr. Howard M. Ticknor will read the text of "Manfred."

The Symphony Concert.

The symphony concert season is drawing to its close. But one more entertainment remains, on which occasion a great programme will be presented, and Mr. Henschel will make his final bow to the audience which has listened to so much that has been enjoyable under his leadership. Saturday evening the audience was not large. Mr. B. J. Lang was the soloist. He played Brahms's second concerto for the pianoforte, which was given here for the first time. It proved to be a melodious work, more pleasing on first hearing than most of this composer's productions. Mr. Lang proved his scholarship and his popularity. Beethoven's eighth symphony was finely given. The programme for next week will be as follows:

The music to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115. Schumann
The Ninth (choral) Symphony in D minor, op. 125. Beethoven

Soloists—Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, tenor; Mr. Max Heinrich, bass.

Mr. Howard M. Ticknor, reader.
Mr. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. A. F. Harlow, Mr. D. M. Babcock, basses.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Reigning Attractions of Stage and Concert Hall.

The Twenty-Third Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third symphony concert was given in Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Prelude to "Lohengrin" Wagner
Concerto for pianoforte, in B-flat, No. 2, op. 83 Brahms
(First time.)
Andante from the "Tragic Symphony" Schubert
Piano solo—
Romance, A Vision. Schumann
Aria, Ländler, The Elf. Beethoven
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93 Beethoven

Mr. B. J. Lang was the pianist.

The prelude to "Lohengrin" was very beautifully rendered. It surpassed anything that the orchestra has done this season. The concerto for pianoforte by Brahms came next and was really the principal attraction, as it was the most inspiring and effective feature of the entertainment. He is truly one of the greatest, weightiest and every way, worthiest of modern composers. It is impossible for those who admire the sincere, the broad, the noble and the ennobling in music to be disappointed in his work. The concerto in B-flat is his best effort of the kind. It rises to a sublime height, and never falls to the level of the ordinary or the commonplace. Equally masterly is it in the treatment of the piano and the orchestra. As a whole, it is grand, impressive and superb. Mr. Lang proved himself equal to the task of interpreting his part of this marvelous work, meeting all its difficulties with apparent ease, and rising to the altitude of its loftiest thought. Even the full orchestra could not and did not detract from his wonderful effectiveness. On the contrary it served only to assist and heighten it. It is impossible to conceive how he could have surpassed himself and surely we know of no one else who could have done so. This is unusual praise, but well earned and justly deserved. He also played the Schumann numbers with the very perfection of ease and grace. The orchestra did marvelously well with the Schubert symphony and the number eight of Beethoven. The next concert will be the last. The programme will be as follows:

The music to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115 Schumann
The Ninth (choral) Symphony in D minor, op. 125 Beethoven
Soloists—Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, tenor; Mr. Max Heinrich, bass; Mr. Howard M. Ticknor, reader; Mr. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. A. F. Harlow, Mr. D. M. Babcock, basses.

truly great can be accomplished in art. As for Raff, his concertos made no very hopeful showing, and the excellent works of Broussart and Scharwenka, not to mention the Tchaikowski concerto in B-flat minor, did not, as we have said of Rubinstein, strike the keynote of true greatness. Even Brahms in his first concerto, with all its largeness of design, did not succeed in producing a work in which the pianoforte was treated sympathetically and in accordance with its true character. But, in the B-flat concerto, one is fain to believe that he has at last given to the world the "great concerto" for which it has been waiting so long; a work which can fairly be called the fit companion of the Beethoven and Schumann concertos. Do not mistake our meaning. It were wholly premature to say yet that this second concerto of Brahms's is entirely the equal of Beethoven's "Emperor" or Schumann's A minor; all that can rationally be said is that Brahms has treated an equally large musical form, and has risen to and maintained himself on a plane of lofty musical thought, which entitles his work to be ranked in the same class, to be mentioned in the same breath, with the few very great concertos which have been given to the world. On this exalted plane he walks with absolute security, as to the manner born. His treatment of both pianoforte and orchestra is as masterly as possible; since the great classic concertos we have mentioned, we know of no composition in this form in which each of these two forces preserves its own individuality so perfectly, and yet in which both are so harmoniously blended together in pursuing a common purpose. At last do we feel that the pianoforte is no millstone around the neck of the composer's inspiration, but that he has really something to impart to us which the pianoforte can say better than any other instrument, and in the saying of which, the orchestra can efficiently help it. Of all the recent concertos that we have heard, Saint-Saëns in G minor seems to us the only one of which this can be said with equal truth. As for the essential beauty and grandeur of Brahms's work, what can be said on paper, save that they both appear unspeakable? This truly great concerto found in Mr. Lang a thoroughly able and sympathetic interpreter. As this was decidedly the severest task Mr. Lang has imposed upon himself for years (for, even apart from the immense and exceptional technical difficulties of the work, the intellectual problems it presents to the performer are of the most taxing description), so was his playing of it the very finest that we can remember having heard from him since he played the Saint-Saëns concerto. He overcame the technical difficulties of the work without the appearance of effort—which, on the whole, does not happen to him too often. In the higher artistic sense, too, he rose to the full height of his task. Such exhaustive rendering of a great and noble work is rare; such exquisite finish and beauty of detail work, united with such noble breadth of style, such genuine depth of sentiment, and such ample totality of conception. One not unimportant detail should not be forgotten: Mr. Lang played with the full orchestra, not with that diminished force of strings which is usually detailed to "play accompaniments." This was a piece of devotion to his task which it were well for other pianists to imitate. Mr. Lang played the little Schumann pieces with the perfection of grace. The movement from the Schubert symphony, and the whole of the ever-wonderful No. 8 of Beethoven, were played in the orchestra's very best manner.

The programme of the next, and last, concert, is:

The music to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115... Schumann
The Ninth (choral) Symphony in D minor, op. 125..... Beethoven

Soloists—Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, tenor; Mr. Max Heinrich, bass; Mr. Howard M. Ticknor, reader; Mr. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. A. F. Harlow, Mr. D. M. Babcock, basses.

This concert will begin at a quarter before eight o'clock, and end shortly before ten.

Twenty-third Symphony Concert.

The last concert but one in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, with the following programme, Mr. B. J. Lang being the soloist: Prelude (Lohengrin), Wagner; Concerto for pianoforte in B flat, No. 2, op. 83 (first time), Brahms; Andante from the Tragic Symphony, Schubert; Piano solo—Romance, a Vision, Aria, Laendler, the Elf, Schumann; Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven. The chief interest of the evening centred upon the Brahms concerto and Mr. Lang's playing of it. It proved to be a striking and beautiful work, very strongly and harmoniously constructed, melodious, and of a decidedly romantic character. It would probably, however, prove to be capable of full understanding by professional musicians and accomplished students of music, who should possess knowledge enough to perceive its extraordinary technical merit. It is a great work in this respect, but to credit it with decided fire and genius would probably be going too far. It was finely played by Mr. Lang, who easily attacked and conquered its remarkable difficulties. The orchestral part of the programme was very well performed, although the symphony has often been better done here. The next concert, which will begin at a quarter of eight, will be devoted to Schumann's music to "Manfred" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with the assistance of Mrs. Georg Henschel, Miss Louise Rollwagen, Mr. T. J. Toedt, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mr. E. Hubbard, Mr. A. F. Harlow and Mr. D. M. Babcock. Mr. Howard M. Ticknor will read the text of "Manfred."

The Symphony Concert.

The symphony concert season is drawing to its close. But one more entertainment remains, on which occasion a great programme will be presented, and Mr. Henschel will make his final bow to the audience which has listened to so much that has been enjoyable under his leadership. Saturday evening the audience was not large. Mr. B. J. Lang was the soloist. He played Brahms's second concerto for the pianoforte, which was given here for the first time. It proved to be a melodious work, more pleasing on first hearing than most of this composer's productions. Mr. Lang proved his scholarship and his popularity. Beethoven's eighth symphony was finely given. The programme for next week will be as follows:

The Music to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115... Schumann
The Ninth (choral) Symphony in D minor, op. 125..... Beethoven

Soloists—Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, tenor; Mr. Max Heinrich, bass.

Mr. Howard M. Ticknor, reader.
Mr. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. A. F. Harlow, Mr. D. M. Babcock, basses.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Reigning Attractions of Stage and Concert Hall.

The Twenty-Third Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third symphony concert was given in Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Prelude to "Lohengrin" Wagner
Concerto for pianoforte, in B-flat, No. 2, op. 83 Brahms
(First time.)
Andante from the "Tragic Symphony" Schubert
Piano solo—
Romance. A Vision. } Schumann
Aria. Ländler. The Elf. }
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93 Beethoven
Mr. B. J. Lang was the pianist.

The prelude to "Lohengrin" was very beautifully rendered. It surpassed anything that the orchestra has done this season. The concerto for pianoforte by Brahms came next and was really the principal attraction, as it was the most inspiring and effective feature of the entertainment. He is truly one of the greatest, weightiest and every way, worthiest of modern composers. It is impossible for those who admire the sincere, the broad, the noble and the ennobling in music to be disappointed in his work. The concerto in B-flat is his best effort of the kind. It rises to a sublime height, and never falls to the level of the ordinary or the commonplace. Equally masterly is it in the treatment of the piano and the orchestra. As a whole, it is grand, impressive and superb. Mr. Lang proved himself equal to the task of interpreting his part of this marvelous work, meeting all its difficulties with apparent ease, and rising to the altitude of its loftiest thought. Even the full orchestra could not and did not detract from his wonderful effectiveness. On the contrary it served only to assist and heighten it. It is impossible to conceive how he could have surpassed himself and surely we know of no one else who could have done so. This is unusual praise, but well earned and justly deserved. He also played the Schumann numbers with the very perfection of ease and grace. The orchestra did marvelously well with the Schubert symphony and the number eight of Beethoven. The next concert will be the last. The programme will be as follows:

The music to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115 Schumann
The Ninth (choral) Symphony in D-minor, op. 125 Beethoven
Soloists—Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, tenor; Mr. Max Heinrich, bass; Mr. Howard M. Ticknor, reader; Mr. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. A. F. Harlow, Mr. D. M. Babcock, basses.

STAGE AND CONCERT HALL.

Twenty-third Symphony Concert—Mr. B. J. Lang, Soloist.

The twenty-third of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Mr. B. J. Lang, pianist, being the soloist, and the selections as follows:

Prelude ("Lohengrin").....Wagner
Concerto for Pianoforte in B flat, No. 2, op. 83.....Brahms
Andante from the "Tragic" Symphony.....Schubert
Piano Solo.
Romance. A Vision.....Schumann.
Aria. Laendler. The Elf.....Schumann.
Symphony in F. No. 8, op. 93.....Beethoven

The Brahms concerto was the novelty of the evening, and proved to be the most enjoyable composition which this composer has as yet put before the public, and its leading characteristics are sharply in contrast with his orchestral works which have been heard here. The concerto was composed about three years ago, and, soon after its completion, was first played in the German cities by Brahms, who received enthusiastic praise from all for the excellence of his work. The usual form of the concerto is not followed by the composer in this work, as it is more nearly a symphony, in which the piano is treated as a part of the orchestra, rather than as the prominent instrument; and it is a peculiarly pleasing work on this account. In the opening movement, allegro non troppo, the ideas are perhaps less clearly presented than in the latter portions of the work, but the variety and beauty of their treatment give a decided charm to this number of the concerto. The second movement, allegro appassionata, has many notable beauties which fully prepare the hearer for the andante which follows, and shows the composer at his best. The solo for cello, which forms the opening theme (finely played by Mr. Mueller), is a delightful piece of writing, and this theme is given in strong contrast with that assigned the piano in the same movement. It is in the last portion of the work, however, allegretto grazioso, that shows the possibilities of this composer, for it is as graceful in form and as pleasing as anything of Mozart's, and gives a most charming conclusion to this most interesting composition. Mr. Lang's presentation of the work was beyond criticism. Good musician that he is, he never has shown a better proof of his abilities in this line of effort. The piano was given just the prominence demanded, and every theme was as clearly presented as one could wish. His intelligence, skill and good taste combined to give his work a peculiar charm in all the movements, and his efforts were fully appreciated and generously rewarded by the audience. The pretty trifles of Schumann were given a real value by the artistic fashion in which they were played, and altogether Mr. Lang more than maintained his reputation by his evening's efforts. Of the work of the orchestra it is almost needless to speak, as the organization has become so fully a unit that its members play as if guided by a single mind, and the best results may always be counted upon. A notably fine interpretation was given the "Parsifal" prelude, the absolute purity of the tone given out by the strings making the chief beauties of the number very prominent. The andante from the "Tragic" symphony, almost a novelty, proved one of the many enjoyable numbers of the programme, its performance being characterized by rare delicacy and precision. The ever enjoyable eighth symphony was played with equal success, and the audience, one of the largest of the season, showed its enjoyment by liberal applause after each of the selections.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—On Saturday evening, at Music Hall, the last concert but one of this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given to a comparatively small audience. Mr. B. J. Lang was the soloist and the following programme was performed: Prelude (Lohengrin), Wagner; concerto for pianoforte in B flat, No. 2, op. 83 (first time) Brahms; andante, from the Tragic Symphony, Schubert; piano solo—Romance, A Vision; aria, Laendler, the Elf, Schumann; symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven. Mr. Lang played the Brahms concerto for the pianoforte with great skill and beauty of expression. The work, which was given for the first time here, proved to be one of pleasing melody as well as high merit in other respects. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the other numbers of the programme were finely performed by the orchestra, under Mr. Henschel's direction. The programme for next Saturday evening, when the last concert will be given, is a great one, as follows:

The Music to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115.....Schumann
The Ninth (choral) Symphony in D minor, op. 125.....Beethoven
Soloists—Mrs. Georg Henschel, Soprano; Miss Louise Rollwagen, Contralto; Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, Tenor; Mr. Max Heinrich, Bass.
Mr. Howard M. Ticknor, Reader.
Mr. Elliot Hubbard, Mr. A. F. Harlow, Mr. D. M. Babcock, basses.

AND P have again come to New TICKERICKING Hall last Friday attracted a considerable audience, particularly among the women, within the sacred limits of the characteristics to these limitations they may be but they are really nothing to result to their injury.
of limited vocal capacity
and of good quality, and take pleasure in hearing sings beyond her physical and instructed and always difficult to speak without is a good musician no

ows how to play a piano
But it would seem to
y uninteresting singer.
unsympathetic and fre-
He shows a Teutonic
grace that often mars an otherwise
a song, and is generally disappoint-
of his art. The fact is that Mr.
his blind admirers claim for him) person than he really is. It is not a good voice, to be a good singer of
to be an accomplished pianist, a
and an orchestral conductor all at ld not a little modesty in this Hen-
itable? My Key Note Apr 24

The Twenty-third Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall, last Saturday evening, March 15th, Georg Henschel conducting as usual, and B. J. Lang, pianist, being the soloist. The programme was as follows:

Prelude ("Lohengrin").....Wagner.
Concerto for Pianoforte in B flat, No. 2 (op. 83).....Brahms.
Andante from the "Tragic" Symphony.....Schubert.
Piano solo.
Romance. A Vision.....Schumann.
Aria. Laendler. The Elf.....Schumann.
Symphony in F. No. 8 (op. 93).....Beethoven.

The great feature of the evening's entertainment was the presentation of the Brahms's concertos, and the pleasant anticipations which had been raised concerning it were in every way gratified. The concerto was first brought out in Germany some three years ago and achieved an instant and remarkable success. It is so distinct in character from other works of this great composer that it is at first somewhat puzzling, but it proves to be very beautiful, and it is particularly noticeable for its harmonious and melodious character. Technically, it is a work of extraordinary merit, but beyond this it possesses many popular qualities easy to be recognized and appreciated even by those who have not ears most thoroughly trained to classical music. The place of the pianoforte is more than usually subordinated in the work, and Mr. Lang again showed his masterly skill in the manner in which he rendered his part of the composition, giving it not undue prominence, and yet exhibiting in the fullest and the strongest way, the beauty of coloring and all the finest effects in it. The strongest passages in particular were rendered with a precision and a clearness and justness of expression that was in the highest degree commendatory. Very admirable was his treatment of the theme in the second movement, allegro appassionata, and this, in conjunction with the violincello solo in the same movement, which was played in a beautiful manner by Mr. Muller, formed one of the most enjoyable numbers of the evening. The preceding movement, allegro non troppo is somewhat less satisfactory but is still full of beauty, and is strongly indicative of the better parts which follow. The closing number allegretto grazioso is the most beautiful part of the composi-

STAGE AND CONCERT HALL.

Twenty-Third Symphony Concert—Mr. B. J. Lang, Soloist.

The twenty-third of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Mr. B. J. Lang, pianist, being the soloist, and the selections as follows:

Prelude ("Lohengrin").....Wagner
Concerto for Pianoforte in B flat, No. 2, op. 83.....Brahms
Andante from the "Tragic" Symphony.....Schubert
Piano Solo.
Romance. A Vision.....Schumann.
Aria. Laendler. The Elf.....Beethoven
Symphony in F. No. 8, op. 93.....Beethoven

The Brahms concerto was the novelty of the evening, and proved to be the most enjoyable composition which this composer has as yet put before the public, and its leading characteristics are sharply in contrast with his orchestral works which have been heard here. The concerto was composed about three years ago, and, soon after its completion, was first played in the German cities by Brahms, who received enthusiastic praise from all for the excellence of his work. The usual form of the concerto is not followed by the composer in this work, as it is more nearly a symphony, in which the piano is treated as a part of the orchestra, rather than as the prominent instrument; and it is a peculiarly pleasing work on this account. In the opening movement, allegro non troppo, the ideas are perhaps less clearly presented than in the latter portions of the work, but the variety and beauty of their treatment give a decided charm to this number of the concerto. The second movement, allegro appassionata, has many notable beauties which fully prepare the hearer for the andante which follows, and shows the composer at his best. The solo for cello, which forms the opening theme (finely played by Mr. Mueller), is a delightful piece of writing, and this theme is given in strong contrast with that assigned the piano in the same movement. It is in the last portion of the work, however, allegretto grazioso, that shows the possibilities of this composer, for it is as graceful in form and as pleasing as anything of Mozart's, and gives a most charming conclusion to this most interesting composition. Mr. Lang's presentation of the work was beyond criticism. Good musician that he is, he never has shown a better proof of his abilities in this line of effort. The piano was given just the prominence demanded, and every theme was as clearly presented as one could wish. His intelligence, skill and good taste combined to give his work a peculiar charm in all the movements, and his efforts were fully appreciated and generously rewarded by the audience. The pretty trifles of Schumann were given a real value by the artistic fashion in which they were played, and altogether Mr. Lang more than maintained his reputation by his evening's efforts. Of the work of the orchestra it is almost needless to speak, as the organization has become so fully a unit that its members play as if guided by a single mind, and the best results may always be counted upon. A notably fine interpretation was given the "Parsifal" prelude, the absolute purity of the tone given out by the strings making the chief beauties of the number very prominent. The andante from the "Tragic" symphony, almost a novelty, proved one of the many enjoyable numbers of the programme, its performance being characterized by rare delicacy and precision. The ever enjoyable eighth symphony was played with equal success, and the audience, one of the largest of the season, showed its enjoyment by liberal applause after each of the selections.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—On Saturday evening, at Music Hall, the last concert but one of this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given to a comparatively small audience. Mr. B. J. Lang was the soloist and the following programme was performed: Prelude (Lohengrin), Wagner; concerto for pianoforte in B flat, No. 2, op. 83 (first time) Brahms; andante, from the Tragic Symphony, Schubert; piano solo—Romance, a Vision; aria. Laendler, the Elf, Schumann; symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven. Mr. Lang played the Brahms concerto for the pianoforte with great skill and beauty of expression. The work, which was given for the first time here, proved to be one of pleasing melody as well as high merit in other respects. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the other numbers of the programme were finely performed by the orchestra, under Mr. Henschel's direction. The programme for next Saturday evening, when the last concert will be given, is a great one, as follows:

The Music to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115.....Schumann
The Ninth (choral) Symphony in D minor, op. 125.....Beethoven
Soloists—Mrs. Georg Henschel, Soprano; Miss Louise Rollwagen, Contralto; Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, Tenor; Mr. Max Heinrich, Bass.
Mr. Howard M. Ticknor, Reader.
Mr. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. A. F. Harlow, Mr. D. M. Babcock, basses.

and I have again come to New TICKNOR attracted a considerable within the sacred limits characteristics to these limitations they may be
but they are really nothing result to their injury.
er of limited vocal capacity
and of good quality, and
take pleasure in hearing
sks beyond her physical I instructed and always difficult to speak without

is a good musician no
ows how to play a piano
But it would seem to
y uninteresting singer.
nsympathetic and fre-
He shows a Teutonic
grance that often mars an otherwise
a song, and is generally disappoint-
of his art. The fact is that Mr.
his blind admirers claim for him)
person than he really is. It is not a good voice, to be a good singer of
to be an accomplished pianist, a
and an orchestral conductor all at ld not a little modesty in this Hen-litable? My Key note Apr 24

The Twenty-third Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall, last Saturday evening, March 15th, Georg Henschel conducting as usual, and B. J. Lang, pianist, being the soloist. The programme was as follows:

Prelude ("Lohengrin").....Wagner.
Concerto for Pianoforte in B flat, No. 2 (op. 83).....Brahms.
Andante from the "Tragic" Symphony.....Schubert.
Piano solo.

Romance. A Vision.....Schumann.
Aria. Laendler. The Elf.....Schumann.
Symphony in F. No. 8 (op. 93).....Beethoven.

The great feature of the evening's entertainment was the presentation of the Brahms's concertos, and the pleasant anticipations which had been raised concerning it were in every way gratified. The concerto was first brought out in Germany some three years ago and achieved an instant and remarkable success. It is so distinct in character from other works of this great composer that it is at first somewhat puzzling, but it proves to be very beautiful, and it is particularly noticeable for its harmonious and melodious character. Technically, it is a work of extraordinary merit, but beyond this it possesses many popular qualities easy to be recognized and appreciated even by those who have not ears most thoroughly trained to classical music. The place of the pianoforte is more than usually subordinated in the work, and Mr. Lang again showed his masterly skill in the manner in which he rendered his part of the composition, giving it not undue prominence, and yet exhibiting in the fullest and the strongest way, the beauty of coloring and all the finest effects in it. The strongest passages in particular were rendered with a precision and a clearness and justness of expression that was in the highest degree commendatory. Very admirable was his treatment of the theme in the second movement, allegro appassionata, and this, in conjunction with the violincello solo in the same movement, which was played in a beautiful manner by Mr. Muller, formed one of the most enjoyable numbers of the evening. The preceding movement, allegro non troppo is somewhat less satisfactory but is still full of beauty, and is strongly indicative of the better parts which follow. The closing number allegretto grazioso is the most beautiful part of the composi-

STAGE AND CONCERT HALL.

Twenty-Third Symphony Concert—Mr. B. J. Lang, Soloist.

The twenty-third of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Mr. B. J. Lang, pianist, being the soloist, and the selections as follows:

Prelude ("Lohengrin").....Wagner
Concerto for Pianoforte in B flat, No. 2, op. 83.....Brahms
Andante from the "Tragic" Symphony.....Schubert
Piano Solo.

Romance. A Vision.....Schumann.
Aria. Laendler. The Elf.....
Symphony in F. No. 8, op. 93.....Beethoven

The Brahms concerto was the novelty of the evening, and proved to be the most enjoyable composition which this composer has as yet put before the public, and its leading characteristics are sharply in contrast with his orchestral works which have been heard here. The concerto was composed about three years ago, and, soon after its completion, was first played in the German cities by Brahms, who received enthusiastic praise from all for the excellence of his work. The usual form of the concerto is not followed by the composer in this work, as it is more nearly a symphony, in which the piano is treated as a part of the orchestra, rather than as the prominent instrument; and it is peculiarly pleasing work on this account.

The opening movement, allegro non troppo, ideas are perhaps less clearly presented in the latter portions of the work, but variety and beauty of their movement give a decided charm to this number of the concerto. The movement, allegro appassionata, has notable beauties which fully prepare the hearer for the andante which follows. The solo cello, which forms the opening theme played by Mr. Mueller, is a delightful example of writing, and this theme is given in contrast with that assigned the piano in the same movement. It is in the last part of the work, however, allegretto grazioso, shows the possibilities of this composition. It is as graceful in form and as pleasing anything of Mozart's, and gives a most interesting conclusion to this most interesting session. Mr. Lang's presentation of the work was beyond criticism. Good pianist that he is, he never has a better proof of his abilities in a line of effort. The piano was just the prominence demanded, and the theme was as clearly presented as one could wish. His intelligence, skill and good combined to give his work a peculiar charm in all the movements, and his effort was fully appreciated and generously rewarded by the audience. The pretty trifles of Schubert were given a real value by the artistic in which they were played, and altogether Mr. Lang more than maintained his reputation by his evening's efforts. Of the work of the orchestra it is almost needless to say, the organization has become so fully that its members play as if guided by a mind, and the best results may be counted upon. A notably fine interpretation was given the "Parsifal" prelude, the purity of the tone given out by the strings making the chief beauties of the number very prominent. The andante of the "Tragic" symphony, almost a novelty, one of the many enjoyable numbers of the programme, its performance being characterized by rare delicacy and precision. The enjoyable eighth symphony was played with equal success, and the audience, on the largest of the season, showed its enjoyment by liberal applause after each of the selections.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—On Saturday evening, at Music Hall, the last concert but one of this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given to a comparatively small audience. Mr. B. J. Lang was the soloist and the following programme was performed: Prelude (Lohengrin), Wagner; concerto for pianoforte in B flat, No. 2, op. 83 (first time) Brahms; andante, from the Tragic Symphony, Schubert; piano solo—Romance, a Vision; aria, Laendler, the Elf, Schumann; symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven. Mr. Lang played the Brahms concerto for the pianoforte with great skill and beauty of expression. The work, which was given for the first time here, proved to be one of pleasing melody as well as high merit in other respects. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the other numbers of the programme were finely performed by the orchestra, under Mr. Henschel's direction. The programme for next Saturday evening, when the last concert will be given, is a great one, as follows:

The Music to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115.....Schumann
The Ninth (choral) Symphony in D minor, op. 125.....Beethoven
Soloists—Mrs. Georg Henschel, Soprano; Miss Louise Rollwagen, Contralto; Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, Tenor; Mr. Max Heinrich, Bass.
Mr. Howard M. Dicknor, Reader.
Mr. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. A. F. Harlow; Mr. D. M. Babcock, basses.

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel have again come to New York. Their first concert at Chickering Hall last Friday night was a popular success and attracted a considerable audience. It has been the fashion, particularly among our Eastern brethren who dwell within the sacred limits of Boston, to ascribe remarkable characteristics to these two performers. With certain limitations they may be described as meritorious artists, but they are really nothing more; and it is to be feared that the adulation they have received may result to their injury. Mrs. Henschel is a charming singer of limited vocal capacities. Her voice is light, pure and of good quality, and every one of musical taste will take pleasure in hearing her when she does not essay tasks beyond her physical capabilities. She has been well instructed and always sings tastefully.

As to Mr. Henschel, it is difficult to speak without seeming to be unjust. That he is a good musician no one will question, and that he knows how to play a piano accompaniment is beyond doubt. But it would seem to be equally true that he is a very uninteresting singer. His voice is harsh, unmusical, unsympathetic and frequently absolutely disagreeable. He shows a Teutonic explosiveness of utterance that often mars an otherwise finished rendering of a song, and is generally disappointing as the exponent of his art. The fact is that Mr. Henschel claims (or his blind admirers claim for him) that he is more of a person than he really is. It is not given to him to have a good voice, to be a good singer of every style of music, to be an accomplished pianist, a composer of genius, and an orchestral conductor all at the same time. Would not a little modesty in this Henschel business be creditable? My Key note Apr 24

The Twenty-third Symphony Concert. absent

The twenty-third concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall, last Saturday evening, March 15th, Georg Henschel conducting as usual, and B. J. Lang, pianist, being the soloist. The programme was as follows:

Prelude ("Lohengrin").....Wagner.
Concerto for Pianoforte in B flat, No. 2 (op. 83).....Brahms.
Andante from the "Tragic" Symphony.....Schubert.
Piano solo.

Romance. A Vision.....Schumann.
Aria. Laendler. The Elf.....
Symphony in F. No. 8 (op. 93).....Beethoven.

The great feature of the evening's entertainment was the presentation of the Brahms's concertos, and the pleasant anticipations which had been raised concerning it were in every way gratified. The concerto was first brought out in Germany some three years ago and achieved an instant and remarkable success. It is so distinct in character from other works of this great composer that it is at first somewhat puzzling, but it proves to be very beautiful, and it is particularly noticeable for its harmonious and melodious character. Technically, it is a work of extraordinary merit, but beyond this it possesses many popular qualities easy to be recognized and appreciated even by those who have not ears most thoroughly trained to classical music. The place of the pianoforte is more than usually subordinated in the work, and Mr. Lang again showed his masterly skill in the manner in which he rendered his part of the composition, giving it not undue prominence, and yet exhibiting in the fullest and the strongest way, the beauty of coloring and all the finest effects in it. The strongest passages in particular were rendered with a precision and a clearness and justness of expression that was in the highest degree commendatory. Very admirable was his treatment of the theme in the second movement, allegro appassionata, and this, in conjunction with the violincello solo in the same movement, which was played in a beautiful manner by Mr. Muller, formed one of the most enjoyable numbers of the evening. The preceding movement, allegro non troppo is somewhat less satisfactory but is still full of beauty, and is strongly indicative of the better parts which follow. The closing number allegretto grazioso is the most beautiful part of the composition.

tion, and is possessed of a sweetness and lightness that is worthy of one of the old masters of composition. The Schumann numbers on the programme showed in strong contrast with the weightier and more severe concerto, and Mr. Lang proved his versatility in a remarkable manner, giving to the selections all the delicacy of touch and sweetness of expression that legitimately belonged to them. The orchestra was, as it always is, fully up to the work assigned to it. The unity of purpose, the precision, truthfulness and strength of its work seem more and more apparent at every succeeding concert, and these are qualities which are in more than an ordinary degree due to Mr. Henschel's talent in organizing and conducting and infusing a body of musicians with something of his own spirit and enthusiasm. The "Lohengrin" prelude was finely played, the beauties of the number being brought out very forcibly. The Andante from the "Tragic" Symphony of Schubert, somewhat of a novelty, proved very enjoyable. The familiar Eighth Symphony of Beethoven was well presented, but not with the vigor and precision that we have noticed in its performance at other times.

—It was a characteristic idea of Mr. Lang to set an unusual hour for his lectures on pianoforte playing, and to ask so high price for the tickets, and then to follow it up by his subsequent action. When the audience had assembled for the first lecture, he confessed that he had felt a great curiosity to know if any one in town cared enough for the matter to pay a big price and submit to an inconvenient hour, for the sake of what he might have to say. His ruse had proved successful, and he should therefore make his audience his guests, and their ticket money should be returned to them the day of the second lecture.

and.
ie of sale.

X' SALE

rick Dwelling House
ont street,
partmouth street, bend the late residence

at 3 o'clock P. M., on the es.
hly built, has the modern entrance floor are parlors
ent dining room, kitchen,
acions hallways; 8 or 9
The house and lot is 22
y 80 feet in depth, in all
ad, bounded by a passage-able location for a private time and place of sale.

X' SALE.

story and Attic
Brick Dwelling
te,
ham street,
ont street.

at 3 1/2 o'clock P. M. (or im-estates Nos. 605 and 607
ulses.
rable estate. The house is 6 rooms, bathroom and the
in good order. The lot is feet in depth, in all about one-half of the passageway
location for a residence or ch will be positive, to settle Baldwin.

X' SALE.

ory Slated Roof
and Estate on ie (second from
r District.

4, at 3 o'clock P. M., on the
ises,
e the estate of the late Geo.
rable estate. The house is well arranged rooms, bath-

Mr. B. J. Lang,

observed

May 26/84

Whose portrait we give in this week's issue, besides having a wide-spread reputation elsewhere as a musician, is principally known in Boston in connection with the Handel and Haydn Society. His influence at their concerts for the last twenty-two years, has been an important and beneficent one. His power in Boston's music has always been exerted for good, and even in the days of Dresel, Kreissmann and Leonhard was felt in the counsels which preceded every important movement. It was he who first suggested the great series of Harvard Symphony Concerts; it was he who more than any other held the programmes up to their first high level; he has also been one of the leading subscribers since the beginning of the series. It was his influence which brought out in Boston for the first time the pianoforte concertos of Bach, and most of those of Schumann, Mendelssohn and Beethoven, as well as the works of the newer school, the concertos of Rubinstein, St. Saens, Bronsart, etc. For the past ten years he has been in the habit of giving a series of pianoforte concerts, the present season forming the only exception. He has given five different sets of symphony concerts, and in these has always followed the good German idea of a large orchestra in a small hall, so that no possible effect should be lost. He is one of the very few American musicians who have given concerts abroad with success. He has appeared as pianist in Berlin, Dresden and Vienna. His interest in the Bayreuth Festival, the Franz Benefit Concert, the Dwight Testimonial, the Liszt Celebration, in short, in every memorable musical occasion has been earnest, thorough, and, above all, practical. He has been honored with the personal friendship of the greatest composers of Europe, and his studies of the works of Wagner have been made with the assistance of the great composer himself. He has, like every earnest, original and competent worker, formed for himself a set of followers, pupils and disciples. It is impossible to enumerate these since the number of his pupils who have become concert soloists is alone over sixty. The work of the Cecilia Club is wholly due to Mr. Lang; that of the Apollo and Euterpe societies largely so. Mr. Lang, although he has composed some very fine works, has, as yet, published nothing. As a musician he is armed at all points; he is one of the very surest of ensemble players and never loses his head. We can personally recall many instances where his calmness has saved careless or nervous players from disaster. He is a good organizer and a very efficient leader. At a time when no one else dared undertake playing with, or directing for, the belligerent Von Bulow or the meteoric Joseffy, he did both—and well. He is one of the surest of score-readers and, though not a virtuoso, is one of the best types of the true musician. He has long been the organist of a leading Unitarian Church.

tion, and is possessed of a sweetness and lightness that is worthy of one of the old masters of composition. The Schumann numbers on the programme showed in strong contrast with the weightier and more severe concerto, and Mr. Lang proved his versatility in a remarkable manner, giving to the selections all the delicacy of touch and sweetness of expression that legitimately belonged to them. The orchestra was, as it always is, fully up to the work assigned to it. The unity of purpose, the precision, truthfulness and strength of its work seem more and more apparent at every succeeding concert, and these are qualities which are in more than an ordinary degree due to Mr. Henschel's talent in organizing and conducting and infusing a body of musicians with something of his own spirit and enthusiasm. The "Lohengrin" prelude was finely played, the beauties of the number being brought out very forcibly. The Andante from the "Tragic" Symphony of Schubert, somewhat of a novelty, proved very enjoyable. The familiar Eighth Symphony of Beethoven was well presented, but not with the vigor and precision that we have noticed in its performance at other times.

—It was a characteristic idea of Mr. Lang to set an unusual hour for his lectures on pianoforte playing, and to ask so high price for the tickets, and then to follow it up by his subsequent action. When the audience had assembled for the first lecture, he confessed that he had felt a great curiosity to know if any one in town cared enough for the matter to pay a big price and submit to an inconvenient hour, for the sake of what he might have to say. His ruse had proved successful, and he should therefore make his audience his guests, and their ticket money should be returned to them the day of the second lecture.

and
ie of sale.

X' SALE

ick Dwelling House
ront street,

partmouth street, bend the late residence

at 3 o'clock P. M., on the es.
hly built, has the modern entrance floor are parlors
ent dining room, kitchen,
acious hallways; 8 or 9
The house and lot is 22
y 80 feet in depth, in all
d, bounded by a passage-

able location for a private
time and place of sale.

X' SALE.

story and Attic
Brick Dwelling
te,

ham street,
ont street.

at 3 1/2 o'clock P. M. (or im-estates Nos. 605 and 607
nises.
rable estate. The house is 6 rooms, bathroom and the
in good order. The lot is feet in depth, in all about
one-half of the passageway
location for a residence or ch will be positive, to settle Baldwin.

IX' SALE.

ory Slated Roof
and Estate on ie (second from

r District.

14. at 3 o'clock P. M., on the
ises.
ie the estate of the late Geo. able estate. The house is well arranged rooms, bath-

Mr. B. J. Lang,

Whose portrait we give in this week's issue, besides having a wide-spread reputation elsewhere as a musician, is principally known in Boston in connection with the Handel and Haydn Society. His influence at their concerts for the last twenty-two years, has been an important and beneficent one. His power in Boston's music has always been exerted for good, and even in the days of Dresel, Kreissmann and Leonhard was felt in the counsels which preceded every important movement. It was he who first suggested the great series of Harvard Symphony Concerts; it was he who more than any other held the programmes up to their first high level; he has also been one of the leading subscribers since the beginning of the series. It was his influence which brought out in Boston for the first time the pianoforte concertos of Bach, and most of those of Schumann, Mendelssohn and Beethoven, as well as the works of the newer school, the concertos of Rubinstein, St. Saens, Bronsart, etc. For the past ten years he has been in the habit of giving a series of pianoforte concerts, the present season forming the only exception. He has given five different sets of symphony concerts, and in these has always followed the good German idea of a large orchestra in a small hall, so that no possible effect should be lost. He is one of the very few American musicians who have given concerts abroad with success. He has appeared as pianist in Berlin, Dresden and Vienna. His interest in the Bayreuth Festival, the Franz Benefit Concert, the Dwight Testimonial, the Liszt Celebration, in short, in every memorable musical occasion has been earnest, thorough, and, above all, practical. He has been honored with the personal friendship of the greatest composers of Europe, and his studies of the works of Wagner have been made with the assistance of the great composer himself. He has, like every earnest, original and competent worker, formed for himself a set of followers, pupils and disciples. It is impossible to enumerate these since the number of his pupils who have become concert soloists is alone over sixty. The work of the Cecilia Club is wholly due to Mr. Lang; that of the Apollo and Euterpe societies largely so. Mr. Lang, although he has composed some very fine works, has, as yet, published nothing. As a musician he is armed at all points; he is one of the very surest of ensemble players and never loses his head. We can personally recall many instances where his calmness has saved careless or nervous players from disaster. He is a good organizer and a very efficient leader. At a time when no one else dared undertake playing with, or directing for, the belligerent Von Bulow or the meteoric Joseffy, he did both—and well. He is one of the surest of score-readers and, though not a virtuoso, is one of the best types of the true musician. He has long been the organist of a leading Unitarian Church.

tion, and is possessed of a sweetness and lightness that is worthy of one of the old masters of composition. The Schumann numbers on the programme showed in strong contrast with the weightier and more severe concerto, and Mr. Lang proved his versatility in a remarkable manner, giving to the selections all the delicacy of touch and sweetness of expression that legitimately belonged to them. The orchestra was, as it always is, fully up to the work assigned to it. The unity of purpose, the precision, truthfulness and strength of its work seem more and more apparent at every succeeding concert. These are qualities which are in more than an ordinary degree due to Mr. Henschel's talent in organizing and conducting and infusing a body of musicians with something of his own spirit and enthusiasm. The "Lohengrin" prelude was finely played, the beauties of the number being brought out forcibly. The Andante from the "Tragic" Symphony of Schubert, somewhat of a novelty, proved very enjoyable. The familiar Eighth Symphony of Beethoven was well presented, but not with the vigor and precision that we have noticed in its performance at other times.

—It was a characteristic idea of Mr. Lang to set an unusual hour for his lectures on pianoforte playing, and to ask so high price for the tickets, and then to follow it up by his subsequent action. When the audience had assembled for the first lecture, he confessed that he had felt a great curiosity to know if any one in town cared enough for the matter to pay a big price and submit to an inconvenient hour, for the sake of what he might have to say. His ruse had proved successful, and he should therefore make his audience his guests, and their ticket money should be returned to them the day of the second lecture.

MR. LANG'S LECTURES.

Mr. B. J. Lang is one of those artists whose personality and whose work are best enjoyed when one can come close to them. Thoughtful, delicate and sensitive, his temperament is inclined to shrink from those larger and more public tests of professional accomplishment which his just ambition and his sense of what is due to his position in the musical community naturally urge him to seek. We do not here refer to him as a conductor or an accompanist at the pianoforte or the organ; in the former case, though he may supply the spirit and the incentive, yet the real work has to be done by others; in the latter case, although he buoys up and sustains, it is still another who stands responsibly foremost: and so, feeling himself a little out of the direct line of observation, he feels free and gives out freely. On the other hand, when he has to stand out alone before a great public, something of that freedom is at times lost, and those who have only heard and known him on such occasions, have not fully heard him and known him. Admirable and excellent as his work was then, it was not the best of which he is capable,—not such as would be in his playing of Chopin or Mendelssohn or Schumann to a special audience in a small hall, or of some special study to a group of sympathetic friends. Hence it was that we felt moved to say, after his performance (in the symphony series) of the Brahms concerto, that it impressed us in the Music Hall less than we expected, because it had impressed so much when he read it en petit comité. In like manner, Mr. Lang has many things to say, which he can say—well, pointedly, and in a way which fixes them in memory—when he feels sure of listeners who understand him and desire more to know his thought than to analyze the form of his phrases. He has studied and taught the pianoforte for many years, to many pupils of various minds and dispositions. Such experience brings much to a man who thinks, and we were glad when Mr. Lang began modestly to tell something of his experiences and his thoughts a few months ago. Since that time he has arranged what he wants to say into three lectures upon pianoforte playing as he understands and teaches it, and upon that awakening and development of the artistic sense, which are as essential in music as in painting. If we may judge the future by the past, these conférences (for they will be more such than mere bald lectures) will have interest for many other persons than students of the pianoforte, and we shall hope that Chickering Hall will be filled with an audience so interested and sympathetic that Mr. Lang will speak as brightly and suggestively as he often does to a single friend.

Mr. B. J. Lang,

Whose portrait we give in this week's issue, besides having a wide-spread reputation elsewhere as a musician, is principally known in Boston in connection with the Handel and Haydn Society. His influence at their concerts for the last twenty-two years, has been an important and beneficent one. His power in Boston's music has always been exerted for good, and even in the days of Dresel, Kreissmann and Leonhard was felt in the counsels which preceded every important movement. It was he who first suggested the great series of Harvard Symphony Concerts; it was he who more than any other held the programmes up to their first high level; he has also been one of the leading subscribers since the beginning of the series. It was his influence which brought out in Boston for the first time the pianoforte concertos of Bach, and most of those of Schumann, Mendelssohn and Beethoven, as well as the works of the newer school, the concertos of Rubinstein, St. Saens, Bronsart, etc. For the past ten years he has been in the habit of giving a series of pianoforte concerts, the present season forming the only exception. He has given five different sets of symphony concerts, and in these has always followed the good German idea of a large orchestra in a small hall, so that no possible effect should be lost. He is one of the very few American musicians who have given concerts abroad with success. He has appeared as pianist in Berlin, Dresden and Vienna. His interest in the Bayreuth Festival, the Franz Benefit Concert, the Dwight Testimonial, the Liszt Celebration, in short, in every memorable musical occasion has been earnest, thorough, and, above all, practical. He has been honored with the personal friendship of the greatest composers of Europe, and his studies of the works of Wagner have been made with the assistance of the great composer himself. He has, like every earnest, original and competent worker, formed for himself a set of followers, pupils and disciples. It is impossible to enumerate these since the number of his pupils who have become concert soloists is alone over sixty. The work of the Cecilia Club is wholly due to Mr. Lang; that of the Apollo and Euterpe societies largely so. Mr. Lang, although he has composed some very fine works, has, as yet, published nothing. As a musician he is armed at all points; he is one of the very surest of ensemble players and never loses his head. We can personally recall many instances where his calmness has saved careless or nervous players from disaster. He is a good organizer and a very efficient leader. At a time when no one else dared undertake playing with, or directing for, the belligerent Von Bulow or the meteoric Joseffy, he did both—and well. He is one of the surest of score-readers and, though not a virtuoso, is one of the best types of the true musician. He has long been the organist of a leading Unitarian Church.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1883 - 84.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XXIV. CONCERT.

(THE LAST OF THE THIRD SEASON.)

SATURDAY, MARCH 22D, AT 7.45, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

THE MUSIC TO BYRON'S "MANFRED," op. 115. . SCHUMANN.

THE NINTH (CHORAL) SYMPHONY in D minor, op. 125. BEETHOVEN.

SOLOISTS:

MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL, Soprano.

MISS LOUISE ROLLWAGEN, Contralto.

MR. THEODORE J. TOEDT, Tenor.

MR. MAX HEINRICH, Bass.

MR. HOWARD M. TICKNOR, Reader.

MR. ELIOT HUBBARD,

MR. A. F. HARLOW,

MR. D. M. BABCOCK. Basses.

THE MUSIC TO BYRON'S "MANFRED." SCHUMANN.

OVERTURE.

Manfred's Castle in the higher Alps.—Manfred, in undying remorse and despair, calls upon the spirits to appear to him and grant him forgetfulness of a mysterious crime which has blighted his youth. But without avail.

I. SONG OF THE SPIRITS.

FIRST SPIRIT.

Mortal, to thy bidding bow'd,
From my mansion in the cloud,
Which the breath of twilight builds,
And the summer's sunset gilds,
Though thy quest may be forbidden,
On a star-beam I have ridden.
To thine adjuration bowed,
Mortal, be thy wish avowed!

SECOND SPIRIT.

In the blue depth of the waters,
Where the wave hath no strife,
Where the wind is a stranger,
And the sea-snake hath life;
Where the mermaid is decking
Her green hair with shells,
Like the storm on the surface
Came the sound of thy spells;
To the Spirit of Ocean
Thy wishes unfold!

THIRD SPIRIT.

Where the roots of the Andes
Strike deep in the earth,
As their summits to heaven
Shoot soaringly forth,
I have quitted my birthplace
Thy bidding to bide;
Thy spell hath subdued me,
Thy will be my guide!

FOURTH SPIRIT.

The star which rules thy destiny,
Was ruled, ere earth began, by me!

THE FOUR SPIRITS.

Air, ocean, earth, thy star,
Before thee their spirits are.
And as thy guests we wait
Thy beck and bidding, child of clay!
What wouldst thou with us, son of mortals? say!

II. MELODRAMA. [Appearance of a beautiful female figure.]

316

III. INCANTATION.

FOUR SPIRITS.

When the moon is on the wave,
And the glow-worm in the grass,
And the meteor on the grave.
And the wisp on the morass:
When the falling stars are shooting,
And the answer'd owls are hooting,
And the silent leaves are still
In the shadow of the hill,
Then my soul shall be on thine,
With a power and with a sign.

A SPIRIT.

From thy false tears I did distil
An essence which hath strength to kill;
From thine own heart I then did wring
The black blood in its blackest spring;
From thine own smile I snatch'd the snake,
For there it coiled as in a brake;
From thine own lip I drew the charm
Which gave all these their chiefest harm;
In proving every poison known,
I found the strongest was thine own.

THREE SPIRITS.

And on thy head I pour the vial
Which doth devote thee to this trial;
Nor to slumber, nor to die,
Shall be in thy destiny;
Though thy death shall still seem near
To thy wish, but as a fear.
Lo, the spell now works around thee,
And the clankless chain hath bound thee;
O'er thy heart and brain together
Hath the word been passed,—now wither!

The mountain of the Jungfrau.—Manfred is meditating death, but is prevented from throwing himself into the abyss beneath by a chamois hunter, who leads him to his chalet.

IV. MELODRAMA. [Ranz des Vaches.]

V. ENTR'ACTE.

A waterfall near the chalet of the chamois hunter.

VI. MELODRAMA. [Calling of the witch of the Alps.]

The hall of Arimanes.—Arimanes on his throne, a globe of fire. The Spirits around him, worshipping him.

VII. HYMN OF THE SPIRITS OF ARIMANES.

Hail to our Master!—Prince of Earth and Air!
Who walks the clouds and waters—in his hand
The sceptre of the elements, which tear
Themselves to chaos at his high command!
He breatheth—and a storm doth shake the sea!
He speaketh—and the clouds reply in thunder;
He gazeth—from his glance the sunbeams flee;
He moveth—earthquakes rend the world asunder.
Beneath his footsteps the volcanoes rise;
His shadow is the pestilence: his path
The comets herald through the crackling skies;
And planets turn to ashes at his wrath.
To him War offers daily sacrifice;
To him Death pays his tribute; Life is his,
With all its infinite of agonies;
And his the spirit of whatever is!

VIII. IX. CHORUS OF SPIRITS.

Prostrate thyself, and thy condemned clay,
Child of the Earth, or dread the worst.

Destroy the worm!
Tear him in pieces!

X. MELODRAMA.—[Invocation of Astarte.]

(After the words "Who sent thee there requires thee here" the phantom of Astarte rises and stands in the midst.)

XI. MELODRAMA. [Manfred's address to Astarte.]

Manfred's Castle.

XII. MELODRAMA. [Manfred's Monologue.]

XIII. MELODRAMA. [Sunset.]

CLOSING SCENE. [Requiem.]

Requiem aeternam dona eis,
Et lux perpetua luceat eis.

THE NINTH SYMPHONY.

BEETHOVEN.

I. Allegro ma non troppo, un poco maestoso.—

II. Molto Vivace. Presto.
Molto Vivace. Presto.—

III. Adagio molto e cantabile. Andante moderato.
Tempo primo. Andante moderato. Adagio.—

IV. Presto. [Recitative for Basses, interspersed with changes of movement: Allegro ma non troppo—Vivace—Adagio cantabile—Allegro assai.]
Allegro assai. Presto.

RECITATIVE: O dearest brothers, these tones no longer!
Rather let us raise together now our voices
And sing more joyfully!

SOLI AND CHORUS: SCHILLER'S "ODE TO JOY."

Joy, thou spark of heavenly brightness,
Daughter from Elysium!
Hearts on fire, with steps of lightness,
On thy holy ground we come.

Thou canst bind all, each to other,
Custom sternly rends apart,
All mankind are friend and brother
Where thy soft wing fans the heart.

He whom happy fate has granted
Friend to have and friend to be,
Faithful wife who never wanted,
Mingle in our jubilee;

Yea, who in his heart's sure keeping
Counts but one true soul his own.
Who cannot—oh, let him weeping
Steal away and live alone.

Joy all living things are drinking,
Nature's breasts for all do flow;
Good and evil, all unthinking,
On her rosy way we go.

Kisses gave she, wine-crowned leisure,
Friends in death, aye, true to friends.
Meanest worm hath sense of pleasure,
Before God the Seraph stands.

Joyous as yon orbs in gladness
Speed along their path on high,
Brothers come! Away with sadness,
Let us on to victory.

Oh, embrace now, all ye millions!
Here's a kiss to all the world.
Brothers, o'er yon azure fold
Is a loving Father's dwelling.

Why on bended knees, ye millions?
Feel ye your Creator near?
Search beyond that boundless sphere,
High among the star pavilions.

320

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-5.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. W. GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

THE DATE OF

THE OPENING CONCERT

WILL BE ANNOUNCED IN

DUE SEASON.

321

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, MARCH 24, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The closing concert of this season's course was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Music to Byron's "Manfred".....Schumann
Symphony in D minor, No. 9.....Beethoven

The solo parts were sung by Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rollwagen, Mr. Toedt and Mr. Heinrichs; Mr. Howard M. Ticknor read the selections from the text of "Manfred."

Concerning the music given there is little new to be said. The "Manfred" has been given before by the Cecilia, and the Ninth Symphony is familiar enough by this time. Both works are unquestionably among the very greatest by their respective composers. The performance of both showed the carefullest preparation; the orchestra has never played with finer finish and precision. The immense difficulties of the last half of the Adagio of the symphony were triumphantly conquered, and the movement went as smoothly as possible. There was still a certain roughness in the recitative of the double-basses in the last movement, but this was one of the very few blemishes in the performance. One could not help wishing that Mr. Henschel's fidelity to the letter of the score had been a little less uncompromising, and that he had omitted the repeats in the last part of the Scherzo; but then there may well be two opinions on this point. There was, however, one serious drawback to the effectiveness of all the orchestral music. The problem of massing chorus singers and orchestra on the stage, so that the latter may produce its full effect while the chorus is silent, is indeed a difficult one. The instrumentation of the orchestral numbers in "Manfred" and the Ninth Symphony is such that these compositions lose much of their effectiveness in so large a hall as the Music Hall, even in the best conditions of sonority; but when the orchestra is hemmed in at the sides and back by such bad reflectors of sound as two large groups of chorus singers, its tone is rendered additionally dull and powerless. On Saturday evening the tone of the whole orchestra, except the trumpets, trombones and instruments of percussion, seemed robbed of all its brilliancy, warmth and dynamic intensity. The chorus sang exceptionally well, and the quartet of solo singers made their music unusually effective. Mr. Toedt rose to a really audible pitch of brilliancy in the climax of his taxing solo in the symphony, and Mrs. Henschel gave out her closing high B natural with thrilling effect. The quartet passages were, in general, sung with greater clearness than we can remember to have heard them before. Mr. Ticknor half read, half recited the selections from the text of "Manfred" with admirable artistic taste and skill, at times with great depth of feeling. His task was no easy one, for when a work of the nature of "Manfred" is given off the stage, very much is left to the indulgent imagination of the audience, and the reader is hard put to it to avoid the Charybdis of undramatic tameness without falling into the Scylla of a dramatic warmth of delivery which might seem garish and even laughable amid the incongruous surroundings. Mr. Ticknor succeeded well in keeping the due mean of suggestive expressiveness.

And thus ended the third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and with it the musical dictatorship of Mr. Henschel. Next season, Mr. von Gericke of Vienna will reign in his place. That the crowded audience fully appreciated that this was their farewell to Mr. Henschel was evident from the enthusiastic and prolonged applause with which he was greeted as he stepped up to the conductor's desk, and which followed him to the green-room as he finally left the stage. Nor were chorus and orchestra wanting in graceful acknowledgments of their appreciation of Mr. Henschel. No sooner had he taken his place at his desk than the orchestra and chorus rose to their feet and greeted him with two stanzas of "Auld Lang Syne." Nothing could have been heartier.

Mr. Henschel's career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the last three years is well worth a considerate retrospective glance. His position has been, from the beginning, a peculiar one, and peculiar positions inevitably have their accompanying drawbacks, no matter what their advantages may be. The peculiar advantages of Mr. Henschel's position were that, from the outset, he was vested with power such as had never before been conferred upon any conductor in this city. He was hampered by few or no pecuniary considerations; his orchestra was wholly at his disposal, he could put in new men and put out old ones at will; he was allowed double or treble the time for rehearsal that had been allowed any conductor before him. The sinews of war (and art) being assured beforehand, he did not need to feel the force of any but purely artistic considerations in making up his programmes; he had to cater to no popular taste, but could follow his own judgement with perfect safety. Now these conditions were not only extraordinary, and extraordinarily favorable at that, but the public knew and felt them to be so. The public also felt that from such exceptional facilities for insuring fine results exceptionally fine results were to be expected. That such results were not immediately apparent caused considerable dismay. Few people had taken pains to consider the fact that Mr. Henschel, with all his musicianship, genius and personal magnetism, had had infinitely little previous practical experience in conducting an orchestra, and that it would have been simply miraculous if everything had gone well at first. Be this as it may, Mr. Henschel certainly was greeted with an unusually large amount of adverse, and at times not wholly good-natured criticism. The rough treatment he then got at the hands of the newspapers was, however, not unnatural. People felt, and quite justly too, that Mr. Henschel's inexperience in conducting was not their business, but his; that it was no valid excuse for unsatisfactory performances, simply because he should have known how to do what he attempted to do. The tinge of acrimonious ill-will that crept into many adverse criticisms at that time may have been not wholly defensible on the highest grounds of critical morality, but it was natural enough, all things considered. Critics are but human, after all, and may be pardoned for feeling the unpleasant side of the incongruity of a man's being paid more and given better opportunities for learning his trade in public (for that is the English of it), than any one before him had been for publicly exercising his carefully acquired proficiency. But, as time went on, Mr. Henschel succeeded in learning his trade, and in learning it excellently well, too, so that the tempest that had been raised in the critical teapot subsided of itself. Indeed Mr. Henschel has gone on steadily improving: his opportunities have been great, it is true, but he has shown both the will and the power to make the most of them. He has not only made himself a thoroughly capable conductor, but has left the orchestra in a condition which any musical city might be proud of. And in doing all this he has had a very serious obstacle to surmount, and one which has been too little considered. For about twenty years the bulk of the orchestra had been playing virtually under the baton of one man, Mr. Zerrahn, for the amount of playing they had done under Mr. Listemann in the Philharmonic concerts, and under Mr. Lang at the symphony concerts he occasionally gave, was comparatively insignificant. The orchestra had thus got so imbued with Mr. Zerrahn's habitual modes of musical thought that by far the greater number of the players came to feel music just as he did; they were so accustomed to his tempi, they found them so natural, that it is highly probable that they would have, of themselves, taken any new work just as Mr. Zerrahn would. His nature had become theirs, and the time had long since gone by when Mr. Zerrahn had to exert himself to impose his individuality upon the orchestra, or to force them into harmony with his conception. They were virtually in harmony with it before he began a rehearsal. Thus the orchestra had got wholly out of the habit of obeying a conductor's beat, for one cannot strictly call it obeying where such perfect unity of sentiment and purpose exists. Now comes in Mr. Henschel, a man of very distinct musical individuality, with a tendency to take tempi differently from what the orchestra had long been accustomed to, and tries to make his beat implicitly obeyed. This was, in the beginning, about as difficult a thing as a conductor could have tried to do. It took the orchestra no little time to learn how to be dependent on any one who thought differently from themselves; in other words, to really follow the lead of their conductor. But this obstacle, far the most serious one Mr. Henschel had to contend with, he at last triumphed over. He now can do with his orchestra what he wants to; more than this, he leaves it in a condition implicitly to obey the beat of any efficient conductor who may come. All thanks to him for it!

OUR ORCHESTRA.

To the Editor of the Transcript: In the interesting review of Mr. Henschel's work which appeared at the close of the Symphony concerts, your critic seems to have missed one vital point of the diagnosis. He regards the old orchestra as having grown into complete unity with Mr. Zerrahn's conceptions and methods. Now, for many years back there was one characteristic of the orchestra which, to my surprise, was never publicly commented on by musicians. The orchestra used to hurry shockingly, particularly when accompanying a chorus. In the "Messiah" it used to be the worst. They would not take the time at all. They made the great choruses sacred jigs. Mr. Zerrahn would start in with a noble, reposeful tempo—clear as day for an orchestra to follow—but they would not comply. Many and many a time have the violins come sizzling in a good half-beat ahead. There was one performance of the "Messiah," somewhere about eight years ago, in which the orchestra ran off with almost every choral number. Once in a while the Handel and Haydn would back up Zerrahn too steadily for them, but commonly they had it all their own way.

Once the second violins tried it on Mr. Lang in a Cecilia concert, and he hissed out such a scathing lecture with his beats that it cured them for that one evening.

Mr. Zerrahn never had an orchestra put under his thumb so that he could say, "Go with me, do as I want, or step out for somebody who will." Henschel, on the contrary, has had this power and has used it; and we can see the results. The orchestra has learned what a curb bit is, and it has grown tender mouthed. Mr. Zerrahn now has a fairer field, and stands a chance of having justice done to his ideas.

Two striking instances of the change occurred last Sunday night. The fast part of the overture and the "Behold now total darkness" used to be favorite racing stretches. This time they went with a fidelity to Mr. Zerrahn that filled some ears with a glad surprise.

I think the good of Mr. Henschel's work in Boston is not that he has worked the orchestra out of Zerrahn's conceptions, but that he has disciplined them (through the liberal outlays of Mr. Higginson for rehearsals) so that they can now be worked into those conceptions.

H. AND H.

THE FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last Saturday evening witnessed the close of the series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra for the current season, and at the same time the close of Mr. Henschel's connection with the orchestra as conductor. The occasion was improved by Mr. Henschel's many admirers and friends, to do him honor by the introduction of certain features "not down on the bill," as the phrase goes. The audience was very large, calling into requisition not only all the seats of the great hall, but much of the available standing room. On Mr. Henschel's first appearance, he was greeted with a warm demonstration of applause on the part both of the audience and the orchestra, and before he had fairly had time to get into position on the conductor's dais, the whole orchestral and choral force that had been assembled on the stage, broke forth into the strains of "Auld Lang Syne," and the audience rose to its feet in sympathy. Mr. Henschel was evidently greatly surprised by this episode, which he received with the dignified modesty, not to say diffidence, with which he invariably acknowledges such complimentary expressions in public. Again, at the end of the concert, there was another outburst of enthusiasm, and Mr. Henschel was recalled to bow his acknowledgments, when he was presented by Mr. H. G. Tucker, in behalf of the chorus, with handsomely bound scores of the Schuman "Manfred" music and Beethoven's choral symphony. It was these two large works, in their entirety, that comprised the formal programme of the evening. This was the first time for several years that the "Manfred" music has been given here in its completeness. The vocal music for solo voices was sung with admirable effect by Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rollwagen, and Messrs. Toedt, Heinrich, Hubbard and Babcock, and the choral work was given with good effect in most of the important details. The work of the orchestra was notably well done, even when judged by the high standard to which this band of musicians has accustomed the patrons of the concerts this season. Mr. Howard M. Ticknor read the poem with his usual taste and intelligence and fine sense of what may be called the musical requirements of his delivery. The great symphony was performed in parts extremely well, so far as the orchestra was concerned, and in other parts, notably the first movement, with only passable effect. As to the vocal portion, though given at the lowered pitch, it seemed to tax the powers of the singers as severely as ever, and again it was demonstrated how impossible it is to secure a performance of the great finale at all adequate to its demands. The soloists—Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rollwagen, Mr. Toedt and Mr. Heinrich—acquitted themselves fully as well as could be expected under the circumstances. The printed programme of the evening bore on its reverse the announcement that Mr. von Gericke is engaged as the conductor of the concerts of next season.

The handsomely bound copies of Schumann's "Manfred" and "Faust" presented to Mr. Henschel Saturday evening by Mr. Tucker were remembrances from the ladies of the chorus.

CLOSE OF THE SEASON.

Mr. Henschel Retires from the Symphony Orchestra—Great Success of the Last Concert.

And so we have to say farewell to Mr. Henschel. His service as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to an end last evening, after three years of steady progress in success and popularity. The disputes that surrounded his first appearance as a conductor in Boston have long since ceased, and the hostile criticism with which his ideas and efforts were originally received has generally given way to genuine admiration for his great abilities. No one cares to say in review of his career that he made this or that mistake; that he failed in this or that particular; all that we feel now is sincere regret that we must lose from our midst an artist of so great breadth, a composer of so marked power, a leader of so much ability.

The concert last evening was a splendid finish to Mr. Henschel's work in Boston. Two works were given—Schumann's "Manfred" and Beethoven's choral symphony. Previous to the performance of Manfred, the entire orchestra and chorus rose and sang "Auld Lang Syne," the audience voluntarily rising during the singing. During the performance the leader was presented with a wreath, and at the close an enthusiastic demonstration was made by the audience, orchestra and chorus, and various other testimonials of respect and admiration were bestowed upon him.

The performance of "Manfred" was magnificent. It is one of the greatest masterpieces of musical composition, Byron's great poem being enhanced by the fancies of a mind as poetical as romantic, as melancholy as his own.

The soloists were Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, tenor; Mr. Max Heinrich, bass; Mr. Howard M. Ticknor, reader; Messrs. Ehot Hubbard, A. F. Harlow and D. M. Babcock, basses.

Mrs. Henschel and Miss Rollwagen sang well the little given to ladies' voices; Mr. Toedt sang with fire and much more power than usual, and Mr. Heinrich succeeded admirably, especially in the solo beginning, "From thy false tears." The quartet of basses, and the full chorus performed their parts unexceptionably.

No small share of the work fell to Mr. Ticknor, the reader. He had indeed a difficult task set before him, to read the lines of the remorseful Manfred, as well as many of the lines of other personages in the drama. Most of the speeches are accompanied by melodramatic music, and in some cases by full chorus. Mr. Ticknor overcame the difficulties of his part with great success. He delivered the lines without exhibiting any tendency to rant or overdo the declamation. His manner throughout was impressive and often thrilling. The unconquerable despair of Manfred was perfectly represented in the tones of the reader's voice, every sentence was read with a fine intelligence of its meaning, and only rarely was a word inaudible. The infinite pathos of the close was rendered so well that words fail to convey any idea of its excellence. We cannot forget the remarkable manner in which Mr. Ticknor delivered the closing line: "Old man, it is not so difficult to die!"

The performance of the Ninth symphony showed much improvement over the efforts of former years. The lowering of the pitch proved of great advantage to the singers. The work needs phenomenal voices, but the performance last night gave much satisfaction. Mr. W. Gericke is announced as leader for the next season.

322

to do. The tinge of acrimonious ill-will that crept into many adverse criticisms at that time may have been not wholly defensible on the highest grounds of critical morality, but it was natural enough, all things considered. Critics are but human, after all, and may be pardoned for feeling the unpleasant side of the incongruity of a man's being paid more and given better opportunities for learning his trade in public (for that is the English of it), than any one before him had been for publicly exercising his carefully acquired proficiency. But, as time went on, Mr. Henschel succeeded in learning his trade, and in learning it excellently well, too, so that the tempest that had been raised in the critical teapot subsided of itself. Indeed Mr. Henschel has gone on steadily improving; his opportunities have been great, it is true, but he has shown both the will and the power to make the most of them. He has not only made himself a thoroughly capable conductor, but has left the orchestra in a condition which any musical city might be proud of. And in doing all this he has had a very serious obstacle to surmount, and one which has been too little considered. For about twenty years the bulk of the orchestra had been playing virtually under the baton of one man, Mr. Zerrahn, for the amount of playing they had done under Mr. Listemann in the Philharmonic concerts, and under Mr. Lang at the symphony concerts he occasionally gave, was comparatively insignificant. The orchestra had thus got so imbued with Mr. Zerrahn's habitual modes of musical thought that by far the greater number of the players came to feel music just as he did; they were so accustomed to his tempi, they found them so natural, that it is highly probable that they would have, of themselves, taken any new work just as Mr. Zerrahn would. His nature had become theirs, and the time had long since gone by when Mr. Zerrahn had to exert himself to impose his individuality upon the orchestra, or to force them into harmony with his conception. They were virtually in harmony with it before he began a rehearsal. Thus the orchestra had got wholly out of the habit of obeying a conductor's beat, for one cannot strictly call it obeying where such perfect unity of sentiment and purpose exists. Now comes in Mr. Henschel, a man of very distinct musical individuality, with a tendency to take tempi differently from what the orchestra had long been accustomed to, and tries to make his beat implicitly obeyed. This was, in the beginning, about as difficult a thing as a conductor could have tried to do. It took the orchestra no little time to learn how to be dependent on any one who thought differently from themselves; in other words, to really follow the lead of their conductor. But this obstacle, far the most serious one Mr. Henschel had to contend with, he at last triumphed over. He now can do with his orchestra what he wants to; more than this, he leaves it in a condition implicitly to obey the beat of any efficient conductor who may come. All thanks to him for it!

OUR ORCHESTRA.

To the Editor of the Transcript: In the interesting review of Mr. Henschel's work which appeared at the close of the Symphony concerts, your critic seems to have missed one vital point of the diagnosis. He regards the old orchestra as having grown into complete unity with Mr. Zerrahn's conceptions and methods. Now, for many years back there was one characteristic of the orchestra which, to my surprise, was never publicly commented on by musicians. The orchestra used to hurry shockingly, particularly when accompanying a chorus. In the "Messiah" it used to be the worst. They would not take the time at all. They made the great choruses sacred jigs. Mr. Zerrahn would start in with a noble, reposeful tempo—clear as day for an orchestra to follow—but they would not comply. Many and many a time have the violins come sizzling in a good half-beat ahead. There was one performance of the "Messiah," somewhere about eight years ago, in which the orchestra ran off with almost every choral number. Once in a while the Handel and Haydn would back up Zerrahn too steadily for them, but commonly they had it all their own way.

Once the second violins tried it on Mr. Lang in a Cecilia concert, and he hissed out such a scathing lecture with his beats that it cured them for that one evening.

Mr. Zerrahn never had an orchestra put under his thumb so that he could say, "Go with me, do as I want, or step out for somebody who will." Henschel, on the contrary, has had this power and has used it; and we can see the results. The orchestra has learned what a curb bit is, and it has grown tender mouthed. Mr. Zerrahn now has a fairer field, and stands a chance of having justice done to his ideas.

Two striking instances of the change occurred last Sunday night. The fast part of the overture and the "Behold now total darkness" used to be favorite racing stretches. This time they went with a fidelity to Mr. Zerrahn that filled some ears with a glad surprise.

I think the good of Mr. Henschel's work in Boston is not that he has worked the orchestra out of Zerrahn's conceptions, but that he has disciplined them (through the liberal outlays of Mr. Higginson for rehearsals) so that they can now be worked into those conceptions.

H. AND H.

THE FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last Saturday evening witnessed the close of the series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra for the current season, and at the same time the close of Mr. Henschel's connection with the orchestra as conductor. The occasion was improved by Mr. Henschel's many admirers and friends, to do him honor by the introduction of certain features "not down on the bill," as the phrase goes. The audience was very large, calling into requisition not only all the seats of the great hall, but much of the available standing room. On Mr. Henschel's first appearance, he was greeted with a warm demonstration of applause on the part both of the audience and the orchestra, and before he had fairly had time to get into position on the conductor's dais, the whole orchestral and choral force that had been assembled on the stage, broke forth into the strains of "Auld Lang Syne," and the audience rose to its feet in sympathy. Mr. Henschel was evidently greatly surprised by this episode, which he received with the dignified modesty, not to say diffidence, with which he invariably acknowledges such complimentary expressions in public. Again, at the end of the concert, there was another outburst of enthusiasm, and Mr. Henschel was recalled to bow his acknowledgments, when he was presented by Mr. H. G. Tucker, in behalf of the chorus, with handsomely bound scores of the Schuman "Manfred" music and Beethoven's choral symphony. It was these two large works, in their entirety, that comprised the formal programme of the evening. This was the first time for several years that the "Manfred" music has been given here in its completeness. The vocal music for solo voices was sung with admirable effect by Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rollwagen, and Messrs. Toedt, Heinrich, Hubbard and Babcock, and the choral work was given with good effect in most of the important details. The work of the orchestra was notably well done, even when judged by the high standard to which this band of musicians has accustomed the patrons of the concerts this season. Mr. Howard M. Ticknor read the poem with his usual taste and intelligence and fine sense of what may be called the musical requirements of his delivery. The great symphony was performed in parts extremely well, so far as the orchestra was concerned, and in other parts, notably the first movement, with only passable effect. As to the vocal portion, though given at the lowered pitch, it seemed to tax the powers of the singers as severely as ever, and again it was demonstrated how impossible it is to secure a performance of the great finale at all adequate to its demands. The soloists—Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rollwagen, Mr. Toedt and Mr. Heinrich—acquitted themselves fully as well as could be expected under the circumstances. The printed programme of the evening bore on its reverse the announcement that Mr. von Gericke is engaged as the conductor of the concerts of next season.

The handsomely bound copies of Schumann's "Manfred" and "Faust" presented to Mr. Henschel Saturday evening by Mr. Tucker were remembrances from the ladies of the chorus.

CLOSE OF THE SEASON.

Mr. Henschel Retires from the Symphony Orchestra—Great Success of the Last Concert.

And so we have to say farewell to Mr. Henschel. His service as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to an end last evening, after three years of steady progress in success and popularity. The disputes that surrounded his first appearance as a conductor in Boston have long since ceased, and the hostile criticism with which his ideas and efforts were originally received has generally given way to genuine admiration for his great abilities. No one cares to say in review of his career that he made this or that mistake; that he failed in this or that particular; all that we feel now is sincere regret that we must lose from our midst an artist of so great breadth, a composer of so marked power, a leader of so much ability.

The concert last evening was a splendid finish to Mr. Henschel's work in Boston. Two works were given—Schumann's "Manfred" and Beethoven's choral symphony. Previous to the performance of Manfred, the entire orchestra and chorus rose and sang "Auld Lang Syne," the audience voluntarily rising during the singing. During the performance the leader was presented with a wreath, and at the close an enthusiastic demonstration was made by the audience, orchestra and chorus, and various other testimonials of respect and admiration were bestowed upon him.

The performance of "Manfred" was magnificent. It is one of the greatest masterpieces of musical composition, Byron's great poem being enhanced by the fancies of a mind as poetical as romantic, as melancholy as his own.

The soloists were Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, tenor; Mr. Max Heinrich, bass; Mr. Howard M. Ticknor, reader; Messrs. Eliot Hubbard, A. F. Harlow and D. M. Babcock, basses.

Mrs. Henschel and Miss Rollwagen sang well the little given to ladies' voices; Mr. Toedt sang with fire and much more power than usual, and Mr. Heinrich succeeded admirably, especially in the solo beginning, "From thy false tears." The quartet of basses, and the full chorus performed their parts unexceptionably.

No small share of the work fell to Mr. Ticknor, the reader. He had indeed a difficult task set before him, to read the lines of the remorseful Manfred, as well as many of the lines of other personages in the drama. Most of the speeches are accompanied by melodramatic music, and in some cases by full chorus. Mr. Ticknor overcame the difficulties of his part with great success. He delivered the lines without exhibiting any tendency to rant or overdo the declamation. His manner throughout was impressive and often thrilling. The unconquerable despair of Manfred was perfectly represented in the tones of the reader's voice, every sentence was read with a fine intelligence of its meaning, and only rarely was a word inaudible. The infinite pathos of the close was rendered so well that words fail to convey any idea of its excellence. We cannot forget the remarkable manner in which Mr. Ticknor delivered the closing line: "Old man, it is not so difficult to die!"

The performance of the Ninth symphony showed much improvement over the efforts of former years. The lowering of the pitch proved of great advantage to the singers. The work needs phenomenal voices, but the performance last night gave much satisfaction. Mr. W. Gericke is announced as leader for the next season.

The Twenty-Fourth Symphony Concert.

The last Symphony concert of the season was given in Music Hall, last Saturday evening. The programme consisted of only two selections which were as follows:

The music to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115 Schumann
The Ninth (choral) Symphony in D-minor, op. 125 Beethoven

Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rollwagen, Mr. Toedt and Mr. Heinrichs sang the solos. Mr. Howard M. Ticknor read the selections from "Manfred." In a musical point of view both selections are among the best ever written by their respective composers. The "Manfred" has been given before by the Cecilia. The Ninth Symphony is familiar. The interpretation of both was excellent. The orchestra was prompt, careful, harmonious and played with unusual skill and finish. The chorus singers did exceptionally well, keeping almost perfect time and accord with each other. The soloists rendered their parts clearly, tastefully and brilliantly. On the whole the concert was eminently successful and enjoyable. Mr. Ticknor's readings from "Manfred" were very excellent. He was neither tame on the one hand, nor too dramatic on the other. Thus terminated the third season of symphony concerts in Boston. Mr. Henschel deserves the highest honors as the successful conductor of these concerts. To him more than to any one else is due the credit of making the Boston Symphony Orchestra what it is, and it is a matter of sincerest and deepest regret that he is no longer to be its conductor, and that we are to lose him from our midst together with his cultured and musical companion.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Music Hall was completely filled as to its seats and standing places last Saturday evening, on the occasion of the final concert of this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And the audience was not only great in numbers, but in enthusiasm. When Mr. Henschel took his place at the conductor's desk, he was greeted with loud and long-continued applause, and before it had subsided, all the members of the orchestra arose and played "Auld Lang Syne," the chorus joining in with the words, and the audience rising and remaining standing until the music ended. The evening's programme consisted of Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred" and the Ninth (Choral) Symphony of Beethoven. A large chorus, mostly composed of members of the Handel and Haydn Society, and the solo singers, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rollwagen and Messrs. Toedt, Heinrich, Hubbard, Harlow and Babcock interpreted the vocal parts of the programme, while Mr. Howard Ticknor read the lines of the poem which are set against the music. The vocal music was finely rendered, while the orchestra never played with greater effect. At the close of the symphony Mr. Henschel was recalled by the increasing enthusiasm of the audience, chorus and orchestra, and coming forward he was presented by Mr. H. G. Tucker in a few complimentary remarks on behalf of the chorus, with the full scores, very handsomely bound, of Schumann's "Faust" and "Manfred." This was Mr. Henschel's leave taking, who responded in a few well chosen words, giving his thanks and all good wishes to the donors. Mr. W. Gericke, a celebrated orchestral conductor in Europe, has been engaged to conduct the Symphony concerts for the next season.

Close of the Symphony Concert Season.

The last concert in the third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before an audience which was large in numbers and enthusiasm. When Mr. Henschel took his place at the conductor's desk, he was greeted with loud and long continued applause, and before it had subsided, all the members of the orchestra arose and played "Auld Lang Syne," the chorus joining in with the words, and the audience rising and remaining standing until the music ended. The evening's programme consisted of Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred" and the Ninth (Choral) Symphony of Beethoven. The orchestral performance of the former work was exceedingly fine, and the vocal music, although having a comparatively unimportant place in the general arrangement of the work, was well interpreted by the chorus and Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rollwagen, Messrs. Toedt, Heinrich, Hubbard, Harlow and Babcock. Mr. Howard Ticknor read the lines of the poem that are set against the music with excellent taste and great effectiveness, and added no little force to the impressiveness of the occasion. The symphony was fairly well performed, though in a very unequal manner. The best work of the orchestra was done in the third movement; its worst in the first and in some of the numerous repetitions in the fourth. The vocal work was at least as good as we are accustomed to hear in this almost unsingable work. The soloists sang correctly, but were none of them able to do full justice to their share of the work, although Mr. Heinrich gave the opening recitation very finely, and Mr. Toedt's solo was given with rare taste and strong effect. At the end of the symphony there was a great outburst of enthusiasm, and Mr. Henschel was repeatedly recalled, while Mr. H. G. Tucker presented him with handsomely bound scores of "Manfred" and the "Choral Symphony" in the name of the chorus. On the back of the programme Mr. W. Gericke was announced as conductor for the season of 1884-5.

STAGE AND CONCERT HALL.

Closing Concert of the Symphony Orchestra's Season.

The 24th and final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the programme consisting of Schumann's "Manfred" and the ninth Beethoven symphony. The text of "Manfred" was read by Mr. Howard Ticknor, and the soloists taking part in the evening's work were: Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, tenor; Mr. Max Heinrich, bass; and Messrs. Eliot Hubbard, A. F. Harlow and D. M. Babcock, basses. The audience attending was the largest of the season, and a large degree of interest attached to the events of the evening other than those specified by the programme. As a pleasant prelude to the "Manfred" overture, the members of the orchestra and chorus rose as Mr. Henschel took the baton, and, while the musicians, under their leader, Mr. Bernhard Listemann, played "Auld Lang Syne," the members of the chorus and many of the audience, also standing, joined in the well known measures of the old tune. A scene of general enthusiasm followed the close of this demonstration, and it was some few minutes before the overture could be begun. The conductor's stand had been elegantly adorned with flowers and trailing vines, and later in the evening Mr. Tucker, acting as the representative of the chorus, presented Mrs. Henschel with an elegantly bound copy of the "Manfred" score. Lack of space prevents any extended comment upon the evening's performance. It was as a whole a highly creditable presentation of the two works included in the programme, soloists, chorus and orchestra combining their efforts, apparently with a desire to make Mr. Henschel's last appearance as the director of the orchestra a notable event. The audience was generous in its applause, and rewarded soloists, chorus and orchestra for their work in the several parts of the programme. A pleasant event of the evening was the presence, for the first time this season, of Mr. H. L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, who returned from his European tour a day or two since.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The final rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Mr. Henschel's direction, at Music Hall yesterday morning, was quite an interesting event, and the interchange of kindly sentiments between the conductor and the musicians who have so largely followed his guidance in the concerts of the last three seasons, made the occasion a memorable one for all who were present. It is pleasant to know that the universal esteem with which Mr. Henschel is regarded by the musical public is so thoroughly shared by the musicians who have been so intimately associated with him during his three years of service in these concerts, and few leaders in local musical affairs have so honestly won the good opinion which is so generally held of Mr. Henschel's abilities. As the rehearsal of yesterday morning closed, Mr. Henschel addressed the orchestra as follows:

Gentlemen: It is only natural for me, at the close of my three years as conductor, to say a few words before we part. First of all, I wish to express my deep gratitude to Mr. Listemann, who through all this time has been of invaluable assistance to me. I hope he will long be the leader of the orchestra. To him and to you all is due my best thanks for the devotion and earnestness with which you have attended to your duty.

I would not willingly have missed the three years I have spent among you, and I count them among the happiest of my musical career.

I have three wishes—to the Boston Symphony orchestra a long and successful career, to all the members prosperity and happiness, and for myself to be kindly remembered by you all.

As Mr. Henschel concluded his remarks, Mr. Jonas, as representative of the orchestra, addressed him, saying:

I hope I express the sentiment of the Boston Symphony orchestra when I offer you their sincere thanks for your kind words, and their regret at your departure.

We join you in the wish that our beloved concert master, Bernhard Listemann, may long remain in the position he so ably fills. The Symphony orchestra, in parting with their director, Mr. Georg Henschel, to whose work it owes its reputation, wish him all success, and, hoping that his future artistic career may be crowned with laurel, join in saying, "Auf wiedersehen."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT SEASON.

The season of 24 concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction, which closed last evening, has been very fruitful in the production of novelties. Among the notable works included in the programmes which were heard for the first time here were the Dvorak symphony in D, that by Bolkmann in B flat, No. 2; that by Svendsen in B flat, No. 2; Raff's "The Winter," and J. O. Grimm's in D minor. Mozart's concerto for piano in E flat and Brahms's concerto for piano in B flat were also given; and Godard's violin concerto, op. 82, and Mozart's concerto for flute and harp had a first hearing. The "Henry VII." ballet music by Saint-Saëns, portions of Delibes's "Sylvia" music, Godard's "Le Tasse" and Gounod's "Philemon et Baucis" were played, and the novelties in the way of miscellaneous selections for the orchestra were the entracte and finale from "Les Erinnyes," by Massenet; Liszt's Hungarian rhapsody in D; the "Olympia" overture by Spontini; Bizet's "Roma," a "Scherzo" by George W. Chadwick, the "Good Friday Spell" from Wagner's "Parsifal," the "Romance" for violoncello, E. Mueller-Berghaus; and the "Serenade in canon form," for string orchestra, and the "Ballad" for violin, composed by Mr. Henschel. The soloists who have appeared for the first time here are Miss Mary E. O'Brien, Mme. Helen Hopekirk, Mr. George Magrath and Mr. Carl Faelten, pianists; Mr. M. Loeffler, violinist; Mrs. Lillian Norton Gower and Mr. Max Heinrich, vocalists. The record of the attendance, reckoning the season ticket holders as constant members of the audiences, shows that the season has varied hardly a perceptible degree as compared with that of 1882-83. The financial results are looked upon as Mr. Higginson's exclusive affair, and no statement will be made public.

Banquet to Mr. Georg Henschel.

About 58 gentlemen, including representatives of most of the musical organizations in the city, participated in a complimentary banquet tendered last evening at Young's Hotel to Mr. Georg Henschel in anticipation of his intended departure for Europe. President Charles C. Perkins of the Handel and Haydn Society presided, with the guest of the evening on his right and Dr. John S. Dwight on his left. Among others present were Messrs. Carl Zerrahn, Henry Higginson, Bernhard Listemann and B. J. Lang. After appropriate words by the President of the evening, Mr. Henschel responded with feeling to the farewell courtesies shown him. The remarks of the evening were of a conversational character. A violin solo, Bach's Chaconne by Prof. Listemann, was warmly applauded.

Apr. 10/84.

The Twenty-Fourth Symphony Concert.

The last Symphony concert of the season was given in Music Hall, last Saturday evening. The programme consisted of only two selections which were as follows:

The music to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115 Schumann
The Ninth (choral) Symphony in D-minor, op. 125 Beethoven

Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rollwagen, Mr. Toedt and Mr. Heinrichs sang the solos. Mr. Howard M. Ticknor read the selections from "Manfred." In a musical point of view both selections are among the best ever written by their respective composers. The "Manfred" has been given before by the Cecilia. The Ninth Symphony is familiar. The interpretation of both was excellent. The orchestra was prompt, careful, harmonious and played with unusual skill and finish. The chorus singers did exceptionally well, keeping almost perfect time and accord with each other. The soloists rendered their parts clearly, tastefully and brilliantly. On the whole the concert was eminently successful and enjoyable. Mr. Ticknor's readings from "Manfred" were very excellent. He was neither tame on the one hand, nor too dramatic on the other. Thus terminated the third season of symphony concerts in Boston. Mr. Henschel deserves the highest honors as the successful conductor of these concerts. To him more than to any one else is due the credit of making the Boston Symphony Orchestra what it is, and it is a matter of sincerest and deepest regret that he is no longer to be its conductor, and that we are to lose him from our midst together with his cultured and musical companion.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Music Hall was completely filled as to its seats and standing places last Saturday evening, on the occasion of the final concert of this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And the audience was not only great in numbers, but in enthusiasm. When Mr. Henschel took his place at the conductor's desk, he was greeted with loud and long-continued applause, and before it had subsided, all the members of the orchestra arose and played "Auld Lang Syne," the chorus joining in with the words, and the audience rising and remaining standing until the music ended. The evening's programme consisted of Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred" and the Ninth (Choral) Symphony of Beethoven. A large chorus, mostly composed of members of the Handel and Haydn Society, and the solo singers, Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rollwagen and Messrs. Toedt, Heinrich, Hubbard, Harlow and Babcock interpreted the vocal parts of the programme, while Mr. Howard Ticknor read the lines of the poem which are set against the music. The vocal music was finely rendered, while the orchestra never played with greater effect. At the close of the symphony Mr. Henschel was recalled by the increasing enthusiasm of the audience, chorus and orchestra, and coming forward he was presented by Mr. H. G. Tucker in a few complimentary remarks on behalf of the chorus, with the full scores, very handsomely bound, of Schumann's "Faust" and "Manfred." This was Mr. Henschel's leave taking, who responded in a few well chosen words, giving his thanks and all good wishes to the donors. Mr. W. Gericke, a celebrated orchestral conductor in Europe, has been engaged to conduct the Symphony concerts for the next season.

Close of the Symphony Concert Season.

The last concert in the third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before an audience which was large in numbers and enthusiasm. When Mr. Henschel took his place at the conductor's desk, he was greeted with loud and long continued applause, and before it had subsided, all the members of the orchestra arose and played "Auld Lang Syne," the chorus joining in with the words, and the audience rising and remaining standing until the music ended. The evening's programme consisted of Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred" and the Ninth (Choral) Symphony of Beethoven. The orchestral performance of the former work was exceedingly fine, and the vocal music, although having a comparatively unimportant place in the general arrangement of the work, was well interpreted by the chorus and Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rollwagen, Messrs. Toedt, Heinrich, Hubbard, Harlow and Babcock. Mr. Howard Ticknor read the lines of the poem that are set against the music with excellent taste and great effectiveness, and added no little force to the impressiveness of the occasion. The symphony was fairly well performed, though in a very unequal manner. The best work of the orchestra was done in the third movement; its worst in the first and in some of the numerous repetitions in the fourth. The vocal work was at least as good as we are accustomed to hear in this almost unsingable work. The soloists sang correctly, but were none of them able to do full justice to their share of the work, although Mr. Heinrich gave the opening recitation very finely, and Mr. Toedt's solo was given with rare taste and strong effect. At the end of the symphony there was a great outburst of enthusiasm, and Mr. Henschel was repeatedly recalled, while Mr. H. G. Tucker presented him with handsomely bound scores of "Manfred" and the "Choral Symphony" in the name of the chorus. On the back of the programme Mr. W. Gericke was announced as conductor for the season of 1884-5.

STAGE AND CONCERT HALL.

Closing Concert of the Symphony Orchestra's Season.

The 24th and final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the programme consisting of Schumann's "Manfred" and the ninth Beethoven symphony. The text of "Manfred" was read by Mr. Howard Ticknor, and the soloists taking part in the evening's work were: Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto; Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, tenor; Mr. Max Heinrich, bass; and Messrs. Eliot Hubbard, A. F. Harlow and D. M. Babcock, basses. The audience attending was the largest of the season, and a large degree of interest attached to the events of the evening other than those specified by the programme. As a pleasant prelude to the "Manfred" overture, the members of the orchestra and chorus rose as Mr. Henschel took the baton, and, while the musicians, under their leader, Mr. Bernhard Listemann, played "Auld Lang Syne," the members of the chorus and many of the audience, also standing, joined in the well known measures of the old tune. A scene of general enthusiasm followed the close of this demonstration, and it was some few minutes before the overture could be begun. The conductor's stand had been elegantly adorned with flowers and trailing vines, and later in the evening Mr. Tucker, acting as the representative of the chorus, presented Mrs. Henschel with an elegantly bound copy of the "Manfred" score. Lack of space prevents any extended comment upon the evening's performance. It was as a whole a highly creditable presentation of the two works included in the programme, soloists, chorus and orchestra combining their efforts, apparently with a desire to make Mr. Henschel's last appearance as the director of the orchestra a notable event. The audience was generous in its applause, and rewarded soloists, chorus and orchestra for their work in the several parts of the programme. A pleasant event of the evening was the presence, for the first time this season, of Mr. H. L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, who returned from his European tour a day or two since.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The final rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Mr. Henschel's direction, at Music Hall yesterday morning, was quite an interesting event, and the interchange of kindly sentiments between the conductor and the musicians who have so largely followed his guidance in the concerts of the last three seasons, made the occasion a memorable one for all who were present. It is pleasant to know that the universal esteem with which Mr. Henschel is regarded by the musical public is so thoroughly shared by the musicians who have been so intimately associated with him during his three years of service in these concerts, and few leaders in local musical affairs have so honestly won the good opinion which is so generally held of Mr. Henschel's abilities. As the rehearsal of yesterday morning closed, Mr. Henschel addressed the orchestra as follows:

Gentlemen: It is only natural for me, at the close of my three years as conductor, to say a few words before we part. First of all, I wish to express my deep gratitude to Mr. Listemann, who through all this time has been of invaluable assistance to me. I hope he will long be the leader of the orchestra. To him and to you all is due my best thanks for the devotion and earnestness with which you have attended to your duty.

I would not willingly have missed the three years I have spent among you, and I count them among the happiest of my musical career.

I have three wishes—to the Boston Symphony orchestra a long and successful career, to all the members prosperity and happiness, and for myself to be kindly remembered by you all.

As Mr. Henschel concluded his remarks, Mr. Jonas, as representative of the orchestra, addressed him, saying:

I hope I express the sentiment of the Boston Symphony orchestra when I offer you their sincere thanks for your kind words, and their regret at your departure.

We join you in the wish that our beloved concert master, Bernhard Listemann, may long remain in the position he so ably fills. The Symphony orchestra, in parting with their director, Mr. Georg Henschel, to whose work it owes its reputation, wish him all success, and, hoping that his future artistic career may be crowned with laurel, join in saying, "Auf wiedersehen."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT SEASON.

The season of 24 concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction, which closed last evening, has been very fruitful in the production of novelties. Among the notable works included in the programmes which were heard for the first time here were the Dvorak symphony in D, that by Bolkmann in B flat, No. 2; that by Svendsen in B flat, No. 2; Raff's "The Winter," and J. O. Grimm's in D minor. Mozart's concerto for piano in E flat and Brahms's concerto for piano in B flat were also given; and Godard's violin concerto, op. 52, and Mozart's concerto for flute and harp had a first hearing. The "Henry VII." ballet music by Saint-Saëns, portions of Delibes' "Sylvia" music, Godard's "Le Tasse" and Gounod's "Philemon et Baucis" were played, and the novelties in the way of miscellaneous selections for the orchestra were the entracte and finale from "Les Erinnyes," by Massenet; Liszt's Hungarian rhapsody in D; the "Olympia" overture by Spontini; Bizet's "Roma," a "Scherzo" by George W. Chadwick, the "Good Friday Spell" from Wagner's "Parsifal," the "Romance" for violoncello, E. Mueller-Berghaus; and the "Serenade in canon form," for string orchestra, and the "Ballad" for violin, composed by Mr. Henschel. The soloists who have appeared for the first time here are Miss Mary E. O'Brien, Mme. Helen Hopekirk, Mr. George Magrath and Mr. Carl Faellen, pianists; Mr. M. Loeffler, violinist; Mrs. Lillian Norton Gower and Mr. Max Heinrich, vocalists. The record of the attendance, reckoning the season ticket holders as constant members of the audiences, shows that the season has varied hardly a perceptible degree as compared with that of 1882-83. The financial results are looked upon as Mr. Higginson's exclusive affair, and no statement will be made public.

Banquet to Mr. Georg Henschel.

About 58 gentlemen, including representatives of most of the musical organizations in the city, participated in a complimentary banquet tendered last evening at Young's Hotel to Mr. Georg Henschel in anticipation of his intended departure for Europe. President Charles C. Perkins of the Handel and Haydn Society presided, with the guest of the evening on his right and Dr. John S. Dwight on his left. Among others present were Messrs. Carl Zerrahn, Henry Higginson, Bernhard Listemann and B. J. Lang. After appropriate words by the President of the evening, Mr. Henschel responded with feeling to the farewell courtesies shown him. The remarks of the evening were of a conversational character. A violin solo, Bach's Chaconne by Prof. Listemann, was warmly applauded.

Apr. 10/84.

MR. HENSCHEL HONORED.

A Complimentary Dinner at Young's Last Evening—The Guests and the Speakers.

A complimentary dinner was given last evening at Young's Hotel to Mr. Georg Henschel by about 40 of his friends in the musical, dramatic and literary professions. The company was a distinguished one, as may be judged from the list of those who composed it. Mr. C. C. Perkins presided, with Mr. Henschel on his right and Mr. B. J. Long next beyond. On Mr. Perkins's left sat Mr. W. L. Higginson. Others present were Mr. W. D. Howells, Mr. Arthur Foote, the Rev. E. A. Horton, Mr. Carl D. Zerrahn, Signor L. Campanari, Mr. Charles R. Adams, Mr. D. Listemann, Mr. T. S. Dwight, Mr. A. F. Harlow, Dr. D. M. Parker, Mr. Elliot Hubbard, Mr. Arthur Schmidt, Mr. Louis C. Elson, Mr. Henry M. Rogers, Mr. A. Rotch, Mr. A. G. Richardson, Mr. George G. Tarbell, Mr. F. P. Vinton, Mr. William F. Apthorp, Mr. L. C. Bailey, Mr. Francis Bartlett, Mr. G. W. Chadwick, Mr. C. P. Curtis, Mr. F. S. Clarke, Dr. John H. Dix, Mr. E. Pelham Dodd, Mr. S. M. Downs, Mr. E. B. Haggard, Mr. C. R. Hayden, Dr. S. W. Langmaid, Mr. S. Lincoln, Mr. W. A. Locke, Mr. G. C. Munzey, Mr. C. B. Perkins, Mr. Elliot W. Pratt, Mr. J. A. Preston, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Joshua Phippen, Mr. R. D. Evans, Mr. William L. Fenolosa, Mr. C. A. Ellis, Mr. Harry T. Fay, Mr. Mundenam, Mr. C. W. Smith, Mr. James Sturgis, Mr. J. H. Stickney, Mr. N. Samuel, Mr. H. G. Tucker, Mr. J. F. Tuckerman, Mr. C. S. Tuckerman, Mr. C. F. Webber, Mr. W. P. Wesselhoeft and Mr. H. M. Ticknor.

The menu was elaborate and pleasing, and the menu cards were very tastefully gotten up, after designs by Dr. Langmaid. On the first page was the list of dishes, printed in fantastic and artistic typography. On the second page was a pretty picture of Mr. Henschel's little three-year-old daughter, and on the opposite page was the familiar vignette of Mr. Henschel and his wife. The fourth page bore these words: "Dinner to Mr. Georg Henschel, Wednesday evening, April 9th, 1884, at Young's Hotel." The eating of the dinner occupied until nearly nine o'clock, and during the ceremony there was much pleasant jollity and agreeable intercourse. When the meal was over Mr. Perkins called the party to order and made a pretty introductory speech, alluding in an agreeable manner to Mr. Henschel and his work. To this Mr. Henschel made a graceful response, which evoked eager and enthusiastic applause. Mr. Sturgis followed with a few remarks, and Mr. Listemann entertained the party with a violin solo. Then Mr. Zerrahn paid a cordial tribute to Mr. Listemann, which was echoed by Mr. Dwight and Mr. Sturgis in brief remarks. Then Mr. Henschel sang a song, which was heartily applauded, and with a few more songs and speeches the round of a memorable evening's pleasures was completed.

Herr Gericke, Mr. Henschel's successor as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is about five feet seven inches tall, rather heavily built, and dark complexioned. He is a native of Styria, a bachelor, and an old friend of Frau Materna.

And oh! could I be yonder
And free from every tortur
Alas! that land enchanted,
But with the dawn of mor

MUSICAL. Gazette

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

With the end of the third series of Boston Symphony Concerts Mr. Henschel, who has directed them from the first, retires and makes way for a new director. At least, so we infer from the fact that Mr. W. Gericke's name is officially announced in the programme of the last concert as the conductor for the season of 1884-5. A statement in a Vienna paper that this gentleman had decided not to come to America cast some doubt upon the earlier rumor of his engagement by Mr. Higginson; but the fact above stated gives a conclusive aspect to the affair. Since we are to part with Mr. Henschel as a conductor, a consideration of his career here in connection with these concerts may not prove wholly uninteresting. From the outset he enjoyed opportunities such as have fallen to the fortunate lot of no conductor who had ever before wielded the baton over a resident orchestra in Boston. He was given supreme power. His orchestra was the largest that had ever been formed in this city, and he was in nowise hampered in his selection of the artists who composed it. He was at liberty to draw from other cities for its material, and to make it as complete as he desired. He was left wholly free to engage such solo talent as seemed best to him, and to arrange his programmes upon any principle his taste might direct. He was not limited to rehearsals either in respect to their length or their frequency. In fact, he was completely unhampered, and ruled supreme. Here were advantages which but few conductors have had at home or abroad. Their bestowal upon him was the more remarkable since he had had but little if any previous training in the art of directing an orchestra, but went to it in effect a mere novice. Under the circumstances it was inevitable that his lack of necessary training for the work he had to do should have manifested itself constantly. The result was much severe and frequently much bitter criticism. The critics who objected to the crude and unsatisfactory work of a novice were blamed because they did not take into consideration the fact that he was only a novice, and that to expect perfection from him was unreasonable and unjust. The critics, on the other hand, maintained that Mr. Henschel had no business to assume a position for which he was not fully equipped, unless he was prepared to take the consequences; that it was no fault of theirs if his performances were inadequate owing to his lack of skill, knowledge and experience to do that which he had undertaken to do. They maintained that Mr. Henschel acted of his own free will in accepting an office for which he was unprepared, and that it would be a perversion of justice to condemn errors of judgment in experienced conductors and to pass by the crass mistakes of a tyro while he was acquiring in presence of the public the elements of an art he had newly adopted. These considerations and the reflection that the novice was receiving a more princely salary for services he could not render than had ever been dreamed of by experienced conductors for services they were wholly competent to perform, were the justification of those critics who saw with dismay and angry impatience incapacity usurping the functions of trained skill. They did not consider they would be doing their duty to themselves and to the public if they were to encourage an inexperienced conductor while he tried his prentice hand upon Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn and other great masters in public, and to bear with him until he had learned how not to misinterpret them. By and by, Mr. Henschel began to improve. The eccentricities that marked his earlier conducting began to disappear during his second season. His orchestra by degrees no longer ran away with him, and he held it well in hand. He ceased such weak affectations as leading works like the ninth symphony from memory. The faults that had been found with his innovations in the disposition of his orchestra were remedied, and, in fact, the censures that had been passed upon him during the first and second seasons were fully justified by his returning to the old established order of affairs in the placing of his artists at the outset of his third season. The criticism he encountered in the beginning, though severe, and at times acrimonious, proved beneficial. He fell in with its teachings, and when he at last laid down his baton at his concluding concert, it was as a very fair conductor as far as drilling an orchestra is concerned. That he has manifested the possession of the higher essentials of the art of conducting we do not think has been made clear. As an interpreter he is particularly weak, especially in the uncertainty that seems to control him in making up his mind upon the meaning of this or that work. Beethoven's nine symphonies were given each season, and each season's reading differed. Those of the second season were better than those of the first, and some of the readings of the season just closed showed a further improvement; but in the Pastoral, the seventh and the ninth there was a falling off. This lack of decision in one who is an excellent musician would seem to indicate a temperamental drawback in him which militates against his ever becoming a perfect conductor. His training of his orchestra was so thorough at last that he could do with it as he pleased; could make it follow his bent with the most sympathetic precision. He could control his orchestra, but could not control himself. The experiment with him was an extraordinary one, and is not likely to be repeated. We doubt if the public will ever again be afforded the novel experience of a conductor who has never before had an orchestra under his control, who has never even been connected with an orchestra, learning his business in their presence. These concerts were intended as an education for the public: they were merely an education for the conductor. The former gained nothing but three fine series of musical entertainment at an unprecedentedly cheap price; but it lost what it would have gained had a thoroughly trained conductor been placed at the head of the orchestra at the beginning.

A glance at the programmes of these three years' concerts shows that a vast amount of work has been done. Many new symphonies have been heard for the first time. The list of overtures old and new that have been played is very large. The lighter orchestral works of modern composers, especially of the new French school, have been presented in profusion. In fact, the programmes, taken as a whole, are remarkably interesting, and those who have attended all of these concerts may congratulate themselves upon having heard nearly every instrumental work which has been universally accorded the merit of greatness. If Mr. Henschel has not been an ideal conductor, in his selection of works for performance his aim has always been artistic and his taste admirable in its eclecticism. If he has not succeeded in reaching the highest or the most desirable perfection with the baton, it is not because of any lack of most conscientious endeavor. Good conducting and fine musicianship are not imperatively necessary in combination. Many great composers have failed as conductors. In fact, conductors, like poets, are born, not made. It is to be hoped that some change of principle may be made with the new conductor. To invest supreme power in one man is dangerous; for, if he have prejudices or hobbies or interests to serve, much injury and injustice may be done in the selection of soloists. Under the recent order of things, who should or who should not be accorded a hearing at these concerts depended upon a single fiat, caprice, or determination of expediency. Where the concert stage is made practically a monopoly it would be well that it should not be under autocratic control.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last evening began and ended with a burst of enthusiasm. When the audience had assembled, the orchestra and chorus joined in "Auld Lang Syne." The audience popped up, of course, but what was it all about? If it was a tribute to the parting conductor, led by himself, we cannot think it in good taste; if it was a notice that the symphony concerts were ended, it was disrespectful to the coming Von Gericke. Byron's "Manfred" began the programme proper, and was, in its orchestral work and its reading, one of the best performances we have heard of the work. The soloists were in good voice, and especially the four basses, Messrs. Heinrich, Hubbard, Harlow and Babcock, did excellently in their concerted work. Mr. Ticknor's reading was marked by earnest solemnity and power, especially in the "Manfred" passages, but in the responses of Nemesis, in a desire to make strong contrast, he became rather colloquial in tone. Also the two sentences of Ahrimanes differed greatly in quality. The beautiful "Incantation" was given exquisitely, and we must also praise the English horn passages, and in fact the orchestral work throughout. The ninth symphony has now become a thrice-told tale under Mr. Henschel's lead, but as this was the first time that it was given with the lowered pitch, we expected that the Achilles heel of the work, the vocal portion, would not be as unvoiced as heretofore. In this we were somewhat mistaken, for the "Star Pavilions" seemed as high as on any previous occasion, and even Mrs. Henschel's sweet voice seemed unduly forced and crushed by the terrible demands of the score. But at least the soloists sang correctly and surely, which is something in itself. Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rollwagen and Messrs. Toedt and Heinrichs were the quartet, and their concerted numbers, as well as the solos of the last named gentleman, were well given. We did not like the reading of the Scherzo, where the brusque interruption in the coda, and the marking of the phrases of three and four bars, as well as the emphasis of the chief figure, were not well brought out. The phrases of the contrabasses in the first part of the last movement were too violent to give an effective contrast, but the reading of the second theme of the slow movement was commendable. The great pressure on our columns prevents more extended review, nor, in view of the familiarity of the public with the work, would this seem to be necessary. Mr. Von Gericke is announced as conductor of the next concert on the programme. Le roi est morte, vive le roi! Comien

MR. HENSCHEL HONORED.

A Complimentary Dinner at Young's Last Evening—The Guests and the Speakers.

A complimentary dinner was given last evening at Young's Hotel to Mr. Georg Henschel by about 40 of his friends in the musical, dramatic and literary professions. The company was a distinguished one, as may be judged from the list of those who composed it. Mr. C. C. Perkins presided, with Mr. Henschel on his right and Mr. B. J. Long next beyond. On Mr. Perkins's left sat Mr. W. L. Higginson. Others present were Mr. W. D. Howells, Mr. Arthur Foote, the Rev. E. A. Horton, Mr. Carl D. Zerrahn, Signor L. Campanari, Mr. Charles R. Adams, Mr. D. Listemann, Mr. T. S. Dwight, Mr. A. F. Harlow, Dr. D. M. Parker, Mr. Eliot Hubbard, Mr. Arthur Schmidt, Mr. Louis C. Elson, Mr. Henry M. Rogers, Mr. A. Rotch, Mr. A. G. Richardson, Mr. George G. Tappan, Mr. F. P. Vinton, Mr. William F. Apthorp, Mr. L. C. Bailey, Mr. Francis Bartlett, Mr. G. W. Chadwick, Mr. C. P. Curtis, Mr. F. S. Clarke, Dr. John H. Dix, Mr. E. Pelham Dodd, Mr. S. M. Downs, Mr. E. B. Haggard, Mr. C. R. Hayden, Dr. S. W. Langmaid, Mr. S. Lincoln, Mr. W. A. Locke, Mr. G. C. Munzey, Mr. C. B. Perkins, Mr. Elliot W. Pratt, Mr. J. A. Preston, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Joshua Phippen, Mr. R. D. Evans, Mr. William L. Fenolosa, Mr. C. A. Ellis, Mr. Harry T. Fay, Mr. Mundenann, Mr. C. W. Smith, Mr. James Sturgis, Mr. J. H. Stickney, Mr. N. Samuel, Mr. H. G. Tucker, Mr. J. F. Tuckerman, Mr. C. S. Tuckerman, Mr. C. F. Webber, Mr. W. P. Wesselhoef and Mr. H. M. Ticknor.

The menu was elaborate and pleasing, and the menu cards were very tastefully gotten up, after designs by Dr. Langmaid. On the first page was the list of dishes, printed in fantastic and artistic typography. On the second page was a pretty picture of Mr. Henschel's little three-year-old daughter, and on the opposite page was the familiar vignette of Mr. Henschel and his wife. The fourth page bore these words: "Dinner to Mr. Georg Henschel, Wednesday evening, April 9th, 1884, at Young's Hotel." The eating of the dinner occupied until nearly nine o'clock, and during the ceremony there was much pleasant jollity and agreeable intercourse. When the meal was over Mr. Perkins called the party to order and made a pretty introductory speech, alluding in an agreeable manner to Mr. Henschel and his work. To this Mr. Henschel made a graceful response, which evoked eager and enthusiastic applause. Mr. Sturgis followed with a few remarks, and Mr. Listemann entertained the party with a violin solo. Then Mr. Zerrahn paid a cordial tribute to Mr. Listemann, which was echoed by Mr. Dwight and Mr. Sturgis in brief remarks. Then Mr. Henschel sang a song, which was heartily applauded, and with a few more songs and speeches the round of a memorable evening's pleasures was completed.

Herr Gericke, Mr. Henschel's successor as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is about five feet seven inches tall, rather heavily built, and dark complexioned. He is a native of Styria, a bachelor, and an old friend of Frau Materna.

And oh! could I be yonder
And free from every tortur
Alas! that land enchanted,
But with the dawn of mor

MUSICAL. Gazette

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

With the end of the third series of Boston Symphony Concerts Mr. Henschel, who has directed them from the first, retires and makes way for a new director. At least, so we infer from the fact that Mr. W. Gericke's name is officially announced in the programme of the last concert as the conductor for the season of 1884-5. A statement in a Vienna paper that this gentleman had decided not to come to America cast some doubt upon the earlier rumor of his engagement by Mr. Higginson; but the fact above stated gives a conclusive aspect to the affair. Since we are to part with Mr. Henschel as a conductor, a consideration of his career here in connection with these concerts may not prove wholly uninteresting. From the outset he enjoyed opportunities such as have fallen to the fortunate lot of no conductor who had ever before wielded the baton over a resident orchestra in Boston. He was given supreme power. His orchestra was the largest that had ever been formed in this city, and he was in nowise hampered in his selection of the artists who composed it. He was at liberty to draw from other cities for its material, and to make it as complete as he desired. He was left wholly free to engage such solo talent as seemed best to him, and to arrange his programmes upon any principle his taste might direct. He was not limited to rehearsals either in respect to their length or their frequency. In fact, he was completely unhampered, and ruled supreme. Here were advantages which but few conductors have had at home or abroad. Their bestowal upon him was the more remarkable since he had had but little if any previous training in the art of directing an orchestra, but went to it in effect a mere novice. Under the circumstances it was inevitable that his lack of necessary training for the work he had to do should have manifested itself constantly. The result was much severe and frequently much bitter criticism. The critics who objected to the crude and unsatisfactory work of a novice were blamed because they did not take into consideration the fact that he was only a novice, and that to expect perfection from him was unreasonable and unjust. The critics, on the other hand, maintained that Mr. Henschel had no business to assume a position for which he was not fully equipped, unless he was prepared to take the consequences; that it was no fault of theirs if his performances were inadequate owing to his lack of skill, knowledge and experience to do that which he had undertaken to do. They maintained that Mr. Henschel acted of his own free will in accepting an office for which he was unprepared, and that it would be a perversion of justice to condemn errors of judgment in experienced conductors and to pass by the crass mistakes of a tyro while he was acquiring in presence of the public the elements of an art he had newly adopted. These considerations and the reflection that the novice was receiving a more princely salary for services he could not render than had ever been dreamed of by experienced conductors for services they were wholly competent to perform, were the justification of those critics who saw with dismay and angry impatience incapacity usurping the functions of trained skill. They did not consider they would be doing their duty to themselves and to the public if they were to encourage an inexperienced conductor while he tried his

prentice hand upon Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn and other great masters in public, and to bear with him until he had learned how not to misinterpret them. By and by, Mr. Henschel began to improve. The eccentricities that marked his earlier conducting began to disappear during his second season. His orchestra by degrees no longer ran away with him, and he held it well in hand. He ceased such weak affectations as leading works like the ninth symphony from memory. The faults that had been found with his innovations in the disposition of his orchestra were remedied, and, in fact, the censures that had been passed upon him during the first and second seasons were fully justified by his returning to the old established order of affairs in the placing of his artists at the outset of his third season. The criticism he encountered in the beginning, though severe, and at times acrimonious, proved beneficial. He fell in with its teachings, and when he at last laid down his baton at his concluding concert, it was as a very fair conductor as far as drilling an orchestra is concerned. That he has manifested the possession of the higher essentials of the art of conducting we do not think has been made clear. As an interpreter he is particularly weak, especially in the uncertainty that seems to control him in making up his mind upon the meaning of this or that work. Beethoven's nine symphonies were given each season, and each season's reading differed. Those of the second season were better than those of the first, and some of the readings of the season just closed showed a further improvement; but in the Pastoral, the seventh and the ninth there was a falling off. This lack of decision in one who is an excellent musician would seem to indicate a temperamental drawback in him which militates against his ever becoming a perfect conductor. His training of his orchestra was so thorough at last that he could do with it as he pleased; could make it follow his beat with the most sympathetic precision. He could control his orchestra, but could not control himself. The experiment with him was an extraordinary one, and is not likely to be repeated. We doubt if the public will ever again be afforded the novel experience of a conductor who has never before had an orchestra under his control, who has never even been connected with an orchestra, learning his business in their presence. These concerts were intended as an education for the public: they were merely an education for the conductor. The former gained nothing but three fine series of musical entertainment at an unprecedentedly cheap price; but it lost what it would have gained had a thoroughly trained conductor been placed at the head of the orchestra at the beginning.

A glance at the programmes of these three years' concerts shows that a vast amount of work has been done. Many new symphonies have been heard for the first time. The list of overtures old and new that have been played is very large. The lighter orchestral works of modern composers, especially of the new French school, have been presented in profusion. In fact, the programmes, taken as a whole, are remarkably interesting, and those who have attended all of these concerts may congratulate themselves upon having heard nearly every instrumental work which has been universally accorded the merit of greatness. If Mr. Henschel has not been an ideal conductor, in his selection of works for performance his aim has always been artistic and his taste admirable in its eclecticism. If he has not succeeded in reaching the highest or the most desirable perfection with the baton, it is not because of any lack of most conscientious endeavor. Good conducting and fine musicianship are not imperatively necessary in combination. Many great composers have failed as conductors. In fact, conductors, like poets, are born, not made. It is to be hoped that some change of principle may be made with the new conductor. To invest supreme power in one man is dangerous; for, if he have prejudices or hobbies or interests to serve, much injury and injustice may be done in the selection of soloists. Under the recent order of things, who should or who should not be accorded a hearing at these concerts depended upon a single fiat, caprice, or determination of expediency. Where the concert stage is made practically a monopoly it would be well that it should not be under autocratic control.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last evening began and ended with a burst of enthusiasm. When the audience had assembled, the orchestra and chorus joined in "Auld Lang Syne." The audience popped up, of course, but what was it all about? If it was a tribute to the parting conductor, led by himself, we cannot think it in good taste; if it was a notice that the symphony concerts were ended, it was disrespectful to the coming Von Gericke. Byron's "Manfred" began the programme proper, and was, in its orchestral work and its reading, one of the best performances we have heard of the work. The soloists were in good voice, and especially the four basses, Messrs. Heinrich, Hubbard, Harlow and Babcock, did excellently in their concerted work. Mr. Ticknor's reading was marked by earnest solemnity and power, especially in the "Manfred" passages, but in the responses of Nemesis, in a desire to make strong contrast, he became rather colloquial in tone. Also the two sentences of Ahriamenes differed greatly in quality. The beautiful "Incantation" was given exquisitely, and we must also praise the English horn passages, and in fact the orchestral work throughout. The ninth symphony has now become a thrice-told tale under Mr. Henschel's lead, but as this was the first time that it was given with the lowered pitch, we expected that the Achilles heel of the work, the vocal portion, would not be as unvoiced as heretofore. In this we were somewhat mistaken, for the "Star Pavilions" seemed as high as on any previous occasion, and even Mrs. Henschel's sweet voice seemed unduly forced and crushed by the terrible demands of the score. But at least the soloists sang correctly and surely, which is something in itself. Mrs. Henschel, Miss Rollwagen and Messrs. Toedt and Heinrichs were the quartet, and their concerted numbers, as well as the solos of the last named gentleman, were well given. We did not like the reading of the Scherzo, where the brusque interruption in the coda, and the marking of the phrases of three and four bars, as well as the emphasis of the chief figure, were not well brought out. The phrases of the contrabasses in the first part of the last movement were too violent to give an effective contrast, but the reading of the second theme of the slow movement was commendable. The great pressure on our columns prevents more extended review, nor, in view of the familiarity of the public with the work, would this seem to be necessary. Mr. Von Gericke is announced as conductor of the next concert on the programme. Le roi est mort, vive le roi! Comica

328

AT THE LAST CONCERT OF THIS SEASON,
ON MARCH 22d,

SGHUMANN'S MUSIC TO BYRON'S "MANFRED"

AND

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHON.

WILL BE PERFORMED.

Ladies and gentlemen desirous of singing in the chorus on that occasion, and willing to attend all the necessary rehearsals, are invited to write their names and addresses in a book provided for this purpose at Mr. Peck's Office, Music Hall.

The list will be closed at 6 P.M. on Tuesday, January 29th, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified.

The Chorus Rehearsals will take place from 7.30 to 9 P. M. on

MONDAYS, February 4th, 11th, 18th, 25th,

March 3d, 10th, and 17th,

at the Apollo Hall, (Chickering's), 152 Tremont Street, and will be conducted by MR. HENSCHEL.

Complimentary Tickets can be given to the members of the Chorus to the Public Rehearsal,—March 21st—only.

J. P. LYMAN, Secretary.

329

who certainly needs no introduction to musical readers, but the detailed story of whose life may be interesting.

Mr. Georg Henschel was born at Breslau, the capital of Silesia, Germany, on the 18th day of February, 1850. His musical talent was evinced when he was scarcely more than an infant, and at the age of five years he began his musical studies with lessons on the pianoforte. At the age of eleven he commenced the theoretic study of music under Dr. Schaeffer, professor and director of music at the University of Breslau. His first public appearance was made at a concert in Berlin in 1862, when twelve years old, when he played with orchestra Weber's "Concerto in F Minor," with great and marked success. Already he has composed the third Psalm for soli and chorus, and a number of songs and pianoforte pieces, which won for him great favor with musicians.

In April, 1867, he went to Leipzig and entered the Conservatory to study, more especially composition, and to fit himself as conductor. Ignaz Moscheles was his instructor on the pianoforte, and he studied theory with Professors Richter and Reinecke, and singing with Professor Goetze. During his stay in Leipzig he conducted a small choral society and wrote a number of compositions for orchestra, several pianoforte pieces (his canons), songs, duets and quartets, many of which were published and are still in print.

He sang occasionally in concerts and oratorios in and near Leipzig, and at the music festival at Altenberg (Saxony), and always with great success; but his goal was still composition and conducting, and their study was paramount with him, though not to the neglect of other departments of his art.

In the Spring of 1870 he accepted an invitation to sing in Weimar, at the Beethoven Festival of the "Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Verein," of which he was a member. He was there the guest of Prof. Gustav Richter, now Rector of the college at Jena, and made the acquaintance of Liszt, who took a lively interest in him and induced him to prolong his visit in Weimar, and to participate socially and musically in those famous Sunday matinées at the "Gartnerei," where the same morning one could hear Anton Rubinstein, Von Bülow and Carl Tausig under the master and host himself. This visit to Weimar, repeated the following year, was the impulse that caused him to remove to Berlin, having passed a little more than a year at Breslau by the special desire of his parents. He entered the Royal Hochschule (in which he soon afterwards became a teacher), and whilst regularly attending the meetings of the orchestra under Joachim's conductorship, he became also a pupil of Frederich Kiel, the celebrated composer of "Christus," and the "Requiem," under whose auspices he composed and conducted the performance of a serenade in canon form for orchestra, the CXXX. Psalm, for solo, chorus and orchestra, together with a number of sonatas, songs, trios and a string quartet. Meantime he did not lose sight of his singing, but prosecuted his studies in that direction under Prof. Adolph Schulze. The position of conductor of the Cologne Theatre orchestra was offered him, but by the advice of his friend, Max Bruch, who foresaw a broader field and greater possibilities for the young artist, he declined.

His singing attracted more and more attention, and in consequence of an unusual success at the great festival in Cologne in 1874, he received invitations to sing in oratorios and concerts from all parts of Germany, from Austria, Russia, Belgium, Holland and Switzerland. His success was phenomenal, and decided him to devote himself more especially for the next few years to this part of his art.

Everywhere was he in demand and everywhere were his compositions played and sung. His musicianship stood him in good stead and made him equal to any and all emergencies. At a rendering of Bach's "Passion" in Coburg, the conductor, being suddenly overcome—exhausted by overwork—offered his baton to Mr. Henschel, who left his place among the soloists and continued the work, arousing great enthusiasm by his truly masterly control of orchestra and chorus.

Mr. Henschel has been constantly before the public since 1869 as singer, composer and conductor. The concerts he gave with his friend Brahms in 1875 were perhaps as successful, musically and otherwise, as any that have recently been given in Austria and Germany. Though best known as a singer and composer, he has been frequently called upon to assume the baton for a part of or an entire concert (more especially where his own works have been given), as in Hamburg, Barmen, Vienna, Zurich, St. Petersburg, London (Crystal Palace and St. James' Hall), etc. He brought out at St. James' Hall in December, '79 (first time in England), Brahms' colossal "Triumphal Hymn" for eight-part (double) chorus and orchestra, and the C Minor Symphony. He first went to England in 1877 and removed there the following year because of the success with which he met. He came to this country on a visit in 1880, attracted hither by her whom he has since made Mrs. Henschel. His first season was devoted principally to singing, the bulk of the second to his duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has entered into arrangements for another season, at the expiration of which he will no doubt return to Europe, though whether for a visit or permanently is not yet known. He has left the greater part of his fine library in London. Many of his most successful vocal compositions have gained double effect by the manner in which they have been interpreted by Mrs. Henschel, formerly Lillian Bailey. His own series of chamber concerts have been among the most delightful that Boston has enjoyed for years, and he has given the German lied a new impetus in this city, its American home. His orchestral concerts have been the most popular ever given in this city. He has the genuine artistic temperament, quick, nervous and sensitive, enthusiastic in his likes and equally strong in his dislikes. He is possessed of a wonderful memory, a great talent for improvisation, an ability to sketch charmingly, a cultivated literary taste and is a very "Admirable Crichton" of music.

The members of the Vocal Association of Vienna, connected with the Society of the Friends of Music, recently gave a farewell concert in honor of Mr. Gericke, who has resigned the conductorship of the association to accept the appointment as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Previously to entering the concert room Mr. Gericke was presented by Baron Hoffman, president of the Society of the Friends of Music, with a written address in the name of that body. In the concert room, Dr. von Raindl, having made a speech in which he eulogized the talents and services of Mr. Gericke, handed to him in the name of the association a watch and an address signed by all the members.

The London World remarks: "A really good series of orchestral concerts has never been given in London; and if that could be done properly, reasonably, practically, it would be no more than what the Paris public have enjoyed for many years, three or four orchestral concerts being given to overcrowded houses every Sunday. Mr. Henschel, hitherto known as a singer and thorough musician, has perceived the chance of filling the gap, the difficulty always felt having been the funds wherewith to pay a first-class orchestra, and—again a financial question—to provide for that orchestra a sufficient number of rehearsals, so as to render the performances a model of completeness and refinement. He has, therefore, done what so few people do—he began at the beginning. He got together a number of guarantors, who took upon themselves to guarantee a certain percentage of the expenses for two years, so that, even should the concerts bring nothing at all, they need not collapse after the first season; a very important item, for it is well known that the Richter concerts, now so great a success, were a serious loss the first winter. The list of guarantors, exceeding a hundred, so far as I have seen, consists of all classes. You find the highest titled patrons of music, the gentry, the nerve and backbone of every undertaking, the well-to-do middle classes; you find artistic celebrities like Sir Frederick Leighton, Sir John Millais, Mr. Alma Tadema, etc. You find not—and mark this well—any publisher, any piano manufacturer, anybody likely commercially to influence the undertaking. From November 17 to March 16—consequently through the four winter months, the proper winter season—sixteen concerts are to be given, nine evening and seven afternoon. That they should be successful, the best possible orchestra of seventy-two members has been engaged (fourteen first violins, twelve second, ten violas, four celli, four double basses, the usual wind, and four horns). Two, and when necessary three, rehearsals will be held." Apr 1886

334
Everywhere was he in demand and everywhere were his compositions played and sung. His musicianship stood him in good stead and made him equal to any and all emergencies. At a rendering of Bach's "Passion" in Coburg, the conductor, being suddenly overcome—exhausted by overwork—offered his baton to Mr. Henschel, who left his place among the soloists and continued the work, arousing great enthusiasm by his truly masterly control of orchestra and chorus.

Mr. Henschel has been constantly before the public since 1869 as singer, composer and conductor. The concerts he gave with his friend Brahms in 1875 were perhaps as successful, musically and otherwise, as any that have recently been given in Austria and Germany. Though best known as a singer and composer, he has been frequently called upon to assume the baton for a part of or an entire concert (more especially where his own works have been given), as in Hamburg, Barmen, Vienna, Zurich, St. Petersburg, London (Crystal Palace and St. James' Hall), etc. He brought out at St. James' Hall in December, '79 (first time in England), Brahms' colossal "Triumphal Hymn" for eight-part (double) chorus and orchestra, and the C Minor Symphony. He first went to England in 1877 and removed there the following year because of the success with which he met. He came to this country on a visit in 1880, attracted hither by her whom he has since made Mrs. Henschel. His first season was devoted principally to singing, the bulk of the second to his duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has entered into arrangements for another season, at the expiration of which he will no doubt return to Europe, though whether for a visit or permanently is not yet known. He has left the greater part of his fine library in London. Many of his most successful vocal compositions have gained double effect by the manner in which they have been interpreted by Mrs. Henschel, formerly Lillian Bailey. His own series of chamber concerts have been among the most delightful that Boston has enjoyed for years, and he has given the German lied a new impetus in this city, its American home. His orchestral concerts have been the most popular ever given in this city. He has the genuine artistic temperament, quick, nervous and sensitive, enthusiastic in his likes and equally strong in his dislikes. He is possessed of a wonderful memory, a great talent for improvisation, an ability to sketch charmingly, a cultivated literary taste and is a very "Admirable Crichton" of music.

The members of the Vocal Association of Vienna, connected with the Society of the Friends of Music, recently gave a farewell concert in honor of Mr. Gericke, who has resigned the conductorship of the association to accept the appointment as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Previously to entering the concert room Mr. Gericke was presented by Baron Hoffman, president of the Society of the Friends of Music, with a written address in the name of that body. In the concert room, Dr. von Raindl, having made a speech in which he eulogized the talents and services of Mr. Gericke, handed to him in the name of the association a watch and an address signed by all the members.

The London World remarks: "A really good series of orchestral concerts has never been given in London; and if that could be done properly, reasonably, practically, it would be no more than what the Paris public have enjoyed for many years, three or four orchestral concerts being given to overcrowded houses every Sunday. Mr. Henschel, hitherto known as a singer and thorough musician, has perceived the chance of filling the gap, the difficulty always felt having been the funds wherewith to pay a first-class orchestra, and—again a financial question—to provide for that orchestra a sufficient number of rehearsals, so as to render the performances a model of completeness and refinement. He has, therefore, done what so few people do—he began at the beginning. He got together a number of guarantors, who took upon themselves to guarantee a certain percentage of the expenses for two years, so that, even should the concerts bring nothing at all, they need not collapse after the first season; a very important item, for it is well known that the Richter concerts, now so great a success, were a serious loss the first winter. The list of guarantors, exceeding a hundred, so far as I have seen, consists of all classes. You find the highest titled patrons of music, the gentry, the nerve and backbone of every undertaking, the well-to-do middle classes; you find artistic celebrities like Sir Frederick Leighton, Sir John Millais, Mr. Alma Tadema, etc. You find not—and mark this well—any publisher, any piano manufacturer, anybody likely commercially to influence the undertaking. From November 17 to March 16—consequently through the four winter months, the proper winter season—sixteen concerts are to be given, nine evening and seven afternoon. That they should be successful, the best possible orchestra of seventy-two members has been engaged (fourteen first violins, twelve second, ten violas, four celli, four double basses, the usual wind, and four horns). Two, and when necessary three, rehearsals will be held." Apr 1886

HERR GERICKE.

The Symphony Orchestra's New Leader.

He Outlines His Opinions and Plans.

His Record and Standing With the Vienna Public.

[FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

VIENNA, April 19, 1884. "But, really, I must go, for I have a rehearsal to direct at the opera," said Herr Wilhelm Gericke, in response to my remark that he ought not to hurry away so soon. We had been together ever since 5 o'clock—it was now nearly 7—seated at a round table in a private corner of the Café Bauer, a famous place of resort for journalists, artists and musicians, just opposite the main entrance of the Vienna Grand Opera House. Five o'clock in this city is the hour for coffee, just as 5 o'clock in Paris is the hour for absinthe; but, as I am not over fond of coffee, even though it be, as it is true, the best in the world, I don't mind confessing that while Herr Gericke was following the Viennese fashion I drank beer, and such beer! We had, therefore, been talking for nearly two hours, and during that time my German vis-à-vis had about as many questions to ask me as I had to ask him. Inasmuch, however, as I had come all the way from Paris to interview him—36 hours by railway on the continent is no easy assignment—I am sure that the information which I received was much more reliable than that which fell to his share of the interviewing process.

"Music, it is understood very good in Boston?" was one of the complex questions he put to me, and that, too, in English! Now, as a matter of fact, Herr Gericke knows very little about the English language, and I was rather astonished when he spoke those words, especially as the pronunciation was excellent and quite free from foreign accent. I expressed my surprise, whereupon he unblushingly confessed that he was "cramming" on that particular question for the sake of the Boston reporters, whom, he had been assured, would run down to New York to meet him on his arrival in the western world. But I suppose I ought to tell my readers why I came all this distance to interview an Austrian gentleman whom nobody, or at least very few, in America have ever heard mentioned. Well, Herr Gericke is the musician whom Mr. H. L. Higginson has engaged to succeed Mr. Henschel in the direction of certain weekly symphony concerts that have given the Boston public more or less pleasure these past three or four seasons. Mr. Higginson is, I believe, a rich, and, no doubt, highly respectable, responsible and intelligent person; but, unfortunately for himself, his notion of what is news not being up to the mark, it naturally falls within

The Province of the Herald to give the public such information as is best suited to their tastes and requirements.

"When I get ready, I will tell the public what I want them to know," has been his reply, practically speaking, to all who have dared question him as to his future intentions as regards these symphony concerts. Now, if Mr. Higginson were not the benighted banker that he is, he would have taken the Boston public into his confidence ever so long ago. But, although he has not seen fit to do anything of the sort, he will not, I hope, find it in his heart to reproach the HERALD representative for doing so for him.

Last autumn, when Mr. Higginson was in Europe, he visited Vienna, and, naturally, he dropped into the Grand Opera House. Perhaps it did not occur to him that the architect of that same building had, subsequent to erecting it, committed suicide, and in truth it would have been more in keeping with æsthetic harmony had the man committed felo de se previous to its construction, for it has always been a failure, both architecturally and acoustically. This sad event did not, perhaps, occur to Mr. Higginson, for two reasons: In the first place, it was a fashionable night, and he had been unable to secure such seats as he desired; and, secondly, he soon forgot everything in his admiration of the man who was conducting the orchestra. The opera was "Aida," and the musician in the pulpit was the gentleman at table with me, Herr William Gericke, assistant chief of orchestra in the grand opera of his Imperial majesty Francis Joseph.

"Just the very man to take Henschel's place," whispered Mr. Higginson to his wife, and Mrs. Higginson agreed with her husband, as all good wives ought to, I suppose. That was the evening of the 20th October. The next day the gentleman from Boston had a business meeting with the sous chef d'orchestre, and by the 22d the whole affair was satisfactorily arranged. Mr. Higginson is quite as familiar with the German as he is with the New England language, hence the pourparlers were not long, and the contract was soon drawn up and signed, concerning the terms and conditions of which I shall have more to say further on.

It was Herr Gericke himself who designated the Café Bauer as the place of our meeting, and he was prompt in keeping the rendezvous. I confess I was somewhat disappointed in His Personal Appearance.

I certainly should never have guessed him to be a great musician; indeed, I think he looks more like a successful boot and shoe dealer, or an irreligious bank cashier, than he does like a musical conductor. But, as every one knows, appearances are deceptive. He is about five feet seven inches in height, weighs, say 160 pounds, is well formed and solidly put together, has dark hair and beard, black eyes, rather brownish complexion, good sized nose, fine teeth, well shaped ears and mouth, and hands like an amateur oarsman. He is what the French would call "un beau garçon," and I am inclined to look on him as rather bashful—a fault, if it is one, which ought not to be counted against him. He commenced his musical career when in his 15th year, and his progress while in the conservatory, where he was a pupil of Herr Dessoff—today manager of the opera house at Frankfort—was so complete that immediately on leaving his class he entered the Imperial Opera at Vienna as one of the three leaders of the orchestra. It is true he is a capital violinist, but he has not played one for many years, preferring the piano and organ, which last mentioned instrument he has played frequently in the leading Viennese churches. Above all things, Herr Gericke is an eclectic, for he believes that good music ought to be taken wherever it is found. While he would naturally prefer the German classic school—and which school, he assured me, he intends to push all he can while in Boston—he says it would be unwise to stick to one style in preference to all others. He is fond of the Wagnerian works of later date, but as they require a considerable amount of study and labor, and as they are essentially intended for the stage, he does not believe that they could be brought out in America for some time to come. He had said so much to me, and we were carrying on our conversation in German, when he startled me with the question in English which I have already quoted, and to which I of course replied in the affirmative, for if music is not

"Understood Very Good"

In Boston, then all I have to say is, I have been sadly misinformed. We called for "some more of the same," and then Herr Gericke spoke about the many programmes that had been sent him from Boston. Judging from these and from what had been told him on the subject, he was forced to believe that too much is done in your city in the way of concerts, and that it would be better to lessen the number and to shorten the programmes. Further, if what he had been told was true, the Boston public had been altogether too greatly saturated with music. Perhaps it would not be advisable to modify these conditions at once, but he thinks that a reform could be carried out gradually. Speaking of the endless programmes usually in the United States as well as in England, Herr Gericke said that after having heard a symphony of Beethoven, the public should not be bothered or troubled—he used both those words—with other music.

Herr Gericke has been gratified to learn that the Boston public enjoys the reputation of being a highly musically educated one. He must have learned this before the arrival of your correspondent, for I was certainly non-committal in my replies to his frequent questions, both as regards fact and theory; but he is a firm believer in the idea that there is "music in the air" in Boston and thereabouts. "It could not be otherwise," said he, "for music is directly connected with poetry, and there have always been grand poets in your city." My city, indeed! But I did not tell him to the contrary. Why, he actually got the notion into his head that I had come all the way across the Atlantic ocean, straight from Boston to Vienna, to get his views on music. He mentioned this "unheard of enterprise" twice, and, as the notion seemed to do him good, I saw no reason for telling him that in truth I had travelled no more than a paltry thousand or so of miles for the purpose of doing Mr. Higginson a good turn.

"You see," said he, continuing the subject of poetry and music yoked together, "they came into existence ever so long before the lyre became the echo of the voice of the bard or the harp of Israel's King was heard of. The laws of concord and discord, of

Harmony and Melody,

are founded in the constitution of man; he seeks as naturally for the gratification of music as for food to allay hunger or drink to quench thirst, for it is the natural delight and pleasure of the ear. Of course, any succession of sounds which excites agreeable sensations on the ear may be called music, but the indispensable points are time and tune," and then he said something about how discord with excellent effect might be produced by certain changes of keys, and by which is created a light and shade that embellish passages which would otherwise be rather monotonous.

"Did you ever think of the differences in the pleasures of the eye and of the ear?" and as he asked that question he looked at me so sternly that I concealed my emotion by draining my beer glass to the bottom. Without giving me time to tune up, he continued, "Colors are positive in the pleasures they afford, while musical sounds are only relatively so. A single color, red, blue or yellow, may give gratification; a single sound will not, but a succession of them can afford great pleasure. Of course I do not mean to say that every succession of musical sounds will please, but if their succession is well arranged, then there will be sweetness and melody. The road to the human heart is much more direct through the ear than it is by way of the eye, and we may by this same avenue gain an intensity of gratification which no combination of colors can ever give us. And the reason why so much more labor and cost is expended in gratifying the eye than the ear is because the pleasure afforded to the first, being embodied in permanent forms, can be repeated and renewed at pleasure, while those of music are lost the moment they are enjoyed, and require a repetition of the same human agency for every renewal of the pleasure."

The man was getting beyond my depth. I plainly told him so, and begged him to let me know something as to his future intentions. To this reasonable request he made answer that when he received the list of the musical works either already performed or existing in the library of the Boston Musical Society, he found that nearly every good composition in existence or known was there, and it would be rather difficult for him to bring out any new ones. He observed, though, that works of minor importance which could be brought out are not so well known in Boston as the great classical compositions. Not knowing exactly the

State of Things in Boston

he could not as yet decide on any positive programme, except to say that his idea was to keep up classical music as far as possible. Referring next to the strength and value of the orchestra in your city, and believing that the artists over there are good musicians, he declared himself as of the opinion that their number is not sufficient, on account of the vast proportions of the room or hall, which certainly requires a much stronger band than the present one.

"Twelve first violins, 12 second violins, and so on, cannot produce the effect which I wish to obtain. I want at least 16 first, 16 second, 10 altos, 8 violincellos, 8 contraltos, these numbers being a minimum. Here at the Viennese Gesellschafts concert, also at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society, I have 18 first violins, 18 seconds, 12 altos, etc., and, as the room is much smaller than the one in Boston, I am sure no great effect can be attained unless the orchestra is increased proportionally to the size of the hall. If that very desirable reform cannot be carried out the first year, I hope to be able to do it the second season."

"Are you going to take any musicians over with you?" I asked.

"Not one," was his reply. "At first I desired to do so, in order that those who went with me, being used to my methods, might serve as instructors for the others, so to speak. But not very long ago I received a letter from Mrs. Higginson, telling me not to bring any musicians with me. She said Mr. Higginson was perfectly willing I should increase the orchestra whenever it became practicable, but that it was not advisable to engage any soloists in Vienna."

Speaking of conductors leads me to say that the Sunday Herald yesterday published a very important interview with our new one—von Gericke. It is likely to be an unfortunate step for the poor stranger. He has unbosomed himself to the interviewer with real German frankness, and this heartless scribe has, in the spirit of kindness, revealed it all to the public. How much von Gericke expects to live on, what he desires to save, how he is going to economize on clothes, etc., etc., all these details are recounted in full. Von Gericke must study his predecessors' note-book. He may force full prices out of charitable concerts; he may squeeze the Boston lemon as hard as he can, and he may boldly show that his only interest in Boston is the number of shekels he can get out of it, but he must not expose his innocent "little economies." If he does he will not be a social success. The naturalness of the Viennese life will not help him on much in Boston. Key note

"Did Mrs. Higginson give you any other orders or instructions?"

"None. She wrote me only once and on the subject just mentioned; I believe that her reason for not wishing to have me take over any musicians was on account of her fear of some sort of a union which exists in America, a protective society, so I am told, for the home article."

"How about Wagner. Will you make any special effort to present his works in Boston?" I asked.

"It is possible, but not probable. If there were, say, three good soloists and a good choir, I might play fragments of 'Parsifal,' the scene between Parsifal and the flower girl. I could also play the prelude of 'Tristan' and some other portions of Wagner's works, but I should certainly be very cautious in my choice." Speaking about his plans, he said that he would spare no efforts to bring out great and important oratorios where big masses of well trained instrumentists and singers could perform new works or works little known, as yet, by the public at large.

"I should be most happy to perform Berlioz's requiem, which was given with a stupendous effect in this city on Easter Tuesday of last year, and again on Easter Tuesday of this year, both times by myself. This capital work, originally written for one principal and four accessory orchestras, was performed here by 120 musicians and 800 male and female singers. I would like to bring out this requiem, but as the work would require 16 trumpets, 16 trombones, 12 horns, 12 clarionets and other instruments in proportion, I am afraid that the task cannot be easily carried out, and that it will take a good while to see my idea realized."

Herr Gericke is a man without family. In one of his letters, Mr. Higginson says to him: "It is a pity you are

Coming to Boston Without a Wife";

but Gericke has not yet discovered why the possession of a wife is necessary to the conducting of symphony concerts. He was born in Styria, in a small village only a short distance from the birthplace of Mme. Materna. By the way, the two have been good friends these many years. Herr Scaria, who is now singing with Materna in America, also comes from Styria, I believe. I find that Gericke has a great many friends in Vienna, and they are all gratified to know that the situation which he is going to occupy is such a good one and will amply compensate him for quitting his home in the Austrian capital. His engagement with Mr. Higginson is for five years, and he receives, so he told me, a salary of $7500 annually. He agrees to conduct during the season one concert every Saturday in Boston, and on other days in other places near your city. He has, however, a right to employ himself in teaching, but he will not take in pupils for some time to come. His principal and permanent work will be the reorganization of the symphony concerts; but if, later on, some offer were made him to start a choral society or to increase the sphere of his musical dominion in a way agreeable to the Boston public and profitable to Mr. Higginson, he will spare no efforts to accomplish this task. He will leave Vienna at the end of August, and will cross the ocean in September. He will stay a week in New York, where he has friends, notably a lady who bears the same name as one of the most distinguished of modern generals. He "calculates" that it will cost him about $2000 a year to live in Boston.

"That will enable me to lay up about 70,000 florins out of my salary," said he proudly. "I have heard that clothing is very dear in Boston, so I will buy a good stock before I leave here." I am sorry he is going to do this, for there is a great difference in the styles here and in Boston. I am afraid he will be laughed at if he makes his appearance "à la mode Viennoise," and if he takes my advice he will not buy any clothing until he gets to London. One of the best known musical critics of Vienna dined with me last night, and, at my request, gave me his personal opinion of Herr Gericke as a director.

"He conducts his orchestra," said my friend, "in the free German style initiated by Richard Wagner, and he has greatly distinguished himself by the cool, collected and intelligent manner in which he handles his orchestra. He is very industrious, and works with the musicians so much and often that the performance invariably comes off blameless. He is an excellent conductor, not only for grand opera, but for sacred music, and here in Vienna his performances of the important works of T. S. Bach, Mozart and Beethoven have long been famous with those of us who understand and appreciate good music. J. H. HAYNIE.

Home Journal Musical. Aug 9. 84

The Musical Record imparts the information that Mr. Henschel, to use his exact language, confesses "his experience" as conductor "during three years has been invaluable. A German conductor could not acquire such an experience in three times as many years." It must be very gratifying (?) to Mr. Higginson to know that his apprentice, Mr. Henschel, so adequately appreciates the experience he has gained in Boston, that he at last virtually justifies the basis of the criticism he received here. Granting that Mr. Higginson was ignorant of Mr. Henschel's incompetency when he agreed to pay him more than twice the salary that any experienced conductor ever received, he may now have the consolation that a most tardy appreciation affords. Indeed if Mr. Henschel could not have obtained the "invaluable" experience to which he refers, he would no doubt have been willing to pay for it. If it was invaluable it was worth paying for as no one will deny. Now the criticisms which the best informed of Mr. Henschel's critics ventured to make were such as an inexperienced conductor would inevitably have called forth. The less intelligent estimate of Mr. Henschel, and that which he now refutes, was on the part of such as were more or less bewildered in their convictions of his ability, owing to the 10,000 dollars a year salary he so unaccountably received. Many who are incapable of judging from any other standpoint very plausibly reasoned that Mr. Higginson, being a cautious and conservative business man, would not pay any man an exorbitant salary for a service such as he could but inefficiently perform. This same public is now informed of its mistake by the employee himself. It is more than possible that Mr. Higginson at the outstart of his symphony concert enterprise was deceived by Mr. Henschel's most magnetic opinion of his own ability, an opinion which he is now both just and straightforward enough to confess as pre-

Speaking of conductors leads me to say that the Sunday Herald yesterday published a very important interview with our new one—von Gericke. It is likely to be an unfortunate step for the poor stranger. He has unbosomed himself to the interviewer with real German frankness, and this heartless scribe has, in the spirit of kindness, revealed it all to the public. How much von Gericke expects to live on, what he desires to save, how he is going to economize on clothes, etc., etc., all these details are recounted in full. Von Gericke must study his predecessors' note-book. He may force full prices out of charitable concerts; he may squeeze the Boston lemon as hard as he can, and he may boldly show that his only interest in Boston is the number of shekels he can get out of it, but he must not expose his innocent "little economies." If he does he will not be a social success. The naturalness of the Viennese life will not help him on much in Boston. Key note

"Did Mrs. Higginson give you any other orders or instructions?"

"None. She wrote me only once and on the subject just mentioned; I believe that her reason for not wishing to have me take over any musicians was on account of her fear of some sort of a union which exists in America, a protective society, so I am told, for the home article."

"How about Wagner. Will you make any special effort to present his works in Boston?" I asked.

"It is possible, but not probable. If there were, say, three good soloists and a good choir, I might play fragments of 'Parsifal,' the scene between Parsifal and the flower girl. I could also play the prelude of 'Tristan' and some other portions of Wagner's works, but I should certainly be very cautious in my choice." Speaking about his plans, he said that he would spare no efforts to bring out great and important oratorios where big masses of well trained instrumentists and singers could perform new works or works little known, as yet, by the public at large.

"I should be most happy to perform Berlioz's requiem, which was given with a stupendous effect in this city on Easter Tuesday of last year, and again on Easter Tuesday of this year, both times by myself. This capital work, originally written for one principal and four accessory orchestras, was performed here by 120 musicians and 800 male and female singers. I would like to bring out this requiem, but as the work would require 16 trumpets, 16 trombones, 12 horns, 12 clarionets and other instruments in proportion, I am afraid that the task cannot be easily carried out, and that it will take a good while to see my idea realized."

Herr Gericke is a man without family. In one of his letters, Mr. Higginson says to him: "It is a pity you are

Coming to Boston Without a Wife";

but Gericke has not yet discovered why the possession of a wife is necessary to the conducting of symphony concerts. He was born in Styria, in a small village only a short distance from the birthplace of Mme. Materna. By the way, the two have been good friends these many years. Herr Scaria, who is now singing with Materna in America, also comes from Styria, I believe. I find that Gericke has a great many friends in Vienna, and they are all gratified to know that the situation which he is going to occupy is such a good one and will amply compensate him for quitting his home in the Austrian capital. His engagement with Mr. Higginson is for five years, and he receives, so he told me, a salary of $7500 annually. He agrees to conduct during the season one concert every Saturday in Boston, and on other days in other places near your city. He has, however, a right to employ himself in teaching, but he will not take in pupils for some time to come. His principal and permanent work will be the reorganization of the symphony concerts; but if, later on, some offer were made him to start a choral society or to increase the sphere of his musical dominion in a way agreeable to the Boston public and profitable to Mr. Higginson, he will spare no efforts to accomplish this task. He will leave Vienna at the end of August, and will cross the ocean in September. He will stay a week in New York, where he has friends, notably a lady who bears the same name as one of the most distinguished of modern generals. He "calculates" that it will cost him about $2000 a year to live in Boston.

"That will enable me to lay up about 70,000 florins out of my salary," said he proudly. "I have heard that clothing is very dear in Boston, so I will buy a good stock before I leave here." I am sorry he is going to do this, for there is a great difference in the styles here and in Boston. I am afraid he will be laughed at if he makes his appearance "à la mode Viennoise," and if he takes my advice he will not buy any clothing until he gets to London. One of the best known musical critics of Vienna dined with me last night, and, at my request, gave me his personal opinion of Herr Gericke as a director.

"He conducts his orchestra," said my friend, "in the free German style initiated by Richard Wagner, and he has greatly distinguished himself by the cool, collected and intelligent manner in which he handles his orchestra. He is very industrious, and works with the musicians so much and often that the performance invariably comes off blameless. He is an excellent conductor, not only for grand opera, but for sacred music, and here in Vienna his performances of the important works of T. S. Bach, Mozart and Beethoven have long been famous with those of us who understand and appreciate good music. J. H. HAYNIE.

Home Jan. Musical. Aug 9. 84

The Musical Record imparts the information that Mr. Henschel, to use his exact language, confesses "his experience" as conductor "during three years has been invaluable. A German conductor could not acquire such an experience in three times as many years." It must be very gratifying (?) to Mr. Higginson to know that his apprentice, Mr. Henschel, so adequately appreciates the experience he has gained in Boston, that he at last virtually justifies the basis of the criticism he received here. Granting that Mr. Higginson was ignorant of Mr. Henschel's incompetency when he agreed to pay him more than twice the salary that any experienced conductor ever received, he may now have the consolation that a most tardy appreciation affords. Indeed if Mr. Henschel could not have obtained the "invaluable" experience to which he refers, he would no doubt have been willing to pay for it. If it was invaluable it was worth paying for as no one will deny. Now the criticisms which the best informed of Mr. Henschel's critics ventured to make were such as an inexperienced conductor would inevitably have called forth. The less intelligent estimate of Mr. Henschel, and that which he now refutes, was on the part of such as were more or less bewildered in their convictions of his ability, owing to the 10,000 dollars a year salary he so unaccountably received. Many who are incapable of judging from any other standpoint very plausibly reasoned that Mr. Higginson, being a cautious and conservative business man, would not pay any man an exorbitant salary for a service such as he could but inefficiently perform. This same public is now informed of its mistake by the employee himself. It is more than possible that Mr. Higginson at the outstart of his symphony concert enterprise was deceived by Mr. Henschel's most magnetic opinion of his own ability, an opinion which he is now both just and straightforward enough to confess as premature. It would have been absurd of the young musician to have gone to Mr. Higginson and told the truth about his ability as follows: "Mr. Higginson, I desire to conduct a large orchestra. I will undertake to direct a series of concerts for you for $10,000 a year. I never conducted an orchestra before, and it is equally true the past employers of my musicianship in London and elsewhere, did not think very highly of my musical genius. The best London critics say I am a bad vocalist, and it seems to be the general opinion, judging from the meagre notices I have received in foreign newspapers, that I am a mediocre musician; but then I guess I'll do for America. Then again, I need the experience; Carl Zerrahn has had it long enough, and I have never had any. Now if you will engage my invaluable services at the aforementioned salary, I will do my best to learn how to interpret Beethoven's nine symphonies, and other great works."

043

Mr. Henschel was not called upon to say anything of the kind to Mr. Higginson, though he would, as any musician knows, been particularly exact in his statement of truth had he have done so. Per contra, he came, he saw, he conquered, by the sensational audacity of his conceit. He now confesses his former incapacity, and at a time when he has no such motive to deny it as he had when his critics were abused for the discovery of it. As the Musical Record tersely puts it, "It is rather refreshing to get his frank avowal that in conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he has been merely learning how to direct!" Well, we should say so. It is unfortunate, however, Mr. Higginson is in no position to appreciate the present necessity of such a remarkable avowal.

friends and acquaintances and the variety of claims pressed upon him. I have reserved for my own use one each.

It is very hard to say no to one so interested in and identified with the best music as you are, but you will see my position. I know what
Mr. Higginson might say if he were here I do not know: he might grant your request on the score of "common sense" which he has refused relations on the score of simple friendship.

The 50¢ concert
seats are for sale at 359 61

auction: all about as usual as the last year. The auction will receive the amount much, and I cannot but think that you will secure your seats without much trouble or expense, especially as they are what many would consider undervalued.

Very truly yours,

J. W. Chapman

To
Allen A. Brown Esq.
Boston, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,
GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

30 August 1883.

My dear Mr. Brown, absence from town has prevented my replying sooner to your note of the 21st inst.

Mr. Siggerson upon his departure gave me a list of seats for next which is out of my power to enlarge. The list is somewhat smaller than that of last year and comprises possibly one hundred seats including those of the Directors, prices re. re.
being a moderate one in view of the number of his

VOLUME 4

1884-1885

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON

✻ 1884-1885 ✻

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS

COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

L. S. Johnson del.

TIGHT BINDING

Index

Composer	Name of Work	No. of Concert	Date	Soloists
Bach J.S.	Prelude, Andante Gavotte arr. for strings by Bachinski	I	Oct 18
	Pastorale from Christmas Oratorio arr. for orch. by R. Franz	VI	Nov. 22
	Three movements from a Sonata arr. by W. Gerike	XVI	Jan 31. 85
	Toccata arr. by Esser	XIII	Feb 21. "
	Ciaccona for Violin alone	XVIII	Feb 24. 85	E. Loeffler
	"My heart ever faithful" for Soprano Cello & Piano	XXIII	Feb 21. 85	Emma Jack F. Giese + H. Tucker
	"Christmas Oratorio" 1 st + 2 ^d Parts Emma Jack, Emily Winant W. J. Wink + F. Remmert + Chorus of 300	XXIII	Feb 21. 85
Bargiel W.	Overture to "Medea"	III	Nov. 1/84
Beethoven	Symphony No. 1.	III	Nov 1. 84
	" " 2	VI	" 22. "
	" " 3	IX	Dec 13. "
	" " 4	XI	" 27 "
	" " 5	XVI	Jan 31. 85
	" " 6	XVII	Feb 14. "
	" " 7	XX	" 28 "
	" " 8	XXII	Feb 14. "
	Overture "Leonore" No. 3	I	Oct 18. 84
	" " "Egmont"	X	Dec 20. "
	" " "Fidelio"	XIX	Feb 21. 85
	Concerto Piano & orch. No. 4 in G	VII	Nov 29. 84	Miss Mary E. Gaillet
	" " "No. 5 E flat	XII	Jan 3. 85	Carl Baermann
	Septet op 20	XIV	" 17. "
	Andante Cant. from op 97 for 4 by Liszt	IV	Nov 8. 84
	March, Fugue from op 59 for strings	XI	Dec 27 "

* M. 125. 5. 1004

1881-1893

Allen O. Brown

Aug 14, 1894

12 v.

Berlioz. 'Le Bal' from Symp. Fantastique	III	Nov. 1.84
Boccherini - Minuet	XII	Jan 3.85
Brakms J. Symphonie No. 2 op 73	XIV	Jan 17.85
" " 3 op 90	IV	Nov 8.84
Hungarian Dances Nos. 1, 2, 5	VII	" 29. "
Var. on a Theme by Jos. Haydn op 56	XIII	Dec 6. "
"Liebes treu" Song with Piano	XI	" 27. "	Miss Louise Rollwagen
"Fidelin" sung by the
"Philomela Uxantella" (Ladies)	XVIII	Feb 14.85
Bruch, Max Adagio from Concerto
No. 2 for violin	X	Dec 20.84	E. Loeffler
Buck, Dudley. "Sunset" Song with Piano	IX	Dec 13.84	Miss Mary H. How
Cherubini. Ovr. to "Anacreon"	II	Oct 25.84
" " "Water Carrier"	XI	Dec 27. "
Chopin F. Concerto Piano + Orch.
No. 2 in 7 min:	XXIV	Feb 28.85	Miss Amy Mary Cheney
Fuchs, Robt. Serenade Nos.	XX	Feb 7.85
" " 2	II	Oct 25.84
Gade N.W. Overture to "Ossian"	VI	Nov 22.84
Gercke W. "Supplication"	X	Nov 15.84	Miss Emma Juch
"My Messengers"	"	"
Songs with Piano
Goldmark C. ovr. to "Sakuntala"	XI	Dec 27.84
"Rustic Wedding" op 26	XV	Jan 24.85

Gounod C. "Barcarolle" from Polyucte	XIII	Jan 10.85	Mr. J. Winch with orch. acc.
Grieg
"The old song"	II	Oct 25.84	Miss Ida Melch
"Autumnal Gade"	"	"	"
Songs with Piano
Handel
Largo for Strings	V	Nov 15.84
Grand Concerto No. 2 for strings	XX	Feb 28.85
Aria "Oh Lord as from the mouth"	XI	Dec 27.84	Louise Rollwagen
with orch. acc.
Aria "Lascia chio piangi"	XX	Feb 28.85	Agnes Huntington
with orch. acc.
Haydn
Symphony No. 2 in D maj.	VIII	Dec 6.84
" " 12 " B flat	XVIII	Feb 14.85
Variations on Austrian National
Hymn for orch.	IX	Dec 13.84
Henselt F. Concerto for Piano + orch. in	XV	Jan 24.84	Miss Fannie Bloomfield
7 min: op 16.
Herbeck J. "Tanz Momente" for orch.	XXIX	Feb 21.85
Jensen A. "Murmeln der Luftschau" Song with	XIII	Jan 10.85	William J. Winch
Piano
Lachner F. Suite No. 1 op 113 for orch.	XIII	Jan 10.85
Lalo E. "Fantaisie Norvegienne" in a	X	Dec 20.84	E. Loeffler for Violin + orch.
Liszt F. "Orpheus" Symphonic Poem	XIV	Jan 17.85
for orch.
Meyerbeer
Scenes from "Le Profeta"	IX	Dec 13.84	Miss Mary H. How
with orch. acc.

- Mendelssohn - Symphony No. 3 in A min.: I Dec 20. 84
 " " 4 " A maj. II Oct 25. "
- Overture to "Ruy Blas" XII Jan 3. 85
 " " "Son + Stranger" XV " 24. "
 " " "Melusina" XX Feb 28. "
- Overture, Scherzo, Notturmo and Wedding March from Mid. Summers
 "Night Dream" music XIII Dec 6. 84
- "Spring Song" with Piano acc. XVI Jan 31. 85 Miss Gertrude Franklin
- Mozart - Symphony in D maj. No. 5 XIII Jan 10. 85
 " " C maj. " 4 XVII Feb 7. "
 " " G min. XXI Feb 7. "
- Overture to the "Magic Flute" VI Nov 22. 84
- Rec. varia from "Figaro" with orch. acc. V Nov 15. 84 Miss Emma Fuch
- "Bella mia fiamma" with orch. XVI Jan 31. 85 Miss Gertrude Franklin
- Paganini - Adagio Rondo from Violin VIII Dec 8. 84 Bern. Listemann Concerto No. 1 in D maj.
- Purcell - "I attempt from love's sickness to fly" Song with Piano XIII Jan 10. 85 William J. Wink
- Raff J. "Dream King + his love" scene with orch. II Oct 25. 84 Miss Ida Welsh
- "Mädchenlied" with Piano XIII Jan 10. 85 William J. Wink
- Rubinstein A. Ballet music from
 "La Figue" for orch. I Dec 20. 84
- Piano Concerto No 4. D min.: XVII Feb 7. 85 Mr Louis Maas
 op 70

- Rheinberger "Good night" for ladies voices
 (unaccompanied) XVIII Feb 14. 85 Philomela
 Quartette
- Saint-Saens "Danse Macabre" XVIII Feb 14. 85
 Concerto for Violin + orch. op 20. XXI Feb 7. 85 T. Adamowski
- Schubert Symphony in C maj. No. 6. VII Nov 29. 84
 " " C maj. No. 9. XXIV Feb 28. 85
 Overture to "Rosamunde" IX Dec 13. 84
 " " "Alphonso u. Estrella" XXI Feb 7. 85
 March in B min. orch. by Liszt V Nov 15. 84
 Grand Fantasia in C maj. arr. for Piano + orch. by Liszt III Nov 1. 84 Mr. H. Sherwood
 "Wohin" Song with Piano XI Dec 27. 84 Louis Rollwagen
 "Impatience" " " XX Feb 18. 85 Miss Agnes Huntington
- Schumann Symphony No. 1 in B flat V Nov 15. 84
 " " 3 " E flat XXIX Feb 21. 85
 " " 4 " D XII Jan 3. "
 Overture, Scherzo, Finale for orch. IV Nov 8. 84
 Overture to "Hermann u. Dorothea" XXII Feb 14. 85
 "Pictures from the Orient" op. 66
 arr. for orch. by C. Reincke VI Nov 22. 84
- "Moonlight" Song with Piano XVI Jan 31. 85 Gertrude Franklin
 "O Sunny beam" " " XX Feb 28. 85 Miss Agnes Huntington
- Spohr B. Ovr. to "Jessonda" XVI Jan 31. 85
- de Swert J. Concerto for Cello with orch. IV Nov 8. 84 Fritz Giese
 op 32
- Tschaikowsky P. Concerto Piano + orch. No. 1. XIX Feb 21. 85 B. J. Lang
 op. 23
- Viouxtemps Concerto for Violin + orch. in
 A min. I Oct 18. 84 Leopold
 Lichtheim }
 Concerto for Violin + orch. op 31 XXII Feb 14. 85 Leandro
 Campanari

Volkmann R. Symphony No. in D minor: I Oct 18.84
 Overture "Richard III" XXII Feb 14.85
 Serenade for Strings XXII Feb 7.85

Wagner R. Ovr. to 'Tannhäuser' VII Nov 29.84
 " "Meistersinger" XXII Feb 7.85 Prelude & Finale to Tristan & Isolde XIII Jan 10. "
 'Siegfried Idyll'
 (on Bill but not given) XXIV Feb 28.85

Weber Cr. M. Ovr. to 'Freischütz' V Nov 15.84
 " "Oberon" XIV Jan 17.85
 " "Euryanthe" XXIV Feb 28. "
 "Invitation to the Dance" orch.
 by Berlioz XV Jan 24.85

Oct. 18	Oct. 25	Nov. 1	Nov. 8	Nov. 15	Nov. 22	Nov. 29	Dec. 6	Dec. 13	Dec. 20	Dec. 27	Jan. 3	Jan. 10	Jan. 17	Jan. 24
1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15
 L 448 2d. BALCONY.   BOSTON MUSIC HALL. THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. WILHELM GERICHKE, Conductor. SEASON 1884 — '85.
Mar. 28	Mar. 21	Mar. 14	Mar. 7	Feb. 28	Feb. 21	Feb. 14	Feb. 7	Jan. 31	Jan. 24	Jan. 17	Jan. 10	Jan. 3	Dec. 27	Dec. 20
24	23	22	21	20	19	18	17	16	15	14	13	12	11	10

Admit Mr. Brown
to Mr. B. J. LANG'S Twelve Symphony-Concert
Lessons at Chickering Hall, on Thursdays, Oct. 23,
Nov. 6, 20, Dec. 11, 18, Jan. 1, 22, 29, Feb. 12, 26, March 12 and 19; at half past two o'clock.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1884.

OUR NEW ORCHESTRAL CONDUCTOR.

The coming of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke among us marks another of those important epochs which have been strewn so thickly along Boston's musical history since Mr. Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In advance of his arrival several articles were published regarding his musical views, and one or two interviews were given to the public through the press, which, however, scarcely presented the leader in his true light, since not every one can fully understand the nature of the true Wienerkind ("child of Vienna"), and such Mr. Gericke, apart from his musical abilities, certainly is. I was requested recently by Mme. Materna, who is an earnest friend of Mr. Gericke, to call on him after his arrival, and convey to him her heartiest greetings and best wishes in his new sphere of action. The interview which resulted from this introduction had so many points of interest to the general public that I have obtained Mr. Gericke's permission to publish such parts of it as were not purely social, although at the time of our conversation the thought of "cold type" was absent from both of us. Of his personal appearance it is unnecessary to speak. Every newspaper has informed us that he is a short man, of dark complexion and vivacious manner. He has all the light-hearted gayety of the Viennese, is a splendid raconteur, and, in any company where he is not obliged to speak English, would be a shining light, apart from any musical qualities. Naturally at first we spoke of Materna. "She is a splendid woman," said he, "and she does not forget her country; you know we are both Styrians, and we both love to get home in our vacation time. It was hard for her to leave Vienna for America. It was hard for me, too. At first they all thought I did not really mean to go, and when they found out that I was really about to leave, they all showered kindnesses upon me in bidding me farewell. Let me show you some of the trophies." Mr. Gericke went to a side room and brought out what seemed to be a set of atlases, but when I saw the bindings I cried out in admiration. Costly silk, enamels, plushes, gold, ivory had been lavished on every one of these masterpieces of art, and each bore "W. G." upon its side, worked into a monogram with all the skill of the most luxurious art. But it was the contents which gave them their real value, since they showed what rank our new conductor had occupied, not only in the musical life, but in the hearts of the Viennese. The first bore, in illuminated text, the certificate of election of Wilhelm Gericke to the position of honorary member of the celebrated Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde of Vienna, a society that has called but very few to this distinguished honor since its foundation. Another presented a note of thanks to the conductor for his great services in elevating music in Austria. A third, from one of the great choral societies of Vienna, began—

"Highly honored sir—Called to a high position in the New World, you are about to leave Europe, your native land, Vienna, and our society. In the hour of parting your high deeds in the cause of art seem yet more brilliant. Four years of unbroken activity have led from triumph to triumph. It only remains for us to wish you equal successes in your new sphere."

Hundreds of signatures were appended to these testimonials, and the names of Brahms, Richter and others appeared in the list. A fine stop-watch, with a dedicatory inscription, a beautiful scarf-pin in the shape of a helmet, inscribed to the musical hero, showed that gifts of intrinsic value were not lacking in the farewell ovations. Having put the trophies away again, Mr. Gericke sat down to a musical chat. He said that his trouble at first would be that his English was insufficient to make him intelligible at rehearsals. I assured him that almost the entire orchestra spoke German, but that he ought to get up a few terrific English anathemas to hurl at some of the brasses that do not speak the Teutonic tongue. The question of placing the orchestra of course came on the tapis. I explained to him the various experiments which had been made with the orchestra during the past three years. He understood the division of the strings as Mr. Henschel had made it in the second year, and spoke of a similar division—for a special purpose, however—which Wagner once made in Vienna. But he could not well understand the object of bringing the contra-basses to the front, although he entirely forebore from any criticism. His own placing will follow the regular plan, first violins at left, second at right, contra-basses back, and so on, although he may dispose the wood wind more to the centre, with the brasses behind. But in this he will be guided by the size of the orchestra and the new effect of the empty stage since the removal of the great organ. There may be a slight addition to the numerical force of the orchestra, and this, if made, will be to the violins. The Philharmonic Orchestra of Vienna has always had a larger proportion of first violins, as compared to the violas and celli, than many other orchestras.

He feared that the stage might be found a trifle low for the best orchestral effects, but this would be an advantage to the soloists, especially as regards the front part of the house. Speaking of the make-up of the programmes for the coming season (of course I am not at liberty to mention actual details in advance of their official publication), he expressed some very decided and musicianly ideas. He told me that he had already been bombarded with letters containing requests for this and that piece, and one suggested improving the symphonies by following them with some light music. "This," said Mr. Gericke, "I cannot conscientiously do. I know perfectly well the necessity of avoiding cumbrous and heavy programmes, and light works must not be excluded. But they must have their place. In the first part of a programme, near the overture, or other work of short or medium length, a light work is sometimes fitting; but after a great masterpiece, very, very seldom. I shall end the programme with the symphony, generally. The public are more elevated if they carry home the impression of a great masterwork, than if a musical trifle follows it. The latter would only annoy, not please, even a cultured non-musician. Some symphonies, however, are not well suited in their finale to end a concert. Take Brahms's third symphony, for example. Its quiet pianissimo and gentle flow are not adapted to finish a programme. When I give that I shall follow it with some other piece."

Mr. Gericke was much disappointed not to find the great organ in the Music Hall. He had been shown a photograph of the hall a year ago, and not only was delighted with its impressive appearance, but had hoped to give some organ selections in connection with his orchestral programmes. In alluding to the opening programme he said he would give several novelties. A symphony by Valkmann, new to America, will be the pièce de resistance. It will be a novelty in itself to begin without the "Weihe des Hauses," Beethoven's Dedication Overture, which has begun each of the past three seasons here. This time the Leonore Overture No. 3 will replace it. One novelty of the coming season I cannot refrain from mentioning; we are to hear a new Schubert Symphony, one of the posthumous discoveries.

The great Schubert Symphony in C will, of course, be given, but it is doubtful if the beautiful "Unfinished Symphony" is heard this season.

The remainder of my pleasant interview with Mr. Gericke did not relate to the coming musical season, but in the course of social chat many anecdotes of Viennese musical life came to the surface. Two of these were so humorous that I venture to reproduce them here. The first relates to Mr. Gericke's timpani player at Vienna. A Meyerbeer festival was in preparation, and the rehearsals were numerous and arduous, so that all the musicians began to murmur, save one, the impecunious kettledrummer, who was noted for his propensity for borrowing money from every member of the orchestra, and not repaying it. This earnest musician burst forth, "B., gentlemen, this is a debt which we owe to Meyerbeer." A howl went up from the orchestra—"Why, in thunder, Mr. L., must you begin the payment of your debts with Meyerbeer?"

The second anecdote relates to Wagner, and has never found its way into print. Mr. Gericke had, at the Vienna Opera House, a prompter of most prosaic nature, who, nevertheless, could always be relied on to help out anybody who forgot his part. The dress rehearsal of "Lohengrin" was going on, and Wagner had thrown himself upon a sofa to listen. The master sat rapt in a reverie. At the end of the phrases preceding the beautiful tenor passage, "Athmest du nicht mit mir die süßen Düfte," Wagner dreamily gave out the first words, "Breathest thou not," and stopped. A hoarse voice came from the prompter's box, "Breathest thou not with me the heavenly fragrance." Wagner glared at the box but said nothing—a dead pause. Then again a hoarse voice, this time fortissimo, "Breathest thou not with me the heavenly fragrance?" This was too much. Wagner sprang up in a fury, rushed to the prompter's box, and yelled into it, "You confounded jackass! can't you let a man dream in peace?"

Perhaps these anecdotes will show, better than any description of mine can, what a thorough Gemüthlichkeit is in Mr. Gericke's nature. His position in Vienna speaks for his musical abilities, and his programmes and his earnest zeal for the elevation of art prove that Boston has gained not only a great musician, but a genial, hearty and unaffected gentleman.

L. C. E.

It is more than probable that the choice of season seats for the concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra the coming season, Herr Wilhelm Gericke director, will be sold at public auction in the same way as they were last season.

WILHELM GERICKE.

BOSTON'S NEW CONDUCTOR—A FAMOUS MUSICIAN—HE DOES NOT BELIEVE IN A CLOSE ADHERENCE TO THE GERMAN CLASSICAL SCHOOL OF MUSIC—THE BOSTON PUBLIC TOO GREATLY SATURATED WITH MUSIC—TOO MANY CONCERTS—ETC.

There is so general a desire to know something of the plans of the famous musician who is to succeed Herr Georg Henschel as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that we have drawn upon the Vienna correspondence of the Boston Herald for the following facts:

"Music, it is understood very good in Boston?" was one of the complex questions he put to me, and that, too, in English! Now, as a matter of fact, Herr Gericke knows very little about the English language, and I was rather astonished when he spoke those words especially as the pronunciation was excellent and quite free from foreign accent. I expressed my surprise, whereupon he unblushingly confessed that he was "cramming" on that particular question for the sake of the Boston reporters, whom, he had been assured, would run to meet him on his arrival in the Western world.

Last autumn, when Mr. Higginson was in Europe, he visited Vienna, and, naturally, he dropped into the Grand Opera House. The opera was "Aida," and the musician in the pulpit was William Gericke, assistant chief of orchestra in the grand opera of his imperial majesty, Francis Joseph.

"Just the very man to take Henschel's place," whispered Mr. Higginson to his wife, and Mrs. Higginson agreed with her husband, as all good wives ought to, I suppose. That was the evening of the 20th of October. The next day the gentleman from Boston had a business meeting with the sous chef d'orchestre, and by the 22d the whole affair was satisfactorily arranged.

Gericke is about five feet seven inches in height, weighs about 160 pounds, is well formed and solidly put together, has dark hair and beard, black eyes and rather brownish complexion. He commenced his musical career when in his 15th year, and his progress while in the conservatory, where he was a pupil of Herr Dessoff—to-day manager of the opera house at Frankfort—was so complete that immediately on leaving his class he entered the Imperial Opera at Vienna as one of the three leaders of the orchestra. It is true he is a capital violinist, but he has not played one for many years, preferring the piano and organ, which last mentioned instrument was played frequently in the leading Vienna churches. Above all things, Herr Gericke is an eclectic, for he believes that good music ought to be taken wherever it is found. While he would naturally prefer the German classic school—and which school, he assured me, he intends to push all he can while in Boston—he says it would be unwise to stick to one style in preference to all others. He is fond of the Wagnerian works of later date.

Herr Gericke spoke about the many programs that had been sent him from Boston. Judging from these and from what had been told him on the subject, he was forced to believe that too much is done in your city in the way of concerts, and that it would be better to lessen the number and to shorten the programs. Further, if what he had been told was true, the Boston public had been altogether too greatly saturated with music. Perhaps it would not be advisable to modify these conditions at once, but he thinks that a reform could be carried out gradually. Speaking of the endless programs usual in the United States, as well as in England, Herr Gericke said that after having heard a symphony of Beethoven, the public should not be bothered or troubled—he used both those words—with other music.

Herr Gericke has been gratified to learn that the Boston public enjoys the reputation of being a highly musically educated one. He must have learned this before the arrival of your correspondent, for I was certainly non-committal in my replies to his frequent questions, both as regards fact and theory; but he is a firm believer in the idea that there is "music in the air" in Boston, and thereabouts. "It could not be otherwise," said he "for music is directly connected with poetry, and there have always been grand poets in your city."

I begged him to let me know something as to his future intentions. To this reasonable request he made answer that when he received the list of the musical works performed in Boston, he found that nearly every good composition in existence or known was there, and it would be rather difficult for him to bring out any new ones. He observed, though, that works of minor importance which could be brought out are not so well known in Boston as the great classical compositions. Not knowing exactly the state of things in Boston he could not as yet decide on any positive program except to say that his idea was to keep up classical music as far as possible. Referring next to the strength and value of the orchestra in your city, and believing that the artists over there are good musicians, he declared himself as of the opinion that their number is not sufficient, on account of the vast proportions of Boston Music Hall, which certainly requires a much stronger band than the present one.

"Twelve first violins, twelve second violins, and so on, cannot produce the effect which I wish to obtain. I want at least sixteen first, sixteen second, ten altos, eight violoncellos, eight contraltos, these numbers being a minimum. Here at the Viennese Gesellschafts concert, also at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society, I have eighteen first violins, eighteen second, twelve altos, etc., and, as the room is much smaller than the one in Boston, I am sure no great effect can be attained unless the orchestra is increased proportionally to the size of the hall. If that very desirable reform cannot be carried out the first year, I hope to be able to do it the second season."

"Are you going to take any musicians over with you?" I asked.

"Not one," was his reply. "At first I desired to do so, in order that those who went with me, being used to my methods, might serve as instructors for the others, so to speak. But not very long ago I received a letter from Mrs. Higginson, telling me not to bring any musicians with me. She said Mr. Higginson was perfectly willing I should increase the orchestra whenever it became practicable, but that it was not advisable to engage any soloists in Vienna."

"Did Mrs. Higginson give you any other orders or instructions?"

"None. She wrote me only once and on the subject just mentioned; I believe that her reason for not wishing to have me take over any musicians was on account of her fear of some sort of a union which exists in America, a protective society, so I am told, for the home article."

"How about Wagner. Will you make any special effort to present his works in Boston?" I asked.

"It is possible, but not probable. If there were, say, three good soloists and a good choir, I might play fragments of 'Parsifal,' the scene between Parsifal and the flower girls. I could also play the prelude of 'Tristan' and some other portions of Wagner's works, but I should certainly be very cautious in my choice." Speaking about his plans, he said that he would spare no efforts to bring out great and important oratorios where big masses of well trained instrumentalists and singers could perform new works or works little known, as yet, by the public at large.

"I should be most happy to perform Berlioz's Requiem, which was given with a stupendous effect in this city on Easter Tuesday of last year, and again on Easter Tuesday of this year, both times by myself. This capital work, originally written for one principal and four accessory orchestras, was performed here by one hundred and twenty musicians and three hundred male and female singers. I would like to bring out this requiem, but as the work would require sixteen trumpets, sixteen trombones, twelve horns, twelve clarionets, and other instruments in proportion, I am afraid that the task cannot be easily carried out, and that it will take a good while to see my idea realized."

His engagement with Mr. Higginson is for five years, and he receives, so he told me, a salary of $7500 annually. He agrees to conduct during the season one concert every Saturday in Boston, and on other days in other places near your city. He has, however, a right to employ himself in teaching, but he will not take in pupils for some time to come. His principal and permanent work will be the reorganization of the symphony concerts; but if, later on, some offer were made him to start a choral society or to increase the sphere of his musical dominion in a way agreeable to the Boston public and profitable to Mr. Higginson, he will spare no efforts to accomplish this task. He will leave Vienna at the end of August and will cross the ocean in September.

One of the best known musical critics of Vienna, at my request, gave me his personal opinion of Herr Gericke as a director:

"He conducts his orchestra" said my friend, "in the free German style initiated by Richard Wagner, and he has greatly distinguished himself by the cool, collected and intelligent manner in which he handles his orchestra. He is very industrious, and works with the musicians so much and often that the performance invariably comes off blameless. He is an excellent conductor, not only for grand opera, but for sacred music, and here in Vienna his performances of the important works of Bach, Mozart and Beethoven have long been famous with those of us who understand and appreciate good music."

"MR. W. GERICKS," says the London Musical World, "after having been for ten years one of the conductors at the Imperial Opera House, Vienna, will resign his post on the 1st of May, 1884, and go to Boston (United States), where he has accepted a long engagement to conduct the Grand Orchestral Concerts. He is said to have taken this step in consequence of not having felt comfortable at the Opera House for some time past." So it has all been arranged comfortably for us, after the manner of those who do such things, and yet, we feel inclined to say with Mark Twain, when he was told that Columbus had discovered America, "Why we have just come from there, and we never heard anything about it."

It is rumored that H. L. Higginson is very much disgusted with Conductor Gericke's recent interview with Heine of the Boston Herald. It is also said that the engagement has been canceled, as Gericke "is no gentleman," so Mr. H. is reported to have said. Now it wouldn't be characteristic to have an ungentlemanly conductor for Mr. Henschel's successor, would it?—Boston Home Journal.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor, Will give a series of twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday evenings, from October 18 to March 28, 1885, inclusive, and of twenty-four public rehearsals on consecutive Friday afternoons from Oct. 17 to March 27, 1885, inclusive.

Tickets for the series of concerts, $12 and $7.50, and for the series of rehearsals $10 and $7.50, according to location. The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 22, at 10 o'clock A. M., and the $12 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Thursday, Sept. 25, at 10 o'clock A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold at one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Seats will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The rehearsal seats not sold at auction, together with the $7.50 seats, will be put on sale at the Box Office on and after Tuesday, Sept. 23, at 8 o'clock A. M.; and the concert seats not sold at auction, together with the $7.50 seats, will be put on sale at the Box Office on and after Friday, Sept. 26, at 8 o'clock A. M., both at the regular subscription prices.

Reception to Herr Gericke.

An agreeable social event of the opening winter season was the informal reception given last night by the Anonymous Club of this city to Herr Gericke, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Creighton House. Besides the members of the club there were present as invited guests Lewis C. Elson, Louis Maas, W. H. Sherwood, Dana Estes, Otto Grundman, Rev. E. P. Guild, Geo. H. Sanderson and other gentlemen well known in musical and literary circles. After the reception in the parlors of the hotel the company adjourned to the dining hall, where F. H. Allen, the President of the club, presided at the banquet tables. In the latter part of the evening vocal and instrumental selections were rendered by the musical members of the gathering, so that the pleasure of the reception was doubled for both hosts and guests.

The situation in regard to local musical interests is a curious one, and even those best acquainted with what may be called the undercurrent of this class of amusement enterprises are at a loss as to what may be the outcome of the present state of affairs. The spirit of demoralization appears to have been busily engaged in this department of the city's interests during the last few months, and the truth of the old saying "there's many a slip," etc., has been frequently illustrated behind the scenes which hide from the public the preliminaries of a season's entertainments. Much speculation has been indulged in concerning the course of the new director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, and the most absurd rumors regarding him have gained more or less credence. Whatever course Herr Gericke may take in planning out his first season's work in America, it can be accepted as a fact that this action will not be taken until after his arrival in this country, and a full consultation with those best acquainted with the demands of local audiences. The future of the Bijou Theatre is also a fruitful cause for prophecy, and those who have enjoyed so much from the enterprise shown in its management since its opening are keenly sensitive to the changes incidental to a new direction of its affairs. The late Manager Tyler's plans were well advanced for the coming season at the time of his death, and the carrying out of his ideas would without doubt have resulted in another year of prosperity for this pleasant amusement resort. It is more than possible that the coming season's attractions at the Bijou will be in the same line as that planned by the late manager, but at the present time any definite statement as to the policy of the house is impossible. The managers of local entertainment courses are making good progress in engaging their attractions, but their openings will be delayed until the middle or last of October, on account of the anticipated political excitement of the approaching election. The operatic outlook indicates that at the present time Dr. Damrosch has the lead in the Damrosch-Thomas musical race which has been so well contested in New York for many years. While Theodore Thomas will probably content himself mainly with his local concert work in New York city, the indications now are that his opponent will be at the head of a German operatic organization at the New York Metropolitan Opera House. Manager Mapleson's silence indicates, to those who know him best, that he will again come to the front in operatic matters in this country, and it is entirely safe to anticipate some enjoyable performances in this city under his direction during the next six months.

THE CONCERT WILL CLOSE AT 9.45. THOSE OBLIGED TO LEAVE BEFORE THE DURING LAST INTERMISSION—AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

your city, and believing that the artists over there are good musicians, he declared himself as of the opinion that their number is not sufficient, on account of the vast proportions of Boston Music Hall, which certainly requires a much stronger band than the present one.

"Twelve first violins, twelve second violins, and so on, cannot produce the effect which I wish to obtain. I want at least sixteen first, sixteen second, ten altos, eight violoncellos, eight contraltos, these numbers being a minimum. Here at the Viennese Gesellschafts concert, also at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society, I have eighteen first violins, eighteen second, twelve altos, etc., and, as the room is much smaller than the one in Boston, I am sure no great effect can be attained unless the orchestra is increased proportionally to the size of the hall. If that very desirable reform cannot be carried out the first year, I hope to be able to do it the second season."

"Are you going to take any musicians over with you?" I asked.

"Not one," was his reply. "At first I desired to do so, in order that those who went with me, being used to my methods, might serve as instructors for the others, so to speak. But not very long ago I received a letter from Mrs. Higginson, telling me not to bring any musicians with me. She said Mr. Higginson was perfectly willing I should increase the orchestra whenever it became practicable, but that it was not advisable to engage any soloists in Vienna."

"Did Mrs. Higginson give you any other orders or instructions?"

"None. She wrote me only once and on the subject just mentioned; I believe that her reason for not wishing to have me take over any musicians was on account of her fear of some sort of a union which exists in America, a protective society, so I am told, for the home article."

"How about Wagner. Will you make any special effort to present his works in Boston?" I asked.

"It is possible, but not probable. If there were, say, three good soloists and a good choir, I might play fragments of 'Parsifal,' the scene between Parsifal and the flower girls. I could also play the prelude of 'Tristan' and some other portions of Wagner's works, but I should certainly be very cautious in my choice." Speaking about his plans, he said that he would spare no efforts to bring out great and important oratorios where big masses of well trained instrumentalists and singers could perform new works or works little known, as yet, by the public at large.

"I should be most happy to perform Berlioz's Requiem, which was given with a stupendous effect in this city on Easter Tuesday of last year, and again on Easter Tuesday of this year, both times by myself. This capital work, originally written for one principal and four accessory orchestras, was performed here by one hundred and twenty musicians and three hundred male and female singers. I would like to bring out this requiem, but as the work would require sixteen trumpets, sixteen trombones, twelve horns, twelve clarionets, and other instruments in proportion, I am afraid that the task cannot be easily carried out, and that it will take a good while to see my idea realized."

His engagement with Mr. Higginson is for five years, and he receives, so he told me, a salary of $7500 annually. He agrees to conduct during the season one concert every Saturday in Boston, and on other days in other places near your city. He has, however, a right to employ himself in teaching, but he will not take in pupils for some time to come. His principal and permanent work will be the reorganization of the symphony concerts; but if, later on, some offer were made him to start a choral society or to increase the sphere of his musical dominion in a way agreeable to the Boston public and profitable to Mr. Higginson, he will spare no efforts to accomplish this task. He will leave Vienna at the end of August and will cross the ocean in September.

One of the best known musical critics of Vienna, at my request, gave me his personal opinion of Herr Gericke as a director:

"He conducts his orchestra" said my friend, "in the free German style initiated by Richard Wagner, and he has greatly distinguished himself by the cool, collected and intelligent manner in which he handles his orchestra. He is very industrious, and works with the musicians so much and often that the performance invariably comes off blameless. He is an excellent conductor, not only for grand opera, but for sacred music, and here in Vienna his performances of the important works of Bach, Mozart and Beethoven have long been famous with those of us who understand and appreciate good music."

"MR. W. GERICKS," says the London Musical World, "after having been for ten years one of the conductors at the Imperial Opera House, Vienna, will resign his post on the 1st of May, 1884, and go to Boston (United States), where he has accepted a long engagement to conduct the Grand Orchestral Concerts. He is said to have taken this step in consequence of not having felt comfortable at the Opera House for some time past." So it has all been arranged comfortably for us, after the manner of those who do such things, and yet, we feel inclined to say with Mark Twain, when he was told that Columbus had discovered America, "Why we have just come from there, and we never heard anything about it."

It is rumored that H. L. Higginson is very much disgusted with Conductor Gericke's recent interview with Heine of the Boston Herald. It is also said that the engagement has been canceled, as Gericke "is no gentleman," so Mr. H. is reported to have said. Now it wouldn't be characteristic to have an ungentlemanly conductor for Mr. Henschel's successor, would it?—Boston Home Journal.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

Will give a series of twenty-four concerts on consecutive Saturday evenings, from October 18 to March 28, 1885, inclusive, and of twenty-four public rehearsals on consecutive Friday afternoons from Oct. 17 to March 27, 1885, inclusive.

Tickets for the series of concerts, $12 and $7.50, and for the series of rehearsals $10 and $7.50, according to location. The $10 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 22, at 10 o'clock A. M., and the $12 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Thursday, Sept. 25, at 10 o'clock A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold at one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Seats will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. The rehearsal seats not sold at auction, together with the $7.50 seats, will be put on sale at the Box Office on and after Tuesday, Sept. 23, at 8 o'clock A. M.; and the concert seats not sold at auction, together with the $7.50 seats, will be put on sale at the Box Office on and after Friday, Sept. 26, at 8 o'clock A. M., both at the regular subscription prices.

Reception to Herr Gericke.

An agreeable social event of the opening winter season was the informal reception given last night by the Anonymous Club of this city to Herr Gericke, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Creighton House. Besides the members of the club there were present as invited guests Lewis C. Elson, Louis Maas, W. H. Sherwood, Dana Estes, Otto Grundman, Rev. E. P. Guild, Geo. H. Sanderson and other gentlemen well known in musical and literary circles. After the reception in the parlors of the hotel the company adjourned to the dining hall, where F. H. Allen, the President of the club, presided at the banquet tables. In the latter part of the evening vocal and instrumental selections were rendered by the musical members of the gathering, so that the pleasure of the reception was doubled for both hosts and guests.

The situation in regard to local musical interests is a curious one, and even those best acquainted with what may be called the undercurrent of this class of amusement enterprises are at a loss as to what may be the outcome of the present state of affairs. The spirit of demoralization appears to have been busily engaged in this department of the city's interests during the last few months, and the truth of the old saying "there's many a slip," etc., has been frequently illustrated behind the scenes which hide from the public the preliminaries of a season's entertainments. Much speculation has been indulged in concerning the course of the new director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, and the most absurd rumors regarding him have gained more or less credence. Whatever course Herr Gericke may take in planning out his first season's work in America, it can be accepted as a fact that this action will not be taken until after his arrival in this country, and a full consultation with those best acquainted with the demands of local audiences. The future of the Bijou Theatre is also a fruitful cause for prophecy, and those who have enjoyed so much from the enterprise shown in its management since its opening are keenly sensitive to the changes incidental to a new direction of its affairs. The late Manager Tyler's plans were well advanced for the coming season at the time of his death, and the carrying out of his ideas would without doubt have resulted in another year of prosperity for this pleasant amusement resort. It is more than possible that the coming season's attractions at the Bijou will be in the same line as that planned by the late manager, but at the present time any definite statement as to the policy of the house is impossible. The managers of local entertainment courses are making good progress in engaging their attractions, but their openings will be delayed until the middle or last of October, on account of the anticipated political excitement of the approaching election. The operatic outlook indicates that at the present time Dr. Damrosch has the lead in the Damrosch-Thomas musical race which has been so well contested in New York for many years. While Theodore Thomas will probably content himself mainly with his local concert work in New York city, the indications now are that his opponent will be at the head of a German operatic organization at the New York Metropolitan Opera House. Manager Mapleson's silence indicates, to those who know him best, that he will again come to the front in operatic matters in this country, and it is entirely safe to anticipate some enjoyable performances in this city under his direction during the next six months.

THE CONCERT WILL CLOSE AT 9.45. THOSE OBLIGED TO LEAVE BEFORE THE DURING LAST INTERMISSION—AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

HERR GERICKE—THE SYMPHONY CON- CERTS. Sept. 24, 84

Inquiries made by the public at Music Hall during the last week have indicated a very general interest in the coming series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, under Herr Wilhelm Gericke's direction, and an active competition is promised at the ticket sales of the coming week. Tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock the auction sale of season tickets for the Friday afternoon rehearsals will be begun. The seats have been classified as follows: All the main floor, the first four rows under the balcony, the first five rows of the first balcony, facing the stage, and the first two rows of the first balcony, side, at $10; the far back rows under the first balcony, the two back rows of the first balcony, facing the stage, and the back row of the first balcony, side, at $7.50. The upper balcony will be open to all comers, the seats not being sold by the season. For the concerts, all the main floor, the first two rows under the first balcony, the first three rows of the first balcony, facing the stage, and the first two rows of the first balcony, side, will be sold at $12, all the balance of the hall at $7.50. Further particulars of the sale are given elsewhere.

Herr Gericke's Plans.

Herr Wilhelm von Gericke arrived in this city on Friday morning, after a stay of about a week in the city of New York. The distinguished musician, who will henceforth be the purveyor of orchestral harmony for music-loving Boston, was found at the pleasant domicile of a friend by a HERALD representative. He greeted the newspaper man with a cordial grasp of the hand and a kindly manner, which established an acquaintance at once, and in a twinkling a conversation in German (Herr von Gericke's English being as yet somewhat limited) was in full flow. He spoke with enthusiasm of the musical societies of his beloved Vienna. "The Court orchestra (Hofkapelle) under the direction of Herr Helmerger," said Herr von Gericke, "is an organization of rare excellence, and this excellence is in a great measure due to its conductor, who is not only an enthusiast himself, but has also the faculty of inspiring those who obey his baton with the same ardor that animates him. Hence their performances are masterpieces of verve, abandon and finish. A distinguished musician from another German city quaintly and forcibly expressed himself to Helmerger: 'Before your fiddling one must bend one's knees.'"

During the delivery of these generous words of appreciation of a brother musician, the reporter had an opportunity to observe the general appearance and bearing of the genial visitor to our shores. Herr von Gericke is a gentleman of medium height, neither stout nor meagre, but of a comfortable fulness. His eyes are black and very expressive. A full black beard and abundant dark hair frame a face to which each varying mood lends its expression, and yet without disturbing that feeling of repose which marks the man of the world. Simply attired, and contentedly smoking a cigar, his ease of manner was thoroughly mondan; a quiet elegance seems to pervade him, and makes the kindly courtesy he exhibits appear the most natural thing in the world. His voice is low, clear and full, and a very slight occasional touch of the Vienna patois lends piquancy to his conversation.

"You have doubtless seen Frau Materna since she returned from America?" queried the HERALD man.

"Only once, after my return from Styria, where I had been spending part of the summer; I was but a short time in Vienna after that, and before leaving for America. By the way, I was somewhat surprised to hear that she is to sing in opera here during the winter. To do that she must have had a new contract with the Opera House authorities."

"Have you as yet decided what the general complexion of your programme will be?"

The Programme Question.

"That is a somewhat difficult question to answer. While I was still in Europe, I had some of your symphony programmes sent over to me, and was surprised to find that almost all the works of note that had been performed in the Vienna concerts, had also been given here. It is very difficult to find novelties; the good older works have so often had a hearing, and there are so few new works that are available; not that many are not written, but because only a small portion of them is up to the standard. It is, however, sometimes possible to present works that are practically novelties, because, though good in quality, they have, for some reason or other not been presented for a long time."

"What works of interest, either on account of their novelty or because they are revivals, do you intend to present?"

"At present I can name only two. They are Brahms' new 'Symphony No. 3' and one by Schubert, entitled 'Grosse Symphonie.' Of the latter, I may say that I have exhumed it from the archives. It has not been performed in Vienna for some thirty years. Its title is somewhat misleading, for it is not a work of the most heroic proportions."

"What is your idea of the composition of programmes?"

"I believe that, above all, they should be harmonious in their entirety—that is, the different numbers should be so selected that one should not be detrimental to the other. For that reason, I do not think it judicious to include many numbers of a heavy character in one evening. The appetite of the auditors must be whetted, and not cloyed. The ideal programme, as I understand it, is a continual crescendo. First comes some pleasing number, such as a Cherubini or Weber overture, then other works of the masters, interspersed with violin or piano concertos, or something of that sort, and all finally leading up to the grand symphony as a finale. I intend to have all of Beethoven's nine symphonies performed in this manner during the winter. Of course there are many by Haydn and Mozart of such a lovely and pleasing character that they appeal to the ear even of him who is not specially versed in classic harmonies, and they also will find their appropriate place."

"What do you think of lightening the character of the usual symphony concert, in order to bring it within the comprehension of the popular ear?"

"I can tell you a little story on that point. Some years ago the director of a concert series in Vienna was asked to resign, and I was installed in his place with the admonition to compose my programmes of the less exacting works. I did so, and after a while a demand came from the audience itself for works of a greater calibre. These were produced in proper proportion, and with the most favorable results, so that I never heard any more about suppressing them afterward."

"Do you believe in introducing operatic music into concert music?"

"No, not as a rule. Of course, there are pieces to be found in operas, such as the grand march in Wagner's 'Tannhauser,' that are so complete in themselves, so well rounded, that they make admirable concert numbers, even when detached from their proper connection. But the function of the orchestra in opera is, after all, a subordinate one; it is simply an accompanist, a part of an integral whole. Wagner himself was inimical to the idea of detaching orchestral numbers from music dramas, and only did so when impelled by the necessity of raising funds for his Baireuth project."

Not only is the voice necessary for complete enjoyment in such cases, but also the scenic dressings. I have no doubt that if the Bostonians that attended the Wagner festival this spring could hear the music with its proper scenic and dramatic complements, much that was blind then would appear as a revelation to them. Another objection to detached morceaux from opera is that the music preceding them should be heard to bring the auditor into the proper receptive mood. This cannot be, when they are, as it were, abruptly flung at him."

"Have you seen anything of our city as yet?"

"I visited your Music Hall today and am quite well pleased with the building. As far as I can judge now, the acoustics must be very good there. I am no lover of gigantic auditoriums. Fine music is lost in them, the delicacies disappear. Tell me, have you many choral and singing societies here?"

After the reporter had enumerated the Handel and Haydn, the Boyston, Apollo, Arlington and various other clubs in existence here, Herr von Gericke said:

"I am surprised and pleased at the great number of such societies in Boston, for it proves that the people of this city must take a real and enduring interest in good music."

"I think you will find them appreciative listeners. Good night, Herr von Gericke."

"Good night, sir."

The members of the Vocal Association of Vienna, connected with the Society of the Friends of Music, recently gave a farewell concert in honor of Herr Gericke, who has resigned the conductorship of the association to come to Boston. Previous to entering the large concert room, Herr Gericke was presented by Baron Hoffman, president of the Society of the Friends of Music, with a written address in the name of that body. Then in the concert room, after various pieces sung by Mme. Papier, Dr. von Ranidl, having made a speech, in which he eulogized very highly the talents and services of Herr Gericke, handed the latter, in the name of the association, a valuable watch, and also an address signed by all the members.

Herr Gericke is a short and well-built man, with black beard and hair, of pleasing address, and cannot help but becoming popular with our musical public, from the fact that he is a musician to the backbone, and with experience in the position he is to occupy, the latter qualification being that which his predecessor lacked when he came to Boston. He will reside at 5 Mt. Vernon Place.

The familiar scenes attending the popular Symphony rehearsals have been renewed with the gently excited throng, the rushing to and fro along the corridors, the anxious searching for seats. Although the removal of the great organ has given room for about two hundred more seats at the front of the hall the demand for seats equals and even exceeds the supply, the last two seats in the hall being offered at double the regular price the day before the first rehearsal. Popular as the concerts may be, the rehearsals are always as much in demand, since they afford suburban residents a needed and convenient opportunity to enjoy good music. As in past seasons, the audience is composed chiefly of ladies, who make a fluttering, sympathetic assembly, and who seem to enjoy the sociable preludes and interludes almost as well as the performance itself.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The announcement of the plans for the sale of the tickets for the series of public rehearsals and concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, during the coming season, will be read with interest by the musical public. The ability of the director chosen to succeed Mr. Henschel is beyond all question, his standing in Vienna being a guarantee of his character as a musician. As alternate with Hans Richter in the direction at the Grand Opera of that city, he has gained the approval of the most critical public of the continent, and, during his 20 years of experience in the conductor's chair of the leading orchestral and vocal societies of Europe, he has given ample proof of his genius and talent. His birth in the native town of Mme. Materna gives a peculiar force to her hearty commendation of his qualities as a musician, and the general regret that has been expressed in Vienna at his departure is another evidence of his standing in the musical circles of the old world. The membership of the orchestra will be of the same numerical strength as last season. Mr. Bernhard Listeman retains his position as leader and solo violinist, Mr. Henry Heindl leads the violas, Mr. Fritz Giese the cellos, Mr. Goldstein the basses, Mr. Martin Heindl the flutes, Mr. Max Eller (a newcomer) the oboes, Mr. Strasser the clarinets, Mr. Beumhardt the bassoons, Mr. Schormann the horns, Mr. Bagley the trumpets, Mr. Stewart the trombones, and Mr. Freygang is the harpist. It will be noted that a slight change has been made in the ticket charges for the coming season. The rates fixed for the rehearsal tickets are $10 for the best and $7.50 for the less desirable seats for the 24 public rehearsals, the terms "best" and "less desirable" being used "without prejudice." For the 24 concerts the tickets will be sold at $12 and $7.50 for the two classes of seats. Both the $10 rehearsal tickets and the $12 concert tickets will be offered at auction, this plan of sale having given more general satisfaction last year than any previously followed. The rehearsal tickets will be sold on Monday, the 22d inst., and the concert tickets on Thursday, the 25th inst., both sales taking place at Music Hall. The usual series of concerts will be given by the orchestra in the various New England cities, and these entertainments will form leading features of the courses already arranged in Lynn, Worcester and Lowell.

The Symphony Concerts.

The box office at Music Hall was opened at eight o'clock yesterday morning for the sale of seats for the symphony concerts. All day long there was a good steady demand, with no particular rush or excitement. The rehearsal sales were unusually good, and today will doubtless see all these seats disposed of. The demand was far better than last year, and the financial success of the season is assured. One of the evening papers stated that some $3000 were realized by the forenoon's sales, but information received from the very best of sources sets a still higher figure than this.

Is it not about time that some of Professor Paine's orchestral works should be given at the symphony concerts? When even the lesser European lights are seen on the programmes, it seems that American leaders in music might also be heard.

HERR GERICKE—THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS. Sept. 21, 84

Inquiries made by the public at Music Hall during the last week have indicated a very general interest in the coming series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, under Herr Wilhelm Gericke's direction, and an active competition is promised at the ticket sales of the coming week. Tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock the auction sale of season tickets for the Friday afternoon rehearsals will be begun. The seats have been classified as follows: All the main floor, the first four rows under the balcony, the first five rows of the first balcony, facing the stage, and the first two rows of the first balcony, side, at $10; the far back rows under the first balcony, the two back rows of the first balcony, facing the stage, and the back row of the first balcony, side, at $7.50. The upper balcony will be open to all comers, the seats not being sold by the season. For the concerts, all the main floor, the first two rows under the first balcony, the first three rows of the first balcony, facing the stage, and the first two rows of the first balcony, side, will be sold at $12, all the balance of the hall at $7.50. Further particulars of the sale are given elsewhere.

Herr Gericke's Plans.

Herr Wilhelm von Gericke arrived in this city on Friday morning, after a stay of about a week in the city of New York. The distinguished musician, who will henceforth be the purveyor of orchestral harmony for music-loving Boston, was found at the pleasant domicile of a friend by a HERALD representative. He greeted the newspaper man with a cordial grasp of the hand and a kindly manner, which established an acquaintance at once, and in a twinkling a conversation in German (Herr von Gericke's English being as yet somewhat limited) was in full flow. He spoke with enthusiasm of the musical societies of his beloved Vienna. "The Court orchestra (Hofkapelle) under the direction of Herr Helmerger," said Herr von Gericke, "is an organization of rare excellence, and this excellence is in a great measure due to its conductor, who is not only an enthusiast himself, but has also the faculty of inspiring those who obey his baton with the same ardor that animates him. Hence their performances are masterpieces of verve, abandon and finish. A distinguished musician from another German city quaintly and forcibly expressed himself to Helmerger: 'Before your fiddling one must bend one's knees.'"

During the delivery of these generous words of appreciation of a brother musician, the reporter had an opportunity to observe the general appearance and bearing of the genial visitor to our shores. Herr von Gericke is a gentleman of medium height, neither stout nor meagre, but of a comfortable fulness. His eyes are black and very expressive. A full black beard and abundant dark hair frame a face to which each varying mood lends its expression, and yet without disturbing that feeling of repose which marks the man of the world. Simply attired, and contentedly smoking a cigar, his ease of manner was thoroughly mondan; a quiet elegance seems to pervade him, and makes the kindly courtesy he exhibits appear the most natural thing in the world. His voice is low, clear and full, and a very slight occasional touch of the Vienna patois lends piquancy to his conversation.

"You have doubtless seen Frau Materna since she returned from America?" queried the HERALD man.

"Only once, after my return from Styria, where I had been spending part of the summer; I was but a short time in Vienna after that, and before leaving for America. By the way, I was somewhat surprised to hear that she is to sing in opera here during the winter. To do that she must have had a new contract with the Opera House authorities."

"Have you as yet decided what the general complexion of your programme will be?"

The Programme Question.

"That is a somewhat difficult question to answer. While I was still in Europe, I had some of your symphony programmes sent over to me, and was surprised to find that almost all the works of note that had been performed in the Vienna concerts, had also been given here. It is very difficult to find novelties; the good older works have so often had a hearing, and there are so few new works that are available; not that many are not written, but because only a small portion of them is up to the standard. It is, however, sometimes possible to present works that are practically novelties, because, though good in quality, they have, for some reason or other not been presented for a long time."

"What works of interest, either on account of their novelty or because they are revivals, do you intend to present?"

"At present I can name only two. They are Brahms' new 'Symphony No. 3' and one by Schubert, entitled 'Grosse Symphonie.' Of the latter, I may say that I have exhumed it from the archives. It has not been performed in Vienna for some thirty years. Its title is somewhat misleading, for it is not a work of the most heroic proportions."

"What is your idea of the composition of programmes?"

"I believe that, above all, they should be harmonious in their entirety—that is, the different numbers should be so selected that one should not be detrimental to the other. For that reason, I do not think it judicious to include many numbers of a heavy character in one evening. The appetite of the auditors must be whetted, and not cloyed. The ideal programme, as I understand it, is a continual crescendo. First comes some pleasing number, such as a Cherubini or Weber overture, then other works of the masters, interspersed with violin or piano concertos, or something of that sort, and all finally leading up to the grand symphony as a finale. I intend to have all of Beethoven's nine symphonies performed in this manner during the winter. Of course there are many by Haydn and Mozart of such a lovely and pleasing character that they appeal to the ear even of him who is not specially versed in classic harmonies, and they also will find their appropriate place."

"What do you think of lightening the character of the usual symphony concert, in order to bring it within the comprehension of the popular ear?"

"I can tell you a little story on that point. Some years ago the director of a concert series in Vienna was asked to resign, and I was installed in his place with the admonition to compose my programmes of the less exacting works. I did so, and after a while a demand came from the audience itself for works of a greater calibre. These were produced in proper proportion, and with the most favorable results, so that I never heard any more about suppressing them afterward."

"Do you believe in introducing operatic music into concert music?"

"No, not as a rule. Of course, there are pieces to be found in operas, such as the grand march in Wagner's 'Tannhauser,' that are so complete in themselves, so well rounded, that they make admirable concert numbers, even when detached from their proper connection. But the function of the orchestra in opera is, after all, a subordinate one; it is simply an accompanist, a part of an integral whole. Wagner himself was inimical to the idea of detaching orchestral numbers from music dramas, and only did so when impelled by the necessity of raising funds for his Baireuth project.

Not only is the voice necessary for complete enjoyment in such cases, but also the scenic dressing. I have no doubt that if the Bostonians that attended the Wagner festival this spring could hear the music with its proper scenic and dramatic complements, much that was blind then would appear as a revelation to them. Another objection to detached morceaux from opera is that the music preceding them should be heard to bring the auditor into the proper receptive mood. This cannot be, when they are, as it were, abruptly flung at him."

"Have you seen anything of our city as yet?"

"I visited your Music Hall today and am quite well pleased with the building. As far as I can judge now, the acoustics must be very good there. I am no lover of gigantic auditoriums. Fine music is lost in them, the delicacies disappear. Tell me, have you many choral and singing societies here?"

After the reporter had enumerated the Handel and Haydn, the Boyston, Apollo, Arlington and various other clubs in existence here, Herr von Gericke said:

"I am surprised and pleased at the great number of such societies in Boston, for it proves that the people of this city must take a real and enduring interest in good music."

"I think you will find them appreciative listeners. Good night, Herr von Gericke."

"Good night, sir."

The members of the Vocal Association of Vienna, connected with the Society of the Friends of Music, recently gave a farewell concert in honor of Herr Gericke, who has resigned the conductorship of the association to come to Boston. Previous to entering the large concert room, Herr Gericke was presented by Baron Hoffman, president of the Society of the Friends of Music, with a written address in the name of that body. Then in the concert room, after various pieces sung by Mme. Papier, Dr. von Ranidl, having made a speech, in which he eulogized very highly the talents and services of Herr Gericke, handed the latter, in the name of the association, a valuable watch, and also an address signed by all the members.

Herr Gericke is a short and well-built man, with black beard and hair, of pleasing address, and cannot help but becoming popular with our musical public, from the fact that he is a musician to the backbone, and with experience in the position he is to occupy, the latter qualification being that which his predecessor lacked when he came to Boston. He will reside at 5 Mt. Vernon Place.

—The familiar scenes attending the popular Symphony rehearsals have been renewed with the gently excited throng, the rushing to and fro along the corridors, the anxious searching for seats. Although the removal of the great organ has given room for about two hundred more seats at the front of the hall the demand for seats equals and even exceeds the supply, the last two seats in the hall being offered at double the regular price the day before the first rehearsal. Popular as the concerts may be, the rehearsals are always as much in demand, since they afford suburban residents a needed and convenient opportunity to enjoy good music. As in past seasons, the audience is composed chiefly of ladies, who make a fluttering, sympathetic assembly, and who seem to enjoy the sociable preludes and interludes almost as well as the performance itself.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The announcement of the plans for the sale of the tickets for the series of public rehearsals and concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, during the coming season, will be read with interest by the musical public. The ability of the director chosen to succeed Mr. Henschel is beyond all question, his standing in Vienna being a guarantee of his character as a musician. As alternate with Hans Richter in the direction at the Grand Opera of that city, he has gained the approval of the most critical public of the continent, and, during his 20 years of experience in the conductor's chair of the leading orchestral and vocal societies of Europe, he has given ample proof of his genius and talent. His birth in the native town of Mme. Materna gives a peculiar force to her hearty commendation of his qualities as a musician, and the general regret that has been expressed in Vienna at his departure is another evidence of his standing in the musical circles of the old world. The membership of the orchestra will be of the same numerical strength as last season. Mr. Bernhard Listeman retains his position as leader and solo violinist, Mr. Henry Heindl leads the violas, Mr. Fritz Giese the cellos, Mr. Goldstein the basses, Mr. Martin Heindl the flutes, Mr. Max Eller (a newcomer) the oboes, Mr. Strasser the clarinets, Mr. Bernhardt the bassoons, Mr. Schormann the horns, Mr. Bagley the trumpets, Mr. Stewart the trombones, and Mr. Freygang is the harpist. It will be noted that a slight change has been made in the ticket charges for the coming season. The rates fixed for the rehearsal tickets are $10 for the best and $7.50 for the less desirable seats for the 24 public rehearsals, the terms "best" and "less desirable" being used "without prejudice." For the 24 concerts the tickets will be sold at $12 and $7.50 for the two classes of seats. Both the $10 rehearsal tickets and the $12 concert tickets will be offered at auction, this plan of sale having given more general satisfaction last year than any previously followed. The rehearsal tickets will be sold on Monday, the 22d inst., and the concert tickets on Thursday, the 25th inst., both sales taking place at Music Hall. The usual series of concerts will be given by the orchestra in the various New England cities, and these entertainments will form leading features of the courses already arranged in Lynn, Worcester and Lowell.

The Symphony Concerts.

The box office at Music Hall was opened at eight o'clock yesterday morning for the sale of seats for the symphony concerts. All day long there was a good steady demand, with no particular rush or excitement. The rehearsal sales were unusually good, and today will doubtless see all these seats disposed of. The demand was far better than last year, and the financial success of the season is assured. One of the evening papers stated that some $3000 were realized by the forenoon's sales, but information received from the very best of sources sets a still higher figure than this.

Is it not about time that some of Professor Paine's orchestral works should be given at the symphony concerts? When even the lesser European lights are seen on the programme, it seems that American leaders in music might also be heard.

Auction Sale of Concert Tickets.

There were probably about one hundred and fifty ladies and gentlemen present at the auction sale of seats for the Symphony concerts, which took place this forenoon in the Music Hall. The sale was conducted under the same rules as were observed at the sale of tickets for the rehearsals on Monday—the premium offered being for each seat taken, and a single purchase being limited to four seats. The fixed price for tickets is $12. At first some of the bids were as low as fifty cents, which price was proffered for end seats in the first rows on the floor. After the auctioneer had disposed of several rows, the bids were largely increased, $5 being a common price. In sections L, M, N and O, $8.50 and $9 were common bids. Some seats sold as high as $16. Speculators were out in force, and they had many chances for obtaining desirable chairs at prices much below the ruling rates, as the following diagram will help explain:

10 | 9 | 8 | | 7 | 6 | 5 |

Quite frequently the auctioneer would state that seats 6 and 7 (or some other end seats) were reserved, and would then ask for a bid on No. 5. By paying $4.50 on that seat, one speculator took the three other seats across the aisle, 8, 9 and 10, at the same price; and a moment later several seats in that same row sold for $15.50. Of course it will be easy for dealers to sell the odd seats (like No. 5) which they got by this sharp practice, and on the others which were included in the lot they must realize an immense profit. Probably almost everybody who attended the sale for the purpose of buying for himself was obliged to pay a price much higher than he had planned. The sale occupied several hours.

All of the reserved seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the concert programmes of the Boston Symphony orchestra have been sold, but the upper balcony seats will be open to all buying admission tickets. The reserved seats for the concerts are also practically disposed of, but there are still some few seats to be had.

Hans Richter has been appointed successor to Mr. Gericke, the late director of the concerts of the "Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde," at Vienna, which is considered an important position. Richter will retain at the same time his office of conductor of the Philharmonic concerts at Vienna, as well as his position at the Imperial Opera in the same city.

About 900 seats for the public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season were sold by auction at Music Hall yesterday. The premiums paid ranged from 25 cents to $16 per seat, and the aggregate amount of the premiums paid was not far from $3600—an average of about $4 per seat, or $14 in all for the 24 rehearsals. The sale was admirably conducted by Mr. Jackson of Henshaw & Co. A

The auction sales of seats for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred yesterday. The highest bonus was $16, paid by Mr. Lothrop, for Nos. 18 and 19, in M; they are seats of the thirteenth row from the front, resting upon the left of the centre aisle. The seats which sold best were those in the centre of the hall. The prices paid for these were in J, Nos. 18 to 21, $8; in K, No. 20, $8; in L, Nos. 24 to 27, $10; in M, Nos. 18 to 19, $16; in N, Nos. 12 to 15, $11; in O, Nos. 14 and 20 to 23, $9; in P, Nos. 18 and 19, $8. In these centre rows the lowest prices were for the end seats and ranged from $4 to $5. Adv. Sept. 23, 04

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

SEASON OF 1884-85.

A series of six concerts will be given on THURSDAY EVENINGS, Nov. 8, Dec. 4, Jan. 22, Feb. 12, March 6 and March 26. Sections C and D in the first gallery and section D in the second gallery have been reserved for college officers and invited guests. Tickets for all other seats will be for sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, at 9 o'clock, A. M., Wednesday, Oct. 22. Price for the series of six concerts, $3. Oct 22 Oct 17

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

First Concert, Saturday Eve'g, Oct. 16, at 8.

Overture—(Lenore No. 3), Beethoven; Concerto for Violin in A-minor, Vieuxtemps; Prelude—Andante and Gavotte (first time), John Seb. Bach; Symphony in D-minor (first time, Volkmann).

MR. LEOPOLD LICHTENBERG will be the soloist. First Public Rehearsal Friday afternoon, Oct. 17, at 2.30. Tickets now on sale. WThS Oct 15

The Changes in Music Hall.

Tomorrow afternoon the first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1884-5 will be given in the Music Hall, and aside from the artistic merits of the concert and the interest in the new conductor, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, there will undoubtedly be a strong desire to see what effect the recent changes have made in the hall. Of course the most noticeable change is the removal of the great organ. The absence of this familiar feature is felt at once, and to those who have been frequent visitors at the hall it will probably seem as though the house-cleaning had been completed at so late an hour that there had not been time to get all the furniture back into place. The change in the height of the platform is something that strikes one almost immediately; and this will generally be considered an improvement. It has been lowered a foot and a half, and is now about four feet and a half high. The removal of the organ enlarged the space at the rear of the platform, and this enabled the architect to push the front line back nearly ten feet, thus giving room for about two hundred more seats at the front of the hall. The platform is slightly inclined, and at the front is a sunken trough containing a row of footlights. When these are not to be used, they are concealed by a cover. The arch at the rear of the platform, the place in which a part of the organ formerly stood, is hung with drapery, a "sunburst" filling the top of the arch. This is evidently only a temporary arrangement. In front of the drapery is the Beethoven statue. There is a slight alteration in the stairs leading to the greenroom, a new flight of three or four steps leading directly from the rear of the platform to the door of the greenroom. The new organ will be placed in a room near the second balcony on the easterly side of the hall. A small, curved balcony projects from the arched opening to this room, and at present this is draped with a light yellow material. The new seats in the hall are of the same comfortable design as those placed in the hall a year ago, but the seats at the rear of the hall and in the balconies are the inconvenient benches in use here for so many years.

THE PLAN ADOPTED for the sale of seats for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears to be the fairest, for all concerned, that could be devised. Last year, speculators, by declining to take all the seats that they had bid off, created the impression that the house was all sold, or nearly so. For the coming sales, both of public rehearsal and of season tickets, the rule is established that seats bought must be paid for at once, instead of, as last year, allowing one or two days' grace to call for them at the box office. It is hoped that the control of the seats, secured by speculators, last year, will for the future be prevented, or at least be very largely reduced. An advantage of the auction method is that buyers of tickets are saved the weariness of standing in line for an indefinite time at the box office.

The sale of symphony concert tickets was conducted in the same way as on Monday, and the bidding was begun quite promptly upon the hour named. The prices ran at the greatest variation, from 50 cents to $10, but there were few personal contests to advance the rate to a high average, and the first 300 seats brought an advance of about $4 each. A dozen or more messenger boys were waiting patiently at noontime for the opening of the box office tomorrow morning.

The Musical Herald says: "Punch is at present publishing a set of 'Things which one had better left unsaid.' It recalls an awkward speech made at a Boston dinner party recently, where there were present Mr. Henschel and a celebrated prima donna. The latter (a great friend of Gericke's), when she heard that the Viennese conductor was coming over, burst out, 'Oh, now you will know what symphonic music is!' The thoughts of the retiring conductor cannot be printed in cold type."

MR. LANG'S MUSICAL TALKS.

Chickering Hall was well filled yesterday afternoon by an interested audience, of much the same character as those attending the symphony rehearsals, and the attraction of the occasion was the first of a series of 12 lessons, conversations or talks about the symphony concert programme of the week, by Mr. B. J. Lang. The line of remark taken by Mr. Lang was, rightly, based upon the supposition that his audience were students rather than professionals, for by this plan the speaker instructed even the novice in musical matters while he interested the better informed of his hearers. In addition to a four-hand pianoforte reading of the leading works of the present week's programme, in which Mr. Ernst Perabo gave his valuable assistance, Mr. Lang told many facts relating to the several compositions, which tended to impress their individuality upon the minds of his audience and better prepare them to more thoroughly enjoy the presentation of the works by the orchestra. These lessons or talks will be continued at fortnightly intervals during the season. Herald, Oct 4/04

MUSIC HALL. Its Stage Reconstruction Finally Decided Upon.

At a meeting of the directors of the corporation controlling the Music Hall property, held yesterday, the treasurer, Mr. Charles E. Cotting, was authorized to complete the changes in the arrangement of the large hall made necessary by the removal of the great organ. The case of the instrument projected so far into the hall that an addition of about 10 feet was made to the old platform when the organ was put in, and now it is proposed to set back the stage line to about the place it originally had when the hall was built. This will give a stage about 30 feet deep and clear of all obstructions between the two side balcony fronts, giving ample space for any and all uses to which the hall is likely to be put. The front line of the new stage will not have such a pronounced curve as formerly and it will be built with about the same pitch as is had in the usual theatre stage. This change adds very largely to the value of the hall for all entertainments, as it gives nearly 200 more seats on the floor of the main auditorium, and makes all the balcony seats to the extreme limits of the walls desirable. All questions as to the disposition of the money received by the sale of the "big" organ have been set at rest by the vote passed appropriating the same amount to the purchase and setting up of a new organ of simple construction, for use in oratorio performances. An organ room about 20x10 feet and 40 feet high has been built by adding to the structure next the hall which accommodates the box office on the lower floor and the artists' rooms overhead. The organist's seat will be in a gallery built out from the upper balcony on the left side of the hall as one faces the stage. The two left-hand panels are being cut away down to the balcony line, and the semicircular space above the gaslight line has also been knocked out to give space for the organ front, which will conform to the coloring of the hall in its decoration. The Beethoven statue will probably be retained as the centre ornament of the stage, and the recess formerly filled by the organ works will be boarded up and the stage end of the hall made the same as the rest of the auditorium, so far as it is possible. The space gained by the rebuilding of the stage will be a great aid in the arrangement of the hall for the club concerts, as well as for the season's oratorio performances, as it makes possible a much better seating of the chorus, and this without reducing the seating capacity as much as formerly. It is expected that the hall will be ready for use by Sept. 1.

GERICKE.—Boston is now in raptures over Gericke, who has come from Europe to assume the baton of the Symphony Orchestra. His first concerts have shown that his European reputation was well-founded and he is regarded as a most invaluable acquisition to American music.

...Is the tide turning? The gossip runs that the extra symphony concerts are proposed because of the profits earned on the regular season.

ten.

Auction Sale of Concert Tickets.

There were probably about one hundred and fifty ladies and gentlemen present at the auction sale of seats for the Symphony concerts, which took place this forenoon in the Music Hall. The sale was conducted under the same rules as were observed at the sale of tickets for the rehearsals on Monday—the premium offered being for each seat taken, and a single purchase being limited to four seats. The fixed price for tickets is $12. At first some of the bids were as low as fifty cents, which price was proffered for end seats in the first rows on the floor. After the auctioneer had disposed of several rows, the bids were largely increased, $5 being a common price. In sections L, M, N and O, $8.50 and $9 were common bids. Some seats sold as high as $16. Speculators were out in force, and they had many chances for obtaining desirable chairs at prices much below the ruling rates, as the following diagram will help explain:

10	9	8	7	6	5
----	---	---	---	---	---

Quite frequently the auctioneer would state that seats 6 and 7 (or some other end seats) were reserved, and would then ask for a bid on No. 5. By paying $4.50 on that seat, one speculator took the three other seats across the aisle, 8, 9 and 10, at the same price; and a moment later several seats in that same row sold for $15.50. Of course it will be easy for dealers to sell the odd seats (like No. 5) which they got by this sharp practice, and on the others which were included in the lot they must realize an immense profit. Probably almost everybody who attended the sale for the purpose of buying for himself was obliged to pay a price much higher than he had planned. The sale occupied several hours.

All of the reserved seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the concert programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been sold, but the upper balcony seats will be open to all buying admission tickets. The reserved seats for the concerts are also practically disposed of, but there are still some few seats to be had.

Hans Richter has been appointed successor to Herr Gericke, the late director of the concerts of the "Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde," at Vienna, which is considered an important position. Richter will retain at the same time his office of conductor of the Philharmonic concerts at Vienna, as well as his position at the Imperial Opera in the same city.

About 900 seats for the public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season were sold by auction at Music Hall yesterday. The premiums paid ranged from 25 cents to $16 per seat, and the aggregate amount of the premiums paid was not far from $3600—an average of about $4 per seat, or $14 in all for the 24 rehearsals. The sale was admirably conducted by Mr. Jackson of Henshaw & Co. A

The auction sales of seats for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred yesterday. The highest bonus was $16, paid by Mr. Lothrop, for Nos. 18 and 19, in M; they are seats of the thirteenth row from the front, resting upon the left of the centre aisle. The seats which sold best were those in the centre of the hall. The prices paid for these were in J, Nos. 18 to 21, $8; in K, No. 20, $8; in L, Nos. 24 to 27, $10; in M, Nos. 18 to 19, $16; in N, Nos. 12 to 15, $11; in O, Nos. 14 and 20 to 23, $9; in P, Nos. 18 and 19, $8. In these centre rows the lowest prices were for the end seats and ranged from $4 to $5. Adv. Sept. 23, 04

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

SEASON OF 1884-85.

A series of six concerts will be given on THURSDAY EVENINGS, Nov. 8, Dec. 4, Jan. 22, Feb. 12, March 5 and March 26. Section C and D in the first gallery and section D in the second gallery have been reserved for college officers and invited guests. Tickets for all other seats will be for sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, at 9 o'clock, A. M., Wednesday, Oct. 22. Price for the series of six concerts, $3. Oct 22 Oct 17

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

First Concert, Saturday Eve'g, Oct. 18, at 8.

Overture—(Lenore No. 3), Beethoven; Concerto for Violin in A-minor, Vieuxtemps; Prelude—Andante and Gavotte (first time), John Seb. Bach; Symphony in D-minor (first time, Volkmann.

MR. LEOPOLD LICHTENBERG will be the soloist. First Public Rehearsal Friday afternoon, Oct. 17, at 2.30. Tickets now on sale. WThS Oct 15

The Changes in Music Hall.

Tomorrow afternoon the first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1884-5 will be given in the Music Hall, and aside from the artistic merits of the concert and the interest in the new conductor, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, there will undoubtedly be a strong desire to see what effect the recent changes have made in the hall. Of course the most noticeable change is the removal of the great organ. The absence of this familiar feature is felt at once, and to those who have been frequent visitors at the hall it will probably seem as though the house-cleaning had been completed at so late an hour that there had not been time to get all the furniture back into place. The change in the height of the platform is something that strikes one almost immediately; and this will generally be considered an improvement. It has been lowered a foot and a half, and is now about four feet and a half high. The removal of the organ enlarged the space at the rear of the platform, and this enabled the architect to push the front line back nearly ten feet, thus giving room for about two hundred more seats at the front of the hall. The platform is slightly inclined, and at the front is a sunken trough containing a row of footlights. When these are not to be used, they are concealed by a cover. The arch at the rear of the platform, the place in which a part of the organ formerly stood, is hung with drapery, a "sunburst" filling the top of the arch. This is evidently only a temporary arrangement. In front of the drapery is the Beethoven statue. There is a slight alteration in the stairs leading to the greenroom, a new flight of three or four steps leading directly from the rear of the platform to the door of the greenroom. The new organ will be placed in a room near the second balcony on the easterly side of the hall. A small, curved balcony projects from the arched opening to this room, and at present this is draped with a light yellow material. The new seats in the hall are of the same comfortable design as those placed in the hall a year ago, but the seats at the rear of the hall and in the balconies are the inconvenient benches in use here for so many years.

THE PLAN ADOPTED for the sale of seats for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears to be the fairest, for all concerned, that could be devised. Last year, speculators, by declining to take all the seats that they had bid off, created the impression that the house was all sold, or nearly so. For the coming sales, both of public rehearsal and of season tickets, the rule is established that seats bought must be paid for at once, instead of, as last year, allowing one or two days' grace to call for them at the box office. It is hoped that the control of the seats, secured by speculators, last year, will for the future be prevented, or at least be very largely reduced. An advantage of the auction method is that buyers of tickets are saved the weariness of standing in line for an indefinite time at the box office.

The sale of symphony concert tickets was conducted in the same way as on Monday, and the bidding was begun quite promptly upon the hour named. The prices ran at the greatest variation, from 50 cents to $10, but there were few personal contests to advance the rate to a high average, and the first 300 seats brought an advance of about $4 each. A dozen or more messenger boys were waiting patiently at noontime for the opening of the box office tomorrow morning.

The Musical Herald says: "Punch is at present publishing a set of 'Things which one had better left unsaid.' It recalls an awkward speech made at a Boston dinner party recently, where there were present Mr. Henshel and a celebrated prima donna. The latter (a great friend of Gericke's), when she heard that the Viennese conductor was coming over, burst out, 'Oh, now you will know what symphonic music is!' The thoughts of the retiring conductor cannot be printed in cold type." 1884

MR. LANG'S MUSICAL TALKS.

Chickering Hall was well filled yesterday afternoon by an interested audience, of much the same character as those attending the symphony rehearsals, and the attraction of the occasion was the first of a series of 12 lessons, conversations or talks about the symphony concert programme of the week, by Mr. B. J. Lang. The line of remark taken by Mr. Lang was, rightly, based upon the supposition that his audience were students rather than professionals, for by this plan the speaker instructed even the novice in musical matters while he interested the better informed of his hearers. In addition to a four-hand pianoforte reading of the leading works of the present week's programme, in which Mr. Ernst Perabo gave his valuable assistance, Mr. Lang told many facts relating to the several compositions, which tended to impress their individuality upon the minds of his audience and better prepare them to more thoroughly enjoy the presentation of the works by the orchestra. These lessons or talks will be continued at fortnightly intervals during the season. Herald, Oct 4/84

MUSIC HALL.

Its Stage Reconstruction Finally Decided Upon.

At a meeting of the directors of the corporation controlling the Music Hall property, held yesterday, the treasurer, Mr. Charles E. Cotting, was authorized to complete the changes in the arrangement of the large hall made necessary by the removal of the great organ. The case of the instrument projected so far into the hall that an addition of about 10 feet was made to the old platform when the organ was put in, and now it is proposed to set back the stage line to about the place it originally had when the hall was built. This will give a stage about 30 feet deep and clear of all obstructions between the two side balcony fronts, giving ample space for any and all uses to which the hall is likely to be put. The front line of the new stage will not have such a pronounced curve as formerly and it will be built with about the same pitch as is had in the usual theatre stage. This change adds very largely to the value of the hall for all entertainments, as it gives nearly 200 more seats on the floor of the main auditorium, and makes all the balcony seats to the extreme limits of the walls desirable. All questions as to the disposition of the money received by the sale of the "big" organ have been set at rest by the vote passed appropriating the same amount to the purchase and setting up of a new organ of simple construction, for use in oratorio performances. An organ room about 20x10 feet and 40 feet high has been built by adding to the structure next the hall which accommodates the box office on the lower floor and the artists' rooms overhead. The organist's seat will be in a gallery built out from the upper balcony on the left side of the hall as one faces the stage. The two left-hand panels are being cut away down to the balcony line, and the semicircular space above the gaslight line has also been knocked out to give space for the organ front, which will conform to the coloring of the hall in its decoration. The Beethoven statue will probably be retained as the centre ornament of the stage, and the recess formerly filled by the organ works will be boarded up and the stage end of the hall made the same as the rest of the auditorium, so far as it is possible. The space gained by the rebuilding of the stage will be a great aid in the arrangement of the hall for the club concerts, as well as for the season's oratorio performances, as it makes possible a much better seating of the chorus, and this without reducing the seating capacity as much as formerly. It is expected that the hall will be ready for use by Sept. 1.

GERICKE.—Boston is now in raptures over Gericke, who has come from Europe to assume the baton of the Symphony Orchestra. His first concerts have shown that his European reputation was well-founded and he is regarded as a most invaluable acquisition to American music.

....Is the tide turning? The gossip runs that the extra symphony concerts are proposed because of the profits earned on the regular season.

ten.

BOSTON.

Oct. 13.—Of course I ought to begin this letter with "Home again," or some reminder that I have been away to foreign shores. I have only recently had the advantage of reading my letters from "Yurup," and also the good advice which you from time to time poured out upon me in your "Personal Jottings" column, wherein you exhort me to be virtuous and happy, and give other moral and pious reflections for my benefit. If I could have read them earlier I should undoubtedly have reaped pecuniary and other benefits from them, but now that, alas, I am transformed into a staid and quiet Bostonian, they are of no further use to me. I have as yet had no opportunity to wield the critical pen, for the concert fever has struck Boston very late this season, and not a note has yet been struck "officially." This letter, therefore, must be rather in the vein of a prelude and a prophecy, and I will try to let you behind the symphonic curtain, and speak of the new director, Wilhelm Gericke. I had been told by Madame Materna what a superb conductor and genial gentleman I might expect. I was not disappointed, therefore, when I found a jovial, hearty gentleman, of some thirty-four years (apparently) looking and acting just like the pleasant Viennese, and possessing a knowledge of scores all the way from Wagner to Von Suppé. The new director has been chiefly feasted the past week by the tavern and the anonymous clubs. I was present at a reception given by the latter. Messrs. Sherwood, Maas, Capen, and many other musicians and literati were there. In the music which followed the banquet, I was struck with the advance which Sherwood is making, even from his former fine playing. His technic was flawless on this occasion, and in a locatta and a Chopin work, he was superb. Mr. Maas played the brilliant Tansig arrangement of Schubert's "marche militaire" with fine technic, and I was called upon for a German lied, possibly to spoil the digestions of some enemies of the club.

I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Gericke several times after that, and he was kind enough to tell me some of his plans. His placing of the orchestra may differ somewhat from Henschel's, as he will not divide the strings. The seating may follow the following plan:

Timpani, contra basses,
Horns, trumpets, etc., trombones,
Woodwind,
Violas, 'celli,
1st violins, 2d violins.

This arrangement will probably have a good effect. Nevertheless Mr. Gericke is not indissolubly wedded to it. Mr. Henschel in his second season made a bad arrangement of his forces—bringing the contrabasses to the front, and kept to it through the entire season, although he must have found out its faultiness. Mr. Gericke acknowledges that he is only studying to get a good tone, and says that he may change if the arrangement does not work well. There is a proverb which applies to this matter, but I will not quote it. The above seating is practically the same that is used in the Philharmonic Orchestra of Vienna. As to the programmes Mr. Gericke was quite outspoken. He did not wish to "lighten" great symphonies by giving musical trivialities after them. The Symphony will hereafter, therefore, probably be the last piece of each programme. As to new works, I am not allowed to mention all, but I may say that there will be a Schubert Symphony given which has never been heard in America, and a Volkmann Symphony in D minor will be given at the opening concert. A piano suite by Bach, arranged for orchestra, and a Serenade by Fuchs will be among the novelties of the earliest programmes. The poor director is being absolutely bombarded with soloists who desire to appear in the concerts. I had the pleasure, during an interview at his house, of seeing the various gifts given to Mr. Gericke by his Viennese friends at parting.

He carries trophies enough to start an ancient Roman triumphal procession with. His chief successes in Vienna, however, have been either in operatic or choral works in leading these he is said to be unrivalled.

Enough of this thoroughly Bostonian subject. Apart from the meeting of the Anonymous Club I have heard no music except at a private soiree, where I had the pleasure of meeting Miss Amy Fay, the well-known pianist and author, and of hearing a new sonata for violin and piano by Mr. Louis Maas, which seems to me, by all odds, one of the most spontaneous works which this learned composer has yet given us. Next week the Symphonies begin, and from that time forth there will be the usual acetic criticisms of

L. C. E.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The change in the interior of Music Hall, caused by removing the great organ, still gives great disappointment to the habitue. One too quickly sees the dismal platform, which from the upper balconies is even repelling in its colorless finish. It will be many days before the hearts of those frequenters of what is best there will become reconciled to this sundering of partnership between the grand instrument and its keeper. Music Hall should no longer be the name for the place. The tenement does not now deserve it. And Beethoven, too! Not now guarding the portal of the organ, but serving as ballast for an incongruous screen, supposed to be decorative at the head of the auditorium! These are unfortunate first impressions at the opening of the musical season, but many must have felt them. The new conductor, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, is more hearty and impressive than his immediate predecessor. He also has an old-fashioned habit of using the score, which, by the way, he consults at performance, but does not study. He commands his players by a watchfulness which anticipates each new entrance, and not only directs but encourages and sustains. If the violas are to lead, he is ready with prompt beat and significant look. The wood-winds can depend upon an elastic free accompaniment extremely interesting, and the players increased by eight in the string department, are in most gracious accord with him. Indeed it is to be noted with pleasure that their conductor, after but two weeks' rehearsing, has the attention of his band in a remarkable degree. Gericke is unlike any of the orchestral leaders best known in Boston. He has little of Thomas's repose, more of the commanding stature of Zerrahn, for any of their sensitive themes. Towards the bass he is an erect, martial-like chief, meeting their entrances with becoming gravity. Towards the strings, his main-stay, he is as a constant ally, going out to them with sympathy and appreciation in every gesture. His beat is definite, and in evolving a climax he more than suggests by his changeable, nervous movement of body and arm. He really forces an episode, be it either delicate or stern, by his sympathetic anticipation. The following programme, which we have not commented on, was played at the opening concert, Saturday, evening, October 18: Beethoven, overture, Leonore No. 3; Vieuxtemps, concerto for violin; Bach, prelude, andante and gavotte, arranged for strings by Bachrich; Volkmann, symphony in D-minor. The Fidelio overture was a well-chosen beginning. Its reading differed in no essential from local standards, while the performance was superb. The Bach arrangement was entirely pleasing to all worshippers of the great master; the playing of the string band throughout this number was delicately varied and full of promise. The Volkmann symphony was listened to for the first time in Boston (the same may art, one then slyly n of seat nen 1, it have world city ably in eat, will that the a select-ent). It is written in total number ways is distinctly attendanc and without a day school bouquets work. The opening E. W. Blive fashion, the low close, by carry on an octave-bowed he figure of five notes, down to the writer was loth to he impatience of the The and two divisions, each salist Sahin pure orchestral evening. The andante has a of flower wood division of the tive of the of movement and of the so is often anything else, so entirely out of form is it. It is piquant and original, yet ungracious withal. The finale proved to be a moderate allegro with a non troppo attachment. In treatment it conducts a single theme to one great climax, but the path is marked by frequent episodes which keep active the senses of the musician. It does not seem to have been written because of the learning that was in the man, but because of the music. It is, therefore, not an example of severest musical form, but it is never vague. The movement rushes forward with the ease of spontaneous existence; strings, wood and brass surge ahead with great abandon, and at last find a climax amid full orchestral speech. The symphony was played in excellent style, and seemed in no sense a work new to the players. Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg, who has been a modest member of the orchestra for two seasons, played the concerto. After his tours with Theodore Thomas he received further instruction from Wienawski. He plays without exaggeration of movement, and his tone is very full, flawless in its purity and changefully expressive in character. He was heartily greeted by the audience. The orchestra in accompanying him were pliant and willing allies.

If the reader will use the following in connection with our review of the symphony concerts, printed in yesterday's paper, a correct idea of what the writer intended to say may be had. The types were at fault after the sentence—"These are unfortunate first impressions," etc., etc. It should then read: "The new conductor, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, is very interesting, and the players, increased by eight in the string department, are in most gracious accord with him. Indeed, it is to be noted with pleasure, that this conductor, after but two weeks rehearsing, has the attention of his band in a remarkable degree. Gericke is unlike any of the orchestral leaders best known in Boston. He has little of Thomas's repose, none of the commanding stature of Zerrahn, and is more hearty and impressive than Mr. Henschel. He also has an old-fashioned habit of using the score, which, by the way, he consults at performance, but does not study. He commands his players by a watchfulness which anticipates each new entrance, and not only directs but encourages and sustains. If the violas are to lead he is ready with prompt beat and significant look. The wood-winds can depend upon an elastic, free accompaniment for any of their sensitive themes. From this point, beginning "Towards the bass," etc., the types of yesterday read correctly.

used is a Chickering.

BOSTON.

Oct. 13.—Of course I ought to begin this letter with "Home again," or some reminder that I have been away to foreign shores. I have only recently had the advantage of reading my letters from "Yurup," and also the good advice which you from time to time poured out upon me in your "Personal Jottings" column, wherein you exhort me to be virtuous and happy, and give other moral and pious reflections for my benefit. If I could have read them earlier I should undoubtedly have reaped pecuniary and other benefits from them, but now that, alas, I am transformed into a staid and quiet Bostonian, they are of no further use to me. I have as yet had no opportunity to wield the critical pen, for the concert fever has struck Boston very late this season, and not a note has yet been struck "officially." This letter, therefore, must be rather in the vein of a prelude and a prophecy, and I will try to let you behind the symphonic curtain, and speak of the new director, Wilhelm Gericke. I had been told by Madame Materna what a superb conductor and genial gentleman I might expect. I was not disappointed, therefore, when I found a jovial, hearty gentleman, of some thirty-four years (apparently) looking and acting just like the pleasant Viennese, and possessing a knowledge of scores all the way from Wagner to Von Suppé. The new director has been chiefly feasted the past week by the tavern and the anonymous clubs. I was present at a reception given by the latter. Messrs. Sherwood, Maas, Capen, and many other musicians and literati were there. In the music which followed the banquet, I was struck with the advance which Sherwood is making, even from his former fine playing. His technic was flawless on this occasion, and in a tocatta and a Chopin work, he was superb. Mr. Maas played the brilliant Tansig arrangement of Schubert's "marche militaire" with fine technic, and I was called upon for a German lied, possibly to spoil the digestions of some enemies of the club.

I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Gericke several times after that, and he was kind enough to tell me some of his plans. His placing of the orchestra may differ somewhat from Henschel's, as he will not divide the strings. The seating may follow the following plan:

Timpani, contra basses,
Horns, trumpets, etc., trombones,
Woodwind,
Violas, 'celli,
1st violins, —	2d violins.

This arrangement will probably have a good effect. Nevertheless Mr. Gericke is not indissolubly wedded to it. Mr. Henschel in his second season made a bad arrangement of his forces—bringing the contrabasses to the front, and kept to it through the entire season, although he must have found out its faultiness. Mr. Gericke acknowledges that he is only studying to get a good tone, and says that he may change if the arrangement does not work well. There is a proverb which applies to this matter, but I will not quote it. The above seating is practically the same that is used in the Philharmonic Orchestra of Vienna. As to the programmes Mr. Gericke was quite outspoken. He did not wish to "lighten" great symphonies by giving musical trivialities after them. The Symphony will hereafter, therefore, probably be the last piece of each programme. As to new works, I am not allowed to mention all, but I may say that there will be a Schubert Symphony given which has never been heard in America, and a Volkmann Symphony in D minor will be given at the opening concert. A piano suite by Bach, arranged for orchestra, and a Serenade by Fuchs will be among the novelties of the earliest programmes. The poor director is being absolutely bombarded with soloists who desire to appear in the concerts. I had the pleasure, during an interview at his house, of seeing the various gifts given to Mr. Gericke by his Viennese friends at parting.

He carries trophies enough to start an ancient Roman procession with. His chief successes in Vienna, have been either in operatic or choral works in leading parts to be unrivalled.

Enough of this thoroughly Bostonian subject. At a meeting of the Anonymous Club I have heard no more private soiree, where I had the pleasure of meeting in the well-known pianist and author, and of hearing for violin and piano by Mr. Louis Maas, which seem odds, one of the most spontaneous works which this poser has yet given us. Next week the Symphonies by that time forth there will be the usual acetic criticisms

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The change in the interior of Music Hall, caused by removing the great organ, still gives great disappointment to the habitue. One too quickly sees the dismal platform, which from the upper balconies is even repelling in its colorless finish. It will be many days before the hearts of those frequenters of what is best there will become reconciled to this sundering of partnership between the grand instrument and its keeper. Music Hall should no longer be the name for the place. The tenement does not now deserve it. And Beethoven, too! Not now guarding the portal of the organ, but serving as ballast for an incongruous screen, supposed to be decorative at the head of the auditorium! These are unfortunate first impressions at the opening of the musical season, but many must have felt them. The new conductor, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, is more hearty and impressive than his immediate predecessor. He also has an old-fashioned habit of using the score, which, by the way, he consults at performance, but does not study. He commands his players by a watchfulness which anticipates each new entrance, and not only directs but encourages and sustains. If the violas are to lead, he is ready with prompt beat and significant look. The wood-winds can depend upon an elastic free accompaniment extremely interesting, and the players increased by eight in the string department, are in most gracious accord with him. Indeed it is to be noted with pleasure that their conductor, after but two weeks' rehearsing, has the attention of his band in a remarkable degree. Gericke is unlike any of the orchestral leaders best known in Boston. He has little of Thomas's repose, more of the commanding stature of Zerrahn, for any of their sensitive themes. Towards the brass he is an erect, martial-like chief, meeting their entrances with becoming gravity. Towards the strings, his main-stay, he is as a constant ally, going out to them with sympathy and appreciation in every gesture. His beat is definite, and in evolving a climax he more than suggests by his changeful, nervous movement of body and arm. He really forces an episode, be it either delicate or stern, by his sympathetic anticipation. The following programme, which we have not commented on, was played at the opening concert, Saturday, evening, October 18: Beethoven, overture, Leonore No. 3; Vieuxtemps, concerto for violin; Bach, prelude, andante and gavotte, arranged for strings by Bachrich; Volkmann, symphony in D-minor. The Fidelio overture was a well-chosen beginning. Its reading differed in no essential from local standards, while the performance was superb. The Bach arrangement was entirely pleasing to all worshippers of the great master; the playing of the string band throughout this number was delicately varied and full of promise. The Volkmann symphony was listened to for the first time in Boston (the same may be said of the Bach arrangement). It is written in four movements, but in many ways is distinctly unique. It seems, at a first hearing and without a look at the score, a coherent work. The opening allegro begins in contemplative fashion, the low strings (with unison brasses?) carry on an octave-apart utterance, founded on a figure of five notes, for a number of measures, as if the writer was loth to show his hand, while enjoying the impatience of the listener. The movement has two divisions, each clearly marked, grouped within pure orchestral limits, and the matter is good. The andante has a pastoral character, wherein the wood division of the band is handled with much grace of movement and freedom of idea. The scherzo is often anything else, so entirely out of form is it. It is piquant and original, yet ungracious withal. The finale proved to be a moderate allegro with a non troppo attachment. In treatment it conducts a single theme to one great climax, but the path is marked by frequent episodes which keep active the senses of the musician. It does not seem to have been written because of the learning that was in the man, but because of the music. It is, therefore, not an example of severest musical form, but it is never vague. The movement rushes forward with the ease of spontaneous existence; strings, wood and brass surge ahead with great abandon, and at last find a climax amid full orchestral speech. The symphony was played in excellent style, and seemed in no sense a work new to the players. Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg, who has been a modest member of the orchestra for two seasons, played the concerto. After his tours with Theodore Thomas he received further instruction from Wienawski. He plays without exaggeration of movement, and his tone is very full, flawless in its purity and changefully expressive in character. He was heartily greeted by the audience. The orchestra in accompanying him were pliant and willing allies.

If the reader will use the following in connection with our review of the symphony concerts, printed in yesterday's paper, a correct idea of what the writer intended to say may be had. The types were at fault after the sentence—"These are unfortunate first impressions," etc., etc. It should then read: "The new conductor, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, is very interesting, and the players, increased by eight in the string department, are in most gracious accord with him. Indeed, it is to be noted with pleasure, that this conductor, after but two weeks rehearsing, has the attention of his band in a remarkable degree. Gericke is unlike any of the orchestral leaders best known in Boston. He has little of Thomas's repose, none of the commanding stature of Zerrahn, and is more hearty and impressive than Mr. Henschel. He also has an old-fashioned habit of using the score, which, by the way, he consults at performance, but does not study. He commands his players by a watchfulness which anticipates each new entrance, and not only directs but encourages and sustains. If the violas are to lead he is ready with prompt beat and significant look. The wood-winds can depend upon an elastic, free accompaniment for any of their sensitive themes. From this point, beginning 'Towards the bass,' etc., the types of yesterday read correctly."

used is a Chickering.

20

22

The Changes in Music Hall.

Tomorrow afternoon the first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1884-5 will be given in the Music Hall, and aside from the artistic merits of the concert and the interest in the new conductor, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, there will undoubtedly be a strong desire to see what effect the recent changes have made in the hall. Of course the most noticeable change is the removal of the great organ. The absence of this familiar feature is felt at once, and to those who have been frequent visitors at the hall it will probably seem as though the house-cleaning had been completed at so late an hour that there had not been time to get all the furniture back into place. The change in the height of the platform is something that strikes one almost immediately; and this will generally be considered an improvement. It has been lowered a foot and a half, and is now about four feet and a half high. The removal of the organ enlarged the space at the rear of the platform, and this enabled the architect to push the front line back nearly ten feet, thus giving room for about two hundred more seats at the front of the hall. The platform is slightly inclined, and at the front is a sunken trough containing a row of footlights. When these are not to be used, they are concealed by a cover. The arch at the rear of the platform, the place in which a part of the organ formerly stood, is hung with drapery, a "sunburst" filling the top of the arch. This is evidently only a temporary arrangement. In front of the drapery is the Beethoven statue. There is a slight alteration in the stairs leading to the greenroom, a new flight of three or four steps leading directly from the rear of the platform to the door of the greenroom. The new organ will be placed in a room near the second balcony on the easterly side of the hall. A small, curved balcony projects from the arched opening to this room, and at present this is draped with a light yellow material. The new seats in the hall are of the same comfortable design as those placed in the hall a year ago, but the seats at the rear of the hall and in the balconies are the inconvenient benches in use here for so many years.

Oct 16/84

TIGHT BINDING

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN,	OVERTURE. (Leonore, No. 3).
VIEUXTEMPS,	CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN, in A minor. Allegro non troppo.—Adagio.—Allegro con fuoco.
JOH. SEB. BACH,	PRELUDE, ANDANTE AND GAVOTTE. Arranged for Strings by Bachrich. (First time.)
ROB. VOLKMANN,	SYMPHONY in D minor. Allegro.—Andante.—Scherzo.—Finale. (First time.)

SOLOIST:

MR. LEOPOLD LICHTENBERG.

THE CONCERT WILL CLOSE AT 9.30. THOSE OBLIGED TO LEAVE BEFORE THEN WILL PLEASE DO SO—AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first symphony concert of this, the fourth, season was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening. The programme was:

Beethoven.....Overture to "Leonore," No. 3
Vieuxtemps.....Violin concerto in A minor
J. S. Bach.....Prelude, Andante and Gavotte
[Arranged for strings by Bachrich.]
Volkmann.....Symphony in D minor

Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg was the violinist.

This, so to speak, official opening of the musical season was perhaps more interesting from various causes, than any concert that has been given in Boston for some time. Within the last twenty years we can remember only two occasions when our musical public has had reason to experience such a flutter of rational excitement on taking their seats in a concert-room as was plainly felt by the larger part of the audience on Saturday evening: the first symphony concert of the Harvard Musical Association in 1865, and the first concert of the present symphony orchestra three years ago. On the former occasion we felt that the lamp of orchestral music, which had burned with an all-too-feeble and flickering flame for years past, was at length to be supplied with new and more copious oil; on the latter we hinted the establishment in Boston of a permanent and adequate orchestra. Every one knew beforehand that these two concerts were to be epoch-marking events in the musical history of this city. Other events there have been here which were not without the keen interest which attaches to seasonable novelty—the institution of the Handel and Haydn triennial festivals, the first appearance of the Thomas Orchestra, the visits of Rubinstein, Von Bülow and Max Bruch, last spring's Wagner festival. But the interest of these occasions was centred in the occasions themselves; they were sporadic flashes of musical light coming from abroad, and had little influence upon the focus of musical activity which we all wish to keep aglow in the midst of our own community. Even the Handel and Haydn festivals have less to do with our every-day musical life than the oratorios which this society gives in more quiet fashion winter in, winter out. No doubt the circumstances which added peculiar interest to last Saturday evening's concert were not so momentous, so immediately concerning the very security of our musical existence, as those which surrounded the two great occasions to which we have referred above. Certainly none of us felt like drowning men who, all at once, find themselves picked up by a lifeboat. But still there was enough of outside, adventitious interest to make this occasion in some degree comparable to the other two. In the first place, it was the formal ratification of our taking a new conductor of established fame for better or worse, for three years at least. Then it was the first concert given in the Music Hall since the removal of the great organ and the lowering of the stage.

If the directors of the Music Hall had gone directly to work to make us feel the loss of the organ as keenly as possible, they could have hit upon no more apt contrivance than that ghastly bare wall which the noble front of the instrument used so well to cover. The sight of that hideous, barren flatness was like a sudden chill that sent all one's blood to the heart, and caused an internal glow of regretful affection for the old organ to spring up in every breast. But wait a bit! The first sounds of the orchestra that were caught by the ear more than amply made up for the torture that was administered through the eye. We can say advisedly that Saturday evening was the first time that a genuinely and legitimately brilliant orchestral effect has been heard in the Music Hall for over twenty years. De mortuis nil nisi bonum; but as the great organ is not dead and buried, but is only awaiting a glorious resurrection (above ground) in the graveyard behind the New England Conservatory, we can speak our mind with decency. Few of us probably have fully appreciated what a bad reflector of sound the beautiful front of the organ was. Likely enough that imposing array of pipes absorbed a good deal more fine music than it ever gave out during its long existence. Now an orchestra in the Music Hall really sounds like an orchestra, and not like a weak apology for one. What the removal of the organ has done for orchestral effect throughout the hall, the lowering of the stage has completed for that part of the audience which occupies the floor. The music now strikes you straight in the ear, and no longer passes over your head.

And now for Mr. Gericke! His reception by the large audience was as cordial as possible, and, as each successive number on the programme was finished, long and hearty applause burst forth afresh with unmistakable vigor. Mr. Gericke has, in a word, made a very palpable hit at the first dash. His manner at the conductor's desk is admirable; dignified, self-contained, free from all over-dramatic demonstrativeness, yet sufficiently animated to indicate the enthusiasm with which he burns. He is by no means one of those conductors who, by their outward impassiveness, stand as an insulator between the orchestra and the hearts of the audience. Then, again, everything one sees him do with the baton is immediately appreciated by the ear, as the orchestra responds to his nervous beat. Every stroke tells, and one's musical enthusiasm is not damped by an unpleasant sense of effort. He seems to make the orchestra do just what he pleases. We say seems, for it is idle to try to judge a man finally after but one concert. One can only speak from first impressions, and these impressions are, in the present case, wholly and strongly favorable. The playing of the orchestra was extremely good; vigorous, spirited, often delicate, and full of intelligently conceived and well-executed effects of light and shade. Their crescendo, for one thing, was at times utterly superb. If, in his rendering of the "Leonore" overture, Mr. Gericke showed a fondness for that flexibility of tempo which is characteristic of the modern school, he showed, at the same time, that he was fully master of the situation; that he commanded the changes of speed, and could return again to his original beat. He never allowed himself to be run away with. In the Bach selections we should have preferred less violent effects of dynamic shading, less of what seemed at moments akin to mere virtuosity; but this is only a personal preference on our part. The real life and brilliancy of the performance were unmistakable.

Mr. Lichtenberg won golden opinions by his admirable and artistic playing of the Vieuxtemps concerto. This young artist has a talent with which he may go far, if he continues as he has begun. The child prodigy of some years ago has already developed into an artist who can claim to be taken seriously. Of the new Volkmann symphony we can hardly speak intelligently. A single hearing of an elaborate work is at all times inadequate, and on the present occasion we are willing to admit that the music that was given at the concert interested us, for the time being, less than the effect of the performance in the new conditions in which it was given.

The next programme is:

Cherubini.....Overture to "Anacreon"
Rob. Fuchs.....Serenade No. 2, in C major
(First time.)
Raff....."The Dream King and his Love."
(Song with Orchestra.)
Beethoven.....Overture to "Coriolanus"
Grieg.....(a) The Old Song
(b) Autumnal Gale
(Songs, with pianoforte.)
Mendelssohn.....Symphony in A major (Italian)
Miss Ita Welsh will be the singer.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

The first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, was attended by an audience limited only by the seating capacity of the hall. The appearance of Herr Wilhelm Gericke, the new conductor, gave special interest to the occasion, and he received a great ovation upon his entrance. The audience, as in former seasons, consisted very largely of ladies, probably seven-eighths of those in attendance being of the gentler sex. Without entering upon any premature comment upon the programme or the manner of its presentation, it may be said that Herr Gericke's abilities need not be questioned, and much good work may be confidently expected from him. The first concert occurs this evening.

BOSTON MASS.—Oct. 21.—The first of the season's series of twenty-four symphony concerts under the direction of the new conductor Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening last before a good house. Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Overture ("Leonore," No. 3) Beethoven; Concerto for violin in A minor, Vieuxtemps; Prelude, andante and gavotte, Joh. Seb. Bach; Symphony in D minor, Rob. Volkmann.

The interest naturally centered in the appearance of the new conductor, who has been summoned from Vienna to take the place left vacant by the resignation of Mr. Georg Henschel. Herr Gericke, as he stepped forward to assume the duties of his new position was given a hearty welcome. He led the overture of "Leonore" in a masterly manner, and a better presentation of this great composition has never been given in this city before. Mr. Lichtenberg, in his violin solos, was enthusiastically applauded and played with that same artistic finish that always characterizes his playing. The concert was a decided success in every way.

The first of this season's series of twenty-four concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the new conductor, who on coming to the platform was greeted with a heartiness which was unusual on the part of a Boston audience. The favorable expectations which it indicated were met very fully as appeared from the subsequent bestowal of applause and from the many commendatory remarks dropped by people in the audience after the concert. Mr. Gericke is a gentleman of scarcely medium height, but yet of good figure, and in manner makes a favorable impression at first sight. His strength as a conductor lies in the fact that he has the power to inspire the musicians under his direction and to make them thoroughly understand that a player in an orchestra, if he knows his business, will deny himself the luxury of expressing too much of himself, and at the same time be something more than a mere machine. While the player, moved by the magnetism which seems to touch at every wave of the conductor's electric wand, realizes the music in its double capacity of expressing thought and the conductor's own reading or expression of that thought, the conductor himself is in reality a soloist, his instrument the orchestra, an intelligence rather than a machine, and it is in such a character that Mr. Gericke appears to excel, holding and controlling in the most delicate manner not only the attention but the sympathy of the component parts of his instrument. The following is the programme which was performed:

Beethoven, Overture, (Leonore, No. 3.)
Vieuxtemps, Concerto for Violin, in A minor.
Allegro non troppo.—Adagio.—Allegro con fuoco.
Joh. Seb. Bach, Prelude, Andante and Gavotte.
Arranged for Strings by Bachrich.
(First time.)
Rob. Volkmann, Symphony in D minor.
Allegro.—Andante.—Scherzo.—Finale.
(First time.)

The Beethoven Overture, a true masterwork, composed in the same period with the "Mount of Olives," the "Pastoral" and the "Eroica," that is, between 1803 and 1808, was given with great poetry and finish. Mr. Lichtenberg, who was the soloist in the Vieuxtemps Concerto, played in a style of rare purity, which suggests Jockim's method strongly. His staccato is remarkable, and the tone he draws out of his instrument is majestic. His performance was accorded a very enthusiastic demonstration of approval. The Bach Prelude, Andante and Gavotte, as arranged for strings, were performed for the first time here and were heard with great interest, the rendering being very satisfactory. Volkmann's Symphony displayed nothing striking or characteristic. The theme of the allegro suggests in some way the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven. It is evident that the composer was too much impressed with this work when engaged upon his own. The Andante is more in a cantilene form. In the Scherzo there is nothing of the true character of such a movement, the first portion of it being too slow and the trio suggesting an old German waltz called "Ländler." The Finale is little more than a musical study for the orchestra, filled with synopses, which, in fact, abound throughout the work. The instrumentation, however, is very brilliant and some of the effects are quite original. In regard to the attendance upon the concert it was to be observed that there were many vacant seats, and it is said that ticket speculators have been badly bitten. The next public rehearsal of the orchestra takes place Friday afternoon, and the second concert will be given Saturday evening. Miss Ita Welsh, mezzo-soprano, will be the soloist, and the following programme will be rendered: Cherubini, overture (Anacreon). Rob. Fuchs, serenade No. 2, in C major; Allegretto—Larghetto—Allegro—Presto (First time). Raff, "The Dream King and his Love" (song with orchestra). Beethoven, overture (Coriolanus). Grieg, (a) The Old Song; (b) Autumnal Gale (songs, with piano). Mendelssohn, symphony in A major; allegro vivace—Andante con moto—con moto moderato—Saltarello (Presto).

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke Warmly Received—
Leopold Lichtenberg's Success—The
Volkmann Symphony.

It is a red, red curtain that hangs back of Beethoven's statue in Music Hall now, but all the gorgeous redness of turkey red cannot relieve the south end of the hall of a dreary sense of loneliness. The great organ is gone, and the old inhabitant sits uneasy in his seat by reason of its absence.

The first concert of the Symphony orchestra found the hall nearly full, the only empty seats being scattered about on the floor. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the new conductor, received a cordial welcome on his first appearance. Every member of the audience was a critic, and if the applause may be taken as a fair indication, Mr. Gericke has begun his campaign in Boston with good chances for subduing the city. The opening number was Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," (No. 3), in the performance of which the orchestra proved to be thoroughly under the control of the conductor.

It was rendered in a most acceptable manner, all the lights and shades, and they are many in number and variety, being expressed with exquisite grace and effectiveness. Individuality in the reading of a score may well be allowed in a musician of Mr. Gericke's experience, and his audiences will note his peculiarities with interest, and render charitable judgment.

Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg was the soloist of the evening. He performed a concerto for violin in A minor, by Vieuxtemps, in an exceptionally pleasing manner. He draws a strong bow and plays with more precision and art than passion. The cadenzas, extremely difficult, of course, were heard to great advantage, and he finished amid great enthusiasm. He will unquestionably prove to be a valuable addition to the orchestra, in which he plays a first violin.

The next number was a prelude, andante and gavotte by Bach, arranged for strings by Bachrich. It was a novelty in Boston. The movements are very attractive, more popular in character, perhaps, than most of the old masters' compositions. The gavotte was rendered beautifully; the other movements were heavy and colorless and dragged.

The symphony, also a novelty, was by Volkmann. While the performance could be vastly improved, the work, as a musical composition, was a disappointment. Its four movements are all in the same spirit, and while pleasing snatches of melody and good instrumentation appear here and there, the general impression given by a single hearing is that of bombast and sentimentality mixed together. It seems to be more the cold creation of the intellect than the spontaneous product of a well-guided fancy. One cannot help wondering, when it is all done, what Volkmann wrote it for.

Following is the programme for the next concert: Cherubini, overture ("Anacreon"); Rob. Fuchs, Serenade No. 2, in C major (first time); Raff, "The Dream King and his Love" (song with orchestra); Beethoven, overture ("Coriolanus"); Grieg, (a) "The Old Song"; (b) "Autumnal Gale" (songs, with piano); Mendelssohn, symphony in A major; soloist, Miss Ita Welsh.

The interest in the symphony concerts is indicated in the fact that both B. J. Laug, the pianist, and George W. Chadwick, the composer, are giving series of lectures explaining and illustrating the structure of the Beethoven symphonies as they come. Professor John K. Paine, of Harvard University, also announces a series of musical lectures illustrating the eminent composers from the earliest classic periods to Wagner.

STAGE AND CONCERT HALL

First of the Season's Symphony Concerts at Music Hall.

The first of the season's series of 24 symphony concerts was given at Music Hall last evening, under the direction of Herr Wilhelm Gericke, and with Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg, violinist, as the soloist. The programme was: Overture, ("Leonore," No. 3).....Beethoven
Concerto for violin in A minor.....Vieuxtemps
Prelude, andante and gavotte.....Joh. Seb. Bach
Symphony in D minor.....Rob. Volkmann

The interest of the occasion naturally centered in the appearance and ability of Herr Wilhelm Gericke, the new conductor who has been summoned from his position as associate director at the Grand Opera, Vienna, by Mr. Higginson, to fill the place left vacant by the retirement of Mr. Georg Henschel. The reception given Herr Gericke as he came forward to assume the duties of his new position was worthy the hospitable character of the city, and it was evident that a friendly audience awaited a demonstration of his abilities. Had it been otherwise, however, there is little doubt but that the result would have been the same, as Herr Gericke's talent is of such a positive nature that it commands instant recognition. His figure, though somewhat below the average stature, is so well poised, as he stands at the conductor's desk, and his use of the baton has such an air of absolute command, that a feeling of confidence is instantly given, and the orchestra appears to be but a single well constructed instrument entirely at the control of its director. It was easy to see that there was more than a mechanical following of the director's lead by the musicians, as an esprit de corps was clearly manifest in all the work of the evening. The grand style in which the ever welcome "Leonore" overture was played removed all doubts of the value of Herr Gericke as a director, as a better presentation of this great composition has rarely been heard here. All the effects called for by the score were given with faultless precision, expression and feeling, and there was a vitality and strength in the presentation of the work which gave unqualified pleasure. The surprise of the evening was caused by the soloist, Mr. Lichtenberg, a violinist, who has for two seasons maintained his place among the first violins of the orchestra with a modesty seldom associated with so much talent. Mr. Lichtenberg was, however, well rewarded for his quiet persistence in refusing all the overtures made him in former seasons to appear as a soloist, as his triumph last evening was one for any artist to take pride in. With an almost faultless technique, his tone is pure, at all times true, and with a strength and breadth seldom gained by so young a performer. His bowing is graceful, clear and confident, his phrasing clear and intelligent, and he gives to all his work the touch of a genius. The reward given the artist by the audience was worthy the work done, and he was called to again and again bow his thanks for the applause following his number. The Bach prelude, andante and gavotte, arranged for strings by Bachrich, was heard for the first time here, and made a most delightful impression. The arrangement is an admirable one, and the manner of the presentation of the composition was worthy its sterling merit. The body of strings in the orchestra has been increased somewhat since last year, there being now 14 first and 14 second violins, 10 violas, etc., and the quality of tone given out by the players in this number was of the best. The strong contrasts of light and shade in the presenta-characteristic of the modern school, he showed, at the same time, that he was fully master of the situation; that he commanded the changes of speed, and could return again to his original beat. He never allowed himself to be run away with. In the Bach selections we should have preferred less violent effects of dynamic shading, less of what seemed at moments akin to mere virtuosity; but this is only a personal preference on our part. The real life and brilliancy of the performance were unmistakable.

Mr. Lichtenberg won golden opinions by his admirable and artistic playing of the Vieuxtemps concerto. This young artist has a talent with which he may go far, if he continues as he has begun. The child prodigy of some years ago has already developed into an artist who can claim to be taken seriously. Of the new Volkmann symphony we can hardly speak intelligently. A single hearing of an elaborate work is at all times inadequate, and on the present occasion we are willing to admit that the music that was given at the concert interested us, for the time being, less than the effect of the performance in the new conditions in which it was given.

The next programme is:

Cherubini.....Overture to "Anacreon"
Rob. Fuchs.....Serenade No. 2, in C major
(First time.)
Raff....."The Dream King and his Love."
(Song with Orchestra.)
Beethoven.....Overture to "Coriolan"
Grieg.....(a) The Old Song
(b) Autumnal Gale
(Songs, with pianoforte.)
Mendelssohn.....Symphony in A major (Italian)
Miss Ita Welsh will be the singer.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

The first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, was attended by an audience limited only by the seating capacity of the hall. The appearance of Herr Wilhelm Gericke, the new conductor, gave special interest to the occasion, and he received a great ovation upon his entrance. The audience, as in former seasons, consisted very largely of ladies, probably seven-eighths of those in attendance being of the gentler sex. Without entering upon any premature comment upon the programme or the manner of its presentation, it may be said that Herr Gericke's abilities need not be questioned, and much good work may be confidently expected from him. The first concert occurs this evening.

BOSTON MASS.—Oct. 21.—The first of the season's series of twenty-four symphony concerts under the direction of the new conductor Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening last before a good house. Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Overture ("Leonore," No. 3) Beethoven; Concerto for violin in A minor, Vieuxtemps; Prelude, andante and gavotte, Joh. Seb. Bach; Symphony in D minor, Rob. Volkmann.

The interest naturally centered in the appearance of the new conductor, who has been summoned from Vienna to take the place left vacant by the resignation of Mr. Georg Henschel. Herr Gericke, as he stepped forward to assume the duties of his new position was given a hearty welcome. He led the overture of "Leonore" in a masterly manner, and a better presentation of this great composition has never been given in this city before. Mr. Lichtenberg, in his violin solos, was enthusiastically applauded and played with that same artistic finish that always characterizes his playing. The concert was a decided success in every way.

First Symphony Concert.

The first of this season's series of twenty-four concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the new conductor, who on coming to the platform was greeted with a heartiness which was unusual on the part of a Boston audience. The favorable expectations which it indicated were met very fully as appeared from the subsequent bestowal of applause and from the many commendatory remarks dropped by people in the audience after the concert. Mr. Gericke is a gentleman of scarcely medium height, but yet of good figure, and in manner makes a favorable impression at first sight. His strength as a conductor lies in the fact that he has the power to inspire the musicians under his direction and to make them thoroughly understand that a player in an orchestra, if he knows his business, will deny himself the luxury of expressing too much of himself, and at the same time be something more than a mere machine. While the player, moved by the magnetism which seems to touch at every wave of the conductor's electric wand, realizes the music in its double capacity of expressing thought and the conductor's own reading or expression of that thought, the conductor himself is in reality a soloist, his instrument the orchestra, an intelligence rather than a machine, and it is in such a character that Mr. Gericke appears to excel, holding and controlling in the most delicate manner not only the attention but the sympathy of the component parts of his instrument. The following is the programme which was performed:

Beethoven, Overture, (Leonore, No. 3.)
Vieuxtemps, Concerto for Violin, in A minor.
Allegro non troppo.—Adagio.—Allegro con fuoco.
Joh. Seb. Bach, Prelude, Andante and Gavotte.
Arranged for Strings by Bachrich.
(First time.)
Rob. Volkmann, Symphony in D minor.
Allegro.—Andante.—Scherzo.—Finale.
(First time.)

The Beethoven Overture, a true masterwork, composed in the same period with the "Mount of Olives," the "Pastoral" and the "Eroica," that is, between 1803 and 1808, was given with great poetry and finish. Mr. Lichtenberg, who was the soloist in the Vieuxtemps Concerto, played in a style of rare purity, which suggests Jocklin's method strongly. His staccato is remarkable, and the tone he draws out of his instrument is majestic. His performance was accorded a very enthusiastic demonstration of approval. The Bach Prelude, Andante and Gavotte, as arranged for strings, were performed for the first time here and were heard with great interest, the rendering being very satisfactory. Volkmann's Symphony displayed nothing striking or characteristic. The theme of the allegro suggests in some way the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven. It is evident that the composer was too much impressed with this work when engaged upon his own. The Andante is more in a cantilene form. In the Scherzo there is nothing of the true character of such a movement, the first portion of it being too slow and the trio suggesting an old German waltz called "Ländler." The Finale is little more than a musical study for the orchestra, filled with synopses, which, in fact, abound throughout the work. The instrumentation, however, is very brilliant and some of the effects are quite original. In regard to the attendance upon the concert it was to be observed that there were many vacant seats, and it is said that ticket speculators have been badly bitten. The next public rehearsal of the orchestra takes place Friday afternoon, and the second concert will be given Saturday evening. Miss Ita Welsh, mezzo-soprano, will be the soloist, and the following programme will be rendered: Cherubini, overture ("Anacreon"). Rob. Fuchs, serenade No. 2, in C major; Allegretto—Larghetto—Allegro—Presto (First time). Raff, "The Dream King and his Love" (song with orchestra). Beethoven, overture ("Coriolanus"). Grieg, (a) The Old Song; (b) Autumnal Gale (songs, with piano). Mendelssohn, symphony in A major; allegro vivace—Andante, con moto—con moto moderato—Saltarello (Presto).

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke Warmly Received—
Leopold Lichtenberg's Success—The
Volkmann Symphony.

It is a red, red curtain that hangs back of Beethoven's statue in Music Hall now, but all the gorgeous redness of turkey red cannot relieve the south end of the hall of a dreary sense of loneliness. The great organ is gone, and the old inhabitant sits uneasy in his seat by reason of its absence.

The first concert of the Symphony orchestra found the hall nearly full, the only empty seats being scattered about on the floor. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the new conductor, received a cordial welcome on his first appearance. Every member of the audience was a critic, and if the applause may be taken as a fair indication, Mr. Gericke has begun his campaign in Boston with good chances for subduing the city. The opening number was Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," (No. 3), in the performance of which the orchestra proved to be thoroughly under the control of the conductor.

It was rendered in a most acceptable manner, all the lights and shades, and they are many in number and variety, being expressed with exquisite grace and effectiveness. Individuality in the reading of a score may well be allowed in a musician of Mr. Gericke's experience, and his audiences will note his peculiarities with interest, and render charitable judgment.

Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg was the soloist of the evening. He performed a concerto for violin in A minor, by Vieuxtemps, in an exceptionally pleasing manner. He draws a strong bow and plays with more precision and art than passion. The cadenzas, extremely difficult, of course, were heard to great advantage, and he finished amid great enthusiasm. He will unquestionably prove to be a valuable addition to the orchestra, in which he plays a first violin.

The next number was a prelude, andante and gavotte by Bach, arranged for strings by Bachrich. It was a novelty in Boston. The movements are very attractive, more popular in character, perhaps, than most of the old masters' compositions. The gavotte was rendered beautifully; the other movements were heavy and colorless and dragged.

The symphony, also a novelty, was by Volkmann. While the performance could be vastly improved, the work, as a musical composition, was a disappointment. Its four movements are all in the same spirit, and while pleasing snatches of melody and good instrumentation appear here and there, the general impression given by a single hearing is that of bombast and sentimentality mixed together. It seems to be more the cold creation of the intellect than the spontaneous product of a well-guided fancy. One cannot help wondering, when it is all done, what Volkmann wrote it for.

Following is the programme for the next concert: Cherubini, overture ("Anacreon"); Rob. Fuchs, Serenade No. 2, in C major (first time); Raff, "The Dream King and his Love" (song with orchestra); Beethoven, overture ("Coriolanus"); Grieg, (a) "The Old Song"; (b) "Autumnal Gale" (songs, with piano); Mendelssohn, symphony in A major; soloist, Miss Ita Welsh.

The interest in the symphony concerts is indicated in the fact that both B. J. Laug, the pianist, and George W. Chadwick, the composer, are giving series of lectures explaining and illustrating the structure of the Beethoven symphonies as they come. Professor John K. Paine, of Harvard University, also announces a series of musical lectures illustrating the eminent composers from the earliest classic periods to Wagner.

STAGE AND CONCERT HALL.

First of the Season's Symphony Concerts at Music Hall.

The first of the season's series of 24 symphony concerts was given at Music Hall last evening, under the direction of Herr Wilhelm Gericke, and with Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg, violinist, as the soloist. The programme was: Overture, ("Leonore," No. 3).....Beethoven
Concerto for violin in A minor.....Vieuxtemps
Prelude, andante and gavotte.....Joh. Seb. Bach
Symphony in D minor.....Rob. Volkmann

The interest of the occasion naturally centered in the appearance and ability of Herr Wilhelm Gericke, the new conductor who has been summoned from his position as associate director at the Grand Opera, Vienna, by Mr. Higginson, to fill the place left vacant by the retirement of Mr. Georg Henschel. The reception given Herr Gericke as he came forward to assume the duties of his new position was worthy the hospitable character of the city, and it was evident that a friendly audience awaited a demonstration of his abilities. Had it been otherwise, however, there is little doubt but that the result would have been the same, as Herr Gericke's talent is of such a positive nature that it commands instant recognition. His figure, though somewhat below the average stature, is so well poised, as he stands at the conductor's desk, and his use of the baton has such an air of absolute command, that a feeling of confidence is instantly given, and the orchestra appears to be but a single well constructed instrument entirely at the control of its director. It was easy to see that there was more than a mechanical following of the director's lead by the musicians, as an esprit de corps was clearly manifest in all the work of the evening. The grand style in which the ever welcome "Leonore" overture was played removed all doubts of the value of Herr Gericke as a director, as a better presentation of this great composition has rarely been heard here. All the effects called for by the score were given with faultless precision, expression and feeling, and there was a vitality and strength in the presentation of the work which gave unqualified pleasure. The surprise of the evening was caused by the soloist, Mr. Lichtenberg, a violinist, who has for two seasons maintained his place among the first violins of the orchestra with a modesty seldom associated with so much talent. Mr. Lichtenberg was, however, well rewarded for his quiet persistence in refusing all the overtures made him in former seasons to appear as a soloist, as his triumph last evening was one for any artist to take pride in. With an almost faultless technique, his tone is pure, at all times true, and with a strength and breadth seldom gained by so young a performer. His bowing is graceful, clear and confident, his phrasing clear and intelligent, and he gives to all his work the touch of a genius. The reward given the artist by the audience was worthy the work done, and he was called to again and again bow his thanks for the applause following his number. The Bach prelude, andante and gavotte, arranged for strings by Bachrich, was heard for the first time here, and made a most delightful impression. The arrangement is an admirable one, and the manner of the presentation of the composition was worthy its sterling merit. The body of strings in the orchestra has been increased somewhat since last year, there being now 14 first and 14 second violins, 10 violas, etc., and the quality of tone given out by the players in this number was of the best. The strong contrasts of light and shade in the presentaon of the gavotta movement showed clearly the control exercised by the conductor over his men, and the first part of the programme was in this way brought to such an ending that a scene of general congratulation followed. It would be pleasant to continue these complimentary remarks and say that Herr Gericke's choice of an opening symphony was also a subject for commendation. Such cannot, however, be said to be the case with the D minor symphony of Volkmann. Like many another composer, Volkmann has the talent to do much that is good, but lacks the tact demanded to utilize this talent judiciously. If he had been satisfied to have rested when he had completed the allegro of this symphony, and given it to the world as an overture, there would be good reason to commend him for having utilized some of Beethoven's best ideas in a very clever way. The andante could also be praised if it had been presented as a romance, and the wood wind instruments had been in better accord than last evening, but neither the scherzo nor the finale have merits sufficient to call for any extended praise. This choice of a symphony appeared to be the result of the unhealthy craving for novelties which Mr. Henschel was wont to exhibit at times in his programme selections, and it is to be hoped that, if novelties must be had, they will in the future be sought in the neglected scores of the older composers, whose works better repay study. It was gratifying to note that the acoustics of the hall have been improved by the removal of the organ—at least, such was the effect shown from the centre of the house on the floor, the most delicate passages being heard with perfect accuracy, and the volume of tone in the forte passages being more effective than when the organ was in the hall. Many vacant seats were noted in all parts of the auditorium, but the audience attending included most of the regular patrons of former seasons.

20
22
28

MUSICAL.

First Symphony Concert.

The first of this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall last night before a very fine audience. There were more vacant seats on the floor than we expected to see, but the rest of the house was very full. The stage looked rather empty in the absence of the organ that had held its place there so long; but it must be frankly conceded that the open space gained, greatly enhanced the effect of the music. The occasion was interesting as the first concert under the direction of the new conductor, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, who upon his appearance was received with a storm of applause which was marked by a heartiness that left no doubt of its sincerity and spontaneity. Herr Gericke has arranged the orchestra in an admirable manner. The strings are seated so that their effect is massed with the best possible results. The wood wind is in the centre, and the horns and trumpets are behind these. The double basses make an unbroken line across the back. The trombones and drums are at the back, on the extreme left. The volume, richness and closeness of tone produced was much finer than any we have heard in Music Hall. Herr Gericke made a wholly favorable impression. His bearing is quiet, unassuming and refined, and his conducting is firm and decisive, and shows in every essential a thorough knowledge of his art. It is without a trace of affectation, and is free from all that can be construed into a desire for display. He leads with spirit, and in a strong and vital manner. His work is delightfully frank and straightforward; sensible and musicianly. The orchestra followed him swiftly and sympathetically, and he held it completely under control through the whole concert, and obedient to every light and shade of expression he wished to draw from it. It is difficult to say the extent of his gifts as an interpreter, but he made it fully manifest that he is a conductor of rare skill, and in all that he does there is a confidence that inspires a similar feeling in both his orchestra and his audience. The latter was warm in its acknowledgments of the pleasure Herr Gericke had afforded it. Judged by his first concert, there is every reason to believe that the new conductor will prove an addition of the highest value to the list of our resident musicians. The pressure upon our space forbids as detailed an account as we would like to give of this exceptionally interesting concert. We can only refer briefly to the works. The first selection was Beethoven's Overture to Leonore (No. 3.) It was read in a clean-cut, thoughtful and brilliant manner. It was elaborated, in respect to expression, somewhat more, perhaps, than was intended by the composer, and there were changes of tempo that were new to us, but nothing that was not self-consistent with the work. The concluding portions of the overture were given with thrilling spirit and effect. A Prelude, Andante and Gavotte, by Bach, arranged for strings by Bachrick, who has performed his task delightfully, was played with delicious crispness, vigor and precision. The gavotte, in particular, was given with a piquancy, force and character that were charming. The symphony, which, by the way, ended the concert was by Volkmann, and in D-minor. It is a remarkably fine work, lofty in aim, clear, abundant in grace, flexibility and beauties of the highest order. It is one of the most healthy works of the new school that we have heard of late, in the absence of all mere groping for effect, and the pursuit of originality at any cost. The opening movement is bold and fiery, with something in its brief opening theme that calls to mind the first movement of the C-minor symphony. The adagio is poetic in the best sense of the word, is pleasing and broad in melody, and is scored with rare warmth and delicacy. The scherzo calls Beethoven to mind again in its opening. The trio of this portion of the work is lovely in its grace and tenderness. The finale, like the opening, is vigorous, broad and imposing. The work made a wholly favorable impression. It was played from beginning to end without a flaw. The soloist was Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg, who performed Vieuxtemps' fine and amazingly difficult concerto for violin in A-minor. This young artist was a genuine surprise to all who heard him. He has a large, full tone, an exquisitely pure intonation, a style of breadth and the highest refinement. His bow is large and free, and he plays with the noble, confident sweep of a young master, and with entire absence of anything even remotely resembling trickery. His technique is remarkable in its brilliancy and certainty. The performer was called for again and again, amid the most enthusiastic, appreciative and deserved applause. The concert was a pronounced success, and Herr Gericke inaugurated his career in a manner that reflected the highest credit on himself and the orchestra, with which he has done so much in so short a time. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; Serenade, C-major, Robert Fuchs; "The Dream," and his Love, Song with orchestra, by Raff; Overture, "Coriolan," Beethoven; Songs by Grieg, and Schumann's Symphony in A-major. The soloist will be Miss Ita Welsh.

MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was begun successfully at Music Hall yesterday night. There were many unfamiliar events connected with the opening: the conductor was new; the hall seemed new without its great organ as a background, and the arrangement of the programme to end with a symphony instead of a light overture or march was also novel to our concert-goers. It is safe to say that the audience became reconciled to all these novelties before the concert was finished. Mr. Gericke was greeted with a generous burst of applause as he stepped upon the stage, and this greeting, by the way, was echoed from across the ocean; for shortly before he stepped upon the stand he was handed a cable dispatch conveying to him the best wishes of his Vienna colleagues. It is not our purpose to institute comparisons between the new conductor and his predecessor. Suffice it to say that we consider Mr. Gericke a thorough leader, having a broad and expressive beat, a musician's comprehension of the works he is presenting, and a director who will present the master works without any capricious effects. It was pleasant already in the beginning, to find the contrabasses in their proper position at the back of the orchestra, and the cellos and violas massed together. The wood wind however, seemed somewhat weak in the "Leonore Overture," spite of its being in the centre, near the conductor. The "Leonore Overture, No. 3," best of all the four "Leonara Fidelio" overtures, fitly began the concert. At first there were some roughness apparent, but that was to be expected from a new orchestra and a conductor making his debut. The violin figure which comes near the finale, spite of its difficulty was finely rendered. The soloist of the evening was Mr. Lichtenburg, one of the members of the orchestra, a splendid violinist of the Belgian school whose playing on this occasion won an absolute triumph, which was enhanced by the modesty of his hearing. In every direction the young artist seemed flawless. His tone was pure and true even in the most difficult passages. His double-stopping was marvellously clear, his harmonies without break, and his legato playing sweet and effective. The brilliant cadenza was very clearly given. Following the violin concerto — Vieuxtemps A minor — came an arrangement for strings of a Bach Prelude, Andante, and Gavotte, (from one of his violin works we believe) which showed how excellently the enlarged force of the strings may be expected to work. The shading was excellent, and the rapid changes both of color and temps showed that the conductor had the orchestra well in hand. The pieces too, were admirably calculated to disabuse the audience of their fear of Bach as a musical pedant. They certainly made as marked and pleasant an effect as a modern waltz could have done. A Symphony by Volkmann, in D minor, new to Boston was the piece de resistance of the concert, and closed the programme. In this the orchestra and conductor both showed their stamina, the only notable defect being a slight irregularity in the Scherzo. The symphony pleases us more than the one in B flat, heard in Boston last season. Its form is clear, its themes striking, its contrasts strong, and its development massive and grand. Its first movement opens with a very pronounced figure of five notes given in unison; just such a figure as Grieg would have delighted to use. Volkmann treats this thematically. It gradually quickens, and flows into a calmer side theme, but still the muttering of the first figure is heard on the violincellos. A secondary theme of sweetest character follows this, and after a short closing and theme, a strong but short development follows. A fine effect is produced by allowing this strange first figure to appear unsupported, and twice repeated as the symphony end of the movement. The second movement opens with a clarinet soliloquy of ineffable tenderness, which was excellently performed, followed by a theme by the entire wood wind. One of the most marked and beautiful effects of this movement is a constantly recurring note-organ-point on the horn against the violin's pianissimo. The Scherzo begins in a most turbulent fashion, but is followed by some well-constructed and quieter string work. The programme announced that those who desired could leave before the last movement, but Mr. Gericke seemed to leave out-of-towners to their fate, for he immediately plunged into the finale. This portion of the work seemed less strong than the preceding movements until its close when the themes were wrought up in a very grand manner. It made a very lofty end to the concert, and we doubt whether any auditor sighed for any light music after its noble measures. To sum up, the concerts seem to be upon a higher plane than ever before, and there seems to be as keen an interest and a more intelligent comprehension of the music, on the part of the audience. Next week Mendelssohn's a major symphony will close the programme.

Musical.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The well-filled Music Hall Saturday evening presented an unusually genial appearance. Another series of Boston symphony concerts opened most auspiciously. To the surprise of many, no doubt, the absence of the big, the too big, organ greatly improved the appearance of the hall. As the new conductor advanced to the front of the stage he was greeted by as cordial and complimentary an ovation as any Boston audience could bestow. It was not an inexperienced conductor receiving applause by way of encouragement, as on a previous occasion, but the conductor in the present instance was honored because of his reputation. It was from the standpoints of experience and ability that his lead could be commented upon and appreciated. He was in a position where he could either disappoint unfavorably, or else prove, as was the case, how worthily his high rank had been gained. As regards personnel, his bearing at the head of his orchestra was as conspicuous in points of modesty and dignity as it was prepossessing. Undemonstrative yet all the more effectual in his lead, it seemed to be his aim to excite admiration for the effects he produced, thereby leaving the hearer entirely unconscious of a sense of gratitude until the performance was concluded. That there must be a conductor at the head of a performance seems as a necessary evil, but in Herr Gericke's case the evil is welcomed and enjoyed from an indisputably artistic standpoint.

The concert opened with Beethoven's overture to Leonora, No. 3. The reading differed, and very acceptably, from any other that has been given here. The allegro tempo was taken at an unusually fast rate of speed, which was only hurried or retarded in accordance with the promptings of an exceedingly unique and impassioned yet thoughtful interpretation that in all its originality was not for one moment disrespectful to the spirit of the work. The use made of the tempo rubato was in a high sense just. It did not thwart its own object by any unsteadiness of nerve, but appeared throughout as methodical and legitimate as it was essentially artistic. The orchestra appreciated the tempo of the lead to the extent of a most prompt, unanimous and inspiring response to its every gradation. An equally commendable result of the lead was noticeable in light and shade effects such as were absolutely without parallel in the record of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Similar improvement was noticed in the performance of a prelude, andante and gavotte by J. S. Bach. The performance had but a single shortcoming in the prelude, where the second violins were almost constantly behind time; but the expression was fervent and charmingly graded, so that the various movements of the suite were heard at most delightful advantage of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Following the Bach suite, Vieuxtemps' A minor concerto was next in order. Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg was the soloist. Every phase of his performance illustrated a high order of mastery, and whether it displayed itself in his large and noble quality of tone, or in execution most facile, it was invariably replete with artistic suggestions. In point of technique it was simply a wonderful effort, and while its expression did not seem sufficiently impassioned at times, it by no means lacked a higher order of feeling, such as artists and musicians will invariably appreciate. Mr. Lichtenberg has every reason to take pride in his effort, not only because of his artistic and scholarly merit, but for other reasons,—the acknowledgment it received from a critical and cultivated audience being unusually enthusiastic and prolonged. The concluding piece of the concert was a symphony in D minor by Robert Volkmann, which we are enabled only to refer to as a very broad, noble and interesting specimen of the symphonic art, the performance of which throughout was in a high degree worthy.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. The Season Brilliantly Inaugurated Last Evening, at Music Hall.

A fine audience gathered, last evening, in Music Hall, when the opening concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given, with the following programme: Overture (Leonora No. 3), Beethoven; Concerto for Violin in A-minor, Vieuxtemps; Prelude—Andante and Gavotte (first time), John Seb. Bach; Symphony in D-minor (first time), Volkmann. The improvements in the hall elicited general commendation, and Herr Gericke was accorded a cordial welcome to his new position, and he made a most favorable impression. The lateness of the hour and unusual pressure upon our columns forbids a detailed criticism of the performance; but we cannot omit a word of deserved praise for the soloist of the evening, Herr Leopold Lichtenberg, for the past two seasons a regular member of the orchestra. Although but 22 years of age, the soloist has been before the public, in this country and abroad, since he was 12 years old; but he has not been heard in Boston for a number of years. Herr Lichtenberg played Vieuxtemps' fifth concerto, which has not been heard in this city since it was performed here by Wieniawski, the instructor of Herr Lichtenberg, who was pronounced by his teacher the peer of any violinist. Herr Lichtenberg's playing was marked by fluent technique, fullness, purity and sweetness of tone, dignity of style, simplicity, rare intelligence, fine feeling and a perfect mastery of the instrument. The extreme difficulties of the work were met with rare ease and grace, and beauty was not sacrificed to sustained power, but made, rather, to become its constant companion. The cadenzas were given with notable breadth, clearness, brilliancy and finish, and made an impression no less favorable upon the members of the orchestra than upon the audience. In fact, the performer's technical skill and artistic perception were so well displayed as to centre the interest upon the artist rather than upon the great work itself. Not since the appearance of Wilhelmj has so thorough an artist been heard here; and it is a matter of congratulation that this talent has not permitted longer to be hidden in the ranks of the orchestra. The soloist aroused the greatest enthusiasm, and was applauded to the echo.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At last the Boston symphony orchestra has an adequate conductor—a man who is evidently capable of giving such direction to his forces and obtaining from them such results as are worthy of the liberal design and support of the founder of the organization, and creditable to the material of which that is composed. If we may judge by the first concert of the present series, given on Saturday evening, Mr. Gericke comes closely up to the standard of the ideal conductor, and his direction will be a reward to the patient, who bore without murmuring the shortcomings of his predecessor, as well as a reproof to the impatience of those who believed Mr. Higginson to be thoroughly content with that gentleman, and disinclined to make any change which should displace him. It was worth while to wait, even in some exasperation of soul, since so large a good was in store; and it is no disparagement of the excellent merits of those conductors whom Boston has had, and still has, in honor, to say that Mr. Gericke will undoubtedly prove to be just the man whom the musical public has desired to see in this particular position. He brings large experience in the various departments of his work, and he enters upon his engagement free from local acquaintanceships, which often imply prejudice or favor on the part of a leader, and familiarity and qualified obedience on the part of a band. His manner inspires respect and confidence; it is easy, simple and graceful, but it is also significant and strong; when the music flows smoothly on, it is content with the slightest indication of his desire; when an important moment approaches, there are in it a decision and power which will be obeyed. His readings appear excellent in respect, both to sense and sentiment, and when he shows the spirit of the modern school of conductors in varying slightly the set tempo of a movement as its feeling rises or falls, it is because he so wills it, and it is only for the moment, the equitable rhythm being restored at once. There is no want of magnetism in him, and he obtains a poetry of effect which has hitherto seemed unattainable by any resident director. The orchestra evidently felt the spirit of a master, and their performance was remarkable for its unity of movement and of sentiment, and for a hundred fine gradations of tone, as well as for a warmth and fulness which indicated their own strong personal interest.

The programme was an agreeably short one, ending with the symphony, as is apparently Mr. Gericke's plan for these concerts. It began with a noble and richly varied rendering of Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, the third; and its next full number was a suite by J. S. Bach, prelude, andante and gavotte, arranged for strings by Bachrich, which proved a delightful treat. The closeness of the harmony and the relations of the different voices were most clearly apparent in the arrangement, and the bright beauty of the third movement, quite akin in spirit to "My heart ever faithful," was given with a graceful earnestness which we shall now long to hear imparted to that air.

The symphony was a new one—Robert Volkmann's in D minor,—a work well worth bearing and full of interest. Although the first two movements are the most striking, an unusual unity of feeling pervades the work and gives it an impressive consistency. It is bold and strong and sometimes strange, and, further, full of contrasts that suggest the conflicts of an eager, aspiring disposition, which now makes almost fierce efforts and then gives itself over to dreamy calm, or yet again falls into moments that are almost mournful. It is frequent in rushing, upreaching unisons, which touch their climax in a sharp diminished chord, and again in reiterated monotonous, across which chromatic harmonies creep slowly; and has long sustained melodies, more like romances than simple themes, and it has short, abrupt, detached assertions, marked with an accent that is nothing less than imperative. The scherzo is only such in name, and although its ending is odd and piquant and its accent diversified by unexpected syncopations, its general vein is sombre and almost melancholy. While there is no repetition and no monotonousness of treatment in the symphony as a whole, yet the first movement, an allegro, might well be detached from the sequence and preserved as an epitome of the work. It might be fancifully a prelude to some great warlike drama. It begins with groups of those great unisons and chords of which we have just spoken, which come as blows of iron on a fortress door; then over a trembling in the strings come plaintive phrases in the wind, as of anxious, yet not despairing, thoughts, which are swept away as the strings rise from their murmuring, and rush away to resume and reinforce the opening theme; the tides of feeling and of action ebb and flow, and sometimes the basses are busy with brief responsive phrases as of parley, while a steady murmuring undercurrent sounds like the deep rumbling sea-voices of Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," the urgent basses persist and grow, and with a martial tread, like that of grand but not cruel triumph, the strong dominant phrase, with whirl and clash of harmony, reaches its loud and splendid ending. The form of some of the other movements, particularly the andante and the finale, suggest to the ear less symphonic than rhapsodic music, and the themes are sometimes fragmentarily treated and passed in incomplete form from instrument to instrument, thus developing less their intellectual than their emotional value; but the work is still one full of fresh and real thought, wrought out with musician's hand, and there is much feeling in it which justly arouses sympathy and stirs interest to know more of its composer.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg, who has been an unassuming member of the first violins, and who at last comes forward into his true place as a player of fine power and color. His selection was Vieuxtemps' A minor concerto, and in this he displayed masterly qualities—rich, searching tone, clearly recognizable even against a full accompaniment, beautiful intonation, artistic and easy bowing, and most distinct execution. The music of Vieuxtemps, with all its dash, is seldom fiery, and how much warmth Mr. Lichtenberg may possess, some subsequent performance must show. But as he exhibited so many of the fine qualities of his master, Wieniawski, it is fair

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth season of the Symphonic concerts inaugurated and sustained by the liberality of Mr. H. L. Higginson, has auspiciously begun in Boston. A new conductor, Mr. Wm. Gericke, and an enlarged orchestra made the occasion an especially interesting one. The programme presented was:—

Overture (Leonore, No. 3).....	Beethoven
Concerto for violin, in A minor.....	Vieuxtemps
Allegro non troppo, Adagio, Allegro con fuoco.
Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg.
Prelude, Andante and Gavotte.....	Joh. Seb. Bach
Arranged for strings by Bachrich.
(First time.)
Symphony in D minor.....	Rob. Volkmann
Allegro, Andante, Scherzo, Finale.
(First time.)

The list looks earnest and classical enough, yet it was not in any sense severe, and the interest was sustained to the very close, as was proved by the large audience listening intently, and making no effort to leave before the final chord had been played. The "Leonore Overture, No. 3," is certainly the most effective of the different overtures which Beethoven composed for his great opera, and was so well suited to begin the long series of twenty-four concerts as the "Weihe des Hauses," with which for the last three seasons the concerts have begun. The first part of the work was rather unclearly played, possibly because the conductor was making a debut, and many of the orchestra also appeared for the first time, but the difficult figure for strings at the close, and the finale generally, went finely. Mr. Gericke has a full, broad beat, easily understood and followed, and his readings seem to be just and conservative, and free from the caprices of his predecessors. Yet it is folly to begin comparisons. Mr. Henschel in the last season was a great advance over Mr. Henschel in his first year of orchestral conducting, for he served his apprenticeship—at $10,000 a year—in Boston. Mr. Lichtenberg's violin playing won an entire success. He played the difficult work in a sure and musicianly manner, with perfectly pure intonation, and without too much bravura. His double stopping, his harmonics, his firm bowing, all deserve commendation. The string arrangement of Bach's work was finely played by the orchestra. Its shading and its changes of tempo were brought out in a manner which showed how excellent the material of the orchestra was, and how well the conductor could control them. The work was so light and melodious that it must have been an absolute surprise to those who only think of Bach as the inventor of intricate contrapuntal devices.

The Symphony, however, was the climax of the concert. Its shape is clear and intelligible, and some of its themes strongly marked. The first movement, for example, opens with a figure of five notes which is as prominent as the great figure which opens Beethoven's fifth Symphony. This figure is announced in unison, and even after the commencement of the side theme it is still heard muttering in the bass, while at the close of the movement it reappears in quaint simplicity, and, twice repeated, makes a striking coda. The second movement is of the gentlest and tenderest character. Its most striking features are a beautiful clarinet solo, supported by pizzicato strings, and a constantly reiterated note (organ point) on the horn, which gives a very melancholy and sombre effect. The scherzo opens turbulently, but a quieter, and rather contrapuntal phrase sets in after. The finale seems comparatively weak at first, but as the last part of it approaches, the working-up of themes becomes very grand and massive. It forms a fitting end to a work which, spite of its brevity, is replete with ideas. The performance was, on the whole, a strong one. The clarinet solo of the second movement deserves especial praise, and the strings did very fine work in the first movement, as did the brasses in the finale, although the scherzo had some weak points. All in all, the first concert was an entire success, and conductor, orchestra, and arrangement of programme, all seemed to impress the audience favorably. The next concert offers:—

Overture (Anacreon).....	Cherubini
Serenade No. 2, in C major.....	Rob. Fuchs
Allegretto, Larghetto, Allegro, Presto.
(First time.)
"The Dream King and His Love".....	Raff
(Song with orchestra.)
Overtures (Coriolanus).....	Beethoven
a, The Old Song, {	Grieg
b, Autumnal Gale, {
(Songs, with piano.)
Symphony in A major.....	Mendelssohn
Allegro vivace, Andante con moto, Con moto moderato,
Saltarello (Presto.)

The new Brahms's Symphony will soon be heard in this course, and, as far as I can see, the Boston Symphony concerts are even on a higher plane than they have been in previous seasons.

L. C. E.

to deduce that he is not lacking in this.

The general value of the orchestral work has been enhanced by a slight increase in the number of violins and violas, and by a new disposition of the players. The string quartette is massed in four solid divisions, with a break in the centre, where the flutes and the clarinets come to the front of the semicircle. The wooden wind and brasses are behind the strings, the trumpets and trombones at the stage right, behind the first violins and cellos, and the double basses are in the rear of all, supplying thus, as they should, the background of the musical picture. The lowering of the stage and the regaining of that portion of the area taken up by the organ, have also restored the sonority of the hall as originally planned, and therefore the music again gains. The eye mourns the absence of the familiar organ façade, of course, and good taste is offended by the cheap and tawdry cotton stuff which fills the vacant wall space. There is an incongruity in being obliged to hear perfect music in a perfectly proportioned room and being compelled to see before one such rubbish as might better befit a minstrel show. There many seats vacant on the floor of out probably this was due to the action of Mr. John Gilbert's benefit, fully and fashionably attended. The programme will also be a reasonably good one, containing two overtures—"Cherubini" and Beethoven's "Coriolanus"—made by Robert Fuchs (first time); Mendelssohn's A major symphony, two songs by Raff and Grieg, for Miss

ti.....	6s
i.....	7 3-10s
olis.....	4 1-2s
ORCHI.....	5s
.....	6s

CONDUCTOR BY

HERS & CO.,

street.

6 Per Ct. Guaranteed, stituted by the vestment Co

ING, BOSTON.

ern Company.

ians, trustees, societies and ally who desire safety rather of interest, or pamphlets.

DEPOSITORS

interest with safety.

MARKET.

ore, No. 3).

IOLIN, in A minor.

lazio.—Allegro con fuoco.

NTE AND GAVOTTE.

by Bachrich.

Boston Music Hall.

Music Hall will appear much changed to those who enter it for the first time since last season. The removal of the organ has made a great addition to the size of the auditorium, and the rebuilding of the stage at a lower elevation and on an incline adds still more to the apparent size of the hall. The arched niche in the end of the hall, at the back of the platform, has been hung with a colored drapery, which gives a striking background for the statue of Beethoven, placed just in front of it. The opening cut in the left hand panelling, above the second balcony line, for the new organ, has been temporarily draped until the instrument is in place. The seating capacity of the auditorium has been increased about one hundred and fifty chairs on the floor, as well as by the additional value given to the side balconies by the removal of the organ.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth season of the Symphonic concerts inaugurated and sustained by the liberality of Mr. H. L. Higginson, has auspiciously begun in Boston. A new conductor, Mr. Wm. Gericke, and an enlarged orchestra made the occasion an especially interesting one. The programme presented was:—

Overture (Leonore, No. 3).....	Beethoven
Concerto for violin, in A minor.....	Vieuxtemps
Allegro non troppo, Adagio, Allegro con fuoco.
Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg.
Prelude, Andante and Gavotte.....	Joh. Seb. Bach
Arranged for strings by Bachrich.
(First time.)
Symphony in D minor.....	Rob. Volkmann
Allegro, Andante, Scherzo, Finale.
(First time.)

The list looks earnest and classical enough, yet it was not in any sense severe, and the interest was sustained to the very close, as was proved by the large audience listening intently, and making no effort to leave before the final chord had been played. The "Leonore Overture, No. 3," is certainly the most effective of the different overtures which Beethoven composed for his great opera, and was so well suited to begin the long series of twenty-four concerts as the "Weihe des Hauses," with which for the last three seasons the concerts have begun. The first part of the work was rather unclearly played, possibly because the conductor was making a debut, and many of the orchestra also appeared for the first time, but the difficult figure for strings at the close, and the finale generally, went finely. Mr. Gericke has a full, broad beat, easily understood and followed, and his readings seem to be just and conservative, and free from the caprices of his predecessors. Yet it is folly to begin comparisons. Mr. Henschel in the last season was a great advance over Mr. Henschel in his first year of orchestral conducting, for he served his apprenticeship—at $10,000 a year—in Boston. Mr. Lichtenberg's violin playing won an entire success. He played the difficult work in a sure and musicianly manner, with perfectly pure intonation, and without too much bravura. His double stopping, his harmonics, his firm bowing, all deserve commendation. The string arrangement of Bach's work was finely played by the orchestra. Its shading and its changes of tempo were brought out in a manner which showed how excellent the material of the orchestra was, and how well the conductor could control them. The work was so light and melodious that it must have been an absolute surprise to those who only think of Bach as the inventor of intricate contrapuntal devices.

The Symphony, however, was the climax of the concert. Its shape is clear and intelligible, and some of its themes strongly marked. The first movement, for example, opens with a figure of five notes which is as prominent as the great figure which opens Beethoven's fifth Symphony. This figure is announced in unison, and even at the commencement of the side theme it is still heard in the bass, while at the close of the movement it reappears in quaint simplicity, and, twice repeated, makes a coda. The second movement is of the gentlest and tenderest character. Its most striking features are a beautiful clarinet solo, supported by pizzicato strings, and a constantly reiterated note (organ point) on the horn, which gives a very melancholy and sombre effect. The scherzo follows turbulently, but a quieter, and rather contrapuntal part sets in after. The finale seems comparatively weak at first, but as the last part of it approaches, the working themes becomes very grand and massive. It forms a fitting end to a work which, spite of its brevity, is rich with ideas. The performance was, on the whole, a success. The clarinet solo of the second movement deserves especial praise, and the strings did very fine work in the first movement, as did the brasses in the finale, although the scherzo had some weak points. All in all, the concert was an entire success, and conductor, orchestra and arrangement of programme, all seemed to impress the audience favorably. The next concert offers:—

Overture (Anacreon).....	Cherubini
Serenade No. 2, in C major.....	Rob. Schumann
Allegretto, Larghetto, Allegro, Presto.
(First time.)
"The Dream King and His Love".....
(Song with orchestra.)
Overtures (Coriolanus).....	Beethoven
a, The Old Song, {
b, Autumnal Gale, {
(Songs, with piano.)
Symphony in A major.....	Mendelssohn
Allegro vivace, Andante con moto, Con moto moderato, Saltarello (Presto.)

The new Brahms's Symphony will soon be heard in this course, and, as far as I can see, the Boston Symphony concerts are even on a higher plane than they have been in previous seasons. L. C. E.

to deduce that he is not lacking in this.

The general value of the orchestral work has been enhanced by a slight increase in the number of violins and violas, and by a new disposition of the players. The string quartette is massed in four solid divisions, with a break in the centre, where the flutes and the clarinets come to the front of the semicircle. The wooden wind and brasses are behind the strings, the trumpets and trombones at the stage right, behind the first violins and cellos, and the double basses are in the rear of all, supplying thus, as they should, the background of the musical picture. The lowering of the stage and the regaining of that portion of the area taken up by the organ, have also restored the sonority of the hall as originally planned, and therefore the music again gains. The eye mourns the absence of the familiar organ façade, of course, and good taste is offended by the cheap and tawdry cotton stuff which fills the vacant wall space. There is an incongruity in being obliged to hear perfect music in a perfectly proportioned room and being compelled to see before one such rubbish as might better befit a minstrel show. There were a good many seats vacant on the floor of the house, but probably this was due to the counter attraction of Mr. John Gilbert's benefit, which was so fully and fashionably attended. The next programme will also be a reasonably brief one. It contains two overtures—Cherubini's "Anacreon" and Beethoven's "Coriolanus"; a serenade by Robert Fuchs (first time); Mendelssohn's A major symphony, two songs by Raff and Grieg, for Miss

MR. LANG'S SYMPHONY LECTURES.

Mr. B. J. Lang has the gift of happy thoughts. Last year it came to him that he had something to say about pianoforte music and pianoforte playing, which it might be well for him to speak and for others to hear. He was right, and his hints, æsthetic as well as plainly practical, were welcome and serviceable, even to many who never touch the keyboard. This year he has devised a series of 12 "symphony lectures," which are to be given on a dozen alternate Thursdays at Chickering's. Starting with the idea that not nearly so many persons, even among musical amateurs, enjoy symphonies as might do so, he proposes to take up regularly the symphonies which will be played in the regular Music Hall course, explain and analyze them, show the entrances and progressions of their themes, and give such helpful insight into the harmonic and instrumental structure of these compositions as shall make it a pleasant and easy thing to listen intelligently, and even critically to them. In doing this, the piano will be liberally used for illustration, and Mr. Lang further hopes that when a concerto for that instrument is to form part of a programme, he may be able sometimes to secure a reading of the solo part by the player of the evening, the orchestral score being reduced for accompaniment on a second piano. So excellent a scheme should fill every seat in the hall.

VIOLIN, in A minor.
Adagio.—Allegro con fuoco.

PRELUDE AND GAVOTTE.
by Bachrich.

Boston Music Hall.

Music Hall will appear much changed to those who enter it for the first time since last season. The removal of the organ has made a great addition to the size of the auditorium, and the rebuilding of the stage at a lower elevation and on an incline adds still more to the apparent size of the hall. The arched niche in the end of the hall, at the back of the platform, has been hung with a colored drapery, which gives a striking background for the statue of Beethoven, placed just in front of it. The opening cut in the left hand panelling, above the second balcony line, for the new organ, has been temporarily draped until the instrument is in place. The seating capacity of the auditorium has been increased about one hundred and fifty chairs on the floor, as well as by the additional value given to the side balconies by the removal of the organ.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.30, WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

CHERUBINI,

OVERTURE. (Anacreon).

RAFF,

"THE DREAM KING AND HIS LOVE."
(Song with Orchestra).

ROB. FUCHS,

SERENADE No. 2, in C major.
Allegretto.—Larghetto.—Allegro.—Presto.
(First time.)

GRIEG,

a) THE OLD SONG.
b) AUTUMNAL GALE.
(Songs, with Piano.)

MENDELSSOHN,

SYMPHONY in A major.
Allegro vivace.—Andante con moto.—
Con moto moderato.—Saltarello (Presto.)

SOLOIST:

MISS ITA WELSH.

THE DREAM-KING AND HIS LOVE. (SONG, WITH ORCHESTRA.)

Sweet slumbers the maiden in bower of peace,
On snowy, soft pillow reclining;
Upon her the June night balmily breathes
With perfume its coolness entwining.
Yon casement blossoms with roses bedight,
The lindens exhale their fragrance;
Scarce through the leaves can moon-
beams win,
With all their gold, an entrance.
But sudden, balmier grows the air,
Fire-flies their flambeaux are swinging;
The leaves are astir, and vocal the breeze
With softly melodious singing.
"Sweet love! sweet love! and hush thee to sleep,
'Neath midnight's silent pinions;
Dream-king will be thy lover brave,
Dream-king from elves' dominions."
Then shakes the sprite his raven locks,
His arms to the maiden advances;
And brightly on his royal crown
Full many a gem glances.
Then bends he him soft o'er the slumbering fair,
Fond kisses enjoying and craving;
And moves his golden enchanting wand
His circles airily waving.

But these as he wider extends, the room
Grows wide as a palace's spaces,
Where girt about with resplendent array,
Dream-king his love embraces.
The pillows of purple that swell the couch,
They yield but soft resistance;
Twin pages kneel at their bridal bed,
The lamp glows mild at a distance.
Beyond in his bright silver ring, a bird
Is rocking with pulses of pleasure,
He rocks himself soft as in sleep,
And sings a bride song in rapturous measure.
So Dream-king brave, with his sleeping love
In fondest caressing reposes;
Till gay their pillow the morning light
Bedecks with shimmering roses.
Then hies him the Elfin Prince soft away,
Round has the magic departed;
The maid, too, wakens and winsomely turns
Her cheek on which blushes have started.
But when she opens her eyelids large,
Tears their lashes encumber;
Then sighs she, then, presses her heart;
It was delight and love, but in slumber,
Emanuel Geibel.

THE OLD SONG. (DAS ALTE LIED.)

Long, long ago there lived a King,
His heart was sad, his hair was grey.
The poor old King, Alas! Alas!
He loved a maid, they say.
And long ago their song was sung
In tones so sweet, in tones so sad,
For both must die;
Must die for the love they had.

And long ago there lived a page,
His heart was light, fair was his hair.
He loved the maid they say;
He loved the fair young queen.

AUTUMNAL GALE. (HERBSTSTURM.)

In Summer the woods are so green,
With twitter of singing birds between,
Then sings the Storm King his mighty song,
Till leaflets and birds are a trembling throng.
Again in fury he sounds a blast,
And fading and pale they drop at last.
Another blast and now they fly
Afair in rain and sleet to die.
All are plundered by Autumn gale.
Winter will now the earth assail.
All is so cold, so waste, so bare,
Dying and death are everywhere.
Where art thou now, thou son of gold?
Ah! thou art taken by Storm King bold.
Pallor the cheeks of the roses cover:
Summer is over.

The poor folk love the autumn gale;
They gather the fagots from hill and vale,
Which winter, who seems so hard and Scatters abroad for winter's fuel. [cruel,
His mantle then (white and soft) is laid
Over the wounds the storm has made
And howe'er so strong the wind may blow,
The summer is coming again, we know.
From each little seed, O hear the cry,
"Who cares to live must die!"
From each little plant, O hear the shout,
"The sunshine is coming! Spring out!
Spring out!" [blow,
For howe'er so strongly the wind may
The summer is coming again, we know.
O joy, to see the first flower blow,
The first spring flower in latest snow.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The second symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Cherubini. Overture to "Anacreon."
Raff. "The Dream King and his Love," song with orchestra.
Robert Fuchs. Serenade No. 2, in C major.
Grieg. a. The Old Song.
b. Autumnal Gale.
Songs with pianoforte.
Mendelssohn. Symphony No. 4, in A major.
Miss Ita Welsh was the singer.

The excitement, stirred up by the circumstances in which the first concert was given, had abated by last Saturday evening, and the programme, as well as the playing, could be listened to on its own merits. While speaking of programmes, let it be said, by the way, that our Boston audiences are accustomed to have somewhat more precise information about the pieces to be played than Mr. Gericke sets down on the bills. We like to be told the key, opus-number and current title of the works performed. One new departure of Mr.
Gericke's in the matter of programme printing is excellent; he follows the German plan of putting the name of the composer before the title of the composition, instead of after it, as has been the custom here. It is not a matter of much importance, after all, but the spirit of the German plan is admirable. The name of the composer is what one naturally asks for first; the title of the composition is, comparatively, of secondary interest.

The playing of the "Anacreon" overture was perhaps the best thing the orchestra has done as yet under Mr. Gericke's baton. Not that it was technically, or otherwise, better played than other things, but that the peculiar excellence of the performance of just this work is especially noteworthy as pointing to a rare keenness and geniality of musical insight on the part of the conductor.
There have been few better instances of a perfect adaptation of that finesse, which characterizes the modern style of instrumental performance, to a composition entirely classical in character, and wholly devoid of even a tinge of modern romanticism. Mr. Gericke, while giving due weight to the somewhat formal beauty of the composition, brought out the inherent brilliancy and verve of the music in a manner which left nothing to be desired. May a comparison be made, the excuse for which lies only in its instructiveness? Many of us still remember the immense brilliancy, vigor and dash with which a Haydn symphony was played under Mr. Henschel at the first concert of the Symphony Orchestra three years ago. The immediate effect was prodigious; one felt, at first, like welcoming this dashing style of playing Haydn as a timely protest against those flaccid, dry renderings of the older orchestral music, which accentuate everything that is quaint and antiquated in it, and give one knows not what milk-for-babes flavor to the whole. One was rejoiced, at first, to find Mr.
Henschel showing us Haydn as a man with red blood in his veins. But, as the performance wore on, the counter-protest could not but come in its turn; those thundering climaxes, that Schumanesque fierceness of accent soon seemed too evidently out of place; in trying to make the performance virile and vigorous, Mr. Henschel infused a wholly modern and un-Haydnish spirit into the symphony, its true temper was distorted. Now, in playing the "Anacreon" overture, a work which, by its whole character, can well be compared with compositions by Haydn or Mozart, Mr. Gericke gave the music all its real brilliancy and dash, showed us Cherubini with red blood in his veins, as has been said, but at the same time never lost the essentially and characteristically classical spirit of the work. To some ears this overture, even apart from the admirable quality of the performance, was the most delightful thing in the concert. At every hearing of a work by Cherubini one feels more and more inclined to smile at the charge of "dryness" that is so often brought against him. It really seems as if people must, for generations, have listened to his music with prejudiced ears.

Cherubini is popularly known as a great contrapunctist, and there is a sacred legend that, to be a contrapunctist, a man must be "dry." Then there is the still current echo of the misappreciation of his music by the Paris opera-public, to whom his operas were, to a great extent, sheer caviare. But it is high time that this absurd legend of Cherubini's "dryness" should be buried in oblivion.

The Serenade by Fuchs is a spirited, taking work by a Viennese composer, who for some time was Mr. Gericke's colleague. There is an abundant of those piquant Romany-Magyar effects of rhythm in which the present school of Austrian writers delight. The serenade was superbly played, some of the string effects being startlingly vigorous; the violas in the opening phrases sounded positively like horns and trumpets.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony was played to general admiration. Although the thematic material of this symphony is of somewhat lighter and less serious character than that of its more favorite "Scotch" predecessor, the treatment of the themes is in general far more elaborate and complex. That bright, sunny first movement is quite a wonder of musical learning, and conceals a vast amount of exquisite art. The third movement, con moto moderato (reminding one a little of Mozart's "Bei Männern welche Liebe fühlen"), is a gem; the two horns and two bassoons in the middle part almost make one wish never to hear four horns again.

Miss Welsh sang Raff's long monody and the Grieg songs with great fervor of sentiment and in very careful style, albeit she laid herself somewhat open to the reproach of monotony. The selections were, perhaps, not of the wisest; the rather pallid tints of the Grieg songs appear wholly without richness in the vast Music Hall, and the Raff piece, in spite of much orchestral gorgeousness and one or two very effective climaxes (effective, but lugged in by the very hair), seems upon the whole a pretty futile piece of sentimentalism.

The next programme is:
Bargiel. Overture to "Medea."
Schubert. Grand Fantasia in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra, arranged by Liszt.
Berlioz. Le Bal (from the Symphonie Fantastique).
Beethoven. Symphony No. 1, in C major.
Mr. William H. Sherwood will be the pianist.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Herr Ger-icke's improvement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was again noticeable at the concert on Saturday evening. In this respect it was an interesting concert, though one that could have been somewhat improved in the programme if not in the selection of soloist. The following works were performed, Miss Ida
Welsh rendering the songs by Raff and Grieg:
Overture, "Anacreon".....Cherubini
Song, "The Dream King and His Love".....Raff
Serenade No. 2, in C major for strings...Rob Fuchs
Songs {a "The Old Song" }.....Grieg
Symphony in A major.....Mendelssohn

An analysis of the above programme shows that its noble overture afforded an isolated element of contrast, followed as it was by the poetic romance of Raff; the genial and melancholy serenade by Fuchs; some unique and pleasing songs by Grieg, and last but not least a symphony about as nice and cloying in its effects as an artist like Mendelssohn possibly could have created. The effect of such a programme could not have been otherwise than monotonous, for the good that it contained was more or less perverted by associations bearing such resemblances to each other as have been pointed out; and by faults of arrangement that are the inevitable characteristics of a superfluous symphony concert. A single exception to such a verdict is afforded by the royal and scholarly work of Cherubini. Anything from Cherubini is always welcome, unless it be the two or three very academic fugues that appear in his work in counterpoint. In such works as "Anacreon," such as only Cherubini could write, we find the highest order of skill controlled by grandeur and intensity of feeling.
In Handel's master-works the spiritual elements are more conspicuous, but are never expressed in such a masterly manner as is proverbial of either Bach or Cherubini. Surely comparisons are not odious between Bach, Handel and Cherubini. The three composers rank as the most successful of contrapuntists, of which three Cherubini was the greatest.
He could display more counterpoint at a less sacrifice of emotion than could either Bach or Handel. So in works like "Anacreon" musical art is illustrated in a manner that disarms the cavil of the mere purist. It commands his respect and warms his frigid temperament.
Upon him the thrill of emotion created by Cherubini's music is enforced; but it is naturally imbued by the genuine music lover whose demands are untainted by pedantry. Thus are two widely opposite tastes gratified to a degree that impels a mutual perception of the highest order of genius. The universality of a Beethoven could not accomplish more. Such traits of Cherubini's genius are suggested by the "Anacreon" overture. Its rendering, as well as the entire performance of the programme, fully justified the claims that are being made of Herr Gericke as a conductor, the orchestra responding with remarkable precision and unanimity to the lead of his baton. Other features in the performance had no doubt been so thoroughly performed at the rehearsals that their spontaneity at the concert reflected additional credit upon Herr Gericke. Miss Welch should have appeared in a less ambitious order of selection than the song by Raff, though in so doing, when she rendered the Grieg songs, she was but heard at a slightly improved advantage. The tones of her voice do not lack a certain quality of pathos, but the voice is used as though it were incapable of making any well-graded crescendo and diminuendo effects. A reference to this fault is not intended to imply that Miss Welsh is unmusical, as it is possible that her method of tone production does an injustice to her interpretive ability. It certainly did injustice to the Raff song, and even to the selections by Grieg. Her phrasing, however, is excellent, and she is evidently a most sincere and pains-taking vocalist. Home Journal

The Concert Room.

"Where you shall hear music."

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The second of the symphony concerts was less entertaining than the first, not because the playing was less good and animated, but because the programme offered comparatively little variety, even the vocal music failing to make any particular contrast to the general quietude of the whole.

Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, with which the evening began, is bright and agreeable, but it is not a strong work, while of Mendelssohn's A-major symphony, which ended the concert, only the last movement rises out of a level plane; and even that — the saltarello, so-called — although it is cast in a presto time, has not the dash and heat of its Italian prototype. The "Serenade" of Fuchs, which had its first introduction, showed no large range of fancy, and, being for strings alone, its four short movements gave a certain sense of monotony of sentiment in spite of their variations of form. The songs were Raff's "Dream King and his Bride," all in a calm, gentle strain, its mild and never erratic melody yielding in real interest to the poetic variety of the subdued obbligati with which it was accompanied, and the two other songs, Grieg's "Old Story" and "Autumnal Gale," being decidedly of a melancholy order. Miss Ida Welsh sang these songs well, but they were nevertheless ineffective, and her excellent care and taste did not show at their full value by any means.

The orchestra again did admirable work, and Mr. Gericke gave further proof of his fine appreciation of his music and his sure control of his forces. There was especial finesse in the long, slowly-developed phrases of the overture, and the largetto of the symphony received a delightfully delicate reading.

To-night the first Beethoven symphony will be played, and Mr. Sherwood will take part in Schubert's C-major fantasia, following the arrangement of Liszt.

MUSICAL.

Second Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There were not as many vacant seats as were to be seen at the opening concert. The programme was rather dull, and the performance did not excite very marked enthusiasm. That, however, was not the fault of the conductor, Herr Gericke, nor of the orchestra, for the work of both was admirably done. The new musical director increased and intensified the very favorable impression he made the week before by the steady-ness, the intelligence, the straightforwardness and the thorough mastery of his conducting, and by the certainty of his control over the materials at his command.
Cherubini's noble and ever-new Anacreon overture was read by him with fine breadth of style and beauty of effect, and with delightful clearness and dignity. The orchestra, especially the strings, acquitted itself with great spirit and brilliancy. A serenade by Robert Fuchs was played for the first time here. It is in four movements — is melodious, musicianly in sentiment, and abounding in grace of harmony and of instrumentation. It is, however, somewhat monotonous in style and color in spite of its many beauties. It is for strings only, and is very massive in effect at times. The interpretation accorded it may be praised in the warmest terms.
Mendelssohn's Symphony in A-major ended the concert. Herr Gericke's reading of this familiar work, which, by the way, is rapidly becoming old, was musicianly, spirited and effective. The opening allegro was given with inspiring force and brilliancy, as was also the finale. We have rarely heard a larger or more delicately shaded performance of the slow movements than was given on this occasion. The whole interpretation was in keen sympathy with the spirit of the work. The soloist was Miss Ida Welsh, who sang "The Dream King and his Love," a song with orchestra, by Raff. The work did not strike us as one of the composer's triumphs. There are some graceful and rich orchestral effects, but the song as a whole is not of special interest. In selecting it Miss Welsh undertook a task beyond her powers, and cannot be credited with the success she so earnestly tried to achieve. Later in the evening she sang two songs by Grieg, in which she fared better, but her voice is not large enough for the hall, where it sounds thin and unsympathetic. Herr Gericke played the piano accompaniments and with exquisite delicacy, refinement and grace. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Medea," Bargiel; "Le Bal," from Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 1. The soloist will be Mr. W. H. Sherwood, who will play Liszt's arrangement for piano and orchestra of Schubert's Fantasia in C major.

STAGE AND CONCERT HALL.

Second of the Season's Symphony Con- certs in Music Hall.

The second of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm
Gericke, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Ida Welsh, mezzo soprano, as soloist, and the following programme:

Overture, "Anacreon".....Cherubini
Song, "The Dream King and His Love".....Raff
Serenade No. 2, in C major for strings.....Rob Fuchs
Songs {a "The Old Song" }.....Grieg
Symphony in A major.....Mendelssohn

Apart from the individual merits of the several compositions, the programme, as a whole, was not well chosen, the element of contrast, so essential to enjoyment, being notably neglected in making the selections.
The placing of the symphony at the end of the numbers is an unwelcome departure from the programme form of the last three seasons, as it finds both hearers and players unfitted for the demands made by this the leading feature of each programme. The concert room is surely a place for recreation, and it seems to be a rational desire to leave it with a feeling that rest and enjoyment has been gained by attending. That some light trifle is better suited to produce such a feeling appears to be reasonable and entirely in keeping with the custom of giving fruits and ices to finish up the menu, rather than the roasts and the more solid dishes of the repast. Possibly the desire to have a certain proportion of what may be called musical sponge cake comes from an unhealthy appetite, but too much musical roast beef and plum pudding may produce disastrous results. The young are ever slow to realize the dangers of indigestion, and consequently the some large audiences will probably attend the rehearsals of the coming season, whatever Herr Gericke may provide for his musical leasts, but the large number of vacant seats at the opening concerts of the past two weeks indicates that the older and more conservative music lovers fear the results of continuing to overtax their powers in digesting the hearty musical food provided. Whatever difference of opinion may exist regarding the programme otherwise, there can be but little exception taken to the fashion of its presentation. In the symphony, which, by the way, has not had a hearing here in three years, the reading was characterized by a clearness and brilliancy which was at all times charming, and gave a vitality to all its many beauties. The marked contrast between the forms of the third movement and those of Mendelssohn's usual style gives color to the statement, said to have been made by the composer in a letter to his sister just after the first performance of the work in Paris. Mendelssohn was evidently in a confidential mood when he indited the latter, for he told his sister that, as he sat unknown among the auditors, when the third movement was concluded he heard all about him the name of "Beethoven." "And it was true," he added,

"I found it so beautiful I thought it a pity not to use it." The treatment of the Beethoven idea is, however, so much in the vein of Mendelssohn and so admirable in every way that the composer can hardly be accused of any slavish imitation of his great predecessor. The contribution to the programme from Rob Fuchs' works was heard for the first time. The composer is a Vienna musician of today, and has completed quite a number of smaller works. He has rather inaptly styled this a "serenade," as it might with more propriety be called a suite for strings. Of the four movements, one only,
the largetto, is distinctly in serenade form;
the first, allegretto, being more of the character of a patrol, the advance and retreat being plainly indicated. The last two movements, allegro and presto, have neither the beauty of form nor the originality of the opening portions of the work, all of which has a resemblance to the modern French school of writing. The beauties of the Cherubini overture are too familiar to call for comment. Miss Ida Welsh, always a welcome artist in the concert room, was unfortunate in her selections. Neither the singer's rare musical intelligence in its interpretation, nor the admirable orchestral setting of the Raff song, could make the composition other than a very commonplace effort, unworthy the time and labor demanded in its preparation; and the Grieg song, "Autumnal Gale," was equally uninteresting. Miss Welsh made one of her happiest efforts in "The Old Song," however, and Herr Gericke proved a very competent accompanist in both the latter selections.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Herr Gericke's improvement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was again noticeable at the concert on Saturday evening. In this respect it was an interesting concert, though one that could have been somewhat improved in the programme if not in the selection of soloist. The following works were performed, Miss Ida Welsh rendering the songs by Raff and Grieg: Overture, "Anacreon".....Cherubini Song, "The Dream King and His Love".....Raff Serenade No. 2, in C major for strings.....Rob Fuchs Songs, {a "The Old Song" }.....Grieg {b "Autumnal Guide" }.....Grieg Symphony in A major.....Mendelssohn

An analysis of the above programme shows that its noble overture afforded an isolated element of contrast, followed as it was by the poetic romance of Raff; the genial and melodious serenade by Fuchs; some unique and pleasing songs by Grieg, and last but not least a symphony about as nice and cloying in its effects as an artist like Mendelssohn possibly could have created. The effect of such a programme could not have been otherwise than monotonous, for the good that it contained was more or less perverted by associations bearing such resemblances to each other as have been pointed out; and by faults of arrangement that are the inevitable characteristics of a superfluous symphony concert. A single exception to such a verdict is afforded by the royal and scholarly work of Cherubini. Anything from Cherubini is always welcome, unless it be the two or three very academic fugues that appear in his work in counterpoint. In such works as "Anacreon," such as only Cherubini could write, we find the highest order of skill controlled by grandeur and intensity of feeling. In Handel's master-works the spiritual elements are more conspicuous, but are never expressed in such a masterly manner as is proverbial of either Bach or Cherubini. Surely comparisons are not odious between Bach, Handel and Cherubini. The three composers rank as the most successful of contrapuntists, of which three Cherubini was the greatest. He could display more counterpoint at a less sacrifice of emotion than could either Bach or Handel. So in works like "Anacreon" musical art is illustrated in a manner that disarms the cavil of the mere purist. It commands his respect and warms his frigid temperament. Upon him the thrill of emotion created by Cherubini's music is enforced; but it is naturally imbibed by the genuine music lover whose demands are untainted by pedantry. Thus are two widely opposite tastes gratified to a degree that impels a mutual perception of the highest order of genius. The universality of a Beethoven could not accomplish more. Such traits of Cherubini's genius are suggested by the "Anacreon" overture. Its rendering, as well as the entire performance of the programme, fully justified the claims that are being made of Herr Gericke as a conductor, the orchestra responding with remarkable precision and unanimity to the lead of his baton. Other features in the performance had no doubt been so thoroughly performed at the rehearsals that their spontaneity at the concert reflected additional credit upon Herr Gericke. Miss Welsh should have appeared in a less ambitious order of selection than the song by Raff, though in so doing, when she rendered the Grieg songs, she was but heard at a slightly improved advantage. The tones of her voice do not lack a certain quality of pathos, but the voice is used as though it were incapable of making any well-graded crescendo and diminuendo effects. A reference to this fault is not intended to imply that Miss Welsh is unmusical, as it is possible that her method of tone production does an injustice to her interpretive ability. It certainly did injustice to the Raff song, and even to the selections by Grieg. Her phrasing, however, is excellent, and she is evidently a most sincere and painstaking vocalist. Hon. Journal

The Concert Room.

"Where you shall hear music."

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The second of the symphony concerts was less entertaining than the first, not because the playing was less good and animated, but because the programme offered comparatively little variety, even the vocal music failing to make any particular contrast to the general quietude of the whole.

Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, with which the evening began, is bright and agreeable, but it is not a strong work, while of Mendelssohn's A-major symphony, which ended the concert, only the last movement rises out of a level plane; and even that—the saltarello, so-called—although it is cast in a presto time, has not the dash and heat of its Italian prototype. The "Serenade" of Fuchs, which had its first introduction, showed no large range of fancy, and, being for strings alone, its four short movements gave a certain sense of monotony of sentiment in spite of their variations of form. The songs were Raff's "Dream King and his Bride," all in a calm, gentle strain, its mild and never erratic melody yielding in real interest to the poetic variety of the subdued obbligati with which it was accompanied, and the two other songs, Grieg's "Old Story" and "Autumnal Gale," being decidedly of a melancholy order. Miss Ida Welsh sang these songs well, but they were nevertheless ineffective, and her excellent care and taste did not show at their full value by any means.

The orchestra again did admirable work, and Mr. Gericke gave further proof of his fine appreciation of his music and his sure control of his forces. There was especial finesse in the long, slowly-developed phrases of the overture, and the larghetto of the symphony received a delightfully delicate reading.

To-night the first Beethoven symphony will be played, and Mr. Sherwood will take part in Schubert's C-major fantasia, following the arrangement of Liszt.

MUSICAL.

Second Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There were not as many vacant seats as were to be seen at the opening concert. The programme was rather dull, and the performance did not excite very marked enthusiasm. That, however, was not the fault of the conductor, Herr Gericke, nor of the orchestra, for the work of both was admirably done. The new musical director increased and intensified the very favorable impression he made the week before by the steadiness, the intelligence, the straightforwardness and the thorough mastery of his conducting, and by the certainty of his control over the materials at his command. Cherubini's noble and ever-new Anacreon overture was read by him with fine breadth of style and beauty of effect, and with delightful clearness and dignity. The orchestra, especially the strings, acquitted itself with great spirit and brilliancy. A serenade by Robert Fuchs was played for the first time here. It is in four movements—is melodious, musicianly in sentiment, and abounding in grace of harmony and of instrumentation. It is, however, somewhat monotonous in style and color in spite of its many beauties. It is for strings only, and is very massive in effect at times. The interpretation accorded it may be praised in the warmest terms. Mendelssohn's Symphony in A-major ended the concert. Herr Gericke's reading of this familiar work, which, by the way, is rapidly becoming old, was musicianly, spirited and effective. The opening allegro was given with inspiring force and brilliancy, as was also the finale. We have rarely heard a larger or more delicately shaded performance of the slow movements than was given on this occasion. The whole interpretation was in keen sympathy with the spirit of the work. The soloist was Miss Ita Welsh, who sang "The Dream King and his Love," a song with orchestra, by Raff. The work did not strike us as one of the composer's triumphs. There are some graceful and rich orchestral effects, but the song as a whole is not of special interest. In selecting it Miss Welsh undertook a task beyond her powers, and cannot be credited with the success she so earnestly tried to achieve. Later in the evening she sang two songs by Grieg, in which she fared better, but her voice is not large enough for the hall, where it sounds thin and unsympathetic. Herr Gericke played the piano accompaniments and with exquisite delicacy, refinement and grace. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Medea," Bargiel; "Le Bal," from Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 1. The soloist will be Mr. W. H. Sherwood, who will play Liszt's arrangement for piano and orchestra of Schubert's Fantasia in C major.

STAGE AND CONCERT HALL.

Second of the Season's Symphony Concerts in Music Hall.

The second of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Ita Welsh, mezzo soprano, as soloist, and the following programme:

Overture, "Anacreon".....Cherubini Song, "The Dream King and His Love".....Raff Serenade No. 2, in C major for strings.....Rob Fuchs Songs, {a "The Old Song" }.....Grieg {b "Autumnal Gale" }.....Grieg Symphony in A major.....Mendelssohn

Apart from the individual merits of the several compositions, the programme, as a whole, was not well chosen, the element of contrast, so essential to enjoyment, being notably neglected in making the selections. The placing of the symphony at the end of the numbers is an unwelcome departure from the programme form of the last three seasons, as it finds both hearers and players unfitted for the demands made by this the leading feature of each programme. The concert room is surely a place for recreation, and it seems to be a rational desire to leave it with a feeling that rest and enjoyment has been gained by attending. That some light trifle is better suited to produce such a feeling appears to be reasonable and entirely in keeping with the custom of giving fruits and ices to finish up the menu, rather than the roasts and the more solid dishes of the repast. Possibly the desire to have a certain proportion of what may be called musical sponge cake comes from an unhealthy appetite, but too much musical roast beef and plum pudding may produce disastrous results. The young are ever slow to realize the dangers of indigestion, and consequently the some large audiences will probably attend the rehearsals of the coming season, whatever Herr Gericke may provide for his musical feasts, but the large number of vacant seats at the opening concerts of the past two weeks indicates that the older and more conservative music lovers fear the results of continuing to overtax their powers in digesting the hearty musical food provided. Whatever difference of opinion may exist regarding the programme otherwise, there can be but little exception taken to the fashion of its presentation. In the symphony, which, by the way, has not had a hearing here in three years, the reading was characterized by a clearness and brilliancy which was at all times charming, and gave a vitality to all its many beauties. The marked contrast between the forms of the third movement and those of Mendelssohn's usual style gives color to the statement, said to have been made by the composer in a letter to his sister just after the first performance of the work in Paris. Mendelssohn was evidently in a confidential mood when he indited the latter, for he told his sister that, as he sat unknown among the auditors, when the third movement was concluded he heard all about him the name of "Beethoven." "And it was true," he added, "I found it so beautiful I thought it a pity not to use it." The treatment of the Beethoven idea is, however, so much in the vein of Mendelssohn and so admirable in every way that the composer can hardly be accused of any slavish imitation of his great predecessor. The contribution to the programme from Rob Fuchs' works was heard for the first time. The composer is a Vienna musician of today, and has completed quite a number of smaller works. He has rather inaptly styled this a "serenade," as it might with more propriety be called a suite for strings. Of the four movements, one only, the larghetto, is distinctly in serenade form; the first, allegretto, being more of the character of a patrol, the advance and retreat being plainly indicated. The last two movements, allegro and presto, have neither the beauty of form nor the originality of the opening portions of the work, all of which has a resemblance to the modern French school of writing. The beauties of the Cherubini overture are too familiar to call for comment. Miss Ita Welsh, always a welcome artist in the concert room, was unfortunate in her selections. Neither the singer's rare musical intelligence in its interpretation, nor the admirable orchestral setting of the Raff song, could make the composition other than a very commonplace effort, unworthy the time and labor demanded in its preparation; and the Grieg song, "Autumnal Gale," was equally uninteresting. Miss Welsh made one of her happiest efforts in "The Old Song," however, and Herr Gericke proved a very competent accompanist in both the latter selections.

Music in Boston.

BOSTON, October 19.

THE first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at Music Hall, under the baton of the new conductor, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. The programme was the following:

Overture (Leonore, No. 3)..... Beethoven
Concerto for violin, in A, minor..... Vieuxtemps
Prelude, andante, gavot (for strings, by Bachrich—first time)... J. S. Bach
Symphony in D, minor (first time)..... R. Volkmann

The soloist was Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg. Mr. Gericke was warmly received by the large audience and before the concert was half over had evidently already established himself in their favor. He is a rather small-built man, about thirty-nine years old, and has conducted an orchestra for nearly twenty years, his last position being that of conductor at the Imperial Opera in Vienna. Personally, he is one of the most charming men I have ever met. Modest and unassuming, yet firm in his ways, there is no "non-sense" about him whatever. He is the true artist and musician entirely, and, as he amply proved last evening, a great conductor, of whom Boston will soon be justly proud.

To speak about the performances, I must say that I seldom heard the Beethoven overture played so entirely to my liking. The conception of the whole was grand, and the light and shade of the different parts were beautifully brought out. The immense crescendo, from the faintest pp to the loudest ff, at the opening of the allegro, still resounds in my ears, so finely and gradually was it worked up. Altogether the colossal tone picture was reproduced in such a manner that the astonished listeners broke forth into enthusiastic applause at its conclusion.

Mr. Lichtenberg, who was next on the programme with the Vieuxtemps "Concerto," delighted everyone with his beautiful violin playing. He was born in San Francisco, studied in Brussels under Wieniawski, and has been a member of the Boston Orchestra for several seasons. His tone is very fine, his technique immense, his intonation of rare purity, and his phrasing and conception that of a thorough musician. He scored a well-earned and highly flattering success, and it is to be hoped that he will be heard oftener in concert than heretofore.

The Bach numbers were well played and much liked. Volkmann's symphony was new to a Boston audience, and in consideration of its being rather difficult to understand for the average concert-goer, was quite well received, especially the first movement. The work was finely rendered in every way and brought this interesting concert to a successful close.

Next week we are to hear, besides other things, Mendelssohn's "A minor Symphony" and the singer, Miss Ita Welsh. Music Hall looks rather strange without its organ, but I suppose we shall get used to it after awhile. The orchestra contains about the same members as last year, although Mr. Gericke has adopted a far better way of placing them than his predecessor had. The stage has been somewhat lowered, and I think with good effect. Mr. Gericke is to be congratulated most heartily on the success he has achieved, and we are all looking forward with great pleasure to the other concerts to be given under his direction.

LOUIS MAAS.

Second Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening with the following programme:

Overture, "Anacreon"..... Cherubini
Song, "The Dream King and His Love"..... Raff
Serenade No. 2, in C major for strings..... Rob. Fuchs
Songs, {a "The Old Song" }..... Grieg
 {b "Autumnal Gale" }..... Mendelssohn
Symphony in A major..... Mendelssohn

The rendering of the Anacreon Overture was characterized by dignity, precision and marked purity, the orchestra being held in admirable control and Mr. Gericke giving renewed evidence of his true mastery in his profession. The work itself, majestic in its character and indicating the independence of Cherubini's character, calls to mind an illustration of that independence in an occurrence wherein the great Napoleon figured. Napoleon, though a great military genius, was not well informed on musical matters, yet hearing of Cherubini's skillful direction at the Paris Conservatory desired to have performed the Anacreon and a few fragments of the opera, "Le Porteur d'Eau." He was much pleased with the rendering, but being accustomed to command called Cherubini to his box, and after congratulating him on the beauty and perfection of the chorus expressed a wish to try some other chorus, placing the basses on the right of the stage and the tenors on the left. Cherubini quietly answered: "Majesty, command your soldiers, and that is your business, but let me command my musicians, who are my army." The Serenade by Fuchs is an interesting composition and very pleasing, but the propriety of naming it a serenade is questionable. Its first movement, allegretto, is in reality a polka, and a pretty one; the second movement, larghetto, comes nearest to justifying the title of the work, and is a near approach to a serenade; while the finale is essentially in the character of an Italian dance called Tarantella. The work was given its first performance here on this occasion. Miss Ita Welsh, the soloist of the evening, is worthily a favorite with concert-goers here, and sang in a thoroughly artistic manner on this occasion, but might have been heard with more satisfaction in some less severe compositions than the three selected. There are undoubtedly different characters in musical works, and it is impossible for any one who has thoroughly and sympathetically studied the different schools of music to feel that one style and conception of the art is nobler than the other. Yet it is not to be denied that certain methods of using musical sound found in the so-called music of the future are to many well informed lovers of music affected, extravagant, fatiguing or incoherent, while others are dignified, natural and marked by genuine feeling, arranging and presenting emotions in a true order, representing no yamped up passion, but passion as it is, with its elations, depressions, intensities and infinitely fine inflections of form, as found in the works of Schubert, Gluck, Mozart, Moschelles, Cherubini, Mendelssohn, Beethoven and others of the old school. Raff's "Dream King and His Love" is one of the colorless, heavy and incoherent songs of the first class of compositions alluded to. It represents the King as a prosy naturalist, living without passion and poetry. Voltaire said, "When he who speaks does not know what he says and when they who hear him do not understand a word of what they hear, that can be called metaphysics, and such songs as this of Raff is metaphysics in music." Of Grieg's two songs it is not possible to speak with any more satisfaction. The symphony, reserved for the closing part of the programme, was performed well with the exception that in some instances the strings were not perfectly in tune. For the second concert, which will be given next Saturday evening, the following is the programme: Overture, "Medea," Bargiel; Grand Fantasia in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra, Schubert; "Le Bal," from the Symphonie Fantastique, Berlioz, and Symphony No. 1, in C major, Beethoven. Mr. William H. Sherwood will be the pianist.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Interesting Programme Admirably Carried Out—Miss Welsh the Soloist.

The second of this year's series of symphony concerts was listened to by a large audience, and the programme was one well calculated to please. The opening number, Cherubini's overture, Anacreon, with its weird introduction and many beautiful passages, was admirably rendered. Indeed, the uniform excellence of the performance of all the orchestral numbers was such as to completely assure Mr. Gericke's succession to the popularity achieved by Mr. Henschel.

The second number, "The Dream King and His Love," solo with orchestra, Raff, was very well done as to the orchestral part, but hardly received adequate treatment from Miss Ita Welsh, the soloist of the evening, who was evidently not in good voice.

The novelty of the evening followed, being a serenade in C major, by Robert Fuchs. It is very simple in construction, but abounds in charming melody. Every point of it was brought out with delightful accuracy and good taste. Two songs by Grieg constituted No. 4 of the programme. The first, "The Old Song," is familiar enough and proved very pleasing, but the second, "The Autumnal Gale," was unsatisfactory, both from a literary as well as musical point of view, and was not well sung.

Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor concluded the programme, the rendering being worthy of all praise.

The programme of the second concert given Saturday evening was:

Overture to Anacreon..... Cherubini
Song, The Dream King and his Love..... Raff
Serenade, No. 2 in C major..... Rob. Fuchs
(first time.)

Songs, {The Old Song, }..... Grieg
 {Autumnal Gale, }..... Mendelssohn
Symphony in A minor..... Mendelssohn

This was an immediate disappointment to those who feared that the strict classic school of the new leader would dictate a choice of only the severest music. It is, however, true that the first programme was no more a suggestion of such a plan than a pleasant compromise with a less serious choice; yet the impression prevailed that this season's programmes, each to end with a symphony, would admit of little relaxation from the scholastic mood. Mendelssohn's Italian symphony certainly could not have grieved even the confessed amusement-seeker in attendance, while its performance was a bright reminder of the musical missionary days of the Harvard Symphony Orchestra to many present. Mendelssohn wrote with greater freedom in this symphony than in the one in C minor. It represents a maturity yet youthful learning which, while it witnesses strict forms of expression, has a confident originality. It is ever a delight, and its performance under Gericke was fine. The Serenade (for strings) is new in Boston, and is a good example of unimpassioned intelligence. It deals with the commonplace very deftly, is not uninteresting, and is often unique. It is a welcome addition to the few good things of the kind. There were many excellences in its performance. The heroic opening of the "Anacreon" overture is not so satisfactorily joined to its final movement wherein a really great crescendo was achieved. There is a thread lost in the discourse to imaginative hearers. Miss Ita Welsh was the singer at this concert. As a vocalist she has the gift of intelligence. She accepts every task with a seriousness which is admirable, and what she sings is never trivial, but she does not always successfully cope with certain "dead-points"

Music in Boston.

BOSTON, October 19.

THE first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at Music Hall, under the baton of the new conductor, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. The programme was the following:

Overture (Leonore, No. 3)..... Beethoven
Concerto for violin, in A, minor..... Vieuxtemps
Prelude, andante, gavot (for strings, by Bachrich—first time)... J. S. Bach
Symphony in D, minor (first time)..... R. Volkmann

The soloist was Mr. Leopold Lichtenberg. Mr. Gericke was warmly received by the large audience and before the concert was half over had evidently already established himself in their favor. He is a rather small-built man, about thirty-nine years old, and has conducted an orchestra for nearly twenty years, his last position being that of conductor at the Imperial Opera in Vienna. Personally, he is one of the most charming men I have ever met. Modest and unassuming, yet firm in his ways, there is no "nonsense" about him whatever. He is the true artist and musician entirely, and, as he amply proved last evening, a great conductor, of whom Boston will soon be justly proud.

To speak about the performances, I must say that I seldom heard the Beethoven overture played so entirely to my liking. The conception of the whole was grand, and the light and shade of the different parts were beautifully brought out. The immense crescendo, from the faintest pp to the loudest ff, at the opening of the allegro, still resounds in my ears, so finely and gradually was it worked up. Altogether the colossal tone picture was reproduced in such a manner that the astonished listeners broke forth into enthusiastic applause at its conclusion.

Mr. Lichtenberg, who was next on the programme with the Vieuxtemps "Concerto," delighted everyone with his beautiful violin playing. He was born in San Francisco, studied in Brussels under Wieniawski, and has been a member of the Boston Orchestra for several seasons. His tone is very fine, his technique immense, his intonation of rare purity, and his phrasing and conception that of a thorough musician. He scored a well-earned and highly flattering success, and it is to be hoped that he will be heard oftener in concert than heretofore.

The Bach numbers were well played and much liked. Volkmann's symphony was new to a Boston audience, and in consideration of its being rather difficult to understand for the average concert-goer, was quite well received, especially the first movement. The work was finely rendered in every way and brought this interesting concert to a successful close.

Next week we are to hear, besides other things, Mendelssohn's "A minor Symphony" and the singer, Miss Ita Welsh. Music Hall looks rather strange without its organ, but I suppose we shall get used to it after awhile. The orchestra contains about the same members as last year, although Mr. Gericke has adopted a far better way of placing them than his predecessor had. The stage has been somewhat lowered, and I think with good effect. Mr. Gericke is to be congratulated most heartily on the success he has achieved, and we are all looking forward with great pleasure to the other concerts to be given under his direction.

LOUIS MAAS.

Second Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening with the following programme:

Overture, "Anacreon"..... Cherubini
Song, "The Dream King and His Love"..... Raff
Serenade No. 2, in C major for strings..... Rob. Fuchs
Songs, { "The Old Song," }..... Grieg
 { "Autumnal Gale," }
Symphony in A major..... Mendelssohn

The rendering of the Anacreon Overture was characterized by dignity, precision and marked purity, the orchestra being held in admirable control and Mr. Gericke giving renewed evidence of his true mastership in his profession. The work itself, majestic in its character and indicating the independence of Cherubini's character, calls to mind an illustration of that independence in an occurrence wherein the great Napoleon figured. Napoleon, though a great military genius, was not well informed on musical matters, yet hearing of Cherubini's skillful direction at the Paris Conservatory desired to have performed the Anacreon and a few fragments of the opera, "Le Porteur d'Eau." He was much pleased with the rendering, but being accustomed to command called Cherubini to his box, and after congratulating him on the beauty and perfection of the chorus expressed a wish to try some other chorus, placing the basses on the right of the stage and the tenors on the left. Cherubini quietly answered: "Majesty, command your soldiers, and that is your business, but let me command my musicians, who are my army." The Serenade by Fuchs is an interesting composition and very pleasing, but the propriety of naming it a serenade is questionable. Its first movement, allegretto, is in reality a polka, and a pretty one; the second movement, larghetto, comes nearest to justifying the title of the work, and is a near approach to a serenade; while the finale is essentially in the character of an Italian dance called Tarantella. The work was given its first performance here on this occasion. Miss Ita Welsh, the soloist of the evening, is worthily a favorite with concert-goers here, and sang in a thoroughly artistic manner. On this occasion, but might have been heard with more satisfaction in some less severe compositions than the three selected. There are undoubtedly different characters in musical works, and it is impossible for any one who has thoroughly and sympathetically studied the different schools of music to feel that one style and conception of the art is nobler than the other. Yet it is not to be denied that certain methods of using musical sound found in the so-called music of the future are to many well informed lovers of music affected, extravagant, fatiguing or incoherent, while others are dignified, natural and marked by genuine feeling, arranging and presenting emotions in a true order, representing no vamped up passion, but passion as it is, with its elations, depressions, intensities and infinitely fine inflections of form, as found in the works of Schubert, Gluck, Mozart, Moschelles, Cherubini, Mendelssohn, Beethoven and others of the old school. Raff's "Dream King and His Love" is one of the colorless, heavy and incoherent songs of the first class of compositions alluded to. It represents the King as a prosy naturalist, living without passion and poetry. Voltaire said, "When he who speaks does not know what he says and when they who hear him do not understand a word of what they hear, that can be called metaphysics, and such songs as this of Raff is metaphysics in music." Of Grieg's two songs it is not possible to speak with any more satisfaction. The symphony, reserved for the closing part of the programme, was performed well with the exception that in some instances the strings were not perfectly in tune. For the second concert, which will be given next Saturday evening, the following is the programme: Overture, "Medea," Bargiel; Grand Fantasia in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra, Schubert; "Le Bal," from the Symphonie Fantastique, Berlioz, and Symphony No. 1, in C major, Beethoven. Mr. William H. Sherwood will be the pianist.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Interesting Programme Admirably Carried Out—Miss Welsh the Soloist.

The second of this year's series of symphony concerts was listened to by a large audience, and the programme was one well calculated to please. The opening number, Cherubini's overture, Anacreon, with its weird introduction and many beautiful passages, was admirably rendered. Indeed, the uniform excellence of the performance of all the orchestral numbers was such as to completely assure Mr. Gericke's succession to the popularity achieved by Mr. Henschel.

The second number, "The Dream King and His Love," solo with orchestra, Raff, was very well done as to the orchestral part, but hardly received adequate treatment from Miss Ita Welsh, the soloist of the evening, who was evidently not in good voice.

The novelty of the evening followed, being a serenade in C major, by Robert Fuchs. It is very simple in construction, but abounds in charming melody. Every point of it was brought out with delightful accuracy and good taste. Two songs by Grieg constituted No. 4 of the programme. The first, "The Old Song," is familiar enough and proved very pleasing, but the second, "The Autumnal Gale," was unsatisfactory, both from a literary as well as musical point of view, and was not well sung.

Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor concluded the programme, the rendering being worthy of all praise.

The programme of the second concert given Saturday evening was:

Overture to Anacreon..... Cherubini
Song, "The Dream King and his Love"..... Raff
Serenade, No. 2 in C major..... Rob. Fuchs
(first time.)

Songs, { "The Old Song," }..... Grieg
 { "Autumnal Gale," }
Symphony in A minor..... Mendelssohn

This was an immediate disappointment to those who feared that the strict classic school of the new leader would dictate a choice of only the severest music. It is, however, true that the first programme was no more a suggestion of such a plan than a pleasant compromise with a less serious choice; yet the impression prevailed that this season's programmes, each to end with a symphony, would admit of little relaxation from the scholastic mood. Mendelssohn's Italian symphony certainly could not have grieved even the confessed amusement-seeker in attendance, while its performance was a bright reminder of the musical missionary days of the Harvard Symphony Orchestra to many present. Mendelssohn wrote with greater freedom in this symphony than in the one in C minor. It represents a maturity yet youthful learning which, while it witnesses strict forms of expression, has a confident originality. It is ever a delight, and its performance under Gericke was fine. The Serenade (for strings) is new in Boston, and is a good example of unimpassioned intelligence. It deals with the commonplace very deftly, is not uninteresting, and is often unique. It is a welcome addition to the few good things of the kind. There were many excellences in its performance. The heroic opening of the "Anacreon" overture is not so satisfactorily joined to its final movement wherein a really great crescendo was achieved. There is a thread lost in the discourse to imaginative hearers. Miss Ita Welsh was the singer at this concert. As a vocalist she has the gift of intelligence. She accepts every task with a seriousness which is admirable, and what she sings is never trivial, but she does not always successfully cope with certain "dead-points" in her vocal method which, even in the face of her clear enunciation, produce inartistic results. The song by Raff (with orchestra) is written in the most glowing style of this lover of pure musical means. It is in numerous divisions and each is the result of a vivid, normal fancy. Miss Welsh gave it a good interpretation and was not at any time disconcerted by its difficulties. The songs by Grieg were sung with the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Gericke. There was a lack of sympathy between the singer and accompanist which produced only negative results. The audience at each concert was warmly demonstrative towards Mr. Gericke, and extremely attentive. The seating of the players followed somewhat a former fashion: The brass and wood-wind instruments are at the conductor's left while the seconds are alone on his right, sharing the centre with the violas who next adjoin the cellos. At the back of the stage the double-basses form a single row. A general good effect is the result, owing in part to the removal of the vast non-transmitting surface of the organ. At the third concert next Saturday evening Mr. W. H. Sherwood will play Schubert's grand fantasia in C major for pianoforte and orchestra as arranged by Liszt, and the orchestral selections will be Bargiel's "Medea" overture,—a first performance here,—"Le Bal," from the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz, and Beethoven's first symphony.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA. adv.

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts had not quite so much exhilaration about it as the first, but it was scarcely less interesting. The curiosity attendant upon the appearances of a new conductor and a new soloist was over, and programme and performance had to stand by themselves and be tested by their merits alone. Of the first in may be said, that, although excellent and varied, and drawn from the authors of the day as well as from those of the past, it had a rather narrow range of color and must even have seemed to some auditors monotonous. Somewhat altered from the form presented a week ago, it stood thus:—

Overture to "Anacreon".....Cherubini
Song, "The Dream King and his Love".....Raff
Serenade, No. 2 in C major.....Rob. Fuchs
[First time.]
Songs, "The Old Song,".....Grieg
"Autumnal Gale,".....Grieg
Symphony in A major.....Mendelssohn

In all these numbers there was nothing solemn or deeply grave, and nothing sparkling or dashing—the largo of the serenade and the andante of the symphony coming nearest to one extreme, and the presto of the latter to the other. The serenade was very enjoyable, as a whole, although the four movements do not awaken equal interest, in spite of their evident equal worth. They are an allegretto, a largo, an allegro and a presto; and the first two seemed to please the audience best, although there is an odd and attractive rhythm to the third and much warmth in the fourth. Possibly the fact that a composition is for strings alone, and that their close, rich harmonies sometimes cloy the ear, may account for the sense of satiety which follows two or three movements in which they only are employed. And, by the way, it may not be out of place to mention that the name "serenade" is but a conventional term for a form of writing which followed the suite, which was apt to be mainly made up upon the rhythms of processional or dance music, and preceded the symphony, wherein larger scope and development were given to the broader desire which had begun to outgrow the serenade, as that had already superseded the suite of its time. The "serenade" has no relation to ladies' windows and moonlighted nights, and as at present understood must be written without wind instruments. Fuchs, the author of this one, is a Viennese, contemporary and sometime coadjutor of Mr. Gericke, who has written something in almost all departments of music, and notably a score of compositions for four hands. His work here shows taste and skill in arrangement and a free vein of melody. The performance of the work by the orchestra was admirable, as it also was of their other numbers. Under their leader's guidance they showed beautiful nicety of gradation in effect and perfect proportion, as one or another part needed to be first apparent. The piu mosso, the long crescendo, and the quick violin scales in the overture; the sentiment shown in the largo, with its soft minor phrases, of the serenade; the delicacy of the andante from the symphony, so quaintly dotted with the tip-toeing counterpoint of the double-basses, and the splendid outcome of the finale of that work—were single illustrations of Mr. Gericke's fine intentions and of the players' effective support.

Miss Ita Welsh sang. Although she was welcomed and recalled, her music was not such as to be advantageous for her. The "Dream King" is indeed poetic, but it is so rather through its instrumental suggestions and its general atmosphere than through any positive charm of melody. It is long, and therefore its want of a dramatic quality is against it. Heard in a smaller room, and with the smallest possible orchestra, it ought to be delightful, but in the Music Hall much of its essence was dissipated and lost. The Grieg songs again were low in tone color, and gave the singer little chance to show any largely satisfying quality of voice or style. Miss Welsh certainly took great pains in phrasing—all her music, and her adherence to its character and her care in enunciation were very gratifying. Mr. Gericke accompanied the Grieg songs, but his accompaniment was not perfect, being not altogether sympathetic in tone and sometimes lagging a shade behind the singer.

At the third concert Mr. W. H. Sherwood will play Schubert's grand fantasia in C major for pianoforte and orchestra as arranged by Liszt, and the orchestral selections will be Bargiel's "Medea" overture,—a first performance here,—"Le Bal," from the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz, and Beethoven's first symphony. At the fourth concert the new symphony by Brahms will probably be heard.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

This was the programme of the second symphony concert which took place last Friday evening:

Overture, (Anacreon).....Cherubini
"The Dream King and his Love".....Raff
(Song with Orchestra.)
Miss Ida Welsh.
Serenade No. 2, in C major.....Rob. Fuchs
Allegretto—Larghetto—Allegro—Presto.
(First time.)
a. The Old Song, }.....Grieg
b. Autumnal Gale, }
(Song with piano.)
Miss Welsh.
Symphony in A major.....Mendelssohn
Allegro vivace—Andante con moto—Con molto moderato—
Saltarello (Presto.)

A rather light list. Symmetry and romanticism rather than depth. But the superb playing of the orchestra and the elastic and graceful readings of the conductor kept even the most severe classicist interested throughout. I have never heard the Cherubini overture so well played. The strings were a marvel of unity even in the most difficult passages. The Raff number was one of the ecstatic school of modern musical bliss which revels in languor, high violin, and sustained wood wind passages. Its highly developed orchestral accompaniment was its chief charm, but it had also vocal passages of ineffable beauty. I admire the skill with which Mr. Gericke tempered the wind to the shorn lamb for Miss Welsh, excellent and tasteful singer though she be, was rather out of place in a large orchestral concert like this. Her artistic instinct was always demonstrated, but so was her inability to reach her ideal. In some of the deeper portions of the work her tones were quite powerless. Much the same may be said of the "Autumn Gale" which did not seem to call for danger signals from the weather department. The con fuoco passage, "Da bleiss der Sturm seingewaltiges Lied," was not at all fiery, but in the tenderer phrases of the poco andante, Miss Welsh succeeded finely, and in "Das Alte Lied" she was perfect, for she gave it with a simplicity of pathos that was most effective. This work [was hampered by a bad translation, reproducing neither the rhythm nor the substance of Heine's poem. Fancy the German poet's surprise, were he alive, at finding the second verse of his fine picture given thus:

And long ago there lived a page,
His heart was light, fair was his hair,
He loved the maid they say;
He loved the fair young queen.

At the risk of being a trifle prolix I will give a translation, spun off during an ocean voyage, by Prof. James Geikie, the eminent Scotch geologist, but never published:

There was a king, an old king,
His heart was sad his head was gray,
This poor old king, he married;
A young bride blithe as May.

In her vocal method which, even in the face of her clear enunciation, produce inartistic results. The song by Raff (with orchestra) is written in the most glowing style of this lover of pure musical means. It is in numerous divisions and each is the result of a vivid, normal fancy. Miss Welsh gave it a good interpretation and was not at any time disconcerted by its difficulties. The songs by Greig were sung with the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Gericke. There was a lack of sympathy between the singer and accompanist which produced only negative results. The audience at each concert was warmly demonstrative towards Mr. Gericke, and extremely attentive. The seating of the players followed somewhat a former fashion: The brass and wood-wind instruments are at the conductor's left while the seconds are alone on his right, sharing the centre with the violas who next adjoin the cellos. At the back of the stage the double-basses form a single row. A general good effect is the result, owing in part to the removal of the vast non-transmitting surface of the organ. At the third concert next Saturday evening Mr. W. H. Sherwood will play Schubert's grand fantasia in C major for pianoforte and orchestra as arranged by Liszt, and the orchestral selections will be Bargiel's "Medea" overture,—a first performance here,—"Le Bal," from the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz, and Beethoven's first symphony.

The second of the Boston Symphony concerts had not quite so much exhilaration about it as the first, but it was scarcely less interesting. The curiosity attendant upon the appearances of a new conductor and a new soloist was over, and programme and performance had to stand by themselves and be tested by their merits alone. Of the first in may be said, that, although excellent and varied, and drawn from the authors of the day as well as from those of the past, it had a rather narrow range of color and must even have seemed to some auditors monotonous. Somewhat altered from the form presented a week ago, it stood thus:—

In all these numbers there was nothing solemn or deeply grave, and nothing sparkling or dashing—the larghetto of the serenade and the andante of the symphony coming nearest to one extreme, and the presto of the latter to the other. The serenade was very enjoyable, as a whole, although the four movements do not awaken equal interest, in spite of their evident equal worth. They are an allegretto, a larghetto, an allegro and a presto; and the first two seemed to please the audience best, although there is an odd and attractive rhythm to the third and much warmth in the fourth. Possibly the fact that a composition is for a ring alone, and that their close, rich harmonies sometimes cloy the ear, may account for the sense of satiety which follows two or three movements in which they only are employed. And, by the way, it may not be out of place to mention that the name "serenade" is but a

Miss Ita Welsh sang. Although she was welcomed and recalled, her music was not such as to be advantageous for her. The "Dream King" is indeed poetic, but it is so rather through its instrumental suggestions and its general atmosphere than through any positive charm of melody. It is long, and therefore its want of a dramatic quality is against it. Heard in a smaller room, and with the smallest possible orchestra, it ought to be delightful, but in the Music Hall much of its essence was dissipated and lost. The Grieg songs again were low in tone color, and gave the singer little chance to show any largely satisfying quality of voice or style. Miss Welsh certainly took great pains in phrasing—all her music, and her adherence to its character and her care in enunciation were very gratifying. Mr. Gericke accompanied the Grieg songs, but his accompaniment was not perfect, being not altogether sympathetic in tone and sometimes lagging a shade behind the singer.

Key note 744 Nov. 1, 84
Boston Symphony Concerts.

347 46
There was a page, a fair page,
Light was his heart, bright was his hair,
He on the queen attended,
His silken train to bear.

Know'st thou the old, old story?
So sad its tone, so soft its sigh,
They loved, alas too fondly,
And for that love must die.

At least this preserves the musical metre, a very important affair in Grieg Song.

The Serenade by Fuchs was a fine work, and was given by the strings with much precision. The dainty first movement was replete with sweetness and grace, and the more earnest one which followed it, gave opportunity for some fine legato work. I liked the first two movements much the best.

The Italian Symphony is certainly one of the brightest, sunniest, and most spontaneous of Mendelssohn's works, but it is not especially Italian, spite of the Saltarello which closes it. It is a wonder, however, that Mendelssohn departed so far from strict classical style as to end a symphony with a dance rhythm of this class. It cannot be classed as deep either, in spite of the contrapuntal character of the second movement. But it is certainly popular. I can find no fault with the performance save that there was a slight aberration of tempo in the strings in the third movement, and even here I am afraid that I am getting hypercritical, but then it is so tiresome always to praise. The essence of criticism (see New York papers for further particulars), is condemnation. The tempo of the last movement was taken extremely fast, faster than ever I heard it, yet there was no blurring, and even the difficult oboe and flute figures stood out clearly. In fact all through the concert the woodwind seemed clearer than we have yet heard it, and this is only one of the points of improvement over the orchestra of last season. The audience seemed to like the "Italian" symphony, even if they could not discover objective sketches of Italian scenes. The title came mainly from the fact that Mendelssohn wrote a good portion of the work in Rome and Naples. So if any of our composers go to Trenton, Newark, or Jersey City and get any "divine inflatus" (this is not beer) there, they can call the work the "New Jersey Symphony." I should suggest piccolo for the mosquito effects, and bass viol to open the clam-motif with.

After the symphony concert, Mr. Gericke went to the St. Botolph Club, where he had been tendered a reception; many of the musicians of Boston had gathered to pay their compliments to the director, and the only limitation to the hearty enjoyment of the occasion was the fact that many members did not speak German, and Mr. Gericke's English lasts only about fifteen seconds and then runs dry. Nevertheless everybody seemed pleased, and the gathering kept up to the "wee sma' hours." Yet there is still something left of

L. C. E.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.30, WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1ST, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BARGIEL,

OVERTURE. (Medea.)

SCHUBERT,

GRAND FANTASIA in C major.
for PIANO-FORTE and ORCHESTRA.
(Arranged by LISZT.)

BERLIOZ,

LE BAL, (from the Symphonie Fantastique.)

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY No. 1, in C major.
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.—Andante cantabile con moto.—Menuetto. (Allegro molto e vivace).—Adagio;
Allegro molto e vivace.—

SOLOIST:

MR. WILLIAM H. SHERWOOD.

The Piano used is a Henry F. Miller.

50
Symphony No. 1, C major.....Beethoven

Third concert Mrs. Cameron
Mr. W. H. Sherwood was the pianist. The Bargiel work is good music throughout. Particularly fine is the introduction; also, the finale, which is very effective. The theme of the allegro is rather weak, but well taken care of in the working-out part. One of the trombone players, the tenor, successfully distinguished himself at the beginning of the overture, by holding out through several bars an E flat, instead of an E. Of course, he did not mean to play E flat, but his intonation of the E was so low that it had the effect of an E flat, thus rather spoiling the passage. The success of the evening was Sherwood's superb playing of the "Wanderer" fantasia.

Clean technique, fine phrasing and artistic conception are characteristic qualities of this artist, and they again shone forth conspicuously last night in his delightful rendering of Schubert's beautiful work. Enthusiastic applause greeted him at its conclusion and he was recalled twice to bow his acknowledgments before the audience was satisfied.

It is but fair to state that the beautiful instrument Mr. Sherwood used was from the manufactory of H. F. Miller.

The orchestral accompaniment was not what it might have been, being far too low, the strings especially in many places completely drowning the piano. However, this is scarcely Mr. Gericke's fault, who tried to tone them down continually. The drilling of the orchestra in this respect in the last years, has been deficient and it will take a little time before Mr. Gericke can teach it the art of accompaniment. The Berlioz number is indeed "fantastique," and although interesting enough in the instrumentation, the musical ideas are not very original in their invention. Beethoven's symphony was excellently played. Mr. Gericke's conception of Beethoven is such as only a true musician can manifest and his tempi, which form so important a factor, are throughout masterly. The second movement of the work was much relished by the audience judging by the applause it called forth. The last movement was played with great dash and spirit and at a breakneck speed, which, however, was successfully carried out. Next week we are to have Brahms's third Symphony in F, and Mr. Giese is to play a concerto for violoncello by De Sordert.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The following formed the third programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Saturday evening:

Overture (Medea).....Bargiel
Grand Fantasia in C.....Schubert
For pianoforte and orchestra, arranged by Liszt.
Le Bal (from the Symphonie Fantastique).....Berlioz
Symphony No. 1.....Beethoven

Bargiel's clearness of form and careful development of subject are well illustrated in the Medea overture. It is potent as a picture of tragedy, and can easily command attention by its incisive, earnest style. Being not unfamiliar in our concert rooms, its performance at the hands of a new conductor was of value to him whose standard was not established. As played under Gericke, it became a musical epic of intense force. Mr. W. H. Sherwood played the pianoforte part in the Schubert fantasia. He was warmly greeted by the audience, before whom he had not appeared since the first season of the orchestra. The arrangement by Liszt, which he played, simplifies many of the Titanic difficulties of the original writing, but this, too, is exacting in its technical demands upon the best players. Mr. Sherwood's performance did not suggest difficulties. It was, as could have been prophesied, free from hindrances of a physical kind, and satisfying as an interpretation. The fantasia is a gratifying composition alike to the player and listener; its meaning is so elevated, the thought behind this barrier of technicalities is so pure, that the student has the best kind of incentive to study it, while the hearer of such a performance as Sherwood's has the delight of following the absolute ideal which the finished work of the performer made possible without a suggestion of obstacles overcome. Mr. Sherwood plays as if he were demonstrating a problem; for it would seem that the absolute command of the distances of the keyboard, the perfect control of all the characteristics of sound produced by the fingers upon the pianoforte, which he possesses, were parts of an absolute science. These so-called scientific processes do not result only in unsympathetic correctness or impassive technical superiority, for Mr. Sherwood plays with great sentiment; nothing more poetic has been heard here for a long time than his performances in the adagio of this fantasia. There were many beauties in the orchestral positions of the fantasia, particularly in the second movement (built upon the theme of "The Wanderer"), where the muted cello (Mr. Giese) and the horn (Mr. Schormann) played the echoed theme of the solo instrument. The band was led to make common cause with the pianoforte, and all the great climaxes were given with great effect. The scrap from the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique was played so gracefully that it must have suggested the incomparable manner in which Gericke might play a waltz! Beethoven's first symphony brought the new conductor forth as an interpreter. Judging from the mood of his audience his reading not only did not disturb but pleased. Beethoven's nine symphonies are works of widely differing character, and if in the performance of the series by this orchestra, readings do occur which create discussion, it would be well to remember the fact of Mr. Gericke's life associations in Vienna, a city which knew Beethoven, and not insist on the standard of this locality, whose musical ancestry is youthful in comparison. It did seem, however, that the spirit of the andante was not well disclosed under Mr. Gericke's full fast-enough beat. In the final allegro molto the players were a unit, though the quality of their performance seemed too insipid to admit of such excellent individual contrast. Taken as a whole, this performance of Beethoven's earliest symphony was notable. More care might be given by the programme maker for these concerts. The times of omitting the opus number where it is by right expected, and the failure to print the different movements of the Schubert fantasia, are faults which should not be permitted. The new way of stating the selections—the composer's name is at the left—results in a reference page which is at least unsymmetrical. At the next concert the new Brahms's symphony No. 3, in F, will be played. Mr. Fritz Giese will be the soloist, who is to produce a little-known concerto for the violoncello, by De Swert. The orchestra will also play an andante cantabile, from the trio op. 67 of Beethoven, arranged by Liszt, and Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, opus 52.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There was an excellent audience. The programme was well selected, and was in pleasing contrast with that of last week. It opened with Bargiel's overture to "Medea," which we have heard frequently, but which we have never found ourselves in the mood to enjoy or admire. It is unquestionably a well and thoughtfully written work, but the more we hear it the more vague its meaning becomes, and even the broad and spirited reading it obtained under Herr Gericke's vigorous lead failed to make it interesting to us. "Le Bal," from the Symphonie Fantastique by Berlioz, was given with fine precision, warmth and beauty of color. Perhaps it would have presented more of grace and delicacy had the conductor taken the movement at a more moderate tempo; but there was enough in the interpretation, as a whole, to atone for this slight shortcoming. The Symphony was Beethoven's No. 1 in C. This was delightfully read and played from beginning to end, and with a freedom from affectation and a manly vigor, a clearness and propriety that were peculiarly welcome after our recent three years' experiences with the work. It was a relief and a satisfaction to hear the symphony once more given in sympathy with the sentiment that pervades it. The tempi throughout were admirable. The andante was interpreted with fascinating ease, evenness and delicacy. The minuet was given with its appropriate force and fire, and the trio was read without a trace of that sickly sweetness which had been before imparted to it. Nothing could have been more brilliant, more crisp and more inspiring than the performance of the finale. The coloring through the whole symphony may be praised in the most cordial terms. Excellent as Herr Gericke's previous work had been, his interpretation of this symphony surpassed it all; and if any doubt existed regarding his eclecticism of style, it was completely removed by this achievement. The audience was quick to appreciate the merits of the reading, as was amply testified by the hearty applause at the end of each movement. The soloist was Mr. W. H. Sherwood, who played Liszt's arrangement for piano and orchestra of Schubert's Grand Fantasia in C-major, in which the artist had been heard here before. His performance was remarkable for the brilliancy, the force, and the impressive power that characterized it. It was given from beginning to end with extraordinary fire, and with a certainty and vigor of touch and an exactness in details of execution, made it an uncommonly fine display of masterly piano technique. Something more of warmth in style would have been welcome in companionship with so much fire of manner; but the artist fairly earned and fully deserved the spontaneous applause that greeted him at the end of the work, and the hearty recall that followed. At the next concert Brahms's new symphony in F major will be played for the first time here; also the andante from Beethoven's trio op. 97, arranged for orchestra by Liszt, and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale op. 52. The soloist will be M. Fritz Giese, who will perform De Swert's concerto for violoncello in D minor.

Symphony No. 1, C major.....Beethoven

Mr. W. H. Sherwood was the pianist. The Bargiel work is good music throughout. Particularly fine is the introduction; also, the finale, which is very effective. The theme of the allegro is rather weak, but well taken care of in the working-out part. One of the trombone players, the tenor, successfully distinguished himself at the beginning of the overture, by holding out through several bars an E flat, instead of an E. Of course, he did not mean to play E flat, but his intonation of the E was so low that it had the effect of an E flat, thus rather spoiling the passage. The success of the evening was Sherwood's superb playing of the "Wanderer" fantasia.

Clean technique, fine phrasing and artistic conception are characteristic qualities of this artist, and they again shone forth conspicuously last night in his delightful rendering of Schubert's beautiful work. Enthusiastic applause greeted him at its conclusion and he was recalled twice to bow his acknowledgments before the audience was satisfied.

It is but fair to state that the beautiful instrument Mr. Sherwood used was from the manufactory of H. F. Miller.

The orchestral accompaniment was not what it might have been, being far too low, the strings especially in many places completely drowning the piano. However, this is scarcely Mr. Gericke's fault, who tried to tone them down continually. The drilling of the orchestra in this respect in the last years, has been deficient and it will take a little time before Mr. Gericke can teach it the art of accompaniment. The Berlioz number is indeed "fantastique," and although interesting enough in the instrumentation, the musical ideas are not very original in their invention. Beethoven's symphony was excellently played. Mr. Gericke's conception of Beethoven is such as only a true musician can manifest and his tempi, which form so important a factor, are throughout masterly. The second movement of the work was much relished by the audience judging by the applause it called forth. The last movement was played with great dash and spirit and at a breakneck speed, which, however, was successfully carried out. Next week we are to have Brahms's third Symphony in F, and Mr. Giese is to play a concerto for violoncello by De Sordert.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The following formed the third programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Saturday evening:

Overture (Medea).....Bargiel
Grand Fantasia in C.....Schubert
For pianoforte and orchestra, arranged by Liszt.
Le Bal (from the Symphonie Fantastique).....Berlioz
Symphony No. 1.....Beethoven

Bargiel's clearness of form and careful development of subject are well illustrated in the Medea overture. It is potent as a picture of tragedy, and can easily command attention by its incisive, earnest style. Being not unfamiliar in our concert rooms, its performance at the hands of a new conductor was of value to him whose standard was not established. As played under Gericke, it became a musical epic of intense force. Mr. W. H. Sherwood played the pianoforte part in the Schubert fantasia. He was warmly greeted by the audience, before whom he had not appeared since the first season of the orchestra. The arrangement by Liszt, which he played, simplifies many of the Titanic difficulties of the original writing, but this, too, is exacting in its technical demands upon the best players. Mr. Sherwood's performance did not suggest difficulties. It was, as could have been prophesied, free from hindrances of a physical kind, and satisfying as an interpretation. The fantasia is a gratifying composition alike to the player and listener; its meaning is so elevated, the thought behind this barrier of technicalities is so pure, that the student has the best kind of incentive to study it, while the hearer of such a performance as Sherwood's has the delight of following the absolute ideal which the finished work of the performer made possible without a suggestion of obstacles overcome. Mr. Sherwood plays as if he were demonstrating a problem; for it would seem that the absolute command of the distances of the keyboard, the perfect control of all the characteristics of sound produced by the fingers upon the pianoforte, which he possesses, were part of an absolute science. These so-called scientific processes do not result only in unsympathetic correctness or impassive technical superiority, for Mr. Sherwood plays with great sentiment; nothing more poetic has been heard here for a long time than his performances in the adagio of this fantasia. There were many beauties in the orchestral positions of the fantasia, particularly in the second movement (built upon the theme of "The Wanderer"), where the muted cello (Mr. Giese) and the horn (Mr. Schormann) played the echoed theme of the solo instrument. The band was led to make common cause with the pianoforte, and all the great climaxes were given with great effect. The scrap from the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique was played so gracefully that it must have suggested the incomparable manner in which Gericke might play a waltz! Beethoven's first symphony brought the new conductor forth as an interpreter. Judging from the mood of his audience his reading not only did not disturb but pleased. Beethoven's nine symphonies are works of widely differing character, and if in the performance of the series by this orchestra, readings do occur which create discussion, it would be well to remember the fact of Mr. Gericke's life associations in Vienna, a city which knew Beethoven, and not insist on the standard of this locality, whose musical ancestry is youthful in comparison. It did seem, however, that the spirit of the andante was not well disclosed under Mr. Gericke's full fast-enough beat. In the final allegro molto the players were a unit, though the quality of their performance seemed too inspiring to admit of such excellent individual contrast. Taken as a whole, this performance of Beethoven's earliest symphony was notable. More care might be given by the programme maker for these concerts. The times of omitting the opus number where it is by right expected, and the failure to print the different movements of the Schubert fantasia, are faults which should not be permitted. The new way of stating the selections—the composer's name is at the left—results in a reference page which is at least unsymmetrical. At the next concert the new Brahms's symphony No. 3, in F, will be played. Mr. Fritz Giese will be the soloist, who is to produce a little-known concerto for the violoncello, by De Swert. The orchestra will also play an andante cantabile, from the trio op. 67 of Beethoven, arranged by Liszt, and Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Finale, opus 52.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There was an excellent audience. The programme was well selected, and was in pleasing contrast with that of last week. It opened with Bargiel's overture to "Medea," which we have heard frequently, but which we have never found ourselves in the mood to enjoy or admire. It is unquestionably a well and thoughtfully written work, but the more we hear it the more vague its meaning becomes, and even the broad and spirited reading it obtained under Herr Gericke's vigorous lead failed to make it interesting to us. "Le Bal," from the Symphonie Fantastique by Berlioz, was given with fine precision, warmth and beauty of color. Perhaps it would have presented more of grace and delicacy had the conductor taken the movement at a more moderate tempo; but there was enough in the interpretation, as a whole, to atone for this slight shortcoming. The Symphony was Beethoven's No. 1 in C. This was delightfully read and played from beginning to end, and with a freedom from affectation and a manly vigor, a clearness and propriety that were peculiarly welcome after our recent three years' experiences with the work. It was a relief and a satisfaction to hear the symphony once more given in sympathy with the sentiment that pervades it. The tempo throughout were admirable. The andante was interpreted with fascinating ease, evenness and delicacy. The minuet was given with its appropriate force and fire, and the trio was read without a trace of that sickly sweetness which had been before imparted to it. Nothing could have been more brilliant, more crisp and more inspiring than the performance of the finale. The coloring through the whole symphony may be praised in the most cordial terms. Excellent as Herr Gericke's previous work had been, his interpretation of this symphony surpassed it all; and if any doubt existed regarding his eclecticism of style, it was completely removed by this achievement. The audience was quick to appreciate the merits of the reading, as was amply testified by the hearty applause at the end of each movement. The soloist was Mr. W. H. Sherwood, who played Liszt's arrangement for piano and orchestra of Schubert's Grand Fantasia in C-major, in which the artist had been heard here before. His performance was remarkable for the brilliancy, the force, and the impressive power that characterized it. It was given from beginning to end with extraordinary fire, and with a certainty and vigor of touch and an exactness in details of execution, made it an uncommonly fine display of masterly piano technique. Something more of warmth in style would have been welcome in companionship with so much fire of manner; but the artist fairly earned and fully deserved the spontaneous applause that greeted him at the end of the work, and the hearty recall that followed. At the next concert Brahms's new symphony in F major will be played for the first time here; also the andante from Beethoven's trio op. 97, arranged for orchestra by Liszt, and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale op. 52. The soloist will be M. Fritz Giese, who will perform De Swert's concerto for violoncello in D minor.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

MR. LANG'S TALKS.—With the opening of the concert season Mr. Lang announced a series of 12 (Boston) Symphony-Concert Lessons, to be given in the afternoon of alternate Thursdays at Chickering Hall. The first took place Oct. 23, its subject being the Italian Symphony of Mendelssohn, and the other orchestral numbers of the second Symphony programme. Then he had the aid of Mr. Perabo. Yesterday's talk anticipated the programme of the present week, and Mr. Foote assisted. Mr. Lang's plan is to present, by means of two pianofortes, an arrangement of the Symphony, and of the less important works or parts of works (as may seem expedient) to be played at the next concert. He will instruct, informally, upon the character and construction of a symphony, peculiarities of the composer, relative value of the music, etc., before it is played, or at intervals during lesson time. The idea is Mr. Lang's own; for some years ago he carried out a similar plan. Now it is unique, and in view of the present cultivated interest in symphonic music, is sure to be a valued means of information. Mr. Lang's audience subscribes for the course, and is large and studious. Many carry note books and seem to esteem the plan from the right point of view. Brahms and Schumann were the subjects of yesterday's talk. In commencing Mr. Lang alluded to the advertisement which placed a Brahms symphony under the head of amusements. He suggested the attitude in which Brahms should be heard: "One should not go determined either to like or to fear, but just listen and let the impression mature naturally. Young people should consider attendance at the Symphony Concerts as serious business, and a hearing of a work like a Brahms symphony should be denied to those who cannot judge it from a comparative standpoint." Mr. Lang's own opinion of Brahms was expressed when he said he stood "as if suspecting that Brahms was greater than Schumann." He cited many instances of similarity in themes from the works of writers widely apart in style, to illustrate how foolish was the usual growl about plagiarism. The Brahms Symphony No. 3 was played, excepting the andante movement. The chief themes were noted and talked about, and the individualities of the composer were briefly treated in a spirit of analysis. The Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52, of Schumann were played, Mr. Foote taking first piano. Mr. Lang styled the arrangement by Liszt for orchestra, of the Andante from the Trio, op. 97 of Beethoven (also included in the next programme) a derangement, as so noble and complete a work should not be disturbed in its integrity. Mr. Lang's manner is always happy, his characterizations are remarkably apt, but the point of a saying is often lost by the hearer who is not very attentive to Mr. Lang's peculiar idioms and his way of expressing them.

Warmth of sentiment in certain passages might have done the music no harm; but one hears very little playing that leaves less to be desired than Mr. Sherwood's performance on Saturday evening. Not the least delightful feature in the Fantasia was Mr. Giese's ethereally beautiful playing of the scrap of cantabile melody that falls to the share of the solo cello in the slow movement.

The next programme is:

Brahms. Symphony, No. 3, in F major, op. 90. (First time.)
De Swert. Concerto for violoncello in D minor, op. 32.
Beethoven. Andante Cantabile, from the Trio op. 97. Arranged by Franz Liszt.
Schumann. Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52.
Mr. Fritz Giese will be the cellist.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought forth the following programme:

Bargiel. Overture to "Medea."
Schubert. Grand Fantasia in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra (arranged by Liszt).
Berlioz. Le Bal from the Symphonie Fantastique.
Beethoven. Symphony No. 1, in C major.

Mr. William H. Sherwood was the pianist.

The Bargiel overture was grandly played. The composition itself, now that it has become familiar after repeated hearings, fails somehow to satisfy one as a piece of well-sustained writing. Bargiel has here been exceptionally happy in what is commonly called his inspiration. The thematic material of the overture is decidedly fine, vigorous and full of character. But the use the composer makes of his ideas seems singularly futile. There is in the work a lack of that finely coherent development which belongs to a stoutly-built symphonic movement. The opening slow movement is indeed superbly impressive, but the successive divisions of the allegro seem but ill welded together, each new theme is a surprise, and does not appear to grow naturally out of what precedes it. The return of the leading theme in the third part almost makes one smile, so awkwardly is its reappearance brought about. One feels no inward compelling necessity, but merely an intentional compliance with the traditional dictates of symphonic form.

Never before has the dainty little ball-scene from Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony been so well played here. The violins played the graceful waltz theme with an exquisite refinement of phrasing, and the whole performance was full of bright piquancy. The only thing lacking was a sufficient prominence of harp tone. The movement is quite an exceptional bit of orchestral coloring—where, for instance, can we find another piece for orchestra written without bassoons?—and the sparkle of the harp notes is an essential factor in this coloring. Mr. Gericke's one harp was an insufficient apology for the absence of the "at least four" that Berlioz asks for in the score, especially as the number of strings was very nearly up to the composer's specifications. As it was, the queen of the ball-room appeared before us as if without her jewels. The playing of the Beethoven symphony was a pure delight from beginning to end; that of the slow movement being in particular about as perfect as one can well wish to hear. The performance was another example of the vigor, verve and brilliancy with which Mr. Gericke gives works of the pure classic school, without for a moment overstepping the bounds of their true character.

Mr. Sherwood played Liszt's incomparable arrangement of the Schubert Fantasia with admirable brilliancy of technique and notable artistic self-command. It was an excellently well-thought-out and beautifully rounded performance of a work in which over-brimming exuberance of fancy goes hand in hand with great definiteness and coherence of form. A little more of engaging

THE THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The third of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Mr. William H. Sherwood, pianist, being the soloist, and the selections as follows:

Overture, "Medea".....Bargiel
Grand fantasia in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra.....Schubert
"Le Bal".....Berlioz
Symphony No. 1, in C major.....Beethoven

An admirable programme of the best musical material, the character of the several numbers being sufficiently varied to allow of continuous enjoyment throughout. The interest was about evenly divided between the presentation of the first of the Beethoven symphonies and the performance of the Schubert number, the one offering, in some ways, a new test of the conductor's characteristics, while the other gave Mr. Sherwood's abilities a brilliant opportunity. In both these matters the result was most satisfactory. Herr Gericke's reading of the symphony was thoroughly intelligent and pleasing throughout, giving the beautiful ideas of the great master in a clear and distinct fashion, presenting an interpretation of the work full of individuality, yet at all times in keeping with the composer's characteristics, and making the value of the composition quickly appreciated by all who listened. The admirable precision, the artistic shading and the fresh, vigorous playing of the orchestra under Herr Gericke again showed how fully he has mastered the musical forces placed at his disposition and how completely his musicians are in accord with his ideas. If one portion of the symphony gave more pleasure than another, it was the andante movement, the exquisite beauty of the master's ideas being brought out with a clearness and expression seldom attained in earlier performances here. The quick response of the audience at the conclusion of each movement showed the general pleasure given by the admirable presentation, and the success attending Herr Gericke's production of this work justifies the brightest anticipations for the remainder of the Beethoven series. Mr. Sherwood had a very friendly reception upon his entrance, and a cordial recognition of his efforts upon concluding his performance of the Schubert "Fantasia." Both expressions of approval were well merited, as this artist has been a very conscientious member of the band of resident musicians for many years, and his playing of the great composition proved most unmistakably the value of his musical attainments. The setting given Schubert's work by Liszt is of somewhat unequal merit, its excellencies being confined largely to the first and second movements. In the finale, the orchestral score assumes too great a prominence, and, save with a pianist of phenomenal power, must overshadow the leading instrument. Mr. Sherwood's playing of the beautiful theme of the second movement surpassed his best previous efforts, the melody being sung by the piano under his touch with admirable expression. The technical difficulties of the finale were played with great apparent ease and accuracy, but the pianist's strength was unequal to the overpowering orchestral effects, and the presentation of the work lacked entire success from this cause. The genius of Berlioz as a master of orchestration was shown in the brilliant musical gem "Le Bal" from the "Fantastique symphonie," and its performance by the orchestra gave unqualified pleasure, the true spirit of the composer being caught by the musicians. The Bargiel overture, another marvel of ingenious instrumentation based upon original and beautiful musical ideas, was also played with faultless taste.

MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There is scarcely any need of a long review of the symphony concert this week. The "Wanderer Fantasia" and the first Beethoven symphony, which were the pieces de resistance, have been heard often enough in Boston to make a review of them more than a twice-told tale. The concert began with a supper of musical horrors in the shape of Bargiel's overture to "Medea." The shading of this was perfect, and all the shudders and shivers of the modern school were graphically rendered. The wood wind stood out splendidly in this work. Mr. Sherwood has seldom appeared to such excellent advantage, as he did on this occasion, in Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasia." At first he seemed rather motionless, but from the first appearance of the theme ("Ich komme von Gebirgeher") he was powerful in the highest degree. He invested this portion of the work with just the right degree of mournful pathos, and in the latter part his technique was altogether commendable, and was seconded by the well-toned piano. The orchestral accompaniment calls only for praise.

Following this came one movement from Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique." It was but natural that Mr. Gericke, a Viennese, should revel in the entrancing swing of this movement—"Le Bal." Yet we were sorry that the work could not be heard in its entirety; or, at least, the romantic movement "In the Fields" be given in contrast with it.

The Beethoven symphony was also given in a manner which makes fault-finding impossible. To us the chief merit of this work lies in the short minuet, forerunner of the Scherzo, and, even as it is, the most characteristic of its class. The responses between the wind and strings in the Trio, were exquisitely rendered. The last movement was deserving of especial praise. The shading of the introduction (those light runs of violins which contemporary critics found "ludicrous") was very finely done, and the strings were clear as crystal in the pretty figure which is the chief part of the movement. The tempo taken was a judicious and, compared with former renderings, a conservative one. It was certainly the best ensemble that we have heard in this movement for years. Next week comes a more important programme, with Brahms's new symphony and Schumann's "Overture Scherzo and Finale"—in itself almost a symphony.

Miss Fannie Bloomfield will be the solo-pianist at the Boston Symphony concert, Jan. 23 and 24. She is said to have received the endorsement of a critic of no less note than Hanslick, also of Freyer and Gehring, all three of whom think highly of her ability. Miss Bloomfield is from Chicago. She more recently comes from abroad, where she has been the pupil of Leschetizky, the teacher of Mme. Essipoff. She has already given concerts in Chicago, New York and Baltimore, and it may be inferred that her playing in Boston Music Hall next week will create an artistic sensation.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

MR. LANG'S TALKS.—With the opening of the concert season Mr. Lang announced a series of 12 (Boston) Symphony-Concert Lessons, to be given in the afternoon of alternate Thursdays at Chickering Hall. The first took place Oct. 23, its subject being the Italian Symphony of Mendelssohn, and the other orchestral numbers of the second Symphony programme. Then he had the aid of Mr. Perabo. Yesterday's talk anticipated the programme of the present week, and Mr. Foote assisted. Mr. Lang's plan is to present, by means of two pianofortes, an arrangement of the Symphony, and of the less important works or parts of works (as may seem expedient) to be played at the next concert. He will instruct, informally, upon the character and construction of a symphony, peculiarities of the composer, relative value of the music, etc., before it is played, or at intervals during lesson time. The idea is Mr. Lang's own; for some years ago he carried out a similar plan. Now it is unique, and in view of the present cultivated interest in symphonic music, is sure to be a valued means of information. Mr. Lang's audience subscribes for the course, and is large and studious. Many carry note books and seem to esteem the plan from the right point of view. Brahms and Schumann were the subjects of yesterday's talk. In commencing Mr. Lang alluded to the advertisement which placed a Brahms symphony under the head of amusements. He suggested the attitude in which Brahms should be heard: "One should not go determined either to like or to fear, but just listen and let the impression mature naturally. Young people should consider attendance at the Symphony Concerts as serious business, and a hearing of a work like a Brahms symphony should be denied to those who cannot judge it from a comparative standpoint." Mr. Lang's own opinion of Brahms was expressed when he said he stood "as if suspecting that Brahms was greater than Schumann." He cited many instances of similarity in themes from the works of writers widely apart in style, to illustrate how foolish was the usual growl about plagiarism. The Brahms Symphony No. 3 was played, excepting the andante movement. The chief themes were noted and talked about, and the individualities of the composer were briefly treated in a spirit of analysis. The Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52, of Schumann were played, Mr. Foote taking first piano. Mr. Lang styled the arrangement by Liszt for orchestra, of the Andante from the Trio, op. 97 of Beethoven (also included in the next programme) a derangement, as so noble and complete a work should not be disturbed in its integrity. Mr. Lang's manner is always happy, his characterizations are remarkably apt, but the point of a saying is often lost by the hearer who is not very attentive to Mr. Lang's peculiar idioms and his way of expressing them.

warmth of sentiment in certain passages might have done the music no harm; but one hears very little playing that leaves less to be desired than Mr. Sherwood's performance on Saturday evening. Not the least delightful feature in the Fantasia was Mr. Giese's ethereally beautiful playing of the scrap of cantabile melody that falls to the share of the solo 'cello in the slow movement.

The next programme is:

Brahms. Symphony, No. 3, in F major, op. 90. (First time.)
De Swert. Concerto for violoncello in D minor, op. 32.
Beethoven. Andante Cantabile, from the Trio op. 97.
Schumann. Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52.
Mr. Fritz Giese will be the 'cellist.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought forth the following programme:

Bargiel. Overture to "Medea."
Schubert. Grand Fantasia in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra (arranged by Liszt).
Berlioz. Le Bal from the Symphonie Fantastique.
Beethoven. Symphony No. 1, in C major.

Mr. William H. Sherwood was the pianist.

The Bargiel overture was grandly played. The composition itself, now that it has become familiar after repeated hearings, fails somehow to satisfy one as a piece of well-sustained writing. Bargiel has here been exceptionally happy in what is commonly called his inspiration. The thematic material of the overture is decidedly fine, vigorous and full of character. But the use the composer makes of his ideas seems singularly futile. There is in the work a lack of that finely coherent development which belongs to a stoutly-built symphonic movement. The opening slow movement is indeed superbly impressive, but the successive divisions of the allegro seem but ill welded together, each new theme is a surprise, and does not appear to grow naturally out of what precedes it. The return of the leading theme in the third part almost makes one smile, so awkwardly is its reappearance brought about. One feels no inward compelling necessity, but merely an intentional compliance with the traditional dictates of symphonic form.

Never before has the dainty little ball-scene from Berlioz's Fantastique Symphony been so well played here. The violins played the graceful waltz theme with an exquisite refinement of phrasing, and the whole performance was full of bright piquancy. The only thing lacking was a sufficient prominence of harp tone. The movement is quite an exceptional bit of orchestral coloring—where, for instance, can we find another piece for orchestra written without bassoons?—and the sparkle of the harp notes is an essential factor in this coloring. Mr. Gericke's one harp was an insufficient apology for the absence of the "at least four" that Berlioz asks for in the score, especially as the number of strings was very nearly up to the composer's specifications. As it was, the queen of the ball-room appeared before us as if without her jewels. The playing of the Beethoven symphony was a pure delight from beginning to end; that of the slow movement being in particular about as perfect as one can well wish to hear. The performance was another example of the vigor, verve and brilliancy with which Mr. Gericke gives works of the pure classic school, without for a moment overstepping the bounds of their true character.

Mr. Sherwood played Liszt's incomparable arrangement of the Schubert Fantasia with admirable brilliancy of technique and notable artistic self-command. It was an excellently well-thought-out and beautifully rounded performance of a work in which over-brimming exuberance of fancy goes hand in hand with great definiteness and coherence of form. A little more of engaging

THE THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The third of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Mr. William H. Sherwood, pianist, being the soloist, and the selections as follows:

Overture, "Medea".....Bargiel
Grand fantasia in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra.....Schubert
"Le Bal".....Berlioz
Symphony No. 1, in C major.....Beethoven

An admirable programme of the best musical material, the character of the several numbers being sufficiently varied to allow of continuous enjoyment throughout. The interest was about evenly divided between the presentation of the first of the Beethoven symphonies and the performance of the Schubert number, the one offering, in some ways, a new test of the conductor's characteristics, while the other gave Mr. Sherwood's abilities a brilliant opportunity. In both these matters the result was most satisfactory. Herr Gericke's reading of the symphony was thoroughly intelligent and pleasing throughout, giving the beautiful ideas of the great master in a clear and distinct fashion, presenting an interpretation of the work full of individuality, yet at all times in keeping with the composer's characteristics, and making the value of the composition quickly appreciated by all who listened. The admirable precision, the artistic shading and the fresh, vigorous playing of the orchestra under Herr Gericke again showed how fully he has mastered the musical forces placed at his disposition and how completely his musicians are in accord with his ideas. If one portion of the symphony gave more pleasure than another, it was the andante movement, the exquisite beauty of the master's ideas being brought out with a clearness and expression seldom attained in earlier performances here. The quick response of the audience at the conclusion of each movement showed the general pleasure given by the admirable presentation, and the success attending Herr Gericke's production of this work justifies the brightest anticipations for the remainder of the Beethoven series. Mr. Sherwood had a very friendly reception upon his entrance, and a cordial recognition of his efforts upon concluding his performance of the Schubert "Fantasia." Both expressions of approval were well merited, as this artist has been a very conscientious member of the band of resident musicians for many years, and his playing of the great composition proved most unmistakably the value of his musical attainments. The setting given Schubert's work by Liszt is of somewhat unequal merit, its excellencies being confined largely to the first and second movements. In the finale, the orchestral score assumes too great a prominence, and, save with a pianist of phenomenal power, must overshadow the leading instrument. Mr. Sherwood's playing of the beautiful theme of the second movement surpassed his best previous efforts, the melody being sung by the piano under his touch with admirable expression. The technical difficulties of the finale were played with great apparent ease and accuracy, but the pianist's strength was unequal to the overpowering orchestral effects, and the presentation of the work lacked entire success from this cause. The genius of Berlioz as a master of orchestration was shown in the brilliant musical gem "Le Bal" from the "Fantastique symphonie," and its performance by the orchestra gave unqualified pleasure, the true spirit of the composer being caught by the musicians. The Bargiel overture, another marvel of ingenious instrumentation based upon original and beautiful musical ideas, was also played with faultless taste.

MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There is scarcely any need of a long review of the symphony concert this week. The "Wanderer Fantasia" and the first Beethoven symphony, which were the pieces de resistance, have been heard often enough in Boston to make a review of them more than a twice-told tale. The concert began with a supper of musical horrors in the shape of Bargiel's overture to "Medea." The shading of this was perfect, and all the shudders and shivers of the modern school were graphically rendered. The wood wind stood out splendidly in this work. Mr. Sherwood has seldom appeared to such excellent advantage, as he did on this occasion, in Schubert's "Wanderer Fantasia." At first he seemed rather motionless, but from the first appearance of the theme ("Ich Komme von Gebirgeher") he was powerful in the highest degree. He invested this portion of the work with just the right degree of mournful pathos, and in the latter part his technique was altogether commendable, and was seconded by the well-toned piano. The orchestral accompaniment calls only for praise.

Following this came one movement from Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique." It was but natural that Mr. Gericke, a Viennese, should revel in the entrancing swing of this movement—"Le Bal." Yet we were sorry that the work could not be heard in its entirety; or, at least, the romantic movement "In the Fields" be given in contrast with it.

The Beethoven symphony was also given in a manner which makes fault-finding impossible. To us the chief merit of this work lies in the short minuet, forerunner of the Scherzo, and, even as it is, the most characteristic of its class. The responses between the wind and strings in the Trio, were exquisitely rendered. The last movement was deserving of especial praise. The shading of the introduction (those light runs of violins which contemporary critics found "ludicrous") was very finely done, and the strings were clear as crystal in the pretty figure which is the chief part of the movement. The tempo taken was a judicious and, compared with former renderings, a conservative one. It was certainly the best ensemble that we have heard in this movement for years. Next week comes a more important programme, with Brahms's new symphony and Schumann's "Overture Scherzo and Finale"—in itself almost a symphony.

Miss Fannie Bloomfield will be the solo-pianist at the Boston Symphony concert, Jan. 23 and 24. She is said to have received the endorsement of a critic of no less note than Hanslick, also of Freyer and Gehring, all three of whom think highly of her ability. Miss Bloomfield is from Chicago. She more recently comes from abroad, where she has been the pupil of Leschetizky, the teacher of Mme. Essipoff. She has already given concerts in Chicago, New York and Baltimore, and it may be inferred that her playing in Boston Music Hall next week will create an artistic sensation.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The following was the programme of the third of the present series of symphony concerts:

Overture—(Medea)	Bargiel
Grand Fantasia in C major	Schubert
For piano-forte and orchestra. (Arranged by Liszt.)
Mr. Wm. H. Sherwood.
Le Bal, (from the Symphonie Fantastique.)	Berlioz
Symphony No. 1, in C major	Beethoven
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio—Andante cantabile con moto.—Menuetto. (Allegro molto e vivace).—Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace.

The Bargiel overture gives the usual Medean horrors in a sombre dish of musical shivers and shudders. Although the work itself does not appeal to me very strongly, I must say that its interpretation was about perfect. Mr. Gericke is bringing his orchestra to a splendid unity, and his care in shading is praiseworthy. He can work up a climax as gradually and as effectually as any one I have ever heard.

Mr. Sherwood is playing better this season than ever before. He began the "Wanderer" fantasia somewhat coldly, but from the entrance of the first phrase of the song he grew passionate and pathetic. But the greatest success was made in the latter portion of the work where the fine and brilliant technic of the pianist carried all before it. A word of praise may be given to the piano (a Miller) which was especially clear in the bass tones. The orchestral accompaniment also was all that could be desired. Mr. Gericke's Viennese nature told in the performance of the single movement of Berlioz's great symphony. The swing dance tune was given in an entrancing manner; yet I was sorry to hear this movement alone. The symphony tells such a complete story that one desires to hear it entire. If this were impossible then the pastoral movement "In the Fields," with its tender conversation in the wood-wind, might have been added to contrast (as the composer intended) with "The Ball." The harp—pet instrument of all the modern composers—came out very clearly and effectively. By the way, that reminds me of an anecdote which shows how Liszt loves the harp. A work of the Hungarian composer was about to be given in Vienna, and the director called on Liszt and begged that if he had any special directions as to the reading of the work they might be imparted and followed. "Make the harps loud enough" was Liszt's only answer. Two years after a similar interview took place between director and composer about another work. "Make the harps loud enough" was again the only comment. If that doesn't prove an affection for the instrument I shall let the case go by default.

What can one say about the Beethoven first symphony? To be sure I spoke an hour about it in the New England Conservatory of Music last Thursday, but I know that you will not open your columns to me for a symphonic analysis a la Grove.

By the way, Grove must be one of the original "Grove's of Blarney," for he scarcely concedes a weak spot in anything that any classical master ever wrote. For myself, I should be well content to let Beethoven's first symphony rest upon the shelf for a single season, and give some of the modern composers (for whom there seems to be no space) a chance. It is no disrespect to say that the chief interest of this work is historical. It shows an epoch in Beethoven's career; a time when he shone, yet with a reflected light, and gave more of Albrechtsberger and Haydn than of Beethoven. From this, however, I except the minuet, which shows the giant shaking the fetters which Haydn had borne patiently for years. One feels, in listening to this bold and sweeping movement, that the essence, if not the name, of the symphonic Scherzo, has already been nearly attained. The movements all went well. I cannot tell what occasioned such a shower of snapping E strings in the violins during the second movement. The responses between the wind and strings in the trio of the minuet went very finely, the shading and contrasts being well brought out. I was especially pleased with the last movement. The short violin runs of the introduction, which some of Beethoven's critics thought ludicrous, were most delicately rendered, and the tempo was taken not too fast, but in the style of an allegro molto of Haydn, a very different thing from an allegro molto of Schumann or the later composers. The ensemble of the last movement I have never heard surpassed. Next week we are to have a programme of more depth, as will be seen by the list.

Symphony, No. 3 in F major, op. 90	Brahms
Allegro con brio.—Andante,—
Poco Allegretto.—Allegro.
(First time.)

Concerto for Violoncello in D minor, op. 32

Andante Cantabile, from the Trio op. 97	Beethoven
Arranged by Franz Liszt.
Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 52	Schumann

As I wrote you some weeks ago, the putting of the Brahms' Symphony before the close of the programme is not a departure from the plan of Mr. Gericke to end with a symphony. The Brahms Symphony is exceptional, in that it ends in a tranquil and generally quiet manner, without a highly wrought up climax. It therefore is unsuited to finish a programme. But as it is, the Schumann Op. 52 is almost a symphony, and will close the proceedings with the customary grandeur. Mr. Fritz Giese is, I think, the best violoncellist in America, so that we may look for next Saturday with a reasonable expectation of having a musical feast.

L. C. E.

Life

Hal

ner 39th street
K.

N PLAN.

h Southern Aspec
NES & PLEWE.

INGTON,

enue, New York

PLAN.

ONDU

O. V. PITMAN.

CHAM,

2d Street.

merican plan. Ric celled. Strictly season or year.

N, Proprietor,
Shelter Island, N.

HOTEL,

N SQUARE,

th Av. & 24th st
AN PLAN.)

ing of the house

nd the Albemarle
fect hotel in the cit

TER, Prop'r.

MARC

Plan.

39th Street,

ague Club.

LIS, New York.

LBURN

LE, from

LISZT.

ST., NEW YORK.

modelled, with new a

The superior exce

ent is proverbial.

BROS., Proprietors.

HOTEL

VENUE,

New York

PLAN.

RRY, Prop'r.

Branch, opens June 2

House,

th St., New York

Proprietor.

First-class accommoda

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The following was the programme of the third of the present series of symphony concerts:

Overture—(Medea).....	Bargiel
Grand Fantasia in C major.....	Schubert
For piano-forte and orchestra. (Arranged by Liszt.)
Mr. Wm. H. Sherwood.
Le Bal, (from the Symphonie Fantastique.).....	Berlioz
Symphony No. 1, in C major.....	Beethoven
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio—Andante cantabile con moto.—Menuetto. (Allegro molto e vivace).—Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace.

The Bargiel overture gives the usual Medean horrors in a sombre dish of musical shivers and shudders. Although the work itself does not appeal to me very strongly, I must say that its interpretation was about perfect. Mr. Gericke is bringing his orchestra to a splendid unity, and his care in shading is praiseworthy. He can work up a climax as gradually and as effectually as any one I have ever heard.

Mr. Sherwood is playing better this season than ever before. He began the "Wanderer" fantasia somewhat coldly, but from the entrance of the first phrase of the song he grew passionate and pathetic. But the greatest success was made in the latter portion of the work where the fine and brilliant technic of the pianist carried all before it. A word of praise may be given to the piano (a Miller) which was especially clear in the bass tones. The orchestral accompaniment also was all that could be desired. Mr. Gericke's Viennese nature told in the performance of the single movement of Berlioz's great symphony. The swiny dance tune was given in an entrancing manner; yet I was sorry to hear this movement alone. The symphony tells such a complete story that one desires to hear it entire. If this were impossible then the pastoral movement "In the Fields," with its tender conversation in the wood-wind, might have been added to contrast (as the composer intended) with "The Ball." The harp—pet instrument of all the modern composers—came out very clearly and effectively. By the way, that reminds me of an anecdote which shows how Liszt loves the harp. A work of the Hungarian composer was about to be given in Vienna, and the director called on Liszt and begged that if he had any special directions as to the reading of the work they might be imparted and followed. "Make the harps loud enough" was Liszt's only answer. Two years after a similar interview took place between director and composer about another work. "Make the harps loud enough" was again the only comment. If that doesn't prove an affection for the instrument I shall let the case go by default.

What can one say about the Beethoven first symphony? To be sure I spoke an hour about it in the New England Conservatory of Music last Thursday, but I know that you will not open your columns to me for a symphonic analysis a la Grove.

By the way, Grove must be one of the original "of Blarney," for he scarcely concedes a weak spot thing that any classical master ever wrote. For me should be well content to let Beethoven's first symphony rest upon the shelf for a single season, and give the modern composers (for whom there seems to be space) a chance. It is no disrespect to say that the interest of this work is historical. It shows an epoch in Beethoven's career; a time when he shone, yet with reflected light, and gave more of Albrechtsberger and than of Beethoven. From this, however, I except the minuet, which shows the giant shaking the fetters. Haydn had borne patiently for years. One feels, in coming to this bold and sweeping movement, that the name, if not the name, of the symphonic Scherzo, has been nearly attained. The movements all went well, cannot tell what occasioned such a shower of snap strings in the violins during the second movement. Responses between the wind and strings in the third minuet went very finely, the shading and contrast well brought out. I was especially pleased with the movement. The short violin runs of the introduction which some of Beethoven's critics thought ludicrously most delicately rendered, and the tempo was taken fast, but in the style of an allegro molto of Haydn, a different thing from an allegro molto of Schumann and later composers. The ensemble of the last movement never heard surpassed. Next week we are to have a programme of more depth, as will be seen by the list.

Symphony, No. 3 in F major, op. 90.....

Allegro con brio.—Andante,—

Poco Allegretto.—Allegro.

(First time.)

Concerto for Violoncello in D minor, op. 32.....

With Orchestral Accompaniment.

Mr. Giese.

Andante Cantabile, from the Trio op. 97.....

Arranged by Franz Liszt.

Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 52.....

As I wrote you some weeks ago, the putting of Brahms' Symphony before the close of the programme was not a departure from the plan of Mr. Gericke to end with a symphony. The Brahms Symphony is exceptional in that it ends in a tranquil and generally quiet manner, but it is a highly wrought up climax. It therefore is unsuitable to finish a programme. But as it is, the Schumann is almost a symphony, and will close the proceedings with the customary grandeur. Mr. Fritz Giese is, I think, the best violoncellist in America, so that we may look for a Saturday with a reasonable expectation of having a feast.

Musical.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The programme for the third symphony concert in Music Hall last Saturday evening read as follows: Bargiel—Overture, (Medea); Schubert—Grand Fantasia in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra, arranged by Liszt; Berlioz—La Bal, (from the Symphonie Fantastique); Beethoven—Symphony No. 1, in C major; adagio molto; allegro con brio—Andante cantabile—Menuetto (allegro molto e vivace), adagio allegro molto e vivace. Soloist, Mr. William H. Sherwood. The Bargiel overture was welcome as the work of a talented and illustrious musician whose name is not a very familiar one in our concert halls. The overture is neither very rich nor very profound in the creative sense; it is a work of certain negative characteristics, such as entitle it to a respectful hearing; yet somewhat more than a negative order of praise can be bestowed upon its orchestration, which is in a high degree interesting and masterly. At this concert even more than at its predecessors the mastery of Herr Gericke's lead was very impressive, notably in the performance of Beethoven's first symphony. The critical attention upon the new conductor at the first symphony concert, thought it had somewhat waned to a blind admiration, again put in an appearance before the rendering of the Beethoven symphony. Much curiosity was manifested as to whether the performance would conform to traditions as to tempo, etc. It cannot be denied that each movement of the work was taken at a faster tempo than has heretofore been experienced in Boston, and yet the entire effect was in a most artistic sense satisfactory. Heretofore the faults of the Boston symphony orchestra have been in a rugged and rough fortissimo, in an unequal piano and in the diminuendo and crescendo, constantly marred here and there by a tone out of its exact position in the retreat and advance of sound. It is in the remedy of such defects that Herr Gericke has achieved a triumph. The performance of the symphony fairly gladdened with "timbre," "verve," and "chic." It was in each of the allegro movements one of the most exciting performances of the work that has ever been heard here. Per contra, had the tempi more strictly conformed to tradition, the least interesting of the Beethoven symphonies might not have been heard to an advantage that enhanced its actual advantage as a work of art. Herr Gericke's conception of orchestral perfection is a lofty one. Until now the defect of the orchestra under any baton has been the annihilation of the individual executant, but under Herr Gericke each solo phrase is heard with charming distinctness, while collectively time, tune and tone are given with a fractional exactitude and consistency. We at last have a conductor who recognizes the string quartette as the true nucleus of the orchestra, and who is enabled to display it as such without bringing it into such prominence as tends to pervert the solo effects intended by the composer. Sherwood's playing in the Schubert fantasia was simply noble. In his very selection of the work for public performance he sacrificed the popular effect that his playing might have produced, and received such applause—being twice recalled—as was simply due his rank as a pianist. None but a musician could thoroughly have enjoyed the fantasia, or could have appreciated the appalling difficulties in constant attendance upon its performance. A large portion of the audience must have taken considerable for granted in applauding him with so much zeal, yet musicians joined in the applause with an absolute knowledge as to the masterly character of the effort, and with a most hearty recognition of its merit. As an interpretive effort it was all that could be desired. Mr. Sherwood, as he has often done, again proved his aptitude to comprehend the meaning and master the technical difficulties of a high order of music, before which all exhibitions of modern so-called virtuosity sink to absolute insignificance.

GERICKE'S ORCHESTRA. 51/2

Beethoven's First Symphony Played Last Evening—The Next Programme.

The symphony programme last evening presented only one novelty—the opening number, Bargiel's "Medea" overture. This proved to be a romantic and imaginative composition of much merit. It was well played, with the exception of some heavy rasping on the strings in parts. Mr. William Sherwood was the soloist of the occasion, and was at his best. He played the Liszt arrangement of Schubert's grand fantasia in C major and several other exacting pieces to a warmly appreciative audience. In fact the enthusiasm called forth by the pianist's fine work was almost without limit. He was recalled three times after his great effort. One of the most popular numbers of the evening was a beautiful little dance with an odd instrumentation from Berlioz' symphony fantastique. Berlioz' name finds its place all too seldom on our symphony programmes. The symphony was Beethoven's first. Mr. Gericke's reading was of a character calculated to develop and emphasize all the brightness and sprightliness of this Haydnish but ever-interesting composition of the great composer. Some of the movements were taken at a little more rapid pace than we are wont to hear them. But Mr. Gericke certainly increased the excellent impression which he has made upon his Boston audiences in the two previous concerts. The programme for the next concert is as follows:

Brahms.....Symphony, No. 3, in F. major, op. 90
Allegro con brio—Andante.
Poco Allegretto—Allegro.
(First time.)
De Swert...Concerto for violoncello in D minor, op. 32
With orchestral accompaniment.
Beethoven...Andante Cantabile, from the Trio op. 97
Arranged by Franz Liszt.
Schumann.....Overture, Scherzo, and finale, op. 52
Soloist.....Mr. Fritz Giese

the work for public performance he sacrificed the popular effect that his playing might have produced, and received such applause—being twice recalled—as was simply due his rank as a pianist. None but a musician could thoroughly have enjoyed the fantasia, or could have appreciated the appalling difficulties in constant attendance upon its performance. A large portion of the audience must have taken considerable for granted in applauding him with so much zeal, yet musicians joined in the applause with an absolute knowledge as to the masterly character of the effort, and with a most hearty recognition of its merit. As an interpretive effort it was all that could be desired. Mr. Sherwood, as he has often done, again proved his aptitude to comprehend the meaning and master the technical difficulties of a high order of music, before which all exhibitions of modern so-called virtuosity sink to absolute insignificance.

GERICKE'S ORCHESTRA. Sl. 12

Beethoven's First Symphony Played Last Evening—The Next Programme.

The symphony programme last evening presented only one novelty—the opening number, Bargiel's "Medea" overture. This proved to be a romantic and imaginative composition of much merit. It was well played, with the exception of some heavy rasping on the strings in parts. Mr. William Sherwood was the soloist of the occasion, and was at his best. He played the Liszt arrangement of Schubert's grand fantasia in C major and several other exacting pieces to a warmly appreciative audience. In fact the enthusiasm called forth by the pianist's fine work was almost without limit. He was recalled three times after his great effort. One of the most popular numbers of the evening was a beautiful little dance with an odd instrumentation from Berlioz' symphony fantastique. Berlioz' name finds its place all too seldom on our symphony programmes. The symphony was Beethoven's first. Mr. Gericke's reading was of a character calculated to develop and emphasize all the brightness and sprightliness of this Haydnish but ever-interesting composition of the great composer. Some of the movements were taken at a little more rapid pace than we are wont to hear them. But Mr. Gericke certainly increased the excellent impression which he has made upon his Boston audiences in the two previous concerts. The programme for the next concert is as follows:

Brahms.....Symphony, No. 3, in F. major, op. 90
Allegro con brio—Andante.
Poco Allegretto—Allegro.
(First time.)
De Swert...Concerto for violoncello in D minor, op. 32
With orchestral accompaniment.
Beethoven... Andante Cantabile, from the Trio op. 97
Arranged by Franz Liszt.
Schumann.....Overture, Scherzo, and finale, op. 52
Soloist.....Mr. Fritz Giese

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.30, WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE SCHERZO OF THE LAST NUMBER.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 8TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS,

SYMPHONY, No. 3 in F major, op. 90.
Allegro con brio.—Andante,—
Poco Allegretto.—Allegro.
(First time.)

DE SWERT,

CONCERTO FOR VIOLONCELLO in D minor, op. 32.
With Orchestral Accompaniment.

BEETHOVEN,

ANDANTE CANTABILE, from the Trio op. 97.
Arranged by FRANZ LISZT.

SCHUMANN,

OVERTURE, SCHERZO, AND FINALE, op. 52.

SOLOIST:

MR. FRITZ GIESE.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night before one of the fullest houses of the season thus far. The programme opened with Brahms's new symphony in F No. 3, played here for the first time. It was a good idea to place it at the beginning of the concert, though it perhaps would have been wiser to have preceded it by a short overture, and thus have enabled those who unfortunately arrived a moment or two late to hear the opening movement. The symphony is the most melodious of the three we have had from Brahms. We cannot say that it is the most interesting or the most brilliant. It is, of course, dignified in character, but like the great mass of the composer's music, it is painfully dry, deliberate and ungenial; and like that, too, it is free from all effect of seeming spontaneity. Its themes are brief according to the method of Brahms, and he no sooner evolves four bars of melody than he sets to work to develop it, and keeps it aggravatingly meandering through labored counterpoint and twisted rhythms until he is ready to return to the short subject in its simpler form again. Brahms is decidedly a master of thematic development, but it is easier to develop themes than to invent them. To develop four bar melodies such as Brahms has vouchsafed in this symphony is not as great an achievement, even when accomplished with the skill, learning and ingenuity he has here shown, as it is to invent the themes of the andante of the fifth symphony, the opening allegro of the seventh, and the allegretto of the eighth by Beethoven. We yearn for more tune in Brahms, even at the loss of something of his persistent masterly development. There is something else in music besides mere science. The opening allegro of this work is spirited and full of color. Its exact meaning is, however, not to be fathomed at a single hearing. The andante is founded on a theme resembling the prayer in "Zampa." It is brief, as usual, and is worked out with great ingenuity, but at a length which at last produce a monotonous effect. The third movement is an allegretto, almost resembling in character an andante. In it the spirit and fire of the customary scherzo gave way to a melancholy plaintiveness. It is the most pleasing and most interesting portion of the symphony, and is more clear, direct, and extended in melody than is customary with Brahms. Its warmth, grace, and easy flow make it stand out conspicuously from the dryness that prevails in the other movements. The finale we could not understand, and it ends in a quiet and unimpressive manner that makes it an anti-climax after the fuss and noisiness that precede it. A second hearing of the work may possibly modify the unsatisfactory effect the symphony as a whole made upon us last night. We must add that the audience seemed to be more fortunate in understanding it than we were, for they applauded heartily at the end. Mr. Lang may possibly have made it clear to them on two planes. The next purely orchestral selection was Liszt's impertinent and unnecessary arrangement of the andante from Beethoven's trio, op. 97. It was the first natural melody of the concert, and came with delightful effect on the ear after all the hard struggling for themes that had preceded it. The orchestra did not acquit itself as well as usual on this work, for it was lacking in precision and at times, in clearness. Schumann's fine Overture, Scherzo and Finale, which ended the concert, was, on the other hand, beautifully read and performed throughout. The soloist was Mr. Fritz Giese, who performed De Swert's Concerto for violoncello and orchestra in D-minor, op. 32, with great brilliancy and rare beauty of expression. His large style, perfect technique, and refined artistic sentiment, were never displayed to more advantage than in his interpretation and execution of this difficult and admirable concerto. He was very heartily applauded and enthusiastically recalled. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Der Freischütz," Weber; Recitative and Aria, "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Largo, Handel; March in B-minor, Schubert; two songs by Gericke; and Schumann's Symphony, No. 1. The soloist will be Miss Emma Juch.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—This was the programme given at the fourth symphony concert last Saturday evening: Brahms, Symphony, No. 3 in F major, op. 90 (first time); De Swert, Concerto for violoncello in D minor, op. 32, with orchestral accompaniment (first time); Beethoven, Andante Cantabile, from the Trio op. 97, arranged by Frank Liszt; Schumann, Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 52. The performance of the newest of the Brahms symphonies was an occasion of unusual interest which was plainly indicated by the large audience and its peculiarly earnest attitude. This symphony was first performed in Vienna Dec. 5, 1883, having been completed the preceding summer. It was first played in this country under the direction of Mr. Van der Stucken, at the first of a series of novelty concerts in New York city, Oct. 25. It is also scheduled in the lists of each of the regular symphony societies of that city for the current season, and, in fact, is the most notable orchestral work available this season. It cannot be denied that Brahms occupies a position in music similar to that held by mathematics in the common curriculum of study. To the majority of students who sincerely desire to cultivate music from an art standpoint, who wish properly to follow the great composers in order to understand and appreciate them, Brahms represents a school of composition abstract and cold. He often forgets beauty of sound in an absorbing earnestness of form; the characteristics of his intelligence prevent his music taking hold upon the sympathies. To the learned, however, he is, with Schumann, pre-eminent for the definite individuality with which he expresses most profound thought. The standard of judgment of the average symphony patron in Boston is probably the result of hearing much good music, and in discussing what has been heard with the companion of the concert room, and with the best-liked writer in the next days' newspaper, a good general opinion results, and it could not be otherwise in an atmosphere so earnest; but the ability to follow the development of the musical structure, to recognize and define the detail of instrumental variety which constantly subserves and adorns the one chief motive of the movement being played, and the ability, therefore, to form an opinion, is given to those only who concede to the study of music an importance equal to literature or science. A symphony is scarcely funny, neither is an essay by Ruskin, yet a sort of surface appreciation is about the only thing possible after hearing either, unless one be really educated in the matter. Pleasure is very possible to him who enjoys music through the senses alone, but is it fair to go no further? The opportunities one has in Boston for a successful understanding of the laws of harmony and counterpoint, of musical theory and musical form, are exceptional, and not until the community is willing to study can it rightly be called musical. But to the average listener the Brahms Symphony No. 3 in F was an agreeable disappointment, largely for two reasons: it is short, and it was played in a warm and expressive manner, which emphasized the color of even the briefest melody hidden within the maze of structural intention. Brahms has not been a prolific writer, for his first symphony is scarcely seven years old, yet the last is more free from excessive development, is more easily understood than either which precede it. With them it expresses great fertility of invention, but it seems tempered to meet the needs of that numerous class of conscientious people who would really like to know Brahms if they only could. Of course, in suggesting this, it does not imply that this relaxation from his usual subjective mood is apparent in any great degree but it is certainly something. The symphony in F major is written in four movements. The theme of the opening Allegro is introduced after three simple chords, by the first violins. It is written in characteristic rhythm and the remaining strings play a syncopated accompaniment; before reaching a climax the secondary theme, of quaint pastoral character, is heard among the woodwinds, it quickly resolves through dissonance of increasing power into a major utterance of the first theme by full orchestra. There is unexpected variety caused by the change of time of the second subject from common to triple. The close of the movement is odd; its last measures quietly reiterate the few notes of the original theme in a descent to the tonic almost undignified. The following Andante is surely transparent, for its melody is singularly simple, and only the strings and the woods with the horns in sustained quiet are employed. Brahms writes, instead of the customary Scherzo, an intermezzo, which here he styles Poco Allegretto. The cellos lead at once with a beautiful song of melancholy character; the violins follow, then the full band, always quietly; its thought is so fresh and its manner of presentation so skillful that both the impressionist and the harmonist must admire. The last movement, Allegro, is written in F minor and not in the key of the opening movement, as is usual. It seems of the largest consequence, though at a single hearing it is hardly definable. Its pattern is grand, and for the first time in this symphony, the extreme of Brahms' orchestral strength is apparent. It suggests in rugged restless figures, the hand of a master of unlimited resources. After a climax occurring midway, the horns usher in a calm with which the movement closes. It is almost certain that the symphony will be played again during the season. The Andante from the trio op. 67 of Beethoven, arranged by Liszt, is an example of a species of iniquity which in the less profound walks of music, in this country at least, seems to thrive without a protest being heard. It certainly is wrong for the compiler of the "Musical Treasure" or "Universal Harp," or Jones' "Gems," who ruthlessly snatches his selections for editing anywhere along the path of composition, from Palestrina to Jerome Hopkins, not to transcribe everything in its integrity. Although it is usual, in these books of musical prostration, to show that so and so wrote the page quoted. Could that unfortunate writer rise from his grave (and, curiously, these "arrangers" select their material with a sort of post-mortem uniformity) he would fail to discover himself in the commonplace and oftentimes ridiculous setting to which he has been subjected. In a score of books in common use the best writers are often sheared of all individuality by the iconoclast, who adds an ending, cuts a cadence, sacrifices a rhythm, or does a hundred things which are sins against truth and good music. The attitude of Liszt towards the Beethoven trio is, from this point of view, no less unpardonable. Granted that he is a master of musical form, this movement was written for piano-forte, violin and cello, and bears a relative value to what preceded and that which followed; in the original it is part of a beautiful design, but its significance in any orchestral setting is lost. The remaining orchestral number of the programme, the overture, Scherzo and Finale of Schumann, is a work of continuous interest, and an excellent type of the master who prophesied the greatness of Brahms. It remains to speak of Mr. Giese, who played the concerto by De Swert for the first time in Boston. The work is fantastic and full of verve, it offers the virtuoso excellent privileges in execution and expression, but its themes are hardly more than melodic; without being reminiscent they do not attach themselves to the memory. The cello is accompanied by a diminished string band. Mr. Giese's playing seems equal in execution and in intensity to that of Fischer (who was heard in Boston about five seasons ago). He has a larger tone, and his style is perhaps more manly than that most finished and brilliant player. The audience applauded at his first period—after a sweeping climax—with a unanimity which was remarkable. Its spontaneity must have astonished Mr. Gericke, who doubtless has become somewhat used to the American repression of feeling. At the close of the concerto Mr. Giese was twice recalled. At the next concert the numbers for orchestra are the Fryschutz Overture, Weber; Largo, Handel; March in B minor, Schubert; Symphony No. 1, Schumann. Miss Emma Juch will sing one of the arias from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," and two songs by Mr. Gericke.

Not long since the Brahms symphony No. 3 in F was performed in Berlin under the composer's direction. The performance was heard by a number of well-known musicians who also attended the concert, on Saturday evening last, at Music Hall, and listened with critical attention. Their verdict made to a representative of this paper is that the Boston symphony orchestra gave a more interesting and more artistic rendering of the work than that given under the composer's direction. As the musicians referred to have no personal acquaintance with Herr Gericke, and are in every way competent judges, the compliment to our new conductor is indeed high, as it is undoubtedly deserved.

Mr. Lang's analysis of the new Brahms' Symphony, at Chickering Hall last Thursday, was largely attended. The lecture was, as usual, of an informal conversational character, and was all the more enjoyable on that account. Selections from the symphony and from Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," were given by Messrs. Lang and Foote.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT. Herald

The fourth of the present season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke conductor, at Music Hall last evening, had as soloist Mr. Fritz Giese, 'celloist, and the several numbers of the programme were as follows:

Symphony, No. 3 in F major, op. 90.....Brahms
Concerto for violoncello in D minor, op. 32....De Swert
Andante Cantabile, from the Trio op. 47...Beethoven
Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 52....Schumann

The Brahms symphony was the novelty of the evening, as it received its first performance here, and was heard for the second time in an American concert hall on this occasion. The first performance of the work at Vienna Dec. 2, 1883, at the Philharmonic society's concert, was under Hans Richter's direction and since then its composer has made it the novelty of many continental concert programmes. Its four movements are allegro con brio, andante, poco allegretto and allegro, each of its divisions being somewhat brief, so that its performance lasts but little over half an hour. It was six years since the second of this composer's symphonies had been made public when this composition had its first presentation at Vienna, and many comments had been made upon the absence of any further result in this line of work by the composer. In some ways it may with justice be said that Brahms has employed this waiting time to good advantage. If the future music lover is to be compelled to be satisfied with music which appeals exclusively to the intellectual faculties for its comprehension, rather than to emotional powers, then it is to be hoped that the studies in this line shall be carefully prepared, and all possible errors corrected, and nothing retained which shall distract the attention of the hearer by furnishing cause for a pleasant emotion. When such music is to be played at a concert, it is an error, as has been remarked, to announce the event under the head of amusements, "educational" being the better classification. However, taking the work as it was presented last evening, the first thought is to thank Herr Gericke for the way in which it was played. There was no chance to complain that its meaning, such as it has, was not clearly given, and the applause following the finale was more merited by the musician than the work. Brahms has apparently determined in this symphony to avoid any cause for the criticism so often made upon his writings, that they are so intricate and complicated as to be unintelligible. In this effort, he appears to have gone to the other extreme and selected as the basis of his work, in each of the four movements, themes which would hardly do credit to a musical primer. The word "selected" is used advisedly, for there is such an ever-present evidence of studied preparation throughout the symphony, that any thought of its being the result of inspiration is out of the question. The treatment given the themes is always of the most skillful character, and every portion of the work has been so carefully polished that it is well nigh impossible to realize the valueless character of the brilliant result. The consummate ability of the musician is everywhere as conspicuous as is the composer's lack of original thought, and the interest given the composition by reason of its technical perfection is more than over-weighted by the ever-present feeling that the cause of real music suffers by the prominence given such efforts. Schumann can hardly be classed as a brilliant composer, and yet the overture, scherzo and finale, a symphony save that it lacks a slow movement, proved a positive gem of melodious measures in contrast with the Brahms number, and the comparative relief it afforded to the general gloom of the preceding selections made it a welcome ending to a most wearisome programme. Mr. Fritz Giese, who in former seasons as the solo 'celloist of the Mendelssohn Quartet Club, has fully demonstrated his right to his present position as the leader of the cellos of the orchestra, achieved a brilliant triumph in the De Swert concerto. Although the composition is not of a particularly pleasing character, the masterly way in which the player met its technical demands fairly electrified the audience, and Mr. Giese was three times recalled at its conclusion to acknowledge the applause which rewarded his efforts. The good taste of the Abbe Liszt in selecting the delightful andante of the Beethoven trio for orchestral treatment can hardly be commended. The work has been done in a masterly manner, and it was presented with good success, save that the lack of prominence given the harp score was so marked that it would have called forth the censure of the venerable abbe, whose partiality for this instrument is so well known. It needed but a slight effort to imagine a frown upon the bronze face of the composer's statue as it gazed down upon the players, and had it been endowed with speech, it might well have said with Snout, as he gazed upon the ass' head on Bottom's shoulders, "Oh! thou art changed, indeed."

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

"What will he do with it?" is almost the first question that arises to the mind when a symphony by Brahms is announced, as "What did he not do with it?" is likely to be the first question after the announcement has been carried out in performance. Up to the Boston Orchestra's concert of last Saturday evening the effect of this composer's symphony writing has been the double one of complexity on his part and perplexity on the part of his auditors. Much as one might feel disposed to trust and admire the author in his work, it was only possible to do so with great limitations, nor was it easy to guess how much of this was due to abstruseness of style and how much to lack of interpretative skill.

But even after a single hearing of the new symphony—No. 3, in F major, opus 90—played as the chief number of the fourth symphony concert, one can hardly help feeling that he has got closer to the composer than before. This is due partly to the clearness and marked form of most of the themes, and partly to the insight and the expressive power of Mr. Gericke, who assisted the listener, as much as lies in any conductor's province, to a direct understanding and correct appreciation of the work. The obstacle to immediate and sure apprehension of Brahms' symphonic music, even by professional men, lies in the author's manner of applying the principles of thematic development. He is apparently so bent upon availing himself of every resource, upon using every thought which occurs to him, upon giving every instrument an active part, that in many parts of his score it is not only difficult to decide which part should be the most prominent for the moment, but also even more difficult to make the elected part appear so. His polyphony often seems to be a chaos—fortunately not a discordant one—of equal voices all crying to be heard at once, and each confusing the speech of the rest and bewildering the mind which tries to separate one coherent statement from the mass and follow it to its conclusion. In a choral prelude of Bach, indeed, the smooth separate motions of the four voices may be traced and enjoyed by the ear alone, but in the symphonies of Brahms it is not always easy, even with the help of the score, to pick out and follow some one figure of the dozen which are struggling for individual recognition. When he shall at last make up his mind to say one thing at a time, supporting it, indeed, with richness and variety, Brahms will have gained greatly upon his present position as artist and entertainer.

This third symphony is without a scherzo, and its general cast is placid and almost pensive; even its lighter themes often recurring in slower, long-drawn notes, and most of its movements ending in extreme quietude. These movements are, an allegro con brio, in which the qualifying epithet must be taken rather as a warning against dullness than as significant of positive gaiety; an andante; a poco allegretto, and a final allegro. The themes are for the most part of considerable length, and they frequently end abruptly—somewhat as if interrupted or suspended; they often have a tinge of gypsy coloring, and in their less elaborate developments their support has often a strange, remote suggestiveness in the fitful pulsings or semitonic augmentations of the under parts. There is not much which is loud or forcible in the treatment—comparatively few crashings of chords and demonstrations of drums, in the ensembles each instrument has so much to say on its own account that the effect is rather that of the confusion of an excited multitude than of the progression of coördinated forces. Many of the themes are very beautiful and exquisitely given out—notably that of the andante, the first half dozen notes of which suggest the choral prayer in the second act of "Zampa," as the instrumentation suggests the "Brautzug" in "Lohengrin." The opening theme of the third movement has a peculiar tenderness in the dropping reluctance of its phrase and the final recurrence of it in the horns just before the brief crescendo with which the movement ends is beautifully conceived. We should like to dwell upon many incidental points, and recall many suggestive or fanciful passages—such as the delicate use of the brass in the second movement, the curious effect of the muting of the strings at the very end, some touching changes from one mode to another, but we have already been too prolix, we fear. Let us say then, in conclusion, that the symphony evidently gave to the audience, as it did to us, more definite ideas and greater pleasure than had been expected from previous experience of the first and second symphonies, and that it was received with unstinted approval.

The orchestra also played Liszt's orchestral arrangement of the andante cantabile from Beethoven's trio, opus 97, with something less than their usual skill, and the Schumann overture, scherzo and finale, opus 52, with their best success. Mr. Fritz Giese as the soloist showed his great mastery of the violoncello in De Swert's showy concerto in D minor, opus 32, a work which, except for its availability for a virtuoso's purposes, does not interest us much.

At the next concert Schuman's first symphony will be played, preceded by the "Freischütz" overture, a largo of Handel, and Schubert's B minor march. There will also be singing by Miss Emma Juch who chooses an air from the "Marriage of Figaro," and two songs by Mr. Gericke.

MR. LANG'S SYMPHONY LECTURES.

Music has many aspects and functions, beyond the mere giving of vague, sensuous pleasure. It does appeal first of all to feeling, beyond doubt, and to be true to its highest mission should find its chief source of power in the moods of man. But understanding does not by any means detract from sympathy or weaken sensitiveness, and the auditor whose hearing is most intelligent and educated, will enjoy the most, even from that music which appeals mainly to the senses.

The symphony, the concerto, and the sonata, all need to be understood by the habitual concert-goer, just as does the structure of the fugue require to be known to the advanced musician. The enjoyment of their tones is enhanced by comprehending the system upon which the melodies and harmonies which are contained in these tones are arranged. To recognize a theme when it is announced, to follow it in its wanderings, and to appreciate the changes which come over it in the orchestral treatment, add an element of pleasure to the audition of the sweetest work in the world. Yet comparatively few concert-goers can do this; not for lack of natural ability or musical appreciation, but simply because they have not been taught what to look for and where to seek it.

It is to meet this difficulty that Mr. B. J. Lang has decided to do in an ample public way what has sometimes been undertaken in private study. He is going to give twelve lectures at Chickering Hall, in which he will first explain the general plan of symphony and concerto, and describe the nature and value of the different orchestral instruments, and then proceed to analyze and illustrate the thematic basis and the particular development of such works in these departments as are included in the regular sequence of the Boston Symphony programmes. Two pianofortes will give the necessary strength and clearness to the explanations, and in some cases Mr. Lang also hopes to have the assistance of the performer who will take the solo part at the concert. The plan is an admirable one, and cannot fail to be warmly welcomed by the amateurs and students of Boston.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme for the fourth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—Brahms. Symphony, No. 3 in F major, op. 90.
(First time.)

De Swert. Concerto for violoncello in D minor, op. 32.
Beethoven. Andante Cantabile, from the Trio op. 97.
Arranged by Franz Liszt.
Schumann. Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 52.
Mr. Fritz Giese was the cellist.

A new Brahms symphony is an event. Now that Wagner is dead, there is no composer in the world from whom a new work in one of the larger musical forms is looked for with such deep interest. This third symphony of Brahms is indeed a wonderful work, unmistakably characteristic of the composer, as everything he now writes is. In fact, this symphony, taken together with its immediate predecessor in D, throws not a little light upon certain characteristics of Brahms which are not a little interesting to note. Brahms stands almost alone today as a composer who, although wholly modern in spirit and style, seems to feel nothing impel him to relinquish the traditional musical forms, and to strike out into a wholly new path. Unlike Wagner, who found it impossible to bring his own genius into harmony with traditional modes of expression, and who set out in a new direction simply because he was irresistibly impelled thereto, and could not help it; unlike the modern Frenchman—Saint-Saëns, for instance—whom a certain weariness of the old drives to actual experimentalizing, who set out with the fixed intention of doing something unprecedented, Brahms is wholly content to stand by the traditions of his forefathers. Saint-Saëns expressed the present French point of view quite plainly when he wrote: "Brahms, with all his genius, leaves me cold, because he continually runs in the old ruts. * * * I own that I prefer Liszt, who cuts himself wholly loose from the old formal bonds." There you have the Frenchman all over: "formal bonds," an instinctive dread of restrictions, not so much because they actually do gall him, as because they possibly may gall him some day; at all events they might be thought to gall him. To be free is not enough; one must also seem free. Now it probably never occurred to Brahms that an adherence to tradition might be a state of bondage. The man is really so free, so absolutely sure of his freedom, that it does not occur to him to make a display of it. He finds certain ready-made forms, and finds moreover that he is easily comfortable in them; that he can move with perfect freedom and go quite as far as his fancy drives him without overstepping their limits. Many other composers still feel in the same way; the remarkable point about Brahms is that he is through and through a modern man, and perhaps the very last man that one would expect to hold fast by traditional methods. The intimate ideal connection between Brahms and Schumann is natural enough. Schumann represented the real development of Music in the path in which it was destined to continue for the next coming generations, whereas Mendelssohn represented the efflorescence of a tendency which has proved itself merely ephemeral. Brahms cannot rightly be said to Schumannize, any more than Beethoven could be said to Haydnize; he simply shows himself to be in the very centre of the modern musical current which Schumann turned in the direction in which it is now flowing. Even Wagner, no matter how individual his musical forms, showed himself in the end as drifting in quite the same direction. It is misleading to call certain traits in Brahms and Wagner "Schumannesque;" these traits are really the embodiment of the essential musical spirit of our day. Not the least noteworthy side of Brahms's predilection for the traditional is the very frequent use he makes of themes of a popular peasant type. Haydn and he can join hands here; only it must be remembered that the use Brahms makes of such themes is wholly his own; in fact, that he really imitates nobody. Of the third symphony, one can only say that it is in every way a worthy companion to its two great predecessors. Analysis on paper is fruitless. The time has fully come, however, for the people who are fond of talking about Brahms's brains to think well what they are saying. Thank heaven, the man has brains, an article of which no one can have too much! Whether or not this or that critic can feel the warm, glowing heart, the fiery passion, the lofty soul and delicate sense of beauty that Brahms possesses over and above his "brains," reduces itself simply to a question of the critic's receptivity. The symphony, with all its bristling difficulties, was grandly played by the orchestra.

It were impossible to speak in terms too enthusiastic of Mr. Giese's exquisite playing of the De Swert concerto; it was simply the perfection of brilliancy and grace. The composition itself, at best somewhat less disagreeable than many such things are, was a terrible plunge into triviality after the Brahms symphony, although some people may consider the fact that it gave huge pleasure to a large majority of the audience some excuse for playing it at such a concert. The Liszt arrangement of the heavenly Beethoven Andante can only be called very weak indeed, wholly unworthy of the work. The Schumann Overture, Scherzo and Finale were superbly given, and made an immense effect.

The next programme is—

Webber. Overture (Freischütz).
Mozart. Recitative and aria (Marriage of Figaro).
Handel. Largo.
Schubert. March in B minor.
Gericke. "Supplication," "My Messengers" (songs with piano).
Schumann. Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat, op. 38.

Miss Emma Juch will be the singer.

The latest absurdity in programme printing, by which the composer's name is given first, is as displeasing from its inelegance as from its failure to present the more important information first. It is a matter of primary interest to know what the general character of the programme is to be than what composers contribute each selection. The most experienced printer can make but a bad arrangement of a programme page following the new fashion, which, it is unnecessary to say, has come from Germany.

the rest and bewildering the mind which tries to separate one coherent statement from the mass and follow it to its conclusion. In a choral prelude of Bach, indeed, the smooth separate motions of the four voices may be traced and enjoyed by the ear alone, but in the symphonies of Brahms it is not always easy, even with the help of the score, to pick out and follow some one figure of the dozen which are struggling for individual recognition. When he shall at last make up his mind to say one thing at a time, supporting it, indeed, with richness and variety, Brahms will have gained greatly upon his present position as artist and entertainer.

This third symphony is without a scherzo, and its general cast is placid and almost pensive; even its lighter themes often recurring in slower, long-drawn notes, and most of its movements ending in extreme quietude. These movements are, an allegro con b. to, in which the qualifying epithet must be taken rather as a warning against dulness than as significant of positive gaiety; an andante; a poco allegretto, and a final allegro. The themes are for the most part of considerable length, and they frequently end abruptly—somewhat as if interrupted or suspended; they often have a tinge of gypsy coloring, and in their less elaborate developments their support has often a strange, remote suggestiveness in the fitful pulsings or semitonic augmentations of the under parts. There is not much which is loud or forcible in the treatment—comparatively few crashings of chords and demonstrations of drums, in the ensembles each instrument has so much to say on its own account that the effect is rather that of the confusion of an excited multitude than of the progression of coordinated forces. Many of the themes are very beautiful and exquisitely given out—notably that of the andante, the first half dozen notes of which suggest the choral prayer in the second act of "Zampa," as the instrumentation suggests the "Brautzug" in "Lohengrin." The opening theme of the third movement has a peculiar tenderness in the dropping reluctance of its phrase and the final recurrence of it in the horns just before the brief crescendo with which the movement ends is beautifully conceived. We should like to dwell upon many incidental points, and recall many suggestive or fanciful passages—such as the delicate use of the brass in the second movement, the curious effect of the muting of the strings at the very end, some touching changes from one mode to another, but we have already been too prolix, we fear. Let us say then, in conclusion, that the symphony evidently gave to the audience, as it did to us, more definite ideas and greater pleasure than had been expected from previous experience of the first and second symphonies, and that it was received with unstinted approval.

The orchestra also played Liszt's orchestral arrangement of the andante cantabile from Beethoven's trio, opus 97, with something less than their usual skill, and the Schumann overture, scherzo and finale, opus 52, with their best success. Mr. Fritz Giese as the soloist showed his great mastery of the violoncello in De Swert's showy concerto in D minor, opus 32, a work when, except for its availability for a virtuoso's purposes, does not interest us much.

At the next concert Schuman's first symphony will be played, preceded by the "Freischütz" overture, a tango of Händel, and Schubert's B minor march. There will also be singing by Miss Emma Juch who chooses an air from the "Marriage of Figaro," and two songs by Mr. Gericke.

MR. LANG'S SYMPHONY LECTURES.

Music has many aspects and functions, beyond the mere giving of vague, sensuous pleasure. It does appeal first of all to feeling, beyond doubt, and to be true to its highest mission should find its chief source of power in the moods of man. But understanding does not by any means detract from sympathy or weaken sensitiveness, and the auditor whose hearing is most intelligent and educated, will enjoy the most, even from that music which appeals mainly to the senses.

The symphony, the concerto, and the sonata, all need to be understood by the habitual concert-goer, just as does the structure of the fugue require to be known to the advanced musician. The enjoyment of their tones is enhanced by comprehending the system upon which the melodies and harmonies which are contained in these tones are arranged. To recognize a theme when it is announced, to follow it in its wanderings, and to appreciate the changes which come over it in the orchestral treatment, add an element of pleasure to the addition of the sweetest work in the world. Yet comparatively few concert-goers can do this; not for lack of natural ability or musical appreciation, but simply because they have not been taught what to look for and where to seek it.

It is to meet this difficulty that Mr. B. J. Lang has decided to do in an ample public way what has sometimes been undertaken in private study. He is going to give twelve lectures at Chickering Hall, in which he will first explain the general plan of symphony and concerto, and describe the nature and value of the different orchestral instruments, and then proceed to analyze and illustrate the thematic basis and the particular development of such works in these departments as are included in the regular sequence of the Boston Symphony programmes. Two pianofortes will give the necessary strength and clearness to the explanations, and in some cases Mr. Lang also hopes to have the assistance of the performer who will take the solo part at the concert. The plan is an admirable one, and cannot fail to be warmly welcomed by the amateurs and students of Boston.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme for the fourth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—Brahms. Symphony, No. 3 in F major, op. 90.
(First time.)

De Swert. Concerto for violoncello in D minor, op. 32.
Beethoven. Andante Cantabile, from the Trio op. 97.
Arranged by Franz Liszt.
Schumann. Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 52.
Mr. Fritz Giese was the cellist.

A new Brahms symphony is an event. Now that Wagner is dead, there is no composer in the world from whom a new work in one of the larger musical forms is looked for with such deep interest. This third symphony of Brahms is indeed a wonderful work, unmistakably characteristic of the composer, as everything he now writes is. In fact, this symphony, taken together with its immediate predecessor in D, throws not a little light upon certain characteristics of Brahms which are not a little interesting to note. Brahms stands almost alone today as a composer who, although wholly modern in spirit and style, seems to feel nothing impel him to relinquish the traditional musical forms, and to strike out into a wholly new path. Unlike Wagner, who found it impossible to bring his own genius into harmony with traditional modes of expression, and who set out in a new direction simply because he was irresistibly impelled thereto, and could not help it; unlike the modern Frenchman—Saint-Saëns, for instance—whom a certain weariness of the old drives to actual experimentalizing, who set out with the fixed intention of doing something unprecedented, Brahms is wholly content to stand by the traditions of his forefathers. Saint-Saëns expressed the present French point of view quite plainly when he wrote: "Brahms, with all his genius, leaves me cold, because he continually runs in the old ruts. * * * I own that I prefer Liszt, who cuts himself wholly loose from the old formal bonds." There you have the Frenchman all over: "formal bonds," an instinctive dread of restrictions, not so much because they actually do gall him, as because they possibly may gall him some day; at all events they might be thought to gall him. To be free is not enough; one must also seem free. Now it probably never occurred to Brahms that an adherence to tradition might be a state of bondage. The man is really so free, so absolutely sure of his freedom, that it does not occur to him to make a display of it. He finds certain ready-made forms, and finds moreover that he is easily comfortable in them; that he can move with perfect freedom and go quite as far as his fancy drives him without overstepping their limits. Many other composers still feel in the same way; the remarkable point about Brahms is that he is through and through a modern man, and perhaps the very last man that one would expect to hold fast by traditional methods. The intimate ideal connection between Brahms and Schumann is natural enough. Schumann represented the real development of Music in the path in which it was destined to continue for the next coming generations, whereas Mendelssohn represented the efflorescence of a tendency which has proved itself merely ephemeral. Brahms cannot rightly be said to Schumannize, any more than Beethoven could be said to Haydnize; he simply shows himself to be in the very centre of the modern musical current which Schumann turned in the direction in which it is now flowing. Even Wagner, no matter how individual his musical forms, showed himself in the end as drifting in quite the same direction. It is misleading to call certain traits in Brahms and Wagner "Schumannesque;" these traits are really the embodiment of the essential musical spirit of our day. Not the least noteworthy side of Brahms's predilection for the traditional is the very frequent use he makes of themes of a popular peasant type. Haydn and he can join hands here; only it must be remembered that the use Brahms makes of such themes is wholly his own; in fact, that he really imitates nobody. Of the third symphony, one can only say that it is in every way a worthy companion to its two great predecessors. Analysis on paper is fruitless. The time has fully come, however, for the people who are fond of talking about Brahms's brains to think well what they are saying. Thank heaven, the man has brains, an article of which no one can have too much! Whether or not this or that critic can feel the warm, glowing heart, the fiery passion, the lofty soul and delicate sense of beauty that Brahms possesses over and above his "brains," reduces itself simply to a question of the critic's receptivity. The symphony, with all its bristling difficulties, was grandly played by the orchestra.

It were impossible to speak in terms too enthusiastic of Mr. Giese's exquisite playing of the De Swert concerto; it was simply the perfection of brilliancy and grace. The composition itself, at best somewhat less disagreeable than many such things are, was a terrible plunge into triviality after the Brahms symphony, although some people may consider the fact that it gave huge pleasure to a large majority of the audience some excuse for playing it at such a concert. The Liszt arrangement of the heavenly Beethoven Andante can only be called very weak indeed, wholly unworthy of the work. The Schumann Overture, Scherzo and Finale were superbly given, and made an immense effect.

The next programme is—
Webber. Overture (Freischütz).
Mozart. Recitative and aria (Marriage of Figaro).
Händel. Largo.
Schubert. March in B minor.
Gericke. "Supplication," "My Messengers" (songs with piano).
Schumann. Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat, op. 38.

Miss Emma Juch will be the singer.

The latest absurdity in programme printing, by which the composer's name is given first, is as displeasing from its inelegance as from its failure to present the more important information first. It is a matter of primary interest to know what the general character of the programme is to be than what composers contribute each selection. The most experienced printer can make but a bad arrangement of a programme page following the new fashion, which, it is unnecessary to say, has come from Germany. Herald

Fourth Symphony Concert.

The fourth of the Boston Symphony Concerts, Mr. Wilhelm Gerike conductor, at Music Hall on Saturday evening introduced the following programme with Mr. Fritz Giese, violoncellist, as solo performer:

Symphony, No. 3 in F major, op. 90 (first time here)..... Brahms
Concerto for violoncello in D minor, op. 32..... De Swert
Andante Cantabile, from the Trio op. 97..... Beethoven
Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 62..... Schumann

Brahms's symphony is very different from his other works. As much as the others are dry and fatiguing, the symphony in F major is melodious, well developed and full of orchestral effects. The andante has a little of a Russo-slavic character; its principal theme, conducted from one instrument into another, is of a very original shape. The allegretto is neither of a scherzo nor a menuetto style and it is less characteristic than the andante; but the finale is vigorous and skillfully elaborated. The performance of this symphony by the orchestra was given with a perfect ensemble. Mr. Giese's execution of De Swert's concerto was of the highest interest. All technical difficulties appeared to be a mere play to him, but this artist possesses something better than the technique, which, after all, is the result of tedious work and long study. He possesses a great deal of feeling and sings on his instrument most pathetically. The Andante Cantabile from the Trio of Beethoven, arranged by Franz Liszt, is very skillfully elaborated, but there could be no easier task than to arrange for instruments a work where all is restrained and nothing morbid which is not instantly corrected, nothing luxurious which is not finally raised into the clear atmosphere of peaceful self-mastery, or even playfulness. And the emotions aroused are not the vamped up feelings of a jaded appetite, nor the false spasms of the sentimentalist, nor the dry and algebraic problem in music. They are such as are experienced in high moods or passionately sad ones, or in the night in summer's time, or by the sea; at all events they are unfolded before us, not with the want of perspective, or with the violent frenzy of a bad dream, but with true gradations in natural succession, and tempered with all the middle tints that go to make up the truth of life—not the life of a prosy positivist, but the life of a true poet, of a true musician. The horn solo was very brilliantly executed, but the bassoon began his variations rather too slowly; he seemed to be vexed in being disturbed in his contemplation. We must also add that the tempo in the middle of the andante was taken much slower than in the beginning, and that the accompaniment of the harps was not heard with sufficient clearness. The last number in the programme was the overture, scherzo and finale, by Schumann.

When does an overture have a scherzo and a separate finale? This illegitimate marriage has not a bit of good sense. Still the best member of this quarrelsome family was the scherzo, suggesting distinctly Mendelssohn's scherzo, "Sommer-nacht's Traum." It has, at least, the wonted character of a scherzo orchestrated in a coquettish way. But we must not be astonished with Schumann's eccentricities. He was all his life through a great worker and a great seeker of musical problems. Before his marriage with the daughter of Mr. Wick, Professor of Harmony in Leipzig, who was his master for composition, Schumann was quite mad. After his marriage, having always the same tendencies not to charm, but to astonish the hearers with the most complicated combinations, very often incomprehensible, he became for the second time insane, was cured again, and instead of looking for inspiration in his works, he looked only for science. Science is indispensable in music, but is not alone sufficient when it is not sustained by melody, by poetry and by inspiration. Schumann became mad for the third time, and his wife, Madame Clara Schumann, was obliged to place him in an asylum, where he died. Some of his compositions are real musical hieroglyphs. Still, we must render him the justice of owning that he was one of the greatest of philosophers in music. The fifth concert will be given in Music Hall next Saturday evening, with the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. Miss Emma Juch, soprano, is the soloist, and the selections are as follows: Overture ("Freischuetz"), Weber; recitative and aria ("Marriage of Figaro"), Mozart; "Largo," Handel; "March" in B minor, Schubert; "Supplication" and "My Messengers" (songs with piano), Gerike; Symphony No. 1 in B flat, op. 38, Schumann.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Fritz Giese Wins Considerable Applause as a Soloist—The Whole Concert Very Acceptable.

The programme of the fourth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening was pleasing and satisfactory. There are many people still who appreciate the better order of music who yet look with a feeling of vague uneasiness at an announcement of a Brahms's symphony. Number three, however, with which the concert last evening began, is so rich in melody, and so obvious in its musical meaning, that it could not fail to be listened to with enjoyment by everybody. This is the first time it has been presented here, and its rich and beautiful themes were an agreeable surprise to many who had made up their minds to hear something exceedingly "intellectual" and obtuse. Mr. Fritz Giese, the soloist, played De Swert's concerto for violoncello in D minor, op. 32. This very difficult work was rendered so excellently that the able artist received three recalls. The work of the orchestra throughout the evening was of the best quality, and Mr. Gerike's efforts were crowned with entire success. The programme for next week is as follows:

Weber, Overture..... Der Freischuetz
Mozart, Recitative and Aria.... Marriage of Figaro
Handel, Largo.
Schubert, March in B minor.
Gerike, (a) Supplication.
(b) My Messengers.
Songs with piano.
Schumann, Symphony, No. 1, in B flat.
Soloist..... Miss Emma Juch

Musical. Home Journal

FOURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Unanimous and cordial verdicts representing a wide variety of taste have justly been bestowed upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, yet with no more justice than on Saturday evening last, when Herr Gerike seemed to be contributing his very best work of the season. It was a notable concert. The programme was of such an exceptionally advanced and interesting order that to say that the performances were adequate to its excellence is very high praise. The compliment was frequently expressed in applause from all parts of the hall that went out for technique and delivery so superior as to fairly establish a popular interest in a most profound order of music. For once it may be taken for granted that a large audience was unanimously sincere in paying the tribute it did to a Brahms symphony. The work is in four movements, as follows: Allegro con brio, andante, poco allegretto, and allegro. Naturalness, grace and, for Brahms, simplicity added their charms to the depth and vigor of a highly interesting symphonic creation, and as being uncharacteristic of their composer, contributed to a genuine surprise. The comment is especially applicable to the first movement of the Fourth Symphony Concert.

The fourth of the Boston Symphony Concerts, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, at Music Hall on Saturday evening introduced the following programme with Mr. Fritz Giese, violoncellist, as solo performer:

Symphony, No. 3 in F major, op. 90 (first time here)..... Brahms
Concerto for violoncello in D minor, op. 32..... De Swert
Andante Cantabile, from the Trio op. 97..... Beethoven
Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 52..... Schumann

Brahms's symphony is very different from his other works. As much as the others are dry and fatiguing, the symphony in F major is melodious, well developed and full of orchestral effects. The andante has a little of a Russo-slavic character; its principal theme, conducted from one instrument into another, is of a very original shape. The allegretto is neither of a scherzo nor a minuetto style and it is less characteristic than the andante; but the finale is vigorous and skillfully elaborated. The performance of this symphony by the orchestra was given with a perfect ensemble. Mr. Giese's execution of De Swert's concerto was of the highest interest. All technical difficulties appeared to be a mere play to him, but this artist possesses something better than the technique, which, after all, is the result of tedious work and long study. He possesses a great deal of feeling and sings on his instrument most pathetically. The Andante Cantabile from the Trio of Beethoven, arranged by Franz Liszt, is very skillfully elaborated, but there could be no easier task than to arrange for instruments a work where all is restrained and nothing morbid which is not instantly corrected, nothing luxurious which is not finally raised into the clear atmosphere of peaceful self-mastery, or even playfulness. And the emotions aroused are not the vamped up feelings of a jaded appetite, nor the false spasms of the sentimentalist, nor the dry and algebraic problem in music. They are such as are experienced in high moods or passionately sad ones, or in the night in summer's time, or by the sea; at all events they are unfolded before us, not with the want of perspective, or with the violent frenzy of a bad dream, but with true gradations in natural succession, and tempered with all the middle tints that go to make up the truth of life—not the life of a prosy positivist, but the life of a true poet, of a true musician. The horn solo was very brilliantly executed, but the bassoon began his variations rather too slowly; he seemed to be vexed in being disturbed in his contemplation. We must also add that the tempo in the middle of the andante was taken much slower than in the beginning, and that the accompaniment of the harp was not heard with sufficient clearness. The last number in the programme was the overture, scherzo and finale, by Schumann. When does an overture have a scherzo and a separate finale? This illegitimate marriage has not a bit of good sense. Still the best member of this quarrelsome family was the scherzo, suggesting distinctly Mendelssohn's scherzo, "Sommer-nacht's Traum." It has, at least, the wanted character of a scherzo orchestrated in a coquettish way. But we must not be astonished with Schumann's eccentricities. He was all his life through a great worker and a great seeker of musical problems. Before his marriage with the daughter of Mr. Wick, Professor of Harmony in Leipzig, who was his master for composition, Schumann was quite mad. After his marriage, having always the same tendencies not to charm, but to astonish the hearers with the most complicated combinations, very often incomprehensible, he became for the second time insane, was cured again, and instead of looking for inspiration in his works, he looked only for science. Science is indispensable in music, but is not alone sufficient when it is not sustained by melody, by poetry and by inspiration. Schumann became mad for the third time, and his wife, Madame Clara Schumann, was obliged to place him in an asylum, where he died. Some of his compositions are real musical hieroglyphs. Still, we must render him the justice of owning that he was one of the greatest of philosophers in music. The fifth concert will be given in Music Hall next Saturday evening, with the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. Miss Emma Juch, soprano, is the soloist, and the selections are as follows: Overture ("Freischuetz"), Weber; recitative and aria ("Marriage of Figaro"), Mozart; "Largo," Handel; "March" in B minor, Schubert; "Supplication" and "My Messengers" (songs with piano), Gericke; Symphony No. 1 in B flat, op. 38, Schumann.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Fritz Giese Wins Considerable Applause as a Soloist—The Whole Concert Very Acceptable.

The programme of the fourth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening was pleasing and satisfactory. There are many people still who appreciate the better order of music who yet look with a feeling of vague uneasiness at an announcement of a Brahms's symphony. Number three, however, with which the concert last evening began, is so rich in melody, and so obvious in its musical meaning, that it could not fail to be listened to with enjoyment by everybody. This is the first time it has been presented here, and its rich and beautiful themes were an agreeable surprise to many who had made up their minds to hear something exceedingly "intellectual" and obtuse. Mr. Fritz Giese, the soloist, played De Swert's concerto for violoncello in D minor, op. 32. This very difficult work was rendered so excellently that the able artist received three recalls. The work of the orchestra throughout the evening was of the best quality, and Mr. Gericke's efforts were crowned with entire success. The programme for next week is as follows:

Weber, Overture..... Der Freischuetz
Mozart, Recitative and Aria.... Marriage of Figaro
Handel, Largo.
Schubert, March in B minor.
Gericke, (a) Supplication.
(b) My Messengers.
Songs with piano.
Schumann, Symphony, No. 1, in B flat.
Soloist..... Miss Emma Juch

Musical.

FOURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Unanimous and cordial verdicts representing a wide variety of taste have justly been bestowed upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, yet with no more justice than on Saturday evening last, when Herr Gericke seemed to be contributing his very best work of the season. It was a notable concert. The programme was of such an exceptionally advanced and interesting order that to say that the performances were adequate to its excellence is very high praise. The compliment was frequently expressed in applause from all parts of the hall that went out for technique and delivery so superior as to fairly establish a popular interest in a most profound order of music. For once it may be taken for granted that a large audience was unanimously sincere in paying the tribute it did to a Brahms symphony. The work is in four movements, as follows: Allegro con brio, andante, poco allegretto, and allegro. Naturalness, grace and, for Brahms, simplicity added their charms to the depth and vigor of a highly interesting symphonic creation, and as being uncharacteristic of their composer, contributed to a genuine surprise. The comment is especially applicable to the first movement of the work. To speak of Brahms as genial sounds odd enough; and yet in the first three movements of his new symphony he is almost as genial as a great composer well can be, and shows his possession of quite as much heart and soul as mind for music. Healthy and vigorous sounds the chord of F as it begins the opening allegro, soon followed by a rich and poetic theme at first based upon the tonic, yet with almost an exact imitation soon repeating itself in the key of D flat major. Thus it unfolds itself with most natural modulations of rich and solid harmonies, the whole being treated in a syncopated manner that does not at all obscure its clearness. One might thus proceed with the somewhat endless task of treating each and every detail of the symphony, but for all present requirements it were best to refer to the work in general terms. Its exceptional feature, simplicity and clearness of form, has already been referred to as uncharacteristic of Brahms. In the first three movements it is evident that the composer, whether intentionally or otherwise, has disindividualized his best known traits of creation. While preserving his originality to an adequate degree he has reformed himself in the direction of such models as he has heretofore abandoned. If the peculiarity of his other symphonies consists in one element more than another, it is in the amount of intellectual labor bestowed at a vast expense of any interesting touches of sentiment. The same is far from being true of the present work until the final allegro is reached. Here it would appear that Brahms must have become conscious of how extremely unlike himself he has written; he therefore returns to the mystery and gloom of his more dissipated moods. It has never seemed to us that such moods were absolutely natural to him, but that per contra they were self-enforced by many an overweening attempt to appear original. Granting such to be the case, it is a question as to how far serious acknowledgment of his genius is entitled to weight. It is true that Brahms has encountered the dislike of many connoisseurs who are always in their element when idolizing the monuments of a past age. They are wont to imagine that there can be no possible creative progress in music beyond the standard of the Beethoven symphonies. Such idolaters revel in their error; but the music of Brahms' first two symphonies is so extravagant as to make their idolatry seem the indispensable virtue that seeks to preserve the identity of classical music. For our own part we are not with the "mugwumps" in music, but prefer for a long time to come to be classified among the grand old party of idolaters to whom reference has been made. No silly taunt of an inability to appreciate will mar the acknowledgment that Brahms is at his best when writing in forms that are intelligible to such as have knowledge as to how Mozart and Beethoven were also great composers. Conforming to such a standpoint, Brahms' third symphony has a more artistic value than its predecessors; the profound mistakes of his earlier works being avoided by a more full and natural expression of his genius. The symphony was rendered in a manner that intensified the clearness of its forms. The thematic treatment was also clearly portrayed, and in as highly creditable a manner as ever to the breadth and culture of Herr Gericke's lead.

BOSTON, November 9.

Next in order came an interesting concerto by De Swert for violoncello and orchestra, the soloist being Mr. Fritz Giese. Pleasing and melodious to a rare degree, the concerto yet seems remarkably replete in its demands upon virtuosity. To such demands Herr Giese responded to charm. Marvellous execution, exquisite nicety of phrasing, beauty of tone, a masterly use of harmonies,—in short an artistic proficiency of the highest grade united with warmth and depths of feeling, were characteristics of the performance. It is but a just acknowledgment of Herr Giese's skill to say that he made his favorite instrument seem as capable as the violin of responding with absolute freedom to the finesse and mastery of his technique. The only intrusion upon the effect of the concerto as a whole was the inconsiderate applause of Herr Giese during the performance of the orchestral tutti. The compliment was doubtless irrepressible, but it seemed more appropriate when at the close of the work Herr Giese was most enthusiastically applauded and recalled. The andante, from Beethoven's trio, op. 97, arranged with good effect for orchestra, by Franz Liszt, and the familiar andante, scherzo and finale of Schumann, contributed to the remaining events of the concert. To-night the symphony will be Schumann's in B flat major, and Fraulein Juch will contribute songs.

MUSIC.

Concert

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The chief interest in the concert of last evening centered in the new symphony by Brahms, heard for the first time in Boston. Already last summer we predicted that this symphony would place Brahms in a new light before the American public. While his two previous works in this field have been complex and difficult for the ordinary auditor to follow, this one has some themes and passages of a simplicity that recall Haydn more than any other composer. The work has also passages which in their instrumentation recall the other extreme of the musical field—Richard Wagner: in fact the chief theme of the first movement recalls the "Slumber-mob" from the "Walküre," yet of course there is nothing which even remotely suggests plagiarism, such resemblances are to be found in almost all works of the modern school. The placing of the symphony at the beginning of the programme was determined on by Mr. Gericke long ago. Its end, quiet and mysterious, with a few pizzicato chords and a pianissimo kettledrum cadence, is not suited to be the close of a whole concert. As it was, the Schumann work, in itself almost a whole symphony, made a fitting close to the great programme. To return to the Brahms work. Its first movement is massive and grand in the highest degree, and proves Brahms to be among the greatest of symphonic composers, a master of the science of true thematic development. The work opens with three massive chords, after which the majestic first theme enters. Between this and the second theme there is the most marked contrast. In the latter there is present an absolutely pastoral tendency, and a directness of melody that must astonish many who know of Brahms only as a composer of complex dissonances. The first figure of the chief theme frequently re-appears during the development which follows, and a side theme which was evolved from subject matter in the first part is also made brilliant use of. The second movement is light and genial; the least earnest and deep of the symphony. Everything in this movement is calm even to utter placidity. But the allegretto which follows makes noble amends. There is much of grace and of tenderness in this movement and the admirably managed diminuendo at the close, with its reminiscences of the themes is romantic in the highest degree. The last movement alternates between mystery and passion. It has a broad "workingup" of themes, and most highly colored instrumentation, the violins being used in the most effective embellishments, and the trombone giving sombre, soft single notes in a striking manner against a melody of strings and clarinets. The work was given with much fidelity to the score. When we last heard it in Denmark and in Germany, a basstuba was made to do duty for the contrabassoon; no such substitutions were made on this occasion, and the latter instrument lent its powerful color to the first movement especially. Mr. Gericke's tem. vi were entirely correct, judging from foreign models. Of Mr. Giese's cello playing we can say that it was a superb rendering of a musically uninteresting work. We know of no American cellist who is Mr. Giese's equal in brilliancy and power. Beethoven's Andante from Op. 97 was not so finely played as the rest of the programme, the strings being at times irresolute in attack. In any case, we cannot say we admire Liszt's serving up of Beethoven's quiet themes with orchestral sauce piquant. Lack of space forbids saying anything about the Schumann Op. 52 which ended the programme, beyond mentioning the fact that it was splendidly played.

MUSIC NOTES.

In a recent programme we read "Weber's Concert Stück." We are very sorry for this. If Weber had rehearsed thoroughly beforehand, probably his concert would not have stuck.

In the Boston Symphony concerts there seems to be a tendency to go to the old files. At least there are a good many Bach numbers.

If our new conductor only knew how his name is being tortured out of shape by Bostonians he would shudder himself to death. "Gericke," "Ge-ric-k-y," and "Gerickee" are a few of the twists given. The name is pronounced "Gairickeh," with an accent on the first syllable, all campaign rumors to the contrary notwithstanding.

The work presents no extraordinary difficulties, and was well played by the orchestra. There was no enthusiasm, the only notable applause being after the third movement. Mr. Fritz Giese played as only a true artist can play, and met with a very flattering reception. Liszt's arrangement of the Beethoven andante did not strike me as being very successfully done. The idea of itself is queer, because it is so essentially conceived for piano, that, without changing the whole, it is scarcely possible to make it sound for orchestra. Schumann's Op. 52, although by no means one of his greatest works, presented a good opportunity, concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took the programme consisting of the following

Musical Courier

Op. No. 3, F major, Allegro con brio, Andante, Poco Allegro.

to for Violoncello, D minor, op. 32.

nte Cantabile, from Trio, op. 97. (For orchestra, by B.).

are, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52.

being Mr. Fritz Giese, considerable interest was the production of Brahms new work, but expectantly very much disappointed. There is nothing, little, of that which the great masters have taught the word "symphony" to be found in it. There development to speak of; no leading up to greatness, in fact, to warrant the title. How some people can compare Brahms to Schumann, and even call successor to Beethoven, is a mystery to me.

en a number of fine works, such as some of his "The German Requiem," "The Song of Fate," of them, and especially in his three symphonies, vying to express something which is not given him mentally aims at producing that which he has depth of soul, or, if you will, genius, to head of writing music just as he feels, he tries himself, and thus becomes unnatural and often first theme of the first movement is neither melodically important and unsuited to symphonic the composer evidently felt also, judging by the ment. The second theme in A given out first by pretty, but would be more in place in a minuetto There is no working-out part or development to the first theme has been repeated a few times an unimportant transition brings it back literally, it in a different aspect as Beethoven has accused the andante is pleasing, but certainly no symphonic the third movement (allegretto) is to my mind the

Although without much originality, its first minor, is good and the nearest approach to the whole work. The last movement with

F minor and second theme in C major the same faults as the first part. Its with muted strings, is decidedly unsatisfactory

Altogether, the new symphony is disappointing, certainly not equal to the composer's No. 1 and 2.

BOSTON, November 9.

work. To speak of Brahms as genial sounds odd enough; and yet in the first three movements of his new symphony he is almost as genial as a great composer well can be, and shows his possession of quite as much heart and soul as mind for music. Healthy and vigorous sounds the chord of F as it begins the opening allegro, soon followed by a rich and poetic theme at first based upon the tonic, yet with almost an exact imitation soon repeating itself in the key of D flat major. Thus it unfolds itself with most natural modulations of rich and solid harmonies, the whole being treated in a synopated manner that does not at all obscure its clearness. One might thus proceed with the somewhat endless task of treating each and every detail of the symphony, but for all present requirements it were best to refer to the work in general terms. Its exceptional feature, simplicity and clearness of form, has already been referred to as uncharacteristic of Brahms. In the first three movements it is evident that the composer, whether intentionally or otherwise, has disindividualized his best known traits of creation. While preserving his originality to an adequate degree he has reformed himself in the direction of such models as he has heretofore abandoned. If the peculiarity of his other symphonies consists in one element more than another, it is in the amount of intellectual labor bestowed at a vast expense of any interesting touches of sentiment. The same is far from being true of the present work until the final allegro is reached. Here it would appear that Brahms must have become conscious of how extremely unlike himself he has written; he therefore returns to the mystery and gloom of his more dissipated moods. It has never seemed to us that such moods were absolutely natural to him, but that per contra they were self-enforced by many an overweening attempt to appear original. Granting such to be the case, it is a question as to how far serious acknowledgment of his genius is entitled to weight. It is true that Brahms has encountered the dislike of many connoisseurs who are always in their element when idolizing the monuments of a past age. They are wont to imagine that there can be no possible creative progress in music beyond the standard of the Beethoven symphonies. Such idolaters revel in their error; but the music of Brahms' first two symphonies is so extravagant as to make their idolatry seem the indispensable virtue that seeks to preserve the identity of classical music. For our own part we are not with the "mugwumps" in music, but prefer for a long time to come to be classified among the grand old party of idolaters to whom reference has been made. No silly taunt of an inability to appreciate will mar the acknowledgment that Brahms is at his best when writing in forms that are intelligible to such as have knowledge as to how Mozart and Beethoven were also great composers. Conforming to such a standpoint, Brahms' third symphony has a more artistic value than its predecessors; the profound mistakes of his earlier works being avoided by a more full and natural expression of his genius. The symphony was rendered in a manner that intensified the clearness of its forms. The thematic treatment was also clearly portrayed, and in as highly creditable a manner as ever to the breadth and culture of Herr Gericke's lead.

Next in order came an interesting concerto by De Swert for violoncello and orchestra, the soloist being Mr. Fritz Giese. Pleasing and melodious to a rare degree, the concerto yet seems remarkably replete in its demands upon virtuosity. To such demands Herr Giese responded to charm. Marvellous execution, exquisite nicety of phrasing, beauty of tone, a mastery use of harmonies,—in short an artistic proficiency of the highest grade united with warmth and depths of feeling, were characteristics of the performance. It is but a just acknowledgment of Herr Giese's skill to say that he made his favorite instrument seem as capable as the violin of responding with absolute freedom to the finesse and mastery of his technique. The only intrusion upon the effect of the concerto as a whole was the inconsiderate applause of Herr Giese during the performance of the orchestral tutti. The compliment was doubtless irrepressible, but it seemed more appropriate when at the close of the work Herr Giese was most enthusiastically applauded and recalled. The andante, from Beethoven's trio, op. 97, arranged with good effect for orchestra, by Franz Liszt, and the familiar andante, scherzo and finale of Schumann, contributed to the remaining events of the concert. To-night the symphony will be Schumann's in B flat major, and Fraulein Juch will contribute songs.

MUSIC.

COURIER

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The chief interest in the concert of last evening centered in the new symphony by Brahms, heard for the first time in Boston. Already last summer we predicted that this symphony would place Brahms in a new light before the American public. While his two previous works in this field have been complex and difficult for the ordinary auditor to follow, this one has some themes and passages of a simplicity that recall Haydn more than any other composer. The work has also passages which in their instrumentation recall the other extreme of the musical field—Richard Wagner: in fact the chief theme of the first movement recalls the "Slumber-mob" from the "Walküre," yet of course there is nothing which even remotely suggests plagiarism, such resemblances are to be found in almost all works of the modern school. The placing of the symphony at the beginning of the program determined on by Mr. Gericke long and quiet and mysterious, with a few pizzicatos and a pianissimo kettledrum cadence, to be the close of a whole concert. A Schumann work, in itself almost a whole concert, made a fitting close to the great programme. To return to the Brahms work. Its first movement is massive and grand in the highest degree, and proves Brahms to be among the greatest of symphonic composers, a master of the science of true thematic development. The work opens with three massive chords, after which the majestic first theme enters. Between this and the second theme there is the most marked contrast. In the latter there is present an absolutely pastoral tendency, and a directness of melody that must astonish many who know of Brahms only as a composer of complex dissonances. The first figure of the chief theme frequently re-ap-ears duride them-he first-

The se-
he legalphony.
to utter makes n-of tender managed cences of
The last pashion.
and moviolins b-ments, a-notes in-strings much fic-Denmar-do duty were it to latter ue co lor to tem, vi wely mode la-
that it w-interesting
who is M-Beethove played aat times say we themes forbids which es fact that ent for ng ch
In a felt Stück." a hearses would no
In the tendency of

STOCK

BOSTON

AND

WHITNE

Bank

NO. 7 EXCHANG

MASS

Loan

CAPIT

18 POST O

SAMUEL A. HERTZ

STEPHEN M. CRO

ISAAC FENNO,

JOSEPH H. GRAY,

L. HOLLINGSWORTH

Loans Made

Foreign and

Insolvent Co

tates Adjusted

Interest Allo

Demand. Spec

on Fixed Time

Authorized Trustee of corporation, municip

SEVEN PER C

For Sale, in sums

FIRST MORTGAG

cipal and interest p

are secured on IMPR

ern States, valued

AMOUNT OF THE BO

JOHN JEFFRIE

R O

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night, the programme consisting of the following numbers:

Brahms—Symphony No. 3, F major, Allegro con brio, Andante, Poco Allegretto, Allegro.
De Swert—Concerto for Violoncello, D minor, op. 32.
Beethoven—Andante Cantabile, from Trio, op. 97. (For orchestra, by Liszt).
Schumann—Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52.

The soloist being Mr. Fritz Giese, considerable interest was manifested in the production of Brahms new work, but expectations were evidently very much disappointed. There is nothing, or at least very little, of that which the great masters have taught us to expect under the word "symphony" to be found in it. There is nowhere any development to speak of; no leading up to great climaxes; nothing, in fact, to warrant the title. How some people in Germany can compare Brahms to Schumann, and even call him a worthy successor to Beethoven, is a mystery to me.

He has written a number of fine works, such as some of his chamber-music, "The German Requiem," "The Song of Fate," &c.; but in all of them, and especially in his three symphonies, there is that striving to express something which is not given him to express. He mentally aims at producing that which he has not sufficient depth of soul, or, if you will, genius, to carry out. Instead of writing music just as he feels, he tries to go beyond himself, and thus becomes unnatural and often distorted. The first theme of the first movement is neither melodiously nor rhythmically important and unsuited to symphonic treatment, which the composer evidently felt also, judging by the rest of the movement. The second theme in A given out first by the clarinet, is pretty, but would be more in place in a minuetto or slow waltz. There is no working-out part or development to speak of, for after the first theme has been repeated a few times in different keys an unimportant transition brings it back literally, without showing it in a different aspect as Beethoven has accustomed us to. The andante is pleasing, but certainly no symphonic movement. The third movement (allegretto) is to my mind the most important. Although without much originality, its first theme in C minor, is good and the nearest approach to a melody in the whole work. The last movement with first theme in F minor and second theme in C major labors under the same faults as the first part. Its close in F major, with muted strings, is decidedly unsatisfactory and very abrupt. Altogether, the new symphony is disappointing, and is certainly not equal to the composer's No. 1 and 2. The work presents no extraordinary difficulties, and was well played by the orchestra. There was no enthusiasm, the only notable applause being after the third movement. Mr. Fritz Giese played as only a true artist can play, and met with a very flattering reception. Liszt's arrangement of the Beethoven andante did not strike me as being very successfully done. The idea of itself is queer, because it is so essentially conceived for piano, that, without changing the whole, it is scarcely possible to make it sound for orchestra. Schumann's Op. 52, although by no means one of his greatest works, presented a good opportunity, leaves,

Macdonald
MANN, Booksellers, Stationers and all camps

70

of contrasting him with Brahms's, much to the detriment of the latter, however. While true genius speaks out of the one, but a high order of talent speaks out of the other. At next week's concert, Miss Emma Juch will sing, and the symphony will be Schumann's first, in B flat.

LOUIS MAAS.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The concert of last Saturday was rather heavy in its make-up, as will be seen by the following programme :

Symphony, No. 3, in F major, op. 90 Brahms
Allegro con brio, Andante, Poco allegretto, Allegro.
(First time.)

Concerto for violoncello in D minor, op. 32 De Swert
With orchestral accompaniment.

Mr. Fritz Giese.

Andante Cantabile, from the Trio op. 97 Beethoven
Arranged by Franz Liszt.

Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52 Schumann

A symphony and three-quarters in one bill of fare make a rather indigestible feast for the average auditor. I should rather have had a European idea worked out in the programme, and had the Brahms' Symphony played twice. But it was not so bad to have Brahms in juxtaposition with Schumann either, for the former is almost entirely the outcome of the latter. As to the construction of the symphony I need say very little, for I have already sent you an account of it from Copenhagen during the summer; but of its performance I can speak in hearty praise; such light and shade, such clearness of phrasing, such general intelligence of interpretation did much to make the symphony clear (on a first hearing), where otherwise much would have been obscure.

The tender second theme of the first movement, and the melodious and tranquil character of the entire second movement, won the heartiest popular recognition, but I am sure that the allegretto and the finale made the strongest effect on the musicians both in audience and orchestra. The symphony is extremely short, occupying only thirty-five minutes in performance, but the first and last movements possesses some admirable points of development, of which Brahms is so great a master, and these are some very majestic portions in the finale. The reason that Mr. Gericke placed the work at the head of the programme I have given you some time ago. Its quiet and mysterious ending unfits it to close a programme. I was glad to hear the work once with the appropriate contrabassoon in the orchestra. Hitherto I have only heard it with a bass tuba growling the phrases of this instrument.

Of the De Swert concerto as a composition there is little to be said. It is rather conventional, and not sustainedly interesting, although its finale is pleasing. But it served excellently to show of what sterling stuff Mr. Giese is made of. I scarcely think that there is a 'cellist in all America who is his equal. His tone is broad, full, and sympathetic in legato and slow passages, and yet in all tricks of virtuosity and rapidity he is absolutely easy. He created the wildest enthusiasm by his performance. As regards Liszt's treatment of Beethoven's andante I cannot say much. I do not like the orchestral spices with which the Hungarian has dished up the German master; and I cannot say that the orchestra played as well in this as in other numbers. There was a lack of surety in the violins, and the ensemble had not the unity which is usual with this orchestra. Per contra, the Schumann work was splendidly rendered. The Scherzo with its gigue-like rhythm, was given with splendid effect, and had just the spirit which Schumann intended for it. But I fear that the programme as a whole, shot a little over the heads of the public. Mr. Gericke must not pin his faith too implicitly upon Boston's adoration from everything classical, just yet. L. C. E.

71

Key Note Nov. 5. 84

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 15TH, AT 8. P. M.

PROGRAMME.

WEBER,	OVERTURE, (Freischuetz).
MOZART,	RECITATIVE AND ARIA, (Marriage of Figaro).
HÆNDEL,	LARGO.
SCHUBERT,	MARCH in B minor. Arranged by Franz Liszt.
GERICKE,	a) SUPPLICATION. b) MY MESSENGERS. (SONGS with Piano.)
SCHUMANN,	SYMPHONY, No. 1, in B flat, op. 38. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.— Larghetto.—Scherzo.—Allegro animato e grazioso.—

SOLOIST:

MISS EMMA JUCH.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.30 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

RECITATIVE AND ARIA. (MARRIAGE OF FIGARO.) "Flown Forever."

RECIT:

How Susanna delays! I'm impatient till I know what my husband has said to her proposal. I fear 'tis rashness what I dared to attempt; he's so impetuous, so resentful, and so jealous! But 'tis no wrong! a mere exchange of garments. I give mine to Susanna, while hers disguise me by the favoring darkness. Oh, Heaven! how deeply my pride has been humbled. I am degraded by my husband's neglect! After short hours of burning love, I awake to doubt and despair. I see him jealous, disdainful. He who loved me, now deserts me, and has betrayed me. Must I submit that my own servants aid me?

ARIA:

Flown forever love's sunny splendor, Why, oh why must I thus sorrow?
Now forsaken and lone I mourn. Why doth all to me seem changed?
Oft he vow'd me love true and tender, From remembrance I must borrow
Ah, those lips are now forsworn. Ev'ry joy, since he's estrang'd.

Ah! perhaps my constant yearning,
And these bitter tears that start,
Yet will win his love returning,
And restore th' ungrateful heart.

SUPPLICATION. (GERICKE.)

On me turn thy sparkling lustre, With thy power of blest enchantment,
Dark eye, filled with gentle light, Take me from this world away;
Earnest, mild, with dream-light beaming, Rule my life and rule forever,
Fair as day, and calm as night. Thee alone will I obey.

MY MESSENGERS. (GERICKE.)

Greet him, oh light of morning, with thy first sunbeam fair,
To him each ray of sunshine a thousand greetings bear!
Ye flowrets sweet and tender, breathing a fragrance rare,
Ah tell him that I love him, and thousand greetings bear!

Ye stars that stud the heavens, watch over him with care,
And pray ye with your twinklings a thousand greetings bear!
And in my lonely chamber, or in the ball-room glare,
To him my thoughts all speed them, and thousand greetings bear!
He is my thought's one object, the burden of my prayer;
My songs all speak my love to him, and thousand greetings bear!

Fifth Symphony Concert.

The fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given at Music Hall Saturday evening, with the following programme, Miss Emma Juch, soprano, being the soloist:

Overture ("Freischütz").....Weber
Recitative and Aria ("Marriage of Figaro").....Mozart
Largo.....Handel
March in B minor.....Schubert

(a) Supplication }Gericke
(b) My Messengers }
Songs with piano.

Symphony, No. 1, in B flat, op. 38.....Schumann
The solo of horns in the beginning of the Freischütz Overture was rendered with great clearness, unity and feeling, which are too frequently missing in performances of this masterly work. As a whole the performance was worthy of its composer. It is to him that Germany owes its pure and melodious character in music, and he is to be thanked that German Opera became dramatic and full of fire and poetry. Through what sufferings would not this true apostle of beauty and simplicity in his art pass, if he could know that a sort of false prophet, a sort of Egyptian Mahdi, had come to enlighten the musical war. In the place of melody, poetry and simplicity there comes a sort of dry positivism. True algebraic problems, based on continued passage of one imperfect chord into another, have taken the place of melody; the use of musical figures, instead of elaborating a theme, the tendency to astonish and to strike the imagination with most noisy and inextricable combinations, have taken the place of the simplicity of the old masters. What would he say to this musical schism—he who sacrificed his friendship to his convictions? The following incident will give evidence of the firmness of his character: Meyerbeer, Blumenthal and Weber were all three the preferred pupils of the celebrated professor of harmony and composition called Abbé Vogler. These young men had been united in the greatest friendship and made a vow to compose in the purest German style so as to avoid all imitation of the French or Italian schools. Weber made both his friends swear that no matter where they might be or what countries they visited, they must be faithful to their word. Their education finished they separated themselves, promising to correspond with each other. Soon after Meyerbeer went to Italy, and being under the charm of this poetic country, and especially hearing the beautiful, melodious and simple music of the country, he composed an opera entitled "Il Crociato in Egitto," but absolutely in Italian style, sending his scores to Weber. The latter, having read it over, threw the work in the fire and refused to correspond with his friend, calling him in his writings "a perjurer."

It may sound like an anachronism to call Händel a contemporary, and yet he seems so constantly present with us that at times we can hardly believe that he has passed away. We are surrounded by his effigies; no living face is more familiar and no modern minstrel is more beloved than he who has now lain quietly in Westminster Abbey for some one hundred and seventeen years. He was born in 1685 in the Duchy of Magdeburg, Lower Saxony, when Germany was not the great musical country which it has since become, and was chiefly engaged in cultivating at second hand the flowers of Italian music, which grew pale enough beneath those alien skies. There and in those times the Italian maestro might be looked upon with some respect, but the native artist was not yet considered a prophet in his own country, so no wonder that the young Händel, who from his earliest childhood seemed to have been passionately fond of sweet sounds, encountered great opposition and disappointment in his early musical endeavors. His father used to say: "Music is an elegant art and fine amusement, but as an occupation it hath little dignity, having for its object nothing better than mere entertainment and pleasure." So his son was to go to no concerts; he must be taught Latin and become a good doctor, like his father, and leave the stems art to Italian ballets and French modistes. Hearing his Largo Saturday evening one could notice that this man came into the world with the stamp of great genius upon him. It is difficult to describe all the effect produced by this simple melody, full of an irresistible charm played by the first violin with the accompaniment of the harp, which this time was perfectly heard. The same melody played by all violins in unison for the second time, with the second violin one octave lower, simply electrified the audience.

Miss Emma Juch possesses a very rich and sympathetic voice, her diction is clear and she rendered in a true classical way the recitative and aria of Mozart, and with great feeling Mr. Gericke's two songs. The symphony in B flat of Schumann is of a very brilliant instrumentation and gives one more evidence that musical science is developed in all of Schumann's works to the highest degree. The best part of this symphony is the andante, this being not only very nicely elaborated, but also melodious. The scherzo, playful, vivacious and gay, was admirably given by the orchestra. But the allegro has not at all any true character of a symphony. It approaches more to an overture of an opera comique; it lacks entirely majesty in the theme, and is in some ways trivial. The finale is neither grand nor striking; one would take it for ballet music. We cannot resist comparing it with the finale of Mozart's symphony in G minor, or the finale of Beethoven's symphony in C minor, and the difference is so disadvantageous to the Schumann symphony that we must repeat what we have told in a precedent article—that science is indispensable in music, but that science alone is not sufficient when it is not sustained by inspiration, by poetry and by melody. The sixth concert will be given on Saturday evening next, with the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. The programmes will be overture ("Magic Flute"), Mozart; Pastoral from the Christmas oratorio, arranged by Robert Franz, Johann Sebastian Bach; "Pictures from the Orient," op. 66, arranged by Carl Reinecke, Schumann; overture ("Ossian"), Gade; symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36, Beethoven.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

The Fifth Symphony Concert.

Since the days when Carl Bergmann used to turn round to the audience at the old Germania rehearsals and say in his pleasant manner, "Ye play now—oovairtyure—'Der Freischütz,'" Boston concert-goers have had a pretty familiar acquaintance with that composition. Such a favorite was it formerly and so often played that one critic at least used to say that he believed he could write it all out from memory. But we do not believe that in all these years it has ever had so beautiful and so picturesque a rendering in Boston—if, indeed, anywhere in America—as at the Music Hall on Saturday evening. Every little phrase was perfected as if for solo playing, and the varying moods—from the peaceful flow of the horn quartette to the mysterious conflicts and shadows that follow, and to the brilliantly happy ending—were so exactly portrayed that the whole story of the opera must have passed in those few minutes through the minds of all who know it. The audience listened in entire stillness, and applauded delightedly at the end.

Similarly good playing was shown in all the programme, which was one of remarkable interest and proportion. The Händel largo proved to be the great soprano air from "Xerxes" (if we mistake not), and it was first played by Mr. Listemann with harp accompaniment, and then re-

RECITATIVE AND ARIA. (MARRIAGE OF FIGARO.) "Flown Forever."

RECIT:

How Susanna delays! I'm impatient till I know what my husband has said to her proposal. I fear 'tis rashness what I dared to attempt; he's so impetuous, so resentful, and so jealous! But 'tis no wrong! a mere exchange of garments. I give mine to Susanna, while hers disguise me by the favoring darkness. Oh, Heaven! how deeply my pride has been humbled. I am degraded by my husband's neglect! After short hours of burning love, I awake to doubt and despair. I see him jealous, disdainful. He who loved me, now deserts me, and has betrayed me. Must I submit that my own servants aid me?

ARIA:

Flown forever love's sunny splendor, Why, oh why must I thus sorrow?
Now forsaken and lone I mourn. Why doth all to me seem changed?
Oft he vow'd me love true and tender, From remembrance I must borrow
Ah, those lips are now forsworn. Ev'ry joy, since he's estrang'd.

Ah! perhaps my constant yearning,
And these bitter tears that start,
Yet will win his love returning,
And restore th' ungrateful heart.

SUPPLICATION. (GERICKE.)

On me turn thy sparkling lustre, With thy power of blest enchantment,
Dark eye, filled with gentle light, Take me from this world away;
Earnest, mild, with dream-light beaming, Rule my life and rule forever,
Fair as day, and calm as night. Thee alone will I obey.

MY MESSENGERS. (GERICKE.)

Greet him, oh light of morning, with thy first sunbeam fair,
To him each ray of sunshine a thousand greetings bear!
Ye flowrets sweet and tender, breathing a fragrance rare,
Ah tell him that I love him, and thousand greetings bear!

Ye stars that stud the heavens, watch over him with care,
And pray ye with your twinklings a thousand greetings bear!
And in my lonely chamber, or in the ball-room glare,
To him my thoughts all speed them, and thousand greetings bear!
He is my thought's one object, the burden of my prayer;
My songs all speak my love to him, and thousand greetings bear!

Fifth Symphony Concert.

The fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given at Music Hall Saturday evening, with the following programme, Miss Emma Juch, soprano, being the soloist:

Overture ("Freischuetz").....Weber
Recitative and Aria ("Marriage of Figaro").....Mozart
Largo.....Handel
March in B minor.....Schubert

(a) Supplication } Arranged by Franz Liszt.
(b) My Messengers } Gericke

Songs with piano.
Symphony, No. 1, in B flat, op. 38.....Schumann

The solo of horns in the beginning of the Freischuetz Overture was rendered with great clearness, unity and feeling, which are too frequently missing in performances of this masterly work. As a whole the performance was worthy of its composer. It is to him that Germany owes its pure and melodious character in music, and he is to be thanked that German Opera became dramatic and full of fire and poetry. Through what sufferings would not this true apostle of beauty and simplicity in his art pass if he could know that a sort of false prophet, a sort of Egyptian Mahdi, had come to enlighten the musical war. In the place of melody, poetry and simplicity there comes a sort of dry positivism. True algebraic problems, based on continued passage of one imperfect chord into another, have taken the place of melody; the use of musical figures, instead of elaborating a theme, the tendency to astonish and to strike the imagination with most noisy and inextricable combinations, have taken the place of the simplicity of the old masters. What would he say to this musical schism—he who sacrificed his friendship to his convictions? The following incident will give evidence of the firmness of his character: Meyerbeer, Blumenthal and Weber were all three the preferred pupils of the celebrated professor of harmony and composition called Abbé Vogler. These young men had been united in the greatest friendship and made a vow to compose in the purest German style so as to avoid all imitation of the French or Italian schools. Weber made both his friends swear that no matter where they might be or what countries they visited, they must be faithful to their word. Their education finished they separated themselves, promising to correspond with each other. Soon after Meyerbeer went to Italy, and being under the charm of this poetic country, and especially hearing the beautiful, melodious and simple music of the country, he composed an opera entitled "Il Crociato in Egitto," but absolutely in Italian style, sending his scores to Weber. The latter, having read it over, threw the work in the fire and refused to correspond with his friend, calling him in his writings "a perjurer."

It may sound like an anachronism to call Hændel a contemporary, and yet he seems so constantly present with us that at times we can hardly believe that he has passed away. We are surrounded by his effigies; no living face is more familiar and no modern minstrel is more beloved than he who has now lain quietly in Westminster Abbey for some one hundred and seventeen years. He was born in 1685 in the Duchy of Magdeburg, Lower Saxony, when Germany was not the great musical country which it has since become, and was chiefly engaged in cultivating at second hand the flowers of Italian music, which grew pale enough beneath those alien skies. There and in those times the Italian maestro might be looked upon with some respect, but the native artist was not yet considered a prophet in his own country, so no wonder that the young Hændel, who from his earliest childhood seemed to have been passionately fond of sweet sounds, encountered great opposition and disappointment in his early musical endeavors. His father used to say: "Music is an elegant art and fine amusement, but as an occupation it hath little dignity, having for its object nothing better than mere entertainment and pleasure." So his son was to go to no concerts; he must be taught Latin and become a good doctor, like his father, and leave the divine art to Italian noddies and French mountebanks. Hearing his Largo Saturday evening one could notice that this man came into the world with the stamp of great genius upon him. It is difficult to describe all the effect produced by this simple melody, full of an irresistible charm played by the first violin with the accompaniment of the harp, which this time was perfectly heard. The same melody played by all violins in unison for the second time, with the second violin one octave lower, simply electrified the audience.

Miss Emma Juch possesses a very rich and sympathetic voice, her diction is clear and she rendered in a true classical way the recitative and aria of Mozart, and with great feeling Mr. Gericke's two songs. The symphony in B flat of Schumann is of a very brilliant instrumentation and gives one more evidence that musical science is developed in all of Schumann's works to the highest degree. The best part of this symphony is the andante, this being not only very nicely elaborated, but also melodious. The scherzo, playful, vivacious and gay, was admirably given by the orchestra. But the allegro has not at all any true character of a symphony. It approaches more to an overture of an opera comique; it lacks entirely majesty in the theme, and is in some ways trivial. The finale is neither grand nor striking; one would take it for ballet music. We cannot resist comparing it with the finale of Mozart's symphony in G minor, or the finale of Beethoven's symphony in C minor, and the difference is so disadvantageous to the Schumann symphony that we must repeat what we have told in a precedent article—that science is indispensable in music, but that science alone is not sufficient when it is not sustained by inspiration, by poetry and by melody. The sixth concert will be given on Saturday evening next, with the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. The programmes will be overture ("Magic Flute"), Mozart; Pastoral from the Christmas oratorio, arranged by Robert Franz, Johann Sebastian Bach; "Pictures from the Orient," op. 66, arranged by Carl Reinecke, Schumann; overture ("Ossian"), Gade; symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36, Beethoven.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

The Fifth Symphony Concert.

Since the days when Carl Bergmann used to turn round to the audience at the old Germania rehearsals and say in his pleasant manner, "Ye play now—oovairtyure—'Der Freischütz,'" Boston concert-goers have had a pretty familiar acquaintance with that composition. Such a favorite was it formerly and so often played that one critic at least used to say that he believed he could write it all out from memory. But we do not believe that in all these years it has ever had so beautiful and so picturesque a rendering in Boston—if, indeed, anywhere in America—as at the Music Hall on Saturday evening. Every little phrase was perfected as if for solo playing, and the varying moods—from the peaceful flow of the horn quartette to the mysterious conflicts and shadows that follow, and to the brilliantly happy ending—were so exactly portrayed that the whole story of the opera must have passed in those few minutes through the minds of all who know it. The audience listened in entire stillness, and applauded delightedly at the end.

Similarly good playing was shown in all the programme, which was one of remarkable interest and proportion. The Hændel largo proved to be the great soprano air from "Xerxes" (if we mistake not), and it was first played by Mr. Listemann with harp accompaniment, and then repeated in unison by seventeen violins ranged in line across the stage, the harp being reinforced by a sustained accompaniment in long notes by the rest of the orchestra, replacing the organ part which is sometimes used. The effect was as fine as it was unique, and we have before never seen a symphony audience roused to such general enthusiasm and to such determination to have a repetition, as when this number ended. The other orchestral selections were two. The first was Schubert's B minor march, full of Oriental flavor, as arranged by Liszt, an original which loses less and gains more by its treatment than many of Liszt's orchestral concoctions, although the two or three sudden outbursts of the instruments of percussion during the trio appear both irrelevant and obtrusive, surprising the ear and distracting it for the moment from the smooth flow of the melody. The other number was Schumann's first symphony—in B flat, opus 38. Gracious and delightful as it is to the listener, this work is a hard test for both director and orchestra; its themes are clear and evident enough when announced, but their development is often so fanciful and the individual parts so difficult, that the original thought may easily be lost for a time in the mazes of harmony or voicing. But Mr. Gericke, who is keen and correct in his readings, never allowed the primary melodies to escape from him, and the whole symphony was intellectually clear, as it was also full of feeling and of vigor. The gradual increase of animation and gavety up to the glorious ending of the first movement; the sweet definiteness of violoncello and of horn in the cantabile and the precision of the basses in the whirling under figures of the basses in the second; the peculiarly bizarre character of the third, and the marked contrasts in the fourth between the insinuating simplicity of the upper parts and the rough, sturdy, unison responses of the lower ones—all these elements of character and expression were just what they should be, and the whole work was greatly enjoyed.

That pure and beautiful singer, Miss Emma Juch, was the soloist. She sang (to the German text) from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" the scene and air usually known as "Dove sono," and two songs by Mr. Gericke, one with German and one with English text—pretty songs, but in nowise remarkable, and the first less valuable than the second. In all these Miss Juch's limpid voice, genuine style and perfect enunciation were fully apparent and gave hearty pleasure.

At the next concert there will be no soloist, but the programme is none the less interesting. It is made up of two overtures—Mozart's "Magic Flute" and Gade's "Ossian"; the pastoral from Bach's Christmas oratorio, arranged by Franz; Reinecke's arrangement of Schumann's "Pictures from the Orient," opus 66, and Beethoven's second symphony.

Concerto

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall, last night. It opened with a remarkably imposing and brilliant performance of Weber's "Der Freyschutz" overture, which was given with splendid coloring, and with an effect that drew forth an outburst of tremendous applause at the end. We have rarely heard a finer playing of this much used and ill-used masterpiece. A largo by Handel also received a beautiful reading. It was played by all the first violins, seventeen in number, accompanied chiefly by the harp, the orchestra giving an occasional assistance. The violins were ranged across the stage in front of the rest of the instruments, and played standing. The large and impressive melody was interpreted with great breadth of style and beauty of expression. This was also enthusiastically applauded. Then followed a charming reading of Schubert's march in B-minor, arranged for orchestra by Liszt, a much more creditable and permissible transcription than was the Andante from the Beethoven trio of the previous concert. Nothing better could have been desired than the warm, varied and appropriate coloring Mr. Gericke gave this work. The concert ended with Schumann's ever fresh, brilliant and delightful Symphony No. 1 in B flat, the most genial, the most fluent, and the most fascinating of the composer's achievements in this field. It was read with masterly skill and effect, and without a blemish, if, perhaps, we except the few closing bars of the Scherzo, which were lacking in clearness and precision. The Larghetto was played with exquisite grace of expression. Herr Gericke's conception of the tempi throughout was artistic, thoughtful and appropriate. The orchestra may be warmly complimented for the admirable quality of its performances through the whole concert. The soloist was Miss Emma Juch, who has a well-trained soprano voice, strong, pure, clear and full in the upper notes, but exceedingly thin, dry and colorless in the rest of its compass. It is not especially warm or sympathetic in quality but she uses it with skill and knowledge. Her intonation is tuneful and save for an inartistic habit of frequently beginning a tone or a semitone below the written note and portamentoing—if we may use the word—up to it, her method is careful. Her first contribution to the concert was "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro." The recitative was not declaimed with any force or expression, but the following aria was interpreted with taste and fair expression. Afterwards she sang two songs by Mr. Gericke, one "Supplication," a tender and flowing melody of much beauty, and the other "Thy Messengers," a bright, spirited and genial song, not marked especially by originality, but interesting, fluent and musicianly in feeling. The first of these Miss Juch sang pleasingly and well, and the second with fervor and animation, though in both the white and nasal tones of her voice were more prominent than in her earlier effort. She received much applause and was recalled after each performance. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "The Magic Flute," Mozart; Pastoral from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," arranged by Robert Franz; "Pictures from the Orient," by Schumann, Op. 66, arranged by Carl Reinecke; Overture, "Ossian," Gade; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D. There will be no soloist.

Home Journal

Musical.

FIFTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—For years the popular idea of a symphony concert in Boston was of a very serious and somewhat tedious affair, about as remote from all traits of tunefulness and brilliancy as its management could possibly design. The familiar habit of Theodore Thomas in counteracting such ideas when he first came to Boston was only for a time successful, as his brilliant symphony concerts at last ceased to pay expenses. Our capricious public did not seem to know its own mind upon the subject. When Thomas and orchestra retired with the very just notion that Boston had not given any decisive evidence of its interest in a popular series of symphony concerts, there existed sounder reasons than ever for simply adapting such affairs to the requirements of the average connoisseur and musician. This stooping to conquer a public to an exact appreciation of a high order of music was never correct in principle, and has always encountered failure whenever it has been attempted. The attempt to combine in a single concert a symphony of Beethoven and a Strauss waltz must seem to any true musician about as inconsistent as uniting corresponding specimens of Shakespeare on the one hand and Bret Harte on the other in an entertainment of literary pretensions. It is yet difficult to determine exactly what kind of symphony concerts are in a pecuniary sense remunerative. Neither brilliant, popular nor classical concerts have hitherto paid; but it must be admitted of the present Boston symphony series, that for the first time in many years the right kind of interest seems to have been awakened. Henceforth there is a fair prospect that symphony concerts of a most pronounced type will receive adequate encouragement from our local public, and this, too, without the slightest catering to any cheap demands as to the character of a programme. Thus far, as he will no doubt continue to do, Herr Gericke has presented without the slightest deviation a high standard of music, and on the other hand the audience in Music Hall at the Saturday night concerts have manifested more sincerity and true appreciation in their treatment of it than it has heretofore been our good fortune to witness in Boston.

The programme last Saturday evening may be referred to as remarkably successful in pleasing the public from a standpoint that transcended the ordinary limits of popular appreciation. It will be argued that it was the singing of Miss Juch, or a certain novelty of orchestral arrangement, that contributed to the popular success of the concert. Yet we are inclined to regard such elements as having a secondary effect upon the refined appreciation, and that during the entire evening the music performed was for its own sake unanimously enjoyed. The enjoyment was undoubtedly enhanced by a very high standard of performance. The overture (Freyschutz) was superbly rendered, such an interesting delivery of the work having been seldom if ever equaled here. Next came a well known recitative and aria from Mozart's Magic Flute, rendered by Miss Emma Juch, in a manner entitling her to high credit for the artistic effect it produced. True, not a very high compliment can be paid the lady's voice. It seems to be a very delicate organ, sweet and sympathetic in its lower range, but of a most delicate texture throughout and already worn to impurity in its upper tones. This is all true; and yet her delivery, despite anything that can be said against it from the superficial standpoint of technicalities, is exquisitely smooth, accurate and musical. Her very pleasing and correct pronunciation of German words added a generous share to the charm of her effort, while her phrasing did full justice to the demands of a Mozart recitative and aria, and her conceptive ability corresponded. Miss Juch's singing was as warmly applauded as her most ardent enthusiast could have desired. She was afterward heard with very pleasing effect when she rendered two songs by Gericke, entitled, "Supplication" and "My Messengers." The songs indicate Herr Gericke's possession of a praiseworthy order of creative talent, are pregnant with melody, and pleasingly romantic in character. Other features of the programme included a largo by Handel, arranged with unique effect for first violins with orchestral accompaniment; Schubert march in B minor, arranged by Liszt, and symphony in B minor, op. 38, by Schumann.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—On Saturday evening the sixth concert of the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given, this being the programme: Mozart, Overture (Magic Flute); J. S. Bach, Pastoral from the Christmas Oratorio, arranged by Robert Franz (first time); Schumann, Pictures from the Orient, op. 66, arranged by Carl Reinecke (first time); Gade, Overture (Ossian); Beethoven, Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36. Here is another evidence that the best writers can be called upon by the programme maker to furnish a light dish for a taste which, though accustomed to treat seriously the evening at the symphony concert, has an innermost liking for that which first comes graciously to the senses; where one can enjoy and yet not feel a loss of caste, is a musical niche in which there is positive comfort. The director of these concerts does well to cultivate sincerity in his hearers by not playing into their minds too constantly; for such a course so often forces a confession of appreciation and enjoyment from the would-be-properly correct-amateur, which her intense constraint and especial platitudes sweetly contradict. Boston does not need strictly "novelty concerts," but the novelty of having two symphony programmes in succession, with a menu interesting and normal, without being a bit severe, is both wholesome and judicious. The Magic Flute overture is pretty jolly science! If a fugue can properly be called funny, here, certainly, is one of the clearest, most lithesome expression of contrapuntal glee. The freaks in dynamics—those strong accents and quickly-following pianissimos in the same measure, often iterated—are part of a correct outline, but so fantastic as to become almost equivocal. The overture was not written until after the opera was completed, and is the last secular music Mozart wrote. It was played very fast, and clearly, except a certain passage among the wood-winds, where a player became sluggish and with difficulty redeemed himself—he doubtless forgot he was playing under Gericke. Franz has written for the Bach Pastoral full parts for the English horn similar to those originally written for the "hunting oboes," now out of use. With other emendations he has reverently and acceptably treated this the gentlest of the Shepherd's Songs to the Nativity. The spirit of its performance was one of complete repose. The simple theme of the movement, which is the basis of only the simplest construction, was beautifully played; the voice of the parallel instruments, the clarinets and the oboes, on which so much depends, was one of faultless unity, while the rhythm and motion throughout were exquisite. The Schumann Pictures as they appeared in this programme are arranged by Reinecke from the composer's original setting for two pianofortes. Those who cultivate the pianoforte duet might remember this, and perhaps play these things from their legitimate scores, for almost all the four-hand pianoforte music now in vogue has been written down from an original orchestral setting. The programme printed for this concert cited the fact that these pieces—six in all—were written during the reading of Rückert's Makamen (narrations after the Arabic of Hariri). As descriptive music this opus abounds in genuine impressions. The first vivace, with its undulating, rhythmic swing, its timing cymbals and pulsing drum, might mean the March of the Caravan. The others are differently suggestive of the Orient, in their varying colors, their contrast of movement and in their mournful minor. Gericke is a colorist, and as an interpreter of the fanciful and picturesque is most successful. The Ossian overture, it is true, is, in connection with what has been previously said concerning the programme, not strictly light music, and very sincere people may call it learned, but is it not transparent? Does it not unfold in its broad bold motion the heart of the sturdy North, where Vikings did valiantly, and where the minstrel named for illustrious note a thousand heroes? Its musical tread is indeed almost noble. This overture won for Gade, when 23 years old, the emperor's prize—a sum of money—with which he came to Leipzig to follow and perfect his art. It is a matter of record that Mendelssohn and Schumann, each, through their delight in this overture, became his friend. Schumann wrote his "Northern Song" upon a theme founded on the four letters of the staff g a d e to compliment him. Many are the beauties of this Ossian, and in their execution everything was magnificent. How exhilarating was the concord of the brasses (without the thankless cornet in some high octave) when their sonorous voice carried the theme! The harp, too, found its recognized place, as potent in this tone picture as the bravest. One of the most plaintive of the songs of this overture is found in a larger way in the author's "Comala," where Dersagrena sings of Fingal's exploits. The second Symphony of Beethoven, with the first, does not especially indicate the master's future greatness. It came in its proper sequence at this concert (it being Mr. Gericke's intention to play all the nine Symphonies). Its execution was admirable; the tempi did not surprise and they were almost resistlessly maintained. In the final Allegro it was always possible to define the parts even in the overwhelming fortissimo, where the repetition of the short descending passage for the strings, prefaced by their rapid whirl in semi-tones, is usually the climax of excessive bewilderment. The Larghetto was the most gracious part of the programme, the movement most anticipated by the audience. This concert is the first since the orchestra was founded that has not brought out a solo player.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fifth of the Season's Series, Miss Emma Juch, Soloist.

For the fifth concert of the season by the Boston symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist was Miss Emma Juch, soprano, and the several selections were as follows:

Overture ("Freischuetz").....Weber
 Recitative and Aria ("Marriage of Figaro").....Mozart
 Largo.....Handel
 March in B minor.....Schubert
 Arranged by Franz Liszt.

(a) Supplication, }
 (b) My Messengers, }.....Gericke
 Songs with piano.

Symphony, No. 1, in B flat, op. 38.....Schumann

It really seemed as if the good old days, the days when common sense and musical taste were speaking acquaintances, had come again, and, though it be to the discredit of Boston's musical culture, it appeared as if the audience was quite ready to shout for joy at the renewal of the acquaintance. There was so much sincerity in the applause, such an air of gaiety throughout the audience, and such an absence of the stereotyped mannerisms as the audience left the hall, that it was unmistakably evident that the music of the older masters is after all, that which gives even here the greatest general pleasure. It is quite easy to include Herr Gericke's compositions in this classification, for the songs he contributed to the programme have such sterling merit that they are entirely unsuited to be considered as belonging to the modern German school. The presentation of the programme was, as a whole, quite as pleasing as the selections it included, though there were some portions of the symphony which suffered from the fatigue of the players in the earlier portion of the evening. The appearance of Miss Juch was one of the notable events of the season thus far, and it is difficult to recall a more pleasing soloist in these concerts. The merits of her vocal gifts need not be recalled, as they have been fully recognized upon former occasions. Her intelligent phrasing of the Mozart recitative, the admirable expression given to the beautiful aria following, and the elegance of her artistic delivery of the two songs by Herr Gericke, alike completely charmed her hearers, and gained her recall after recall at the conclusion of each appearance. No words can do justice to the performance of the "Freischuetz" overture or that given the Handel "Largo," the latter selection fairly electrifying the audience by its own merits as well as the way in which they were brought out by the band. In this latter number Herr Gericke introduced the novelty of grouping the first and second violin players about the conductor's desk in a semicircle, standing. Whether or not any additional effect was gained in this way it would be difficult to say, but certain it is that the grand organ-like tone given out in the final measures of this number has never been excelled by the orchestra. The brilliant setting, by Liszt, of the march by Schubert makes it a wonderfully pleasing composition, and its stirring measures were capitally played. The audience was the largest of the season, and hardly a half dozen persons left the hall before the concert concluded.

Herr Gericke has declined to allow two members of the Boston symphony orchestra, who are also members of the Campanari quartet, to absent themselves from a concert engagement in Portland in order to play for the Enterpe Club concert in this city, and so the opening concert of the club's season is indefinitely postponed.

Daily Evening Traveller.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1884.

Single Copies.....Three Cents.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The fifth concert of the present season's course by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Music Hall, Saturday evening. This was the programme: Weber, overture (Freischuetz); Mozart, recitative and aria, "Dore Soro" (Marriage of Figaro); Handel, largo; Schubert, march in B minor, arranged by Franz Liszt; Gericke, songs—a "Supplication," b "My Messengers"; Schumann, Symphony No. 1, in B flat, op. 38. The critic's pen writes only praise of such a programme. It pleased everybody; those who did their duty by the scientist of last week and those who declare there is no music in him, heard with equal pleasure these beautiful things. The relaxation of one was as evident as the unmistakable appreciation of the other. Just such a choice—the purely instrumental numbers—which did not include a later writer than Schumann, is unique in the history of the orchestra. It is all good music, worthy of its respective writers, but it has the peculiar charm of a youthful period, and is neither characteristic nor typical, nor anything but just spontaneous, natural music. The opinion of the audience was heard in frequent expressions of approval as the concert ended, and it is fair to add that the vocalist was in no sense a disturbing element in this really popular programme. The beautiful Freischuetz overture never seemed more poetic, and it received a very noteworthy performance. Von Weber might have borne his burden easier and continued to write for four horns until now, could he have heard the perfect work of our players. Here, too, the fortissimo attack of the violins, after the pause, was a bit of perfect achievement, and the effect was immense. The Largo of Handel is a stately, solemn theme, and, as arranged for orchestra, is very impressive. It is first given out by the wood-winds (the harp playing in soft arpeggios), then a single violin (Mr. Listemann), with harp as before. Again, the first and second violins in unison restate the measure. The melody here lies near the heart of their instruments—where all is vibrations—and the effect produced by these 28 players, standing in front of their leader, while they played in willing obedience and with absolute unity of speech, will not soon be forgotten. It was a moment of intense enjoyment. The remaining strings soon assume the lead, and the close is made in great dignity, the brass in sonorous importance swelling the sound until it becomes one grand hymn. Mr. Gericke was forced to acknowledge the gratitude of the audience for this number by repeated bows. The March by Schubert had the twist of the modern school in its Liszt arrangement. It is too long in this dress, yet this is hardly felt because of so much variety in its orchestration. Its flavor is from the Magyar, and while the editor Liszt is here seen in a less bold setting than would have been the composer Liszt, the march was quite bizarre enough considering its close juxtaposition to Handel and Schumann. The player upon the cymbals is to be congratulated, and so are we in his having both hands free for his instruments, for the cymbals swung give an entirely different sound from that produced when one is lashed to the big drum, as is often the case. For once the percussion instruments were respectfully treated. Schumann's first Symphony celebrates two things, his engagement to Clara Wieck and his partial freedom from his profession of musical editor. From the time of writing his earliest string quartets, and the single symphony which was never published, he devoted himself to musical literature with incessant zeal for a number of years. The Symphony in B flat was about the first thing he wrote after returning again to composition. Given the conditions, how could it be otherwise than happy and bright? Even the "animato e grazioso" which qualifies the closing Allegro shows the youthful exuberance of the man. The opening Andante is "maestoso," just long enough to be respectful, when in rushes an Allegro vivace with its irreverent triangle, peasant dances, blithe fancies, etc., but with a hymning undercurrent of fugal (not frugal) praise that is quite in the nature of a thanksgiving. The Larghetto represents a pause for seriousness. The happy spirit of the writer is barely kept back, though the pace is slower. His thought is not yet become sombre or mournful. The Scherzo is unrestrained sense again; the accents tell the intention, and though the figure has the flight of a Phaeton it is never reckless. The Allegro at the close could not be easily compassed at the modern musical clinic. It conceives an idea only to give it away again; it teaches an anti-climax only to serve a fancy in another direction; development it has, but the style is too often bewildering by its incessant wilfulness. The movement is surcharged with ideas that receive only partial expression, though it is always clear what he might do if he wished. Schumann did not write another symphony with the same impetuosity or perhaps pleasure. Strangely and sadly enough, the new direction he was to give to musical thought was accompanied by intense mental suffering and domestic unrest. The playing of the band is uniformly fine; the ensemble of the strings produces a large, rich tone of an uncommonly musical quality, while the first violins in particular are superb in their unisons. This corps possesses so many artists of reputation that it is a matter of great pride that their individuality can be so successfully hidden. But all the band is responsive and show the loyalty of willing minds. It would be hard to say what was played the best on Saturday evening. The cargo was the most effective single movement; the style in which the March was played gave it its abundant color and marked rhythm; the Freischütz was a continuous poem; yet because the symphony offered the more connected and better opportunity will it be the best remembered, for its performance did possess all the elegances of refined playing. Miss Emma Juch sang "Dove Sono" carefully, but not with any manifest breadth of style. The two songs written by Mr. Gericke were pleasantly suited to the singer. "My Messengers" is written after a common model, not unlike Abt, which allows the singer an expressive, generous melody. "Supplication" is a song of a higher type, possibly suggesting Greig. Mr. Gericke played an attentive and helpful accompaniment for the songs. The conductor of the orchestra maintains a beautiful disregard of the printed wish of the management concerning the time of leaving the hall, intermission, etc. The intermission should be a recognized feature of the evening, and it should continue ten minutes. Concerning the courtesy of the management in appointing a time for those to leave the hall who must go before the concert is done, it seems a thing no longer needful, for half-past nine has been the closing hour for all the concerts thus far, and this in itself obviates the suburban necessity of leaving. The ventilation of the hall is as inadequate as the still-standing screen and the unpainted platform are ugly. At the next concert no soloist is announced. The instrumental numbers are: Mozart, Overture (Magic Flute); Joh. Seb. Bach, pastoral from the Christmas Oratorio, arranged by Robert Franz; Schumann, pictures from the Orient, op. 66, arranged by Carl Reinecke; Gade, overture (Oasian); Beethoven, Symphony in D. No. 2, op. 36.

THE BOSTON GIRL.

From a Boston letter in the San Francisco Call we clip the following discriminating and complimentary paragraph:

Two genuine Boston girls, near whom the writer sat the other night at a symphony concert, knew the style of every man in the orchestra, from the leader Listemann to dear, departed Lichtenberg of happy memory; they could tell if the oboe fell a sixteenth part of a half-tone from the pitch, or if the farthest kettledrum was snared an infinitesimal atom too tightly.

When the andantino of a Tschalkowsky concerto was fainting way in a strain of delicious sweetness that you or I would as soon think of analyzing as an echo from paradise it reminded one of "that staccato study of Rubinstein;" when the andante con fuoco began it recalled to the other something of Brahms. They discussed the relative merits of the Lang school and the rival clique with a discriminating justice that would not have shamed Solomon; they gossiped in German and translated the French song on the programme; they spoke of one woman's back hair as "a study," and another woman's bonnet as "a daisy"—so that they were human after all. They knew the genealogy of every one in the hall, which, is another essentially Boston accomplishment; and I found out in the pauses for intermission and breath that they hammered brass-work, wrote essays, painted in oils, read Wagner's music at sight, went to the theatre every other evening, kept up an intimate acquaintance with 500 friends, and had their own ideas on the subject of house-keeping. And yet, I give you my word of honor, they looked as pretty, and as artless, and as quiet as if they had not two thoughts in their two heads; and although they whispered a great deal, they managed to do it without disturbing anyone but myself, who rather enjoyed it. You think, perhaps, that I have been sketching an isolated type? My dear friend, my style is as plenty as peas on the Fourth of July. It is you who have been imposed upon by a false semblance, a poor imitation, a base fraud upon the genuine Boston girl.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fifth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:
Weber. Overture to "Der Freischütz."
Mozart. Recitative and Aria from "The Marriage of Figaro."
Handel: Largo.
Schubert. March in B minor arranged by Liszt.
Gericke. Songs with pianoforte:
a. Supplication.
b. My Messengers.
Schumann. Symphony No. 1, in B-flat, op. 38.
Miss Emma Juch was the singer.

Eminently a delightful concert, perhaps the most brilliant of the season so far. The playing of the "Freischütz" overture was the most spirited and effective performance of this ever-young work that has been listened to here for a long while. The effect was electric, and no foolish opera audience ever applauded the high C of a distracted tenor more loudly and spontaneously than the intelligent concert audience did this overture last Saturday evening. All the poetry of Weber's slow opening movement was revealed in its truest colors—the little sforzando of the four horns at the close of the beautiful woodland melody being a masterpiece of delicate expressiveness. Indeed, this whole slow introduction was given to perfection. The molto vivace was given with a vigor of accent, a wealth of light and shade, and a brilliancy which left nothing to be desired. One might only question whether the jubilant conclusion in C major were not taken with a too Rossini-like impetuosity of tempo, gaining brilliancy somewhat at the expense of refinement. Yet Mr. Gericke's reading may, after all, be quite in harmony with Weber's intentions; for it is likely enough that the Dresden composer had at times quite other musical instincts than those thrice-refined poetical ones upon which his enthusiastic adorers—Wagner, for instance—have more especially dwelt. The Handel Largo—an arrangement of an aria from the composer's "Xerxes," if we mistake not—aroused almost as much enthusiasm as the "Freischütz" overture. The arrangement (by whom made we know not) was originally for strings, harp and organ; but as the last-named instrument is represented at present in the Music Hall only by an empty hiatus in the southwest wall, Mr. Gericke wrote out the organ parts for all the wind instruments in the orchestra, treating it with admirable skill. The first verse of the air was excellently played by Mr. Listemann, the second verse by all the first violins in unison, the players standing in a single row along the front of the stage. The effect was immensely impressive; so grand, indeed, as to make one not care to question the "legitimacy" of this sort of treatment of Handel. Liszt's brilliant scoring of the Schubert march was made effective as ever. The playing of Schumann's first symphony, barring a very few technical slips of minor importance, was a real triumph. Saving that the tempo in the first movement seemed decidedly a shade too fast, it were hard to imagine a more artistic, musicianly and sympathetic rendering of this noble work.

The difficulties which conductor and orchestra have to face in bringing about a perfect performance of this symphony, a performance which shall make everything sound really well, are almost unique. Schumann's total inexperience in the art of orchestration at the time he wrote it led him to treat his orchestra, notably the wind instruments, in a way which makes certain passages exceedingly difficult for the players. At times the effects the composer aimed at have to be read between the lines by the conductor, and it takes no little skill and knowledge of the orchestra on his part to enable him to produce these effects smoothly and surely. Mr. Gericke has given no better proof of his mastery than the manner in which he has brought his orchestra to play this symphony of Schumann's. As for the work itself, without wishing for a moment to detract from the high encomiums which have just now been showered upon it from some quarters, we must say that it seems to us that it has been praised unjustly at the expense of Schumann's other symphonies. Speaking positively, call it great, grand, superb, or anything fine you please; you can hardly praise it too highly. But, speaking comparatively, we, for one, cannot see that it at any point reaches the almost superhuman level to which Schumann has soared in his other symphonies. A better rounded and more evenly sustained work it possibly may be, but there is surely no thing in it that rises to the height of the finale of the C major symphony, or the first and fourth movements of the E-flat major. As for the fourth symphony in D minor, we cannot but think it a greater work throughout.

Miss Emma Juch, who, it is only just to say, had been suffering severely from toothache for several days, so that any movement of the mouth was exquisitely painful, sang Mozart's "Dove sono" in excellent style and with good expression. In fact, the only blemish in her style is an insecure attack; she often slides up to notes, both at the beginning and in the middle of a phrase. But good as her singing was, she was too evidently out of sorts, and hardly recalled the immensely brilliant impression she made last season at the Wagner Festival. In the two songs with pianoforte she appeared more like herself, singing the second one with irresistible entrain and effectiveness. The songs themselves, the first things of his own that Mr. Gericke has yet given here, are modest, easily melodious in style, and gain much from excellently written accompaniments. At a first hearing they do not strike one as being of very pronounced character, but they are natural, unforced in sentiment, and wholly unassuming.

The next programme is—

Mozart. Overture to the "Magic Flute."
Joh. Seb. Bach. Pastoral from the Christmas Oratorio.
Arranged by Robert Franz.
Schumann. Pictures from the Orient, op. 66.
Arranged by Carl Reinecke.
Gade. Overture (Oasian).
Beethoven. Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36.

once the percussion instruments were respectfully treated. Schumann's first Symphony celebrates two things, his engagement to Clara Wieck and his partial freedom from his profession of musical editor. From the time of writing his earliest string quartets, and the single symphony which was never published, he devoted himself to musical literature with incessant zeal for a number of years. The Symphony in B flat was about the first thing he wrote after returning again to composition. Given the conditions, how could it be otherwise than happy and bright? Even the "animato e grazioso" which qualifies the closing Allegro shows the youthful exuberance of the man. The opening Andante is "maestoso," just long enough to be respectful, when it rushes an Allegro vivace with its irreverent triangle, peasant dances, blithe fancies, etc., but with a hymning undercurrent of fugal (not frugal) praise that is quite in the nature of a thanksgiving. The Larghetto represents a pause for seriousness. The happy spirit of the writer is barely kept back, though the pace is slower. His thought is not yet become sombre or mournful. The Scherzo is unrestrained sense again; the accents tell the intention, and though the figure has the flight of a Phaeton it is never reckless. The Allegro at the close could not be easily compassed at the modern musical clinic. It conceives an idea only to give it away again; it teaches an anti-climax only to serve a fancy in another direction; development it has, but the style is too often bewildering by its incessant wilfulness. The movement is surcharged with ideas that receive only partial expression, though it is always clear what he might do if he wished. Schumann did not write another symphony with the same impetuosity or perhaps pleasure. Strangely and sadly enough, the new direction he was to give to musical thought was accompanied by intense mental suffering and domestic unrest. The playing of the band is uniformly fine; the ensemble of the strings produces a large, rich tone of an uncommonly musical quality, while the first violins in particular are superb in their unisons. This corps possesses so many artists of reputation that it is a matter of great pride that their individuality can be so successfully hidden. But all the band is responsive and show the loyalty of willing minds. It would be hard to say what was played the best on Saturday evening. The cargo was the most effective single movement; the style in which the March was played gave it its abundant color and marked rhythm; the Freischuetz was a continuous poem; yet because the symphony offered the more connected and better opportunity will it be the best remembered, for its performance did possess all the elegances of refined playing. Miss Emma Juch sang "Dove Sono" carefully, but not with any manifest breadth of style. The two songs written by Mr. Gericke were pleasantly suited to the singer. "My Messengers" is written after a common model, not unlike Abt, which allows the singer an expressive, generous melody. "Supplication" is a song of a higher type, possibly suggesting Greig. Mr. Gericke played an attentive and helpful accompaniment for the songs. The conductor of the orchestra maintains a beautiful disregard of the printed wish of the management concerning the time of leaving the hall, intermission, etc. The intermission should be a recognized feature of the evening, and it should continue ten minutes. Concerning the courtesy of the management in appointing a time for those to leave the hall who must go before the concert is done, it seems a thing no longer needful, for half-past nine has been the closing hour for all the concerts thus far, and this in itself obviates the suburban necessity of leaving. The ventilation of the hall is as inadequate as the still-standing screen and the unpainted platform are ugly. At the next concert no soloist is announced. The instrumental numbers are: Mozart, Overture (Magic Flute); Joh. Seb. Bach, pastoral from the Christmas Oratorio, arranged by Robert Franz; Schumann, pictures from the Orient, op. 66, arranged by Carl Reinecke; Gade, overture (Ossian); Beethoven, Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36.

THE BOSTON GIRL.

From a Boston letter in the San Francisco Call we clip the following discriminating and complimentary paragraph:

Two genuine Boston girls, near whom the writer sat the other night at a symphony concert, knew the style of every man in the orchestra, from the leader Listemann to dear, departed Lichtenberg of happy memory; they could tell if the oboe fell a sixteenth part of a half-tone from the pitch, or if the farthest kettledrum was snared an infinitesimal atom too tightly.

When the andantino of a Tschalkowsky concerto was fainting way in a strain of delicious sweetness that you or I would as soon think of analyzing as an echo from paradise it reminded one of "that staccato study of Rubinstein;" when the andante con fuoco began it recalled to the other something of Brahms. They discussed the relative merits of the Lang school and the rival clique with a discriminating justice that would not have shamed Solomon; they gossiped in German and translated the French song on the programme; they spoke of one woman's back hair as "a study," and another woman's bonnet as "a daisy"—so that they were human after all. They knew the genealogy of every one in the hall, which, is another essentially Boston accomplishment; and I found out in the pauses for intermission and breath that they hammered brass-work, wrote essays, painted in oils, read Wagner's music at sight, went to the theatre every other evening, kept up an intimate acquaintance with 500 friends, and had their own ideas on the subject of house-keeping. And yet, I give you my word of honor, they looked as pretty, and as artless, and as quiet as if they had not two thoughts in their two heads; and although they whispered a great deal, they managed to do it without disturbing anyone but myself, who rather enjoyed it. You think, perhaps, that I have been sketching an isolated type? My dear friend, my style is as plenty as peas on the Fourth of July. It is you who have been imposed upon by a false semblance, a poor imitation, a base fraud upon the genuine Boston girl.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fifth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Weber. Overture to "Der Freischütz."
Mozart. Recitative and Aria from "The Marriage of Figaro."

Handel: Largo.
Schubert. March in B minor arranged by Liszt.
Gericke. Songs with pianoforte:

a. Supplication.

b. My Messengers.

Schumann. Symphony No. 1, in B-flat, op. 38.

Miss Emma Juch was the singer.

Eminently a delightful concert, perhaps the most brilliant of the season so far. The playing of the "Freischütz" overture was the most spirited and effective performance of this ever-young work that has been listened to here for a long while. The effect was electric, and no foolish opera audience ever applauded the high C of a distracted tenor more loudly and spontaneously than the intelligent concert audience did this overture last Saturday evening. All the poetry of Weber's slow opening movement was revealed in its truest colors—the little sforzando of the four horns at the close of the beautiful woodland melody being a masterpiece of delicate expressiveness. Indeed, this whole slow introduction was given to perfection. The molto vivace was given with a vigor of accent, a wealth of light and shade, and a brilliancy which left nothing to be desired. One might only question whether the jubilant conclusion in C major were not taken with a too Rossini-like impetuosity of tempo, gaining brilliancy somewhat at the expense of refinement. Yet Mr. Gericke's reading may, after all, be quite in harmony with Weber's intentions; for it is likely enough that the Dresden composer had at times quite other musical instincts than those thrice-refined poetical ones upon which his enthusiastic adorers—Wagner, for instance—have more especially dwelt. The Handel Largo—an arrangement of an aria from the composer's "Xerxes," if we mistake not—aroused almost as much enthusiasm as the "Freischütz" overture. The arrangement (by whom made we know not) was originally for strings, harp and organ; but as the last-named instrument is represented at present in the Music Hall only by an empty hiatus in the southwest wall, Mr. Gericke wrote out the organ parts for all the wind instruments in the orchestra, treating it with admirable skill. The first verse of the air was excellently played by Mr. Listemann, the second verse by all the first violins in unison, the players standing in a single row along the front of the stage. The effect was immensely impressive; so grand, indeed, as to make one not care to question the "legitimacy" of this sort of treatment of Handel. Liszt's brilliant scoring of the Schubert march was made effective as ever. The playing of Schumann's first symphony, barring a very few technical slips of minor importance, was a real triumph. Saving that the tempo in the first movement seemed decidedly a shade too fast, it were

hard to imagine a more artistic, musicianly and sympathetic rendering of this noble work.

The difficulties which conductor and orchestra have to face in bringing about a perfect performance of this symphony, a performance which shall make everything sound really well, are almost unique. Schumann's total inexperience in the art of orchestration at the time he wrote it led him to treat his orchestra, notably the wind instruments, in a way which makes certain passages exceedingly difficult for the players. At times the effects the composer aimed at have to be read between the lines by the conductor, and it takes no little skill and knowledge of the orchestra on his part to enable him to produce these effects smoothly and surely. Mr. Gericke has given no better proof of his mastery than the manner in which he has brought his orchestra to play this symphony of Schumann's. As for the work itself, without wishing for a moment to detract from the high encomiums which have just now been showered upon it from some quarters, we must say that it seems to us that it has been praised unjustly at the expense of Schumann's other symphonies. Speaking positively, call it great, grand, superb, or anything fine you please; you can hardly praise it too highly. But, speaking comparatively, we, for one, cannot see that it at any point reaches the almost superhuman level to which Schumann has soared in his other symphonies. A better rounded and more evenly sustained work it possibly may be, but there is surely no thing in it that rises to the height of the finale of the C major symphony, or the first and fourth movements of the E-flat major. As for the fourth symphony in D minor, we cannot but think it a greater work throughout.

Miss Emma Juch, who, it is only just to say, had been suffering severely from toothache for several days, so that any movement of the mouth was exquisitely painful, sang Mozart's "Dove sono" in excellent style and with good expression. In fact, the only blemish in her style is an insecure attack; she often slides up to notes, both at the beginning and in the middle of a phrase. But good as her singing was, she was too evidently out of sorts, and hardly recalled the immensely brilliant impression she made last season at the Wagner Festival. In the two songs with pianoforte she appeared more like herself, singing the second one with irresistible entrain and effectiveness. The songs themselves, the first things of his own that Mr. Gericke has yet given here, are modest, easily melodious in style, and gain much from excellently written accompaniments. At a first hearing they do not strike one as being of very pronounced character, but they are natural, unforced in sentiment, and wholly unassuming.

The next programme is—

Mozart. Overture to the "Magic Flute."
Joh. Seb. Bach. Pastoral from the Christmas Oratorio.
Arranged by Robert Franz.
Schumann. Pictures from the Orient, op. 66.
Arranged by Carl Reinecke.
Gade. Overture (Ossian).
Beethoven. Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36.

Key note Nov 22/84

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The most enjoyable concert of the whole season thus far, was given in this series last Saturday evening. The programme was:

Overture (Freischütz).....Weber
 Recitative and Aria (Marriage of Figaro).....Mozart
 Miss Emma Juch.

Largo.....Handel
 March in B minor.....Schubert
 Arranged by Franz Liszt.

a, Supplication, }.....Gericke
 b, My Messengers, }
 (Songs with piano.)
 Miss Juch.

Symphony, No. 1, in B flat, op. 38.....Schumann
 Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace—Larghetto
 —Scherzo—Allegro animato e grazioso.

Melody, romance and passion were blended in this programme, while the pieces were so arranged that the contrasts were strongly marked, and each gained in effect thereby. I have never heard the "Freischütz" overture as well played in America. The horn quartette went without a break, and was shaded to perfection, and the brilliant finale went as smoothly as if played by a single instrument. The applause at its close showed that Boston auditors are beginning to recognize a good performance when they hear it. I may add here that several times during the concert the applause burst forth in the same overwhelming fashion, and that the hall was for once thronged. How different it used to be in Boston! I can remember concerts in the city where the critic felt very lonely, where musical auto-crats fell asleep, and where the small audience was so cold that the conductor's teeth chattered and the orchestra had to put on ulsters. Of course in those pre-Higginson days applause was unknown, and if once an enthusiastic youth did clap his hands, it was discovered that he came from New York, and he was requested by a committee from the congre—I mean, from the audience, to discontinue such indecorous proceedings. Nous avons changé tout cela. We are getting as excitable as a La Scala audience, and when we once establish the good old custom of hissing bad work we shall be all right.

Miss Juch sang conscientiously and well. I might have craved more dramatic fire in recitative, and less portamento in journeying up to the high notes (perhaps her proverb is "Any portamento—in a storm"), but she evidently had an artistic appreciation of what she was singing, and her legato work in the Mozart number, which proved to be "Dove sono," was praiseworthy. She sang Mr. Gericke's two songs finely, but the enthusiasm which followed was as plainly meant for the composer as for herself, and when he finally appeared, modestly in the background, the hall rang with plaudits. The second of the two songs is a most musicianly and effective work, and the first is also glorious in its melody and harmonic treatment, were it not for the fact that Robert Franz has set "Weil auf mir du Dunkles Auge" in a manner which precludes any followers.

In the Handel "Largo" Mr. Gericke made a good effect by allowing all the violins to stand at the front of the stage, thus producing a fuller tone and greater freedom in bowing. The work is chiefly for strings and harp, with a solo for first violin (admirably played by Mr. B. Listemann), but with a full orchestral passage at the end. It was simply an arrangement of "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's opera of "Xerxes," written in 1738. I do not know who we have to thank for the excellent arrangement. The orchestration at the end was certainly modern. The Schubert March also went perfectly, if I except one tardy attack by the flutes, and its brusque figures, culminating finally on the kettledrum, were given with force and decision. But the Symphony was the fitting crown to the whole concert. This "Spring" Symphony is certainly the greatest of Schumann's instrumental works, and probably the most spontaneous symphony that anyone except Beethoven or Schubert composed. Its performance was very thorough.

The first figure, at the very beginning, of trumpets and horns, was nobly rendered, and in the latter part of the introduction Mr. Gericke very properly adopted an accelerando instead of at once starting an allegretto. Thus by degrees he led up to the tempo of the allegro. This movement seemed to be taken a little too fast; at least, its figures blurred a little and the triangle seemed to rap away, ad libitum. The larghetto was gloriously performed, the broad melody being given by the violins, the 'cellos and wind instruments successively, without any flaw, and the anticipation of the figure of the first theme of the scherzo being finely rendered by the trombones.

The scherzo at first seemed to be taken rather fast. To be sure this is Schumann's own direction, but it blurred the chromatic figure for all that. At the reprise after the first trio, it went clearer. The contrabasses did excellent work in the second trio. The last movement was very near perfect. It seemed to me that the first violins tried to run away from the leader's beat at the beginning of it. Mr. Gericke was right in not taking the tempo of this movement too rapidly. Schumann intended it to represent "Spring's Farewell," and expressed the wish that it should not be taken too rapidly. The concert altogether was the best which Mr. Gericke has yet given, and better than those of previous seasons.

On Saturday night we went to the Music Hall to hear the symphony concert and see your new leader, Mr. William Gericke, in whom Miss Kellogg discovered her old conductor of Vienna. On the nights that Richter did not conduct the opera there, Gericke did; and, although Miss Kellogg had forgotten the name, she recognized him the moment she saw him. He is a capital conductor, and Boston is to be congratulated upon his possession. There is a firmness and condensation about his beat that will tell upon the Symphony Society orchestra before he has been leading it very long. Already he is said to have worked wonders with it.

C. Nov. 24/84

IONY CONCERT.

It was an altogether enhanced the most romantic of Freischütz," and ending of Schumann's symphony could not but charm the auditor. It also presented what must have been infinitely accustomed to modern example, can be more age in the "Freischütz" which all other brass is artificial. The Schumann was the crown of the evening of this master's great (all the rest, and scarcely of Beethoven may command reason why it should be the composer's works; and Schumann in this piece the finest lieder that have passed, after years of waiting, and the great joy which very part of the great work used in the early part of his subject from nature a "Spring Symphony." From the first notes of the noble theme, like a close, pictures spring's movement as beautiful farewell, and is a hint to end a symphony the title of "Spring" was not for it will stand as surely, pure music, as it could in a movement, for example, is nobly developed—the spring. The last movement possible instances of contrabass alternations of light and on delighted in, and as and his unfinished symphony—first one with two trios mphony—is a movement by its form, and the non-face, almost recalling Moept and innigkeit of the are Schumannesque in then not only displays ut also reveals him in a is absent from his later and gayety vanished too thoughts, and his mind even the brightness of r "Cologne"—symphony, py Rhine life, does not

S.

RICES.

TS

T.

TON.

E,

Ale,

a Lager den Seal

ST:

GIES

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The most enjoyable concert of the whole season thus far, was given in this series last Saturday evening. The programme was:

Overture (Freischütz).....	Weber
Recitative and Aria (Marriage of Figaro).....	Mozart
Miss Emma Juch.
Largo.....	Handel
March in B minor.....	Schubert
Arranged by Franz Liszt.
a, Supplication, }.....	Gericke
b, My Messengers, }
(Songs with piano.)
Miss Juch.
Symphony, No. 1, in B flat, op. 38.....	Schumann
Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace—Larghetto
—Scherzo—Allegro animato e grazioso.

Melody, romance and passion were blended in this programme, while the pieces were so arranged that the contrasts were strongly marked, and each gained in effect thereby. I have never heard the "Freischütz" overture as well played in America. The horn quartette went without a break, and was shaded to perfection, and the brilliant finale went as smoothly as if played by a single instrument. The applause at its close showed that Boston auditors are beginning to recognize a good performance when they hear it. I may add here that several times during the concert the applause burst forth in the same overwhelming fashion, and that the hall was for once thronged. How different it used to be in Boston! I can remember concerts in the city where the critic felt very lonely, where musical auto-crats fell asleep, and where the small audience was so cold that the conductor's teeth chattered and the orchestra had to put on ulsters. Of course in those pre-Higginson days applause was unknown, and if once an enthusiastic youth did clap his hands, it was discovered that he came from New York, and he was requested by a committee from the congre—I mean, from the audience, to discontinue such indecorous proceedings. Nous avons changé tout cela. We are getting as excitable as a La Scala audience, and when we once establish the good old custom of hissing bad work we shall be all right.

Miss Juch sang conscientiously and well. I might have craved more dramatic fire in recitative, and less portamento in journeying up to the high notes (perhaps her proverb is "Any port-amento—in a storm"), but she evidently had an artistic appreciation of what she was singing, and her legato work in the Mozart number, which proved to be "Dove sono," was praiseworthy. She sang Mr. Gericke's two songs finely, but the enthusiasm which followed was as plainly meant for the composer as for herself, and when he finally appeared, modestly in the background, the hall rang with plaudits. The second of the two songs is a most musicianly and effective work, and the first is also glorious in its melody and harmonic treatment, were it not for the fact that Robert Franz has set "Weil auf mir du Dunkles Auge" in a manner which precludes any followers.

In the Handel "Largo" Mr. Gericke made a good effect by allowing all the violins to stand at the front of the stage, thus producing a fuller tone and greater freedom in bowing. The work is chiefly for strings and harp, with a solo for first violin (admirably played by Mr. B. Listemann), but with a full orchestral passage at the end. It was simply an arrangement of "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's opera of "Xerxes," written in 1738. I do not know who we have to thank for the excellent arrangement. The orchestration at the end was certainly modern. The Schubert March also went perfectly, if I except one tardy attack by the flutes, and its brusque figures, culminating finally on the kettledrum, were given with force and decision. But the Symphony was the fitting crown to the whole concert. This "Spring" Symphony is certainly the greatest of Schumann's instrumental works, and probably the most spontaneous symphony that anyone except Beethoven or Schubert composed. Its performance was very thorough.

The first figure, at the very beginning, of trumpets and horns, was nobly rendered, and in the latter part of the introduction Mr. Gericke very properly adopted an accelerando instead of at once starting an allegretto. Thus by degrees he led up to the tempo of the allegro. This movement seemed to be taken a little too fast; at least, its figures blurred a little and the triangle seemed to rap away, ad libitum. The larghetto was gloriously performed, the broad melody being given by the violins, the 'cellos and wind instruments successively, without any flaw, and the anticipation of the figure of the first theme of the scherzo being finely rendered by the trombones.

The scherzo at first seemed to be taken rather fast. To be sure this is Schumann's own direction, but it blurred the chromatic figure for all that. At the reprise after the first trio, it went clearer. The contrabasses did excellent work in the second trio. The last movement was very near perfect. It seemed to me that the first violins tried to run away from the leader's beat at the beginning of it. Mr. Gericke was right in not taking the tempo of this movement too rapidly. Schumann intended it to represent "Spring's Farewell," and expressed the wish that it should not be taken too rapidly. The concert altogether was the best which Mr. Gericke has yet given, and better than those of previous seasons.

On Saturday night we went to the Music Hall to hear the symphony concert and see your new leader, Mr. William Gericke, in whom Miss Kellogg discovered her old conductor of Vienna. On the nights that Richter did not conduct the opera there, Gericke did; and, although Miss Kellogg had forgotten the name, she recognized him the moment she saw him. He is a capital conductor, and Boston is to be congratulated upon his possession. There is a firmness and condensation about his beat that will tell upon the Symphony Society orchestra before he has been leading it very long. Already he is said to have worked wonders with it.

C. Nov. 14/84 IONY CONCERT.

It was an altogether enhanced the most romantic of Freischütz," and ending of Schumann's symphony could not but charm the auditor. It also presented that must have been in the early part of the composer's works; and Schumann in this piece the finest lieder that have appeared, after years of waiting, and the great joy which very part of the great movement in the early part of his subject from nature—a "Spring Symphony." From the first notes of the noble theme, like a close, pictures spring's movement as beautiful as a farewell, and is a but to end a symphony the title of "Spring" was not for it will stand as surely, pure music, as it could in movement, for example, is nobly developed—the spring. The last movement possible instances of contrabasses of light and on delighted in, and as and his unfinished symphony—first one with two trios mphony—is a movement by its form, and the non-face, almost recalling Moept and innigkeit of the are Schumannesque in then not only displays ut also reveals him in a is absent from his later and gayety vanished too thoughts, and his mind even the brightness of r "Cologne"—symphony, py Rhine life, does not

S.

RICES.

TS

r.

TON.

E,

Ale,

a Lager den Seal

ST:

GIES

84

Key note Nov 22/84

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The most enjoyable concert of the whole season thus far, was given in this series last Saturday evening. The programme was:

Overture (Freischütz).....	Weber
Recitative and Aria (Marriage of Figaro).....	Mozart
Miss Emma Juch.
Largo.....	Handel
March in B minor.....	Schubert
Arranged by Franz Liszt.
a, Supplication, }.....	Gericke
b, My Messengers, }
(Songs with piano.)
Miss Juch.
Symphony, No. 1, in B flat, op. 38.....	Schumann
Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace—Larghetto
—Scherzo—Allegro animato e grazioso.

Melody, romance and passion were blended in this programme, while the pieces were so arranged that the contrasts were strongly marked, and each gained in effect thereby. I have never heard the "Freischütz" overture as well played in America. The horn quartette went without a break, and was shaded to perfection, and the brilliant finale went as smoothly as if played by a single instrument. The applause at its close showed that Boston auditors are beginning to recognize a good performance when they hear it. I may add here that several times during the concert the applause burst forth in the same overwhelming fashion, and that the hall was for once thronged. How different it used to be in Boston! I can remember concerts in the city where the critic felt very lonely, where musical autocrats fell asleep, and where the small audience was so cold that the conductor's teeth chattered and the orchestra had to put on ulsters. Of course in those pre-Higginson days applause was unknown, and if once an enthusiastic youth did clap his hands, it was discovered that he came from New York, and he was requested by a committee from the congré—I mean, from the audience, to discontinue such indecorous proceedings. Nous avons changé tout cela. We are getting as excitable as a La Scala audience, and when we once establish the good old custom of hissing bad work we shall be all right.

Miss Juch sang conscientiously and well. I might have craved more dramatic fire in recitative, and less portamento in journeying up to the high notes (perhaps her proverb is "Any port-amento—in a storm"), but she evidently had an artistic appreciation of what she was singing, and her legato work in the Mozart number, which proved to be "Dove sono," was praiseworthy. She sang Mr. Gericke's two songs finely, but the enthusiasm which followed was as plainly meant for the composer as for herself, and when he finally appeared, modestly in the background, the hall rang with plaudits. The second of the two songs is a most musicianly and effective work, and the first is also glorious in its melody and harmonic treatment, were it not for the fact that Robert Franz has set "Weil auf mir Auge" in a manner which precludes any follow-

In the Handel "Largo" Mr. Gericke made a good thing, allowing all the violins to stand at the front, thus producing a fuller tone and greater freedom. The work is chiefly for strings and harp for first violin (admirably played by Mr. B. Liszt) with a full orchestral passage at the end. It was an arrangement of "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's "Xerxes," written in 1738. I do not know what to thank for the excellent arrangement. The work at the end was certainly modern. The Schumann also went perfectly, if I except one tardy at flutes, and its brusque figures, culminating in the kettledrum, were given with force and decision. The Symphony was the fitting crown to the whole. This "Spring" Symphony is certainly the best of Schumann's instrumental works, and probably the most spontaneous symphony that anyone except Schubert composed. Its performance was very good.

The first figure, at the very beginning, of the horns, was nobly rendered, and in the latter introduction Mr. Gericke very properly adopted rando instead of at once starting an allegretto. The degrees he led up to the tempo of the allegretto seemed to be taken a little too fast; at least it blurred a little and the triangle seemed to libitum. The larghetto was gloriously played, the broad melody being given by the violins, the wind instruments successively, without any anticipation of the figure of the first theme or being finely rendered by the trombones.

The scherzo at first seemed to be taken rather fast. I am sure this is Schumann's own direction, but the chromatic figure for all that. At the reprise of the trio, it went clearer. The contrabasses did excellently in the second trio. The last movement was perfect. It seemed to me that the first violins were away from the leader's beat at the beginning. Mr. Gericke was right in not taking the tempo of the first movement too rapidly. Schumann intended it to represent "Farewell," and expressed the wish that it should be taken too rapidly. The concert altogether was a success, which Mr. Gericke has yet given, and better than previous seasons.

On Saturday night we went to the Music Hall to hear the symphony concert and see your new leader, William Gericke, in whom Miss Kellogg discovered the old conductor of Vienna. On the nights that Richard Strauss did not conduct the opera there, Gericke did; and though Miss Kellogg had forgotten the name, she recognized him the moment she saw him. He is a capable conductor, and Boston is to be congratulated upon its possession. There is a firmness and condensat about his beat that will tell upon the Symphony Society orchestra before he has been leading it very long. He is ready he is said to have worked wonders with it.

Comm

MUSIC.

Nov 1/84

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of last night was an altogether enjoyable one, beginning with the most romantic of overtures, that to Weber's "Freischütz," and ending with the freshest and brightest of Schumann's symphonies (No. 1 in B flat), it could not but charm even the most musical auditor. It also presented points of instrumentation that must have been instructive to ears become wholly accustomed to modern dissonances. What, for example, can be more beautiful than the horn passage in the "Freischütz" overture, a quartette beside which all other brass quartettes seem labored and artificial. The Schumann symphony, however, was the crown of the evening's work. Although the first of this master's great orchestral works, it overtops all the rest, and scarcely any symphony since the time of Beethoven may compare with it. There is a valid reason why it should be the most deeply joyous of the composer's works; the same reason which caused Schumann in this period (1840-41) to produce the finest lieder that have ever been composed. He had, after years of waiting, won his wife, Clara Weeck, and the great joy which was in him is reflected in every part of the great work of last night. Composed in the early part of spring, he was moved to take his subject from nature, and the work is actually a "Spring Symphony." The entire first movement, from the first notes of the call of trumpets and horns to the noble theme, like a hymn of praise, at the close, pictures spring's awakening. The last movement as beautifully portrays spring's farewell, and is a comparatively slow movement to end a symphony with. We are glad that the title of "Spring" was not appended to the symphony, for it will stand as surely, and as high in the field of pure music, as it could in programme music. The first movement, for example, has a superb motif which is nobly developed—the trumpet call of approaching spring. The last movement gives one of the best possible instances of contrasted themes and brusque alternations of light and shadow, such as Beethoven delighted in, and as Schubert used in his ninth and his unfinished symphony. The scherzo—the first one with two trios ever introduced into a symphony—is a movement which interests the musician by its form, and the non-musician by its melodic grace, almost recalling Mozart in this respect. The depth and innigkeit of the slow movement of the work are Schumannesque in every bar. The symphony then not only displays Schumann at his highest, but also reveals him in a many-sided manner which is absent from his later works. The brightness and gayety vanished too soon from his musical thoughts, and his mind became more clouded, and even the brightness of portions of his fourth—or "Cologne"—symphony, when he pictures the happy Rhine life, does not 86 seem as spontaneous as the great joy which wells up in this "spring" symphony.

And now to speak of its execution. The work affords many opportunities of most delicate shading as also of giving broad and massive tutti passages. The opening trumpet call was given with precision and vigor, and in the last part of the andante introduction Mr. Gericke adopted just the right accelerando effect instead of jumping at once into a quicker movement. The allegro, however, seemed a trifle too fast, and it was not easy to follow the figures. The triangle might occasionally have been somewhat prompter. The adagio, with its three repetitions of the noble theme, was finely rendered by violins, cellos, and wind instruments in succession. The appearance of the theme of the scherzo in the brasses at the end of the larghetto was made doubly impressive because of the excellent manner in which it was played. The beginning of the scherzo was somewhat blurred, but at the reprise after the first trio, all went well. The finale was finely played, although there seemed to be a tendency on the part of the first violins to run away from the conductor's steady, and not too rapid, beat. Mr. Gericke's reaching was the right one; the movement loses by too much rapidity.

The "Freischütz" overture has never received a better performance than at this concert. The shading and ensemble were perfect, and the hornplayers covered themselves with glory. Miss Emma Juch was the soloist, and won great applause. In "Dove Sono," and in her later songs, her enunciation was commendably clear. The only fault that might be found was that in reaching the higher notes she was constantly obliged to make use of the portamento. She sang, however, with an evidently artistic understanding of her selections, and in the Mozart aria, the sweetness and purity of her legato work deserves praise. Two songs of Mr. Gericke's own composition were received by the audience with most enthusiastic warmth, and the tribute was divided between the composer and the singer. The first, "Weil auf mir, du dunkles Auge," somewhat recalls the earnest manner in which Robert Franz has set his song. The second was full of brightness, with an accompaniment that showed how good a musician Mr. Gericke is. The harmonies were interesting throughout, and the work was full of bewitching grace. Handel's "Largo" proved to be an instrumentation of his operatic song, "Ombra mai fu," chiefly for violins and harp, but bringing in full orchestra at the close. Mr. Listemann played the beautiful contralto melody with much taste, and the strings, standing at the front of the stage, gave an excellent support. The Schubert march in B minor, with Liszt's sumptuous orchestration, was also—if we except one late attack in flutes—well played. Its Hungarian flavor, its brusque chief figure finally bursting forth on kettle-drums, its clash of cymbals and general pomp made it a fine contrast to the Handelian simplicity of orchestration, and thus enhanced the effect of both.

All in all, the concert was the most successful of the series thus far, and the large audience present, as well as the overwhelming applause, proved how keenly it was enjoyed. Next week's symphony will be the Beethoven number two.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.30 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART,

OVERTURE, (Magic Flute).

JOH. SEB. BACH,

PASTORAL from the Christmas Oratorio.
Arranged by Robert Franz.
(First time.)

SCHUMANN,

PICTURES from the Orient, op. 66.
Vivace ma non troppo.—Andante con moto.—
Un poco maestoso.—Andantino.—Vivace.—
Molto moderato.—
Arranged by Carl Reinecke.
(First time.)

GADE,

OVERTURE. (Ossian.)

BEETHOVEN,

SYMPHONY in D. No. 2, op. 36.
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.—Larghetto.—
Scherzo (Allegro).—Allegro molto.—

PICTURES FROM THE ORIENT.

The Composer thinks it well to state that these pieces owe their origin to a special prompting. In fact they were written during the reading of Rückert's Makamen (narrations after the Arabic of Hariri).

The book's droll hero, Abu Seid, who might be compared to the German Eulenspiegel,—only that the former is presented in a far more noble and poetic aspect,—as well as the figure of his honorable friend Hareth, would haunt the Composer's mind while he was engaged in the work; which fact may account for the singular character of several of the musical pieces.

Farther than this, no definite situations have floated before him during the composition of the first five pieces; and only the last may pass, perhaps, for an echo of the last Makame, in which we see the hero close his merry life in sorrow and repentance.

Sixth Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall Saturday night, the programme being as follows:

Overture—"Magic Flute".....Mozart
Pastoral from the Christmas Oratorio.....Joh. Seb. Bach
Pictures from the Orient, op. 68.....Schumann
Overture—"Ossian".....Gade
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36.....Beethoven

At the age of four Mozart wrote tunes, at twelve he could not find his equal on the harpsichord, and the professors of Europe stood aghast at one who improvised fugues on a given theme, and then took a ride-a-cock-horse on his father's walking stick. The rest of Mozart's life can be compared to nothing but a torch burning out rapidly in the wind. Unwearied alike as a composer and as an artist, he kept pouring forth symphonies, sonatas and operas. Disease could not shake his nerve as an executant, and the hand of death found him unwilling to relinquish the pen of the ready writer. The year 1785 is marked by the six celebrated quartettes dedicated to Haydn. "I declare to you," exclaimed the old man to Mozart's father, upon hearing them, "before God and on the faith of an honest man, that your son is the greatest composer who ever lived." In 1786 "The Marriage of Figaro" was produced, and in 1787 "Don Giovanni" was written for his favorite public at Prague. The overture of "The Magic Flute" has an historical origin. Joseph II., Emperor of Austria, was not only a good musician, but he used also to protect the arts. One evening the celebrated pianist and composer, Clementi, the author of "Gradus ad Parnassum," performed one of his sonatas before the Emperor, who was not only charmed with the execution, but calling Mozart, who was at that time pianist of his Court, he asked if he had noticed that the first part of the sonata was elaborated on a theme of four first bars. Finding it very ingenious and a true tour de force, "Sir," answered Mozart, "I promise to Your Majesty to make a whole overture of the first bar of this sonata." He was finishing in these moments his "Zauberflöte." He took the first bar of Clementi's sonata to make the overture to his opera, and that is how he produced this masterwork, the performance of which on Saturday evening was much admired, and which was given with a rare perfection. It will scarcely be believed that all this time Mozart was in the greatest want of money. His works were miserably paid for. He was struggling with poverty, and when they brought him the rich appointment of organist to the Cathedral of St. Stephen, for which he had been longing all his life, when managers besieged his door with handfuls of gold, summoning him to compose something for them, it was all too late. He lay with swollen limbs and burning head. On a stormy December morning in 1793 through the deserted streets of Vienna, amid snow and hail, and unaccompanied by a single friend, the body of Mozart was hastily borne with fifteen others to the common burial ground of the poor.

Bach's Pastoral is like a true idylle, breathing the calmness of the fields on a summer night. Its instrumentation answers perfectly to the title of the work, and the wind instruments gave it with the greatest delicacy. Schumann's Pictures from the Orient is a charming and melodious work which cannot be heard indifferently, but why it is called from the Orient while it would be as well called Pictures from Oil City or from Texas is difficult to see, as it is without any local color. Oriental music possesses quite a particular scale; its characteristic point is an exceedingly slow movement, and it is nearly always in a minor key. To have a true idea of Oriental music it is only necessary to hear "The Desert" of Felicien David, who transports us as by magic to this poetic region, full of the aromatic exhalations of rich vases, making us assist in the pilgrimage through the desert. There is the true Oriental poetry, with its vivacious and picturesque colors of the native music.

Schumann's work combines a very pleasant melody with very fine effects of instrumentation, but the beginning suggests somewhat Beethoven's march entitled "Les Ruines d'Althene," and in the middle of the work may be found four complete bars of the Mozart Symphony in G minor. The Overture of Gade (Ossian) is of a very original style, perfectly developed in its ensemble. The theme in minor is of great effect, full of energy and fire.

Of Beethoven's symphony it might be enough to say that its author was the greatest symphonist of the past and of the present. It is because Beethoven's music takes emotion fairly in hand, disciplines it, expresses its depressions in order to remove them; renders with terrible accuracy even its insanity and incoherence in order to give relief through such expressions, and restores calm; finches not from the tender and the passionate; and stoops to pity, and becomes a very angel in sorrow, that we place Beethoven's name in the first rank and allow no names to stand before his. Of the programme Saturday night it is necessary to say that the tempo of the allegro was much too quick, especially in the principal theme and in the reply played by the bassoons and repeated by violins. In the scherzo the violins were terribly in a hurry. Some of them did not play in the proper tempo. These excellent artists must not confuse quickness with energy. The seventh concert will be given on Saturday evening, with the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. Miss Mary E. Garlicks, pianist, will be the soloist, and the following programme will be given: Symphony in C major, No. 6, Schubert; concerto for pianoforte in G major, No. 4, op. 58, Beethoven; Hungarian dances, Brahms; overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There was an excellent audience. The programme was entirely orchestral, the services of a soloist having been dispensed with. The performances opened with Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," the allegro of which was taken at such a breakneck pace that the character and dignity of the work were wholly lost. It was Mr. Gericke's first serious mistake, but it was a very bad one, and was remarkable in view of the excellent judgment he has invariably shown on all other occasions. It was followed by Franz's charming arrangement of the Pastoral from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, which was delicately and artistically played. After this came Reinecke's arrangement of Schumann's "Pictures from the Orient," op. 68, which are scored for orchestra with great skill, taste and sympathy with the composer's feeling. These sketches lend themselves easily to instrumental treatment and were admirably interpreted. But is not Mr. Gericke giving too many arrangements of piano works? At the fourth concert we had Liszt's meddlesome interference with the andante from the Beethoven Trio; at the fifth concert we had the same arranger's transcription for orchestra of Schubert's March in B-minor, and at the concert of last night we had two more arrangements. Surely there is enough fine music written expressly for the orchestra, that has not yet been heard here, to make these transcriptions unnecessary. Gade's noble "Ossian" overture had an exceptionally broad and impressive reading, and was grandly performed. The whole ended with Beethoven's second symphony, which was sympathetically read and played. Perhaps the opening adagio might have had a larger treatment, and the scherzo have been taken at a pace somewhat less rapid, but the results as a whole were so excellent as to condone slight blemishes. At the next concert the programme will be Schubert's Symphony in C major, No. 6 (first time); Beethoven's Concerto for pianoforte in G major; Brahms's Hungarian Dances, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" Overture. The pianist will be Miss Mary E. Garlicks.

Sardis

PICTURES FROM THE ORIENT.

The Composer thinks it well to state that these pieces owe their origin to a special prompting. In fact they were written during the reading of Rückert's Makamen (narrations after the Arabic of Hariri).

The book's droll hero, Abu Seid, who might be compared to the German Eulenspiegel,—only that the former is presented in a far more noble and poetic aspect,—as well as the figure of his honorable friend Hareth, would haunt the Composer's mind while he was engaged in the work; which fact may account for the singular character of several of the musical pieces.

Farther than this, no definite situations have floated before him during the composition of the first five pieces; and only the last may pass, perhaps, for an echo of the last Makame, in which we see the hero close his merry life in sorrow and repentance.

Sixth Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall Saturday night, the programme being as follows:

Overture—"Magic Flute".....Mozart
Pastoral from the Christmas Oratorio.....Joh. Seb. Bach
Pictures from the Orient, op. 66.....Schumann
Overture—"Ossian".....Gade
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 38.....Beethoven

At the age of four Mozart wrote tunes, at twelve he could not find his equal on the harpsichord, and the professors of Europe stood aghast at one who improvised fugues on a given theme, and then took a ride-a-cock-horse on his father's walking stick. The rest of Mozart's life can be compared to nothing but a torch burning out rapidly in the wind. Unwearied alike as a composer and as an artist, he kept pouring forth symphonies, sonatas and operas. Disease could not shake his nerve as an executant, and the hand of death found him unwilling to relinquish the pen of the ready writer. The year 1785 is marked by the six celebrated quartettes dedicated to Haydn. "I declare to you," exclaimed the old man to Mozart's father, upon hearing them, "before God and on the faith of an honest man, that your son is the greatest composer who ever lived." In 1786 "The Marriage of Figaro" was produced, and in 1787 "Don Giovanni" was written for his favorite public at Prague. The overture of "The Magic Flute" has an historical origin. Joseph II., Emperor of Austria, was not only a good musician, but he used also to protect the arts. One evening the celebrated pianist and composer, Clementi, the author of "Gradus ad Parnassum," performed one of his sonatas before the Emperor, who was not only charmed with the execution, but calling Mozart, who was at that time pianist of his Court, he asked if he had noticed that the first part of the sonata was elaborated on a theme of four first bars. Finding it very ingenious and a true tour de force, "Sir," answered Mozart, "I promise to Your Majesty to make a whole overture of the first bar of this sonata." He was finishing in these moments his "Zauberflöte." He took the first bar of Clementi's sonata to make the overture to his opera, and that is how he produced this masterwork, the performance of which on Saturday evening was much admired, and which was given with a rare perfection. It will scarcely be believed that all this time Mozart was in the greatest want of money. His works were miserably paid for. He was struggling with poverty, and when they brought him the rich appointment of organist to the Cathedral of St. Stephen, for which he had been longing all his life, when managers besieged his door with handfuls of gold, summoning him to compose something for them, it was all too late. He lay with swollen limbs and burning head. On a stormy December morning in 1793 through the deserted streets of Vienna, amid snow and hail, and unaccompanied by a single friend, the body of Mozart was hastily borne with fifteen others to the common burial ground of the poor.

Bach's Pastoral is like a true idylle, breathing the calmness of the fields on a summer night. Its instrumentation answers perfectly to the title of the work, and the wind instruments gave it with the greatest delicacy. Schumann's Pictures from the Orient is a charming and melodious work which cannot be heard indifferently, but why it is called from the Orient while it would be as well called Pictures from Oil City or from Texas is difficult to see, as it is without any local color. Oriental music possesses quite a particular scale; its characteristic point is an exceedingly slow movement, and it is nearly always in a minor key. To have a true idea of Oriental music it is only necessary to hear "The Desert" of Felicien David, who transports us as by magic to this poetic region, full of the aromatic exhalations of rich vases, making us assist in the pilgrimage through the desert. There is the true Oriental poetry, with its vivacious and picturesque colors of the native music.

Schumann's work combines a very pleasant melody with very fine effects of instrumentation, but the beginning suggests somewhat Beethoven's march entitled "Les Ruines d'Athene," and in the middle of the work may be found four complete bars of the Mozart Symphony in G minor. The Overture of Gade (Ossian) is of a very original style, perfectly developed in its ensemble. The theme in minor is of great effect, full of energy and fire.

Of Beethoven's symphony it might be enough to say that its author was the greatest symphonist of the past and of the present. It is because Beethoven's music takes emotion fairly in hand, disciplines it, expresses its depressions in order to remove them; renders with terrible accuracy even its insanity and incoherence in order to give relief through such expressions, and restores calm; flinches not from the tender and the passionate; and stoops to pity, and becomes a very angel in sorrow, that we place Beethoven's name in the first rank and allow no names to stand before his. Of the programme Saturday night it is necessary to say that the tempo of the allegro was much too quick, especially in the principal theme and in the reply played by the bassoons and repeated by violins. In the scherzo the violins were terribly in a hurry. Some of them did not play in the proper tempo. These excellent artists must not confuse quickness with energy. The seventh concert will be given on Saturday evening, with the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon. Miss Mary E. Garlicks, pianist, will be the soloist, and the following programme will be given: Symphony in C major, No. 6, Schubert; concerto for pianoforte in G major, No. 4, op. 58, Beethoven; Hungarian dances, Brahms; overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There was an excellent audience. The programme was entirely orchestral, the services of a soloist having been dispensed with. The performances opened with Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," the allegro of which was taken at such a breakneck pace that the character and dignity of the work were wholly lost. It was Mr. Gericke's first serious mistake, but it was a very bad one, and was remarkable in view of the excellent judgment he has invariably shown on all other occasions. It was followed by Franz's charming arrangement of the Pastoral from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, which was delicately and artistically played. After this came Reinecke's arrangement of Schumann's "Pictures from the Orient," op. 66, which are scored for orchestra with great skill, taste and sympathy with the composer's feeling. These sketches lend themselves easily to instrumental treatment and were admirably interpreted. But is not Mr. Gericke giving too many arrangements of piano works? At the fourth concert we had Liszt's meddlesome interference with the andante from the Beethoven Trio; at the fifth concert we had the same arranger's transcription for orchestra of Schubert's March in B-minor, and at the concert of last night we had two more arrangements. Surely there is enough fine music written expressly for the orchestra, that has not yet been heard here, to make these transcriptions unnecessary. Gade's noble "Ossian" overture had an exceptionally broad and impressive reading, and was grandly performed. The whole ended with Beethoven's second symphony, which was sympathetically read and played. Perhaps the opening adagio might have had a larger treatment, and the scherzo have been taken at a pace somewhat less rapid, but the results as a whole were so excellent as to condone slight blemishes. At the next concert the programme will be Schubert's Symphony in C major, No. 8 (first time); Beethoven's Concerto for pianoforte in G major; Brahms's Hungarian Dances, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" Overture. The pianist will be Miss Mary E. Garlicks.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sixth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Mozart. Overture to "The Magic Flute."
Bach. Pastoral from the Christmas Oratorio.
[Additional parts by Robert Franz.]
Schumann. Pictures from the Orient, Op. 66.
[Scored by Carl Reinecke.]
Gade. Overture, "Reminiscences of Ossian."
Beethoven. Symphony No. 2, in D, Op. 36.

A symphony concert without solos is a thing warmly to be welcomed now and then, for sounder reasons than the one of mere novelty. No doubt, the prevailing fashion is the better one in the long run, everything considered—the preference of an unquestionable majority of the audience being a not unimportant item in this "everything"—but, for once in awhile, it is well to consider the taste of the minority to whom solo singers and players do not invariably seem to come straight from heaven. Surely there can not have been many in the audience last Saturday evening who very sorely missed the customary solos; or, if there was a feeling that the concert lacked something of liveliness, it was probably due to another cause. Certainly the first part of the concert was somehow wanting in focus. Schumann's "Pictures from the Orient," which, from their position on the programme, should have formed this focus of musical interest, did not produce the effect that might have been expected from them. It is no indignity to these charming compositions themselves, nor to the admirable style in which they were played, to say that they fell decidedly flat upon the audience. And let it be said at once that these pieces, given in the shape they were, presented points of quite exceptional interest; only they were far more interesting than they were enjoyable. Indeed the most interesting thing about them was, perhaps, the very fact that they proved so ineffective. Arranging orchestral works for the pianoforte is a process, the dangers and limitations of which are universally appreciated; they stare one in the face. But it were well to consider carefully the dangers that are inherent in the opposite process, arranging pianoforte works for orchestra. If these four-hand compositions were to be scored for orchestra at all, there is probably no one in the world whom one would have judged fitter for the task than Carl Reinecke, a man of unquestioned musicianship, a clever handler of the orchestra, and one who has long been known as almost a Schumann specialist. Certainly Reinecke has performed his task of instrumentation with unexceptionable skill and good taste. Viewed technically, his work is better done than Schumann himself would have done it. But, curiously enough, Reinecke's admirable scoring in this case leads one to appreciate the adequacy of Schumann's peculiar treatment of the orchestra more keenly than almost anything else. Speaking personally, we never before felt what a fine sense of orchestral coloring Schumann had. Great skill in handling the orchestra he evidently had not, especially when judged by modern standards; he was no virtuoso in the art of instrumentation. But he had the very keenest sense of just what orchestral coloring exactly suited his own music, and he had technical skill enough to obtain this coloring, or at least a fair indication of it. What fault one may find with Schumann's orchestration in general, must rest wholly on his imperfect knowledge of how to write for instruments in a manner entirely congenial to the players, and so as to make everything sound perfectly smooth and clear. In a word, his only weakness lay in the technical part. But his inner orchestral sense, so to speak, was singularly fine, and quite as individual as any other phase of his genius. His scoring might often have been better done, but its spirit fitted the spirit of his compositions to a T. Now, in listening to these little pieces scored by Reinecke, the first impression was one of pure delight. One felt that here, at last, was something of Schumann's written for the orchestra with all the finished skill of a complete master of the art. The beautiful quality of tone, above all the perfect and unwonted clearness with which every phrase stood out, the crystal transparency through which the often complex harmonic web was made to reveal all its secrets, filled one with admiration. But soon enough a feeling of uneasiness came over one; something seemed wrong, and out of joint; the music did not, somehow, sound like Schumann. One had to glance once more at the programme to make sure what he was listening to. The trouble was that, with all its rare beauty, the spirit, the soul, even the manner of Reinecke's instrumentation was utterly un-Schumannesque. Schumann's music spoke no longer in its own vernacular, but in some strange dialect. The transcription turned out to be really a translation, in which much of the peculiar, personal flavor of the original was lost. But, after all, this was not the most serious bar to the enjoyableness of these "Pictures from the Orient;" the trouble was more deeply rooted. The form of the compositions is too small, too homely, as it were, to bear orchestral treatment at all. The matter seemed dwarfed by the vehicle. And here we come to the chief danger of arranging pianoforte pieces for orchestra. The first question to ask in such cases is always, "Does the composition itself contain material enough, and especially is this material presented in sufficiently large and fully developed a form to bear the weight of full orchestral dress?" If not, the composition inevitably will appear puny and ineffective.

There was much that was admirable in the way in which the delightful Bach Pastoral was played. So good a performance of it has surely not been given here before. Yet, good as it was, even better may be looked for in future. The orchestra had got only to the point of just conquering the immense difficulties of the music, but had not got to overcoming them with absolute ease and security. The thing sounded uneasy, and one could not help being on the alert for the slips, which, to be sure, did not come, but which one felt might come at any moment. In strong contrast to this was the wholly beautiful and finished playing of the Gade overture, and the triumphant dash and brilliancy with which the overture to "The Magic Flute" was given. Yet, for this last-named work, it must be said that all the clean-cut perfection, brilliancy and unquestionable effectiveness of the performance could not reconcile one to the lightning tempo at which Mr. Gericke took the Allegro. Such a tempo is conceivable only as a means or showing off the virtuosity of an orchestra; it is difficult to find anything in the composition itself to suggest it.

The second symphony was, upon the whole, very well played, albeit that the performance was not quite up to the present high standard of our orchestra. It sounded a little as if the symphony had been somewhat sacrificed to the rest of the programme at rehearsals. Here is another argument in the hands of those who are fond of solos! The Larghetto, in spite of the by no means slow tempo at which it was taken, sounded at times heavy in the phrasing; one did not always find in it that buoyancy which is the birthright of triple time. That the orchestra did not fall into the same error in the far more difficult Pastoral of Bach is curious, when one considers the more patently cantabile character of the themes in Beethoven's slow movement.

The next programme is—

Schubert. Symphony in C major, No. 6.
(First time.)

Beethoven. Concerto for pianoforte in G major, No. 4,
op. 58.

Brahms. Hungarian Dances.

Wagner. Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Miss Mary E. Garlicks will be the pianist.

MUSIC. Continued

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

It was quite an innovation to listen last night, to a symphony concert without any soloist whatever, and yet this is a proceeding strictly in line with the style of the concerts. We should like to have the influence of the soloist at these concerts, give place to a greater interest in the symphony itself.

Last night the symphony was the second Beethoven. This work is always interesting, not only intrinsically, but as showing the advance made from the first symphony, and as establishing the scherzo form and doing away with the rather monotonous minuet. But for all that, the true Beethoven is first revealed in the next—the "Heroic"—Symphony. The performance of the work was a good, and even a notable one. The ensemble throughout was perfect, and although we should have liked the first portion of the work somewhat slower, the tempi generally were well chosen and elastic. Above all it was made clear in the Scherzo that the orchestra can give crescendo and diminuendo effects better than ever before. We can especially praise the clearness of the horns in the second movement, and the excellent balance of the wood wind throughout. The first number on the programme did not please quite as well. To take the contrafrontal figures of the "Magic Flute" overture at so rapid a pace seemed to destroy much of the meaning and beauty of Mozart's work. The other overture, per contra,—Gade's "Ossian"—was superbly played. The brasses gave their majestic theme against the heavy bow strokes of the strings, in splendid style, and the contrasts of martial pomp with wierd melancholy, merely finely drawn and not exaggerated. The coda was given with absolute perfection of shading. The remainder of the programme consisted of "arrangements." It might be charged that there is no necessity of using "arranged" pieces when so many original orchestral compositions are at hand, but when these works are scored by such conservative masters as Robert Franz and Carl Reinecke they have a value of their own. The Pastoral from Bach's Christmas Oratorio was quaint and delicious with its constantly piping woodwind and its flavor of English horn and oboe. The "Pictures from the Orient," by Schumann, had a most romantic flavor, and were in fine contrast with each other. The march rhythms of the first, with a rhythmic sprinkling of bass drum, and the mournful, plaintive character of the finale were given with all due effect, and the absence of all rigidity in the tempo, showed that Mr. Gericke can use his orchestra as a player uses his instrument. That this is appreciated by the public was evidenced not only by the liberal and hearty applause, but by the large size of the audience which on this occasion was not attracted by the claims of any soloist, but came solely to hear the orchestra.

SIXTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The symphony concert in Music Hall on Saturday evening was given without a soloist. Well, why not? In such cities as Berlin, Leipzig, Dresden and Vienna people are supposed to attend symphony concerts, not to witness a display of virtuosity, but to listen to music for its own sake. Soloists in such affairs are of secondary consideration. That the public should have its primary school of concerts we do not deny, but it were not to the credit of Boston's musical reputation if a series of strictly classical symphony concerts cannot be as well supported here as abroad. Such a plan, too, promotes the interests of competition. Now is just the time for a popular series of concerts to be established in Boston, a series that shall so contrast with Mr. Higginson's most worthy enterprise as to call forth an extensive and equally divided support from the public. It is evident that Herr Gericke is striving to preserve the identity of a symphony concert series, by presenting such programmes as require a cultivated taste for music in order to be enjoyed. Such a plan in any community will, if properly offset, tend to raise the standard of musical appreciation. We do not argue that every symphony concert should be given without a soloist simply to preserve the identity of a high artistic enterprise; all we claim is that in such affairs audiences should not have their attention too closely confined to the skill of the performer. The cause of music is not best served by so concentrating the attention of its patrons, or by attending symphony concerts for such a purpose as has been described. The success of music in Germany has been owing to the supremacy of musical creation from the symphony down to the folk song; and this supremacy has not detracted from a just regard for the public performer of either high or low degree; but the performer in Germany is more appreciated as a medium, while in this country the reverse has too long been the case. In Berlin and Leipzig classical concerts are attended by sincere and appreciative audiences; by audiences who are just as ready to enjoy the music of Strauss, Suppe, etc., as we are in this country, but who on the other hand are never given to professing a love for such music as they are incapable of comprehending. It is not likely that any considerable portion of the audience in Music Hall last Saturday evening enjoyed the concert any the more because of the absence of a soloist; yet the music performed was undoubtedly more appreciated than would otherwise have been the case. The tribute of a symphony concert audience should centre in the creative ability shown; while the soloist may none the less be admired for any high service noticeable in his performance.

We have by no means intended to depreciate such music as can be enjoyed by a vast majority of people. Such dislike as overgrown amateurs are wont to express for a worthy class of popular music is absurd; and it were equally absurd not to admit that virtuosity, when not interfering with or intruding upon the domain of art, can be worthily enjoyed.

But all such acknowledgments do not effect the advisability of maintaining in Boston a strictly classical series of symphony concerts, now that through the princely munificence of Mr. Higginson our city is afforded as fine an orchestra as can be named has at last placed it in competent hands, and with such a sum total of advantages as can contribute the highest service to the cause of classical music. No especial lack of interest was manifested in the referred to programme, most of which was rendered in accordance with the high standard of interpretation that Gericke has maintained here. Somewhat inconsistent with this standard was the performance of the overture to the "Magic Flute," where there was a race against time which was won by the conductor at a slight expense of propriety. Otherwise the concert was artistically without flaw. Schumann's "Pictures from the Orient," arranged by Reinecke, were rendered with great charm and refinement of feeling. The second symphony received a broad and in the main conservative treatment, and good performances were given of the Pastoral from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, and of Gade's Ossian overture. At the concert to-night the soloist for the fourth concerto of Beethoven will be Miss Emma Sarlicks.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Sixth Programme of the Present Season's Series.

The sixth of the present season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with the following programme:

Overture—"Magic Flute".....Mozart
Pastoral from the Christmas Oratorio, Joh. Seb. Bach
Pictures from the Orient, op. 66.....Schumann
Overture—"Ossian".....Gade
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36.....Beethoven

With such a programme, the absence of the usual soloist was easily pardoned, and the concert, as a whole, proved one of the most interesting of the season. The beauty of the Mozart overture is hardly appreciated when given in the opera house, with the noise attending the entrance of late comers, and it is so seldom heard without such accompaniments that its selection gave a peculiar pleasure, especially as it was played with fine effect throughout. The quaint simplicity of the "Pastoral" from Bach's oratorio made a pleasing contrast with the opening overture, and the instrumentation given its orchestral setting by Robert Franz is so entirely in keeping with the character of the composition that its presentation afforded another source of enjoyment to the listener. It was heard for the first time, and was played with admirable taste. Schumann's "Pictures from the Orient" cannot be so generously commended. The programme afforded the information that "the composer thinks it well to state that these pieces owe their origin to a special prompting. In fact, they were written during the reading of Rückert's 'Makamen' (narrations after the Arabic of Hariri)." Schumann's lack of poetic feeling and imagination is clearly shown in these compositions, for, though they have merit, they have not in the slightest degree the eastern color or oriental characteristics which would be given such a series of "Pictures" by a composer open to the influences likely to be felt by a more emotional nature under the circumstances. It is only necessary to recall the music of Felecia David in his "Desert" to realize how little the German musician has caught the true spirit of oriental music in these compositions. The genius of Carl Reinecke is, however so distinctly shown in the arrangement of the "Pictures" that their presentation proved a very pleasing novelty. The "Ossian" overture, one of the best evidences of Gade's talents, was given a very satisfactory performance, and made a brilliant ending to the first part of the programme. The reading of the symphony was excellent in the opening movement, the scherzo and the finale, but less satisfying in the larghetto and the opening portion of the last movement, the slow movement being hurried so as to mar the beauty of its leading theme, and the unsteadiness of the strings interfering with the enjoyment of the first part of the allegro. The audience was nearly as large as that of the preceding week, and quite as enthusiastic upon occasions.

94

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

A Boston correspondent of the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser writes:

The departure of Henschel and the appearance of Herr Gericke from Vienna as leader of the Boston symphony concerts has added much new interest and enthusiasm to Boston music. As an accompanist or song composer Henschel was extremely liked here, and no one was more popular than he and his wife when they appeared as vocal artists. But as a leader of the largest orchestra in Boston, or as an arranger of programmes, he was not a success, at least after the first year, although the concerts were crowded, as might be expected from the extremely popular prices.

People began to wonder whether Mr. Higginson could not get a better man as the director of his concerts. So when it was announced that a German had been obtained—not Hans Richter, as rumor at one time reported—much curiosity was shown. The first few concerts of the series have passed off, and every one is delighted with the new leader. His genuine understanding and reading of the great masters fills a long felt want, and he certainly knows how to arrange a programme. Mr. Higginson is greatly to be congratulated on having obtained such a man, and Herr Gericke can flatter himself that he has filled a difficult position exceedingly well.

In connection with this "renaissance," as it were, of music two courses of lectures on music have been started, one by Prof. J. K. Paine of Harvard, the author of the Spring Symphony and the music to the Greek play, the other by Mr. B. J. Lang the organist, and these are proving themselves immensely popular. It could not be amiss to start them in any city where there is a music-loving people, for they are not difficult to prepare, and open out a new world to those who are used to going to concerts simply to hear sounds and forget the spirit that prompts the sound. M. Lang calls his course of twelve lectures "Symphony Concert Lessons," does not pretend to make them amusing or popular, but at the same time they prove most interesting. He is not at all used to public speaking; his manner is bad, and he loses much time in hesitating; at the same time his subject is so interesting and his illustrations on the piano so effective that he holds an audience of 250 most completely for a couple of hours every two weeks. One advantage he gets from calling them lessons is that he can insist on people's coming promptly and staying all through. Boston people have a great habit of leaving before the finish of any entertainment, concert, lecture, theatre, or even church, so that it is a great relief when the lecturer can insist on all remaining or else not coming.

Mr. Lang's scheme is to take the concert programme of the following Saturday, take up each number, analyze it, play it in detail and go through the symphony very carefully, so that one gets a most excellent idea of the motives, themes and general purport of all that is to be given. Then, if one goes to the public rehearsals as well as the concerts, by Sunday one has a very clear idea of a great symphony, an overture and several other pieces.

Professor Paine's lectures are on the history and general development of music with vocal and instrumental illustrations. He has for several years given a similar course at Harvard, but without the opportunities for illustration he now has. At present he is engaged with old Ambrosian and Gregorian chants, soon to take up the beginnings of the "canticus firmus" and counterpoint, the rise and development of the Flemish masters, and so on down through all the prominent masters and schools to the present day. He, too, has a poor manner for lecturing; but, as in Mr. Lang's case, the illustrations carry the lecture along so that it is most attractive.

Besides these lectures there has been started an orchestral club, in which amateurs can play with professionals either duets, trios, or even in an orchestra. Great proficiency is not required of those entering, and by taking part as well as hearing whatever else may be going on, one has a wonderful opportunity of becoming closely acquainted with a great deal of music. Altogether, it can be truly said that Boston is to be much envied by those elsewhere who are fond of music in any direction.

MR. LANG'S LESSONS.—The seventh of Mr. Lang's concert lessons in the current symphony programme was given at the usual place Thursday afternoon. No mention has been made of the two preceding lessons owing to the Traveller representative being less ubiquitous than usual. An attempt to gain from Mr. Lang himself any account of what he said at these lessons or what anybody did, etc., was entirely useless; his modesty prevailed, and the seeker for facts could only be content with the hearsay information that the lesson where Mr. Perabo played and the Schumann symphony was discussed, was the most interesting of any; that the one where Mr. Tucker played Beethoven's E-flat concerto, and the especial function of the strings of the orchestra were discussed, was also of especial value to Mr. Lang's constituency. On Thursday the wood-wind division of the orchestra was the text for the spoken part of the lesson. The value of the parts of flutes, oboes, clarionets and bassoons in the ensemble of the orchestra; the need of solo artists for the chief performer of each pair, especially of the oboe, was represented with that especially characteristic manner for which Mr. Lang is noted. Mr. Lang personally regrets that our Music Hall is so vast that nothing "sounds for what it is," and—save the brasses for what they are worth. He would have a large orchestra play in a hall with equally good acoustics, which would seat only about 1200 people. Mr. Lang incidentally compared the great advantages at present offered in our city as against a German town like, say, Dresden, which has perhaps six symphony concerts this season. Berlin even has less than we, and it is only in Leipzig that the weekly symphony concert is assured. To illustrate the potency of the wood-wind instruments properly placed, Mr. Lang asked Messrs. Heindl, Hackebarth, Strasser, Bernhardt and Eller to play a quintet by Reichardt for flute, horn, clarinet, oboe and bassoon. It was a novelty, and proved interesting. Passing comment was given the works to be performed Saturday evening, and of these Mr. Lang and Mrs. Alma Faunce Smith played the Goldmark "Rustic Wedding" suite.

The Cecilia at its regular rehearsal Thursday evening took up the study of an almost unknown work of Mendelssohn's—"Camacho's Wedding." Though an opera, it will be performed by the club as concert music. Mendelssohn when quite young was urged to write an opera, and although "Camacho's Wedding" is full of delightful music, yet its author would not allow its publication, and it is thought but one performance of the work has ever been given—that in Berlin. Mr. Lang owns an orchestral score of the work, but no piano score has yet been prepared. It is owing largely to his suggestion that the club has decided to give it; hectograph parts have been prepared with an admirable English translation by Miss A. L. Beandy.

The only orchestra that came under my observation in Boston was that lately directed by Herr Henschel, and at present conducted by Herr Gericke. It is a body composed almost entirely—perhaps I should say exclusively—of Germans, and maintains its frequent Concerts in a large measure through the liberality of a wealthy amateur, whose devotion to the art reminds one of the princely patrons of old. I attended one of the performances under Herr Gericke's bâton in the noble Music Hall, of which Boston is justly proud. There was a large and intelligent audience, evidently made up from many classes of people—if there be more than one class in so democratic a land. I was struck with the business-like aspect of the Hall, the idea conveyed being not that of a dress fête, but of an ordinary occasion for which ordinary attire sufficed. The scene, therefore, was not what we in England sometimes call "brilliant." It appealed rather to mental recognition of a gathering with a higher purpose than show. In German fashion, Gericke had his men on a level platform, he himself mounting a rostrum to command them, and becoming much more conspicuous than a conductor ever ought to be. Othello, according to one of his attendants, loved "music that may not be heard." Similarly, I should prefer conductors that are never seen; a gesticulating person right before the eye being, besides an absurd, a distracting spectacle. German Chefs d'orchestre, unhappily, cling to the level platform and their own "bad eminence" with a firmness worthy of a better cause. The Boston orchestra falls far short, numerically, of that presided over by Mr. Thomas, but it is large enough for all reasonable purposes, and contains a lot of good men, fit, like Wellington's Peninsular troops, to "go anywhere and do anything." This was clearly shown by the performance of the overture to "Die Zauberflöte"—a very fair test-piece, as all amateurs know. I can honestly say that I never heard a better rendering of Mozart's work either in England or on the Continent. It had wonderful qualities of precision, delicacy, and shading—was, in fact, as good as it could be. Some of the Boston critics, I observed, complained of the tempo as too fast. On that point I was unable to agree with them. Gericke took the overture at precisely the rate of speed to which we in Europe are accustomed. The next two pieces in the programme were, I regret to say, arrangements, by Franz and Reinecke respectively, of Bach's Pastoral ("Christmas Oratorio"), and Schumann's "Oriental Pictures" (Op. 66)—these last having, as I need scarcely add, been written for the pianoforte. Why the conductor elected to present perversions instead of legitimate orchestral music it is impossible to imagine without thinking hard things of his taste. The Boston critics spoke sharply on the matter, and they were right. Gade's "Ossian" overture and Beethoven's Symphony, No. 2, completed the programme. In the Danish master's work, as in that of Mozart, the orchestra appeared to great advantage, giving an interpretation which faithfully conveyed the spirit of the music as well as its form. The Beethoven Symphony, on the other hand, showed a falling off, its performance leaving something to desire in various respects. Taken as a whole, the Concert deserved high rank, and Boston should be glad and grateful that a spirited citizen gives such opportunities for culture of the best class.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

For the first time since the establishment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of their concerts—that of Saturday evening, the sixth of the present course—was given without any soloist. But we do not know that the programme was any the less interesting on that account, for although, of course, vocal music gives real relief in an orchestral programme, the performance of an instrumental number, as a concerto, for instance, is, after all, but a variation in form and not in kind.

At this concert the symphony was, as it seems to us, the least successful number. It was Beethoven's second, a work in which beauty and fluency are not equally disposed throughout, nor is equally sustained interest apt to attend all the four movements. There was some excellent playing in it, and among other things we noted with pleasure how Mr. Gericke obtained the quickness of his allegri without driving them into loudness, and gave gayety without boisterousness; the larghetto lacked something in warmth, but was calm and smooth.

The larger of the two novelties was Carl Reinecke's arrangement of that set of piano pieces which their author, Schumann, called "Pictures from the Orient," and attributed to the effect left upon his mind by the reading of Rückert's "Makamen," or series of tales after Arabic originals. We quite agree with the remark of the Saturday Evening Gazette that it is easily possible to make and play too many orchestral arrangements of pianoforte music, especially when the authors drawn upon were themselves masters of orchestra as well as piano, and might reasonably be supposed to know which united with their thought. But apart from this consideration (which we commend with our indorsement to Mr. Gericke), the pieces themselves are not particularly suggestive of the East. Not that we should look in Schumann—even if he had made himself the orchestral score—for the clash and jangle and fantastic forms of "Le Désert" or of a "Suite Algérienne," but that the poetry and fancy do not closely correspond to the abstract qualities of Oriental character or recall the material features of Oriental atmosphere and life, as they are generally conceived. These "Pictures" are, indeed, a little out of the common course of thought, and have odd contrasts of rhythm and of phrase; their harmonic treatment is often unexpected, although the device of abruptly ending a minor passage with a major resolution loses something of its effect after many repetitions; there are in the opening vivace and the poco marcato, which comes somewhat later, hints of pompous dances and marches, broken in upon now and then by irrelevant lighter phrases that might serve for the irregular accompaniment of the jester or the mime. The andantino is sweet and smooth, and might suit for a love song anywhere, especially when the violoncello takes up the air. But, as a whole, the suite was not particularly effective, for all the pleasant interest that attached to it.

But no qualification detracted from full enjoyment of the tender, tranquil pastorale from Sebastian Bach's Christmas oratorio, which was also given for the first time, and was listened to in perfect silence. Franz has sufficient sympathy and modesty to fill out the narrower scores of Bach with dignity and justice, and all through this arrangement there were charming effects of the wooden wind floating along over the well subordinated basses. The melody is as softly smooth as Handel's best, and it was appreciatively read.

The two overtures also gave great satisfaction. The one, with which the concert began, was Mozart's "Magic Flute," read at first with fine effect of accent and with a real majesty of tone in the brasses, but toward the close with a speed which somewhat diminished the value of the subject. The other was Gade's "Ossian," the delivery of which was, to our thinking, the gem of the evening. All its ranging phases of mystery, of conflict, of high outcry, of grave, deep organ tones, of pastoral placidity, of splendid march, or of "peace to the souls of the heroes," were given in turn with fine poetic interpretation and admirable technical treatment.

At the next concert there will be a soloist—Miss Mary E. Garlicks, of whose ability we must plead ignorance—who is to play Beethoven's fourth piano concerto, in G major, opus 58. The symphony will be Schubert's sixth, in C major, which is new to Boston, and the other numbers will be one of Brahms's Hungarian dances and Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser." The symphony will begin the concert and the overture will end it.

WITHOUT A SOLOIST.

An Innovation in the Symphony Concert Programmes—The Experiment a Success.

The popularity of the symphony concerts evidently does not depend upon the presence on the programme of a soloist, although the soloist usually takes the cream of the applause. Last night, for the first time since the Symphony orchestra was founded, the concert was an orchestral one pure and simple, and yet the applause was quite as hearty and the enjoyment of the evening's entertainment apparently fully as great. The novelty was R. Schumann's "Pictures from the Orient" (op. 46), arranged by Carl Reinecke. It proved to be a decidedly Schumannesque composition, bewitching and graceful throughout, and was very greatly liked by the large audience. Also for the first time a curious bit of writing arranged by Robert Franz from John Seb. Bach's Christmas oratorio was played. The effect was exceedingly original and pleasing. Gade's Ossian overture and Mozart's prelude to the "Magic Flute" were given. The symphony was Beethoven's second. Mr. Gericke's reading of the great master of orchestral composition is evidently to be different from that which we have previously had in Boston. He took the tempi throughout at a considerably more rapid rate than his predecessor at least. The orchestra was in splendid condition from first to last, and their work was everything that could be desired. The programme next week will be:

Schubert. Symphony in C major, No. 6. (First time.)
Beethoven. Concerto for pianoforte in G major.
Brahms. Hungarian dances.
Wagner. Overture (Tannhäuser).
Soloist, Miss Mary E. Garlicks.

Globe

The only orchestra that came under my observation in Boston was that lately directed by Herr Henschel, and at present conducted by Herr Gericke. It is a body composed almost entirely—perhaps I should say exclusively—of Germans, and maintains its frequent Concerts in a large measure through the liberality of a wealthy amateur, whose devotion to the art reminds one of the princely patrons of old. I attended one of the performances under Herr Gericke's bâton in the noble Music Hall, of which Boston is justly proud. There was a large and intelligent audience, evidently made up from many classes of people—if there be more than one class in so democratic a land. I was struck with the business-like aspect of the Hall, the idea conveyed being not that of a dress fête, but of an ordinary occasion for which ordinary attire sufficed. The scene, therefore, was not what we in England sometimes call "brilliant." It appealed rather to mental recognition of a gathering with a higher purpose than show. In German fashion, Gericke had his men on a level platform, he himself mounting a rostrum to command them, and becoming much more conspicuous than a conductor ever ought to be. Othello, according to one of his attendants, loved "music that may not be heard." Similarly, I should prefer conductors that are never seen; a gesticulating person right before the eye being, besides an absurd, a distracting spectacle. German Chefs d'orchestre, unhappily, cling to the level platform and their own "bad eminence" with a firmness worthy of a better cause. The Boston orchestra falls far short, numerically, of that presided over by Mr. Thomas, but it is large enough for all reasonable purposes, and contains a lot of good men, fit, like Wellington's Peninsular troops, to "go anywhere and do anything." This was clearly shown by the performance of the overture to "Die Zauberflöte"—a very fair test-piece, as all amateurs know. I can honestly say that I never heard a better rendering of Mozart's work either in England or on the Continent. It had wonderful qualities of precision, delicacy, and shading—was, in fact, as good as it could be. Some of the Boston critics, I observed, complained of the tempo as too fast. On that point I was unable to agree with them. Gericke took the overture at precisely the rate of speed to which we in Europe are accustomed. The next two pieces in the programme were, I regret to say, arrangements, by Franz and Reinecke respectively, of Bach's Pastoral ("Christmas Oratorio"), and Schumann's "Oriental Pictures" (Op. 66)—these last having, as I need scarcely add, been written for the pianoforte. Why the conductor elected to present perversions instead of legitimate orchestral music it is impossible to imagine without thinking hard things of his taste. The Boston critics spoke sharply on the matter, and they were right. Gade's "Ossian" overture and Beethoven's Symphony, No. 2, completed the programme. In the Danish master's work, as in that of Mozart, the orchestra appeared to great advantage, giving an interpretation which faithfully conveyed the spirit of the music as well as its form. The Beethoven Symphony, on the other hand, showed a falling off, its performance leaving something to desire in various respects. Taken as a whole, the Concert deserved high rank, and Boston should be glad and grateful that a spirited citizen gives such opportunities for culture of the best class.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

For the first time since the establishment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of their concerts—that of Saturday evening, the sixth of the present course—was given without any soloist. But we do not know that the programme was any the less interesting on that account, for although, of course, vocal music gives real relief in an orchestral programme, the performance of an instrumental number, as a concerto, for instance, is, after all, but a variation in form and not in kind.

At this concert the symphony was, as it seems to us, the least successful number. It was Beethoven's second, a work in which beauty and fluency are not equally disposed throughout, nor is equally sustained interest apt to attend all the four movements. There was some excellent playing in it, and among other things we noted with pleasure how Mr. Gericke obtained the quickness of his allegri without driving them into loudness, and gave gayety without boisterousness; the larghetto lacked something in warmth, but was calm and smooth.

The larger of the two novelties was Carl Reinecke's arrangement of that set of piano pieces which their author, Schumann, called "Pictures from the Orient," and attributed to the effect left upon his mind by the reading of Rückert's "Makamen," or series of tales after Arabic originals. We quite agree with the remark of the Saturday Evening Gazette that it is easily possible to make and play too many orchestral arrangements of pianoforte music, especially when the authors drawn upon were themselves masters of orchestra as well as piano, and might reasonably be supposed to know which united with their thought. But apart from this consideration (which we commend with our indorsement to Mr. Gericke), the pieces themselves are not particularly suggestive of the East. Not that we should look in Schumann—even if he had made himself the orchestral score—for the clash and jangle and fantastic forms of "Le Désert" or of a "Suite Algérienne," but that the poetry and fancy do not closely correspond to the abstract qualities of Oriental character or recall the material features of Oriental atmosphere and life, as they are generally conceived. These "Pictures" are, indeed, a little out of the common course of thought, and have odd contrasts of rhythm and of phrase; their harmonic treatment is often unexpected, although the device of abruptly ending a minor passage with a major resolution loses something of its effect after many repetitions; there are in the opening vivace and the poco marcato, which comes somewhat later, hints of pompous dances and marches, broken in upon now and then by irrelevant lighter phrases that might serve for the irregular accompaniment of the jester or the mime. The andantino is sweet and smooth, and might suit for a love song anywhere, especially when the violoncello takes up the air. But, as a whole, the suite was not particularly effective, for all the pleasant interest that attached to it.

But no qualification detracted from full enjoyment of the tender, tranquil pastorale from Sebastian Bach's Christmas oratorio, which was also given for the first time, and was listened to in perfect silence. Franz has sufficient sympathy and modesty to fill out the narrower scores of Bach with dignity and justice, and all through this arrangement there were charming effects of the wooden wind floating along over the well subordinated basses. The melody is as softly smooth as Händel's best, and it was appreciatively read.

The two overtures also gave great satisfaction. The one, with which the concert began, was Mozart's "Magic Flute," read at first with fine effect of accent and with a real majesty of tone in the brasses, but toward the close with a speed which somewhat diminished the value of the subject. The other was Gade's "Ossian," the delivery of which was, to our thinking, the gem of the evening. All its ranging phases of mystery, of conflict, of high outcry, of grave, deep organ tones, of pastoral placidity, of splendid march, or of "peace to the souls of the heroes," were given in turn with fine poetic interpretation and admirable technical treatment.

At the next concert there will be a soloist—Miss Mary E. Garlicks, of whose ability we must plead ignorance—who is to play Beethoven's fourth piano concerto, in G major, opus 58. The symphony will be Schubert's sixth, in C major, which is new to Boston, and the other numbers will be one of Brahms's Hungarian dances and Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser." The symphony will begin the concert and the overture will end it.

WITHOUT A SOLOIST.

An Innovation in the Symphony Concert Programmes—The Experiment a Success.

The popularity of the symphony concerts evidently does not depend upon the presence on the programme of a soloist, although the soloist usually takes the cream of the applause. Last night, for the first time since the Symphony orchestra was founded, the concert was an orchestral one pure and simple, and yet the applause was quite as hearty and the enjoyment of the evening's entertainment apparently fully as great. The novelty was R. Schumann's "Pictures from the Orient" (op. 46), arranged by Carl Reinecke. It proved to be a decidedly Schumannesque composition, bewitching and graceful throughout, and was very greatly liked by the large audience. Also for the first time a curious bit of writing arranged by Robert Franz from John Seb. Bach's Christmas oratorio was played. The effect was exceedingly original and pleasing. Gade's Ossian overture and Mozart's prelude to the "Magic Flute" were given. The symphony was Beethoven's second. Mr. Gericke's reading of the great master of orchestral composition is evidently to be different from that which we have previously had in Boston. He took the tempi throughout at a considerably more rapid rate than his predecessor at least. The orchestra was in splendid condition from first to last, and their work was everything that could be desired. The programme next week will be:

Schubert. Symphony in C major, No. 6. (First time.)
Beethoven. Concerto for pianoforte in G major.
Brahms. Hungarian dances.
Wagner. Overture (Tannhäuser).
Soloist, Miss Mary E. Garlicks.

Globe

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29TH, AT 8. P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUBERT,

SYMPHONY in C major, No 6.
Adagio.—Andante.—Scherzo (Presto).—
Allegro moderato.—
(First time.)

BEETHOVEN,

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE in G major,
No. 4, op. 58.
Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—Rondo.—

BRAHMS,

HUNGARIAN DANCES Nos. 1, 2, and 6.

WAGNER,

OVERTURE, (Tannhäuser.)

SOLOIST:

MISS MARY E. GARLICH.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.35 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE HUNGARIAN DANCES.

MUSIC. Continued

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

From Schubert to Wagner, from melody to dissonance, from flute pipings to trombone grumbles, this was the road over which the Symphony Orchestra travelled last night. It is not often that the critic has an opportunity to review the late Mr. Schubert, of Vienna, in a new work, at least new to America. The symphony of last night is numbered "six" in the series by Schubert, and is one that still remains in manuscript. The first half of Schubert's symphonies were scarcely intended for publication. The composer was a member of a little Bohemian musical club, which met Sunday afternoons to play string quartets, quintets, etc. As the numbers grew more ambitious works were attempted, and Schubert composed works for small orchestras, which were, at least, sinfoniettas. The symphony, without drums or trumpets, which Mr. Henschel produced from the manuscript a year ago was one of these, but this work was by no means as important as the symphony of last evening, which is the first which Schubert entitled "Grosse Sinfonie," although it has not the real characteristics of a great symphony. The work was played in Vienna many years ago—probably during the composer's life—and then was laid aside until resuscitated by Mr. Gericke. This occurred as follows: Schubert's brother possessed a whole chest full of the manuscripts of the master after his death, and this chest he presented to a rich Roumanian, named Dumba, who had befriended him. Until recently the Dumba family kept this chest without studying deeply into its contents, but recently Dr. Hans Richter and Mr. Gericke examined into it and unearthed many a treasure. The result is that a committee consisting of Brahms, Richter, and others are now examining the treasure trove, and Breitkopf & Hartel, the great German music publishers—who already possess many of Schubert's manuscripts—are preparing the first edition of all of Schubert's works, a task which will extend to the dimensions of an entire library.

The work is full of spontaneous melody, and has all the enchanting grace which one expects to find in Schubert. The first movement, however, recalls alternately Mozart and Weber. The flutes have much work to do in this movement—and they did it well—and all through the work the wood wind is prominent. But the second movement reveals the true Schubert, for here we find all the wealth of melody and poetry of Schubert's lieder. In fact this symphony has tunes enough in it to set up a regiment of modern symphonists for a few years in these days of anti-melodic development. In the second movement the strings did not play in absolutely united time. They may have been deceived by the seeming ease of the composition and neglected their usual care. The scherzo reminds one distinctly—yet without plagiarism—of Beethoven's treatment in scherzo forms. It has the brusque contrasts, the playful, skipping figures, followed by strong earnest phrases which the symphonic giant often used. The contrast between the body of the scherzo and the trio was very marked, and was excellently brought out by Mr. Gericke, and, save a slip in the strings, by his orchestra. The finale, however, is the only movement which gives the work a right to the title of "Great Symphony," for it is only here and there that one finds, not only melody and grace, but majestic development and grand working of the themes. The orchestra gave this with all possible power, and the symphony charmed, even if it did not always deeply impress.

Now followed the fourth piano concerto of Beethoven, played by a young lady new to Boston, called Miss Mary E. Garlicks. Even with the memory of Baermann's playing of this concerto strong upon us, we gladly record that the artist made a success. There were no slips to excuse, no blurred passages to condone. Everything was clear, well phrased and artistic. There was also the repose which showed the pianist of good method. No extreme exertion in octave work; steadiness and ease in wrist as well as finger action. The terrific cadenza by Von Bulow was perfectly rendered, and the pianist was always in time, yet without any rigidity of tempo. Yet one would have liked to have heard the pianist in some less exacting work, as regards power, at first. The last movement was not quite up to the high level of the first, and, although nothing of exhaustion was apparent, the end was not as triumphant as if the composition had closed with the first allegro. We hope to hear this faithful pianist, however, in more varied work that we may do more justice to her evident talent.

Three of Brahms's Hungarian dances followed. These were all characteristic. Tsiganj music, and the second one—especially in the oboe part—was excellently played. The last was not so perfect, the ensemble being faulty in many of the sudden changes of tempo. But who can demand that an orchestra of over seventy men shall give all the shadings, the grief, the joy, the delirium of a Hungarian Lassan and Friska. The writer of this has heard the Gipsies in the heart of Hungary play these tunes with an orchestra (strings) of only about fifteen, but those fifteen became practically one instrument, one excitement moved them all, and as the wild tune with a delirious accelerando neared its end, the frenzy became more like that of a set of dancing Dervishes than anything musical belonging to Europe.

This was the real spirit of Hungarian music. But of course we should not demand anything like this from the dress-coated musicians—at least not on symphony nights. And the slower, more expressive movements—for Hungarian music is as often pleading and tender, as wild and furious—were finely given.

But the fitting end of the concert was the "Tannhauser" overture. This work which has been played to death in Boston, became on this occasion practically a new composition, and, as Mr. Gericke has directed it under Wagner's own supervision, we presume that his reading is ex cathedra, and must be the correct one, as it is certainly the most effective. Many changes from former readings were apparent. Figures heretofore crushed under the weight of instrumentation, were dug out and became audible. The great violin figure was easily followed, and was begun slowly and clearly, becoming only gradually fast and furious. The brasses no longer were allowed to sweep everything before them but were obliged to shade even to a tender pianissimo at times, and all in all we can say that the "Tannhauser" overture, in its new dress became to the critic, the greatest surprise of this most intensely interesting concert.

MUSICAL. Garotte

Boston Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall, last night. The audience was a large one. The performances opened with a symphony in C major No. 6, by Schubert, a delightfully fresh, genial and fascinating work, overflowing with a wealth of delicate, graceful and refined melody; full of animal spirits and deliciously pleasing in effect. It is true that it frequently is at variance with ideas of symphonic dignity; in fact, it has but little of the character of a symphony beyond its form, but it is all very charming, very winning in its playful grace and in the sunny atmosphere that pervades it. There are in it enough themes to furnish out a dozen symphonies for modern composers. There is but little of the Schubert with whom we are most familiar except now and then in some sudden and exquisite harmonic changes and in a bit of tender melody. It is frequently more naive than are Haydn and Mozart in their most artless moods. It reflects the influences of both these masters, rarely of Beethoven, but occasionally, mirabile dictu of Rossini! Lack of space forbids a more detailed analysis of this work. We trust it may be given again. It was beautifully read and played, especially by the wood wind upon which it makes severe demands. The audience manifested great delight with the symphony, but not as much as it bestowed upon Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Brahms's "Hungarian Dances," especially the common-place No. 6, which received the most rapturous applause of the evening. The concert ended with one of the finest performances we have ever listened to—Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture. For richness of color, variety of effect, strong, consistent and impressive originality of reading, and artistic unity of conception, it may rank as the most brilliant of Mr. Gericke's achievements thus far. The soloist was Miss Mary E. Garlicks, a young artist of pleasing presence and modest mien. She played Beethoven's concerto for piano in G with a fluent and able technique. Her touch is firm, certain, and even; her scale runs are delightfully clear, and pearly, and her style is refined, and marked by discreet taste, artistic feeling and a graceful intelligence. Her reading of this concerto, though showing thought and excellent judgment in many essentials, was lacking, however, in strength, and her physical power was not quite equal, especially in the last movement to the force necessary for the production of the most desirable results. It was a brilliant and pleasing rather than a deep and impressive interpretation. There seemed at times to be a slight struggle between the artist and the conductor for mastery in respect to tempo. However that may be, the allegros were taken much too rapidly, and to the disadvantage of the soloist, who was apparently carried along, unwillingly, by the impetuosity imparted to the orchestra. Certainly in those portions of the concerto in which the latter played at any length without the soloist, the time was hurried beyond any precedent we can recall, and with an effect far from satisfactory. We hope to hear the artist again in Hummel, Mozart or Chopin, to whose works her style and her brilliant technique seems better adapted than they are to Beethoven. The instrument upon which she played was a superb Steinway of noble quality in purity of tone, sonority, richness and carrying power. The programme for the next concert will be Symphony in D, No. 2, Haydn; adagio and rondo from Paganini's violin concerto in D major; variations on a theme by Haydn, op. 56, by Brahms, and overture, scherzo, nocturne and wedding march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

A SCHUBERT SYMPHONY. Slide

First Performance in Boston Last Evening of One of the Composer's Earliest Works.

The chief novelty of last night's symphony concert, and indeed of the season so far, was the presentation of a not very well-known symphony of Franz Schubert's. Strangely enough Schubert's sixth symphony in C major does not appear to have had a hearing in Boston until last evening. Strangely, because there is certainly merit enough in the work to warrant an earlier performance. Mr. Henschell last year, going still farther back into the composer's adolescence, raked out a symphony of much less pleasing quality and decidedly inferior in worth. However, better late than never. The beauties of the sixth symphony lie on the surface. There is no occasion for a second thought or a contracted brow here. An ever-present, uninterrupted flow of melody greets the ear from the first bar to the last. It is certainly a magnificent work for a young man of 21. While no one could think of ranking it with the composer's great work in the same key (the ninth) or with the unfinished symphony in b flat, it is well deserving of an occasional place upon the programmes of our symphony concerts. It might not bear many repetitions, and to some ears undoubtedly the continued sweetness of the first two movements would soon become almost cloying. The scherzo is a splendid piece of work, but unfortunately its characteristics, its accentuation, its very modulations carry the mind back with a rush to the scherzo of the seventh symphony of Beethoven almost with the first notes. It hardly seems that so striking a resemblance could be the result of accident. A most generous amount of applause was bestowed upon the work by the very large audience. The two other purely instrumental numbers, Brahms's "Hungarian dances" and the overture to Tannhauser were also received with unusual favor, which they certainly richly deserved. A perfect storm of applause followed the performance of the latter work, which was one of the finest of the many that have been heard in this city. Miss Mary E. Garlicks was the soloist. She played Beethoven's G major concerto. After the broad and finished reading of this great work by Carl Boermann, so familiar to a symphony audience, the lady placed herself in a position to be very severely criticised. But she acquitted herself most creditably, and won the favor of her hearers. If there was little of strength or depth to her work, it was certainly artistically delicate and technically faultless. The programme for the next concert is as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Haydn
Adagio and Rondo from the Concerto No. 1, in D major.....Paganini
Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn, op. 56.....Brahms
Overture, Scherzo, Notturmo and Wedding March from Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn
Soloist.....Mr. Bernhard Listemann

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the seventh concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—Schubert. Symphony in C major, No. 6, (First time.)
Beethoven. Concerto for Pianoforte in G major, No. 4, op. 58.
Brahms. Hungarian Dances Nos. 1, 2, and 6.
Wagner. Overture to "Tannhauser."

Miss Mary E. Garlicks was the pianist.

A new Schubert symphony is sure to be a treat; and, thanks to the iron grasp with which happy possessors of unpublished Schubert MSS. have hitherto held on to their treasures, this sixth symphony in C, the score of which Mr. Gericke brought with him from Vienna, will probably not be the last of the great composer's orchestral works to which we shall be called to listen for the first time. Every now and then a fresh Schubert MSS. escapes from the collector's jealous keeping, and the musical world receives it with rejoicing. Had collectors been more open-handed in the past, or had publishers and concert-givers been more enterprising in this direction, the stock of their delightful surprises might have been exhausted long ago.

The sixth symphony in C, although entitled "Grosse Sinfonie" in the score, hardly corresponds to our modern notions of "grand." There are some mighty passages in it, notably in the last movement, where parts of the finale of the other symphony in C are foreshadowed, as it were. But for the most part the work is bright, graceful and brilliant, rather than grand. The leading theme of the first movement is of the sort one would expect to find in a rondo. There is, strange to say, a decided Mozartish flavor about much of the work, which is somewhat to be wondered at, seeing that Mozart is probably the one of all composers of whom one finds the fewest hints in the works of other men. Haydn, in a manner, ruled the musical spirit of his time and of a good half of the next generation, but Mozart stood alone. It were idle to attempt to describe this sixth symphony of Schubert's here. Let it suffice to say that it is an infinitely delightful work, and one which we sincerely hope to hear again. It was admirably played, and made an unusually strong impression on the audience.

The Brahms Hungarian dances have been given here before, but never so effectively, with such unmistakable "national" accent. Mr. Gericke conducted them as a Viennese, to the manner born. This is the way the Hungarian Band would have played them—if the Hungarian Band played well. The effect was electric. The "Tannhauser" overture was given superbly, and created quite as much enthusiasm as the "Freischütz" overture did a few weeks ago. Some points in Mr. Gericke's reading were new here, and, as we happen to know on the very best authority, perfectly correct. The moderate tempo at the beginning of the Allegro, the broad rhythm of Tannhauser's song to Venus, the gradual slackening of speed at the close of the episodic monologue of the clarinet (Venus's seduction-motive), the doubling of the tempo at the last entrance of the pilgrims' chorus, were points in which Mr. Gericke adhered to the only authentic tradition.

Miss Garlicks, the young pianist, who came here absolutely unheralded, made a favorable impression by her playing of the great G major concerto. She plays clearly, with correct accent, and with excellent musical feeling. Her rendering was rather neutral, but she played the music in a straightforward, unaffected way that let it be highly enjoyable. Her great fault is a reckless abuse of the pedal. One other drawback was that she and Mr. Gericke did not seem able to come to an understanding about the tempo of the first and last movements. Orchestra and pianoforte did keep well enough together, but one felt too constantly that they were trying to pull different ways. The tutti were pretty steadily faster than the solo passages. And what could Mr. Gericke mean by having the strings muted in the Andante con moto? There could surely have been no fear of the orchestra drowning the pianoforte, for in this movement orchestra and pianoforte never play together, except in the last four pianissimo measures. One would think that the whole gist of this movement lay in the contrast between the mysterious, far-off tone of the pianoforte, played pianissimo with the soft pedal, and the stern, implacable forte of all the strings in octaves. To stomp out the somewhat harsh outline of the string passages—by putting on mutes—seems, to us at least, to weaken the whole movement. That Beethoven did not wish for muted strings here, goes without saying.

The next programme is:

Haydn. Symphony No. 2, in D major.
Paganini. Adagio and Rondo from the Violin Concerto No. 1, in D major.
Brahms. Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn, op. 56.
Mendelssohn. Overture, Scherzo, Notturmo and Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Mr. Bernhard Listemann will be the violinist.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—At the concert of Saturday evening, Nov. 29, the seventh of the series, this programme was played:

Symphony in C major, No. 6.....Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte in G major, No. 4, op. 58.....Beethoven
Hungarian Dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6.....Brahms
Overture, Tannhauser.....Wagner

The interest of the evening was chiefly in the Symphony, which has not yet found a publisher, and, perhaps, because of the difficulties attending the possession of full manuscripts, parts it has never before been heard in Boston.

Although bearing a late serial number, it was written early; in fact, it is hardly formal enough to be called a symphony. It is a sinfonietta. With the "Italian" of Mendelssohn and Schumann's No. 1 this work is delightfully youthful, buoyant and vigorous. In neither of the movements, except perhaps the closing allegro moderato, are these difficulties of any pretension—yet so important are its simple subjects, so perfect must be the unity within the orchestra that the smooth performance given was, we doubt not, the result of specially careful rehearsing. A few measures of the traditional slow opening introduce an allegro which in character is reckless enough to be the scherzo of the whole. Its chief figure is a

ing and tender, as wild and furious—were finely given.

But the fitting end of the concert was the "Tannhäuser" overture. This work which has been played to death in Boston, became on this occasion practically a new composition, and, as Mr. Gericke has directed it under Wagner's own supervision, we presume that his reading is ex cathedra, and must be the correct one, as it is certainly the most effective. Many changes from former readings were apparent. Figures heretofore crushed under the weight of instrumentation, were dug out and became audible. The great violin figure was easily followed, and was begun slowly and clearly, becoming only gradually fast and furious. The brasses no longer were allowed to sweep everything before them but were obliged to shade even to a tender pianissimo at times, and all in all we can say that the "Tannhäuser" overture, in its new dress became to the critic, the greatest surprise of this most intensely interesting concert.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall, last night. The audience was a large one. The performances opened with a symphony in C major No. 6, by Schubert, a delightfully fresh, genial and fascinating work, overflowing with a wealth of delicate, graceful and refined melody; full of animal spirits and deliciously pleasing in effect. It is true that it frequently is at variance with ideas of symphonic dignity; in fact, it has but little of the character of a symphony beyond its form, but it is all very charming, very winning in its playful grace and in the sunny atmosphere that pervades it. There are in it enough themes to furnish out a dozen symphonies for modern composers. There is but little of the Schubert with whom we are most familiar except now and then in some sudden and exquisite harmonic changes and in a bit of tender melody. It is frequently more naive than are Haydn and Mozart in their most artless moods. It reflects the influences of both these masters, rarely of Beethoven, but occasionally, mirabile dictu! of Rossini! Lack of space forbids a more detailed analysis of this work. We trust it may be given again. It was beautifully read and played, especially by the wood wind upon which it makes severe demands. The audience manifested great delight with the symphony, but not as much as it bestowed upon Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Brahms's "Hungarian Dances," especially the common-place No. 6, which received the most rapturous applause of the evening. The concert ended with one of the finest performances we have ever listened to of Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture. For richness of color, variety of effect, strong, consistent and impressive originality of reading, and artistic unity of conception, it may rank as the most brilliant of Mr. Gericke's achievements thus far. The soloist was Miss Mary E. Garlichs, a young artist of pleasing presence and modest mien. She played Beethoven's concerto for piano in G with a fluent and able technique. Her touch is firm, certain, and even; her scale runs are delightfully clear, and pearly, and her style is refined, and marked by discreet taste, artistic feeling and a graceful intelligence. Her reading of this concerto, though showing thought and excellent judgment in many essentials, was lacking, however, in strength, and her physical powers were not quite equal, especially in the last movement to the force necessary for the production of the most desirable results. It was a brilliant and pleasing rather than a deep and impressive interpretation. There seemed at times to be a slight struggle between the artist and the conductor for mastery in respect to tempo. However that may be, the allegros were taken much too rapidly, and to the disadvantage of the soloist, who was apparently carried along, unwillingly, by the impetuosity imparted to the orchestra. Certainly in those portions of the concerto in which the latter played at any length without the soloist, the time was hurried beyond any precedent we can recall, and with an effect far from satisfactory. We hope to hear the artist again in Hummel, Mozart or Chopin, to whose works her style and her brilliant technique seems better adapted than they are to Beethoven. The instrument upon which she played was a superb Steinway of noble quality in purity of tone, sonority, richness and carrying power. The programme for the next concert will be Symphony in D, No. 2, Haydn; adagio and rondo from Paganini's violin concerto in D major; variations on a theme by Haydn, op. 56, by Brahms, and overture, scherzo, nocturne and wedding march from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

A SCHUBERT SYMPHONY.

First Performance in Boston Last Evening of One of the Composer's Earliest Works.

The chief novelty of last night's symphony concert, and indeed of the season so far, was the presentation of a not very well-known symphony of Franz Schubert's. Strangely enough Schubert's sixth symphony in C major does not appear to have had a hearing in Boston until last evening. Strangely, because there is certainly merit enough in the work to warrant an earlier performance. Mr. Henschell last year, going still farther back into the composer's adolescence, raked out a symphony of much less pleasing quality and decidedly inferior in worth. However, better late than never. The beauties of the sixth symphony lie on the surface. There is no occasion for a second thought or a contracted brow here. An ever-present, uninterrupted flow of melody greets the ear from the first bar to the last. It is certainly a magnificent work for a young man of 21. While no one could think of ranking it with the composer's great work in the same key (the ninth) or with the unfinished symphony in b flat, it is well deserving of an occasional place upon the programmes of our symphony concerts. It might not bear many repetitions, and to some ears undoubtedly the continued sweetness of the first two movements would soon become almost cloying. The scherzo is a splendid piece of work, but unfortunately its characteristics, its accentuation, its very modulations carry the mind back with a rush to the scherzo of the seventh symphony of Beethoven almost with the first notes. It hardly seems that so striking a resemblance could be the result of accident. A most generous amount of applause was bestowed upon the work by the very large audience. The two other purely instrumental numbers, Brahms's "Hungarian dances" and the overture to Tannhäuser were also received with unusual favor, which they certainly richly deserved. A perfect storm of applause followed the performance of the latter work, which was one of the finest of the many that have been heard in this city. Miss Mary E. Garlichs was the soloist. She played Beethoven's G major concerto. After the broad and finished reading of this great work by Carl Boernmann, so familiar to a symphony audience, the lady placed herself in a position to be very severely criticised. But she acquitted herself most creditably, and won the favor of her hearers. If there was little of strength or depth to her work, it was certainly artistically delicate and technically faultless. The programme for the next concert is as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Haydn
Adagio and Rondo from the Concerto No. 1, in D major.....Paganini
Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn, op. 56.....Brahms
Overture, Scherzo, Notturmo and Wedding March from Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn
Soloist.....Mr. Bernhard Listemann

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1894.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the seventh concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—
Schubert. Symphony in C major, No. 6, (First time.)
Beethoven. Concerto for Pianoforte in G major, No. 4, op. 58.
Brahms. Hungarian Dances Nos. 1, 2, and 6.
Wagner. Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Miss Mary E. Garlichs was the pianist.

A new Schubert symphony is sure to be a treat; and, thanks to the iron grasp with which happy possessors of unpublished Schubert MSS. have hitherto held on to their treasures, this sixth symphony in C, the score of which Mr. Gericke brought with him from Vienna, will probably not be the last of the great composer's orchestral works to which we shall be called to listen for the first time. Every now and then a fresh Schubert MS. escapes from the collector's jealous keeping, and the musical world receives it with rejoicing. Had collectors been more open-handed in the past, or had publishers and concert-givers been more enterprising in this direction, the stock of their delightful surprises might have been exhausted long ago.

The sixth symphony in C, although entitled "Grosse Sinfonie" in the score, hardly corresponds to our modern notions of "grand." There are some mighty passages in it, notably in the last movement, where parts of the finale of the other symphony in C are foreshadowed, as it were. But for the most part the work is bright, graceful and brilliant, rather than grand. The leading theme of the first movement is of the sort one would expect to find in a rondo. There is, strange to say, a decided Mozartish flavor about much of the work, which is somewhat to be wondered at, seeing that Mozart is probably the one of all composers of whom one finds the fewest hints in the works of other men. Haydn, in a manner, ruled the musical spirit of his time and of a good half of the next generation, but Mozart stood alone. It were idle to attempt to describe this sixth symphony of Schubert's here. Let it suffice to say that it is an infinitely delightful work, and one which we sincerely hope to hear again. It was admirably played, and made an unusually strong impression on the audience.

The Brahms Hungarian dances have been given here before, but never so effectively, with such unmistakable "national" accent. Mr. Gericke conducted them as a Viennese, to the manner born. This is the way the Hungarian Band would have played them—if the Hungarian Band played well. The effect was electric. The "Tannhäuser" overture was given superbly, and created quite as much enthusiasm as the "Freischütz" overture did a few weeks ago. Some points in Mr. Gericke's reading were new here, and, as we happen to know on the very best authority, perfectly correct. The moderate tempo at the beginning of the Allegro, the broad rhythm of Tannhäuser's song to Venus, the gradual slackening of speed at the close of the episodic monologue of the clarinet (Venus's seduction-motive), the doubling of the tempo at the last entrance of the pilgrims' chorus, were points in which Mr. Gericke adhered to the only authentic tradition.

Miss Garlichs, the young pianist, who came here absolutely unheralded, made a favorable impression by her playing of the great G major concerto. She plays clearly, with correct accent, and with excellent musical feeling. Her rendering was rather neutral, but she played the music in a straightforward, unaffected way that let it be highly enjoyable. Her great fault is a reckless abuse of the pedal. One other drawback was that she and Mr. Gericke did not seem able to come to an understanding about the tempo of the first and last movements. Orchestra and pianoforte did keep well enough together, but one felt too constantly that they were trying to pull different ways. The *tutti*s were pretty steadily faster than the solo passages. And what could Mr. Gericke mean by having the strings muted in the Andante con moto? There could surely have been no fear of the orchestra drowning the pianoforte, for in this movement orchestra and pianoforte never play together, except in the last four pianissimo measures. One would think that the whole gist of this movement lay in the contrast between the mysterious, far-off tone of the pianoforte, played pianissimo with the soft pedal, and the stern, implacable forte of all the strings in octaves. To stamp out the somewhat harsh outline of the string passages—by putting on mutes—seems, to us at least, to weaken the whole movement. That Beethoven did not wish for muted strings here, goes without saying.

The next programme is:

Haydn. Symphony No. 2, in D major.
Paganini. Adagio and Rondo from the Violin Concerto No. 1, in D major.
Brahms. Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn, op. 56.
Mendelssohn. Overture, Scherzo, Notturmo and Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Mr. Bernhard Listemann will be the violinist.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—At the concert of Saturday evening, Nov. 29, the seventh of the series, this programme was played:

Schubert
Symphony in C major, No. 6.....Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte in G major, No. 4, op. 58.....Beethoven
Hungarian Dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6.....Brahms
Overture, Tannhäuser.....Wagner

The interest of the evening was chiefly in the Symphony, which has not yet found a publisher, and, perhaps, because of the difficulties attending the possession of full manuscript parts it has never before been heard in Boston.

Although bearing a late serial number, it was written early; in fact, it is hardly formal enough to be called a symphony. It is a sinfonetta. With the "Italian" of Mendelssohn and Schumann's No. 1 this work is delightfully youthful, buoyant and vigorous. In neither of the movements, except perhaps the closing allegro moderato, are these difficulties of any pretension—yet so important are its simple subjects, so perfect must be the unity within the orchestra that the smooth performance given was, we doubt not, the result of specially careful rehearsing. A few measures of the traditional slow opening introduce an allegro which in character is reckless enough to be the scherzo of the whole. Its chief figure is a anciful, reliant gigue about which the wood winds play a syncopated adornment.

104

Its frequent repetition, however, made tiresome an otherwise clever and welcome sketch. With a piu moto to end the movement it was indeed hard to give it a proper title. Next followed the andante. It is an unbroken song expressive of some equable mood where everything was harmonious. A scherzo followed, possessing all the musical disregard consistent with its elastic outline. A quiet opening by the strings in pianissimo is followed by a startling fortissimo of the same subject by the same instruments, and as the movement advances the double basses in strongly accented phrase aid this musical bustle. The scherzo of a symphony is, under Gericke, as much anticipated as its more formal neighbor, for he has a particularly individual aptitude in showing just how fantastic the classical writer was. The closing movement—allegro moderato—overflows with new life and fresh subjects, which remind one of Haydn.

There is very little contemplation about how a theme shall be developed, for one follows another with a flow which suggests an inexhaustible store.

The large orchestra is more heartily handled in this movement, but nothing is conspicuous as an attempt merely because all is so fitting and perfect.

As has been intimated, the orchestra played this newly-learned work with great warmth and variety of expression.

Mr. Gericke's immediate success with it here would justify one in supposing he had reached an understanding of it through previous performances in other cities. We hope it may be heard again this season. The Brahms's dances were played with the greatest possible consideration of tempo, rhythm, and fine adjustment of balance.

It is certain that their performance made a marked impression. The Tannhauser overture was magnificent under our new conductor. Mr. Thomas's rendering at the Wagner festival is not easily forgotten, yet so delicately graven were all the phases of this gorgeous story that one is likely to say that it is only in point of numbers that our American leader is first. At the close of the overture the audience showed its pleasure by a long-continued demonstration. Miss Mary Garlich of New York city, who has recently returned from long schooling abroad, played the pianoforte part of the concerto. She has a fine technique, and is acceptable because she plays intelligently, accurately and with a promising musical sense. She was evidently nervous during this her first appearance in Boston, and being offered no second opportunity in the programme, could not easily establish herself with her audience. Her manner is reserved, and at the piano she is extremely conscientious. Her later appearance here will be pleasantly anticipated. Mr. Gericke in the seven programmes thus far given has allotted a place as soloist to only two vocalists. Are vocalists so scarce, men singers in particular, that at least an alternating arrangement cannot be maintained between the instrumentalist and the vocalist? This would more surely suit the temper of his audience. The programme for next Saturday evening presents Mr. Bernhard Listemann as solo violinist, who will play the adagio and rondo from the Paganini Concerto in D major. The orchestra will prepare Haydn's Symphony No. 2 in D minor; variations on a theme by Jos. Haydn, Op. 56, by Brahms; overture, scherzo, Wotturno and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seventh Programme of the Season—Miss Garlich, Soloist.

The seventh of the season's programmes by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Miss Mary E. Garlich, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Symphony in C major, No. 6.....Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte in G major, No. 4.
Op. 58.....Beethoven
Hungarian Dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6.....Brahms
Overture ("Tannhauser").....Wagner

It would be quite interesting to know when the last two or three programmes of this series of concerts were arranged by Herr Gericke. If they were planned before he left Vienna, he is to be complimented for his intelligent estimate of the actual musical culture of the average Boston concert patron; but, if the selections of the last few weeks have been made since the opening of his season of concerts, there is even more cause to commend Herr Gericke for his quick perception and willingness to recognize the demands of the public, rather than the preferences of those of its members who favor the more advanced (?) class of compositions. A study of the audiences present at the rehearsals and concerts of the last few weeks must have proved, to any one open to conviction, that Herr Gericke has hit upon an admirable line of musical selections in his recent programmes; and it is to be hoped that he will see the wisdom of continuing in his present course of action. The unfamiliar symphony by Schubert proved a source of keen enjoyment, and gave more genuine pleasure than any novelty from the hand of any of the present day composers in this line of effort. Written during the latter part of 1817 and the early months of the following year, it shows the first evidences of the composers' advance in orchestral work, but it hardly warrants the designation "grand," given it by Schubert. The opening movement (adagio), which is quite in the style of Mozart, lacks something of the dignity and largeness of style appropriate to the introduction of symphonic work, but its themes are so graceful and elaborated with such taste that it puts the hearer in a pleasant mood for what is to follow. The andante has all of the delightful simplicity of Haydn's writings, and its fascination is due to the seeming absence of all art in its development, the themes flowing on in a stream of melody as clear and transparent as the waters of a rock bound brook. In the scherzo there are indications of Beethoven's style, and this part of the work is full of charming characteristics, the instrumentation being wrought out with rare delicacy. The finale, allegro moderata, is hardly in keeping with the andante and scherzo in its musical merits, but it is bright and pleasing, and makes a very brilliant ending to the work. The orchestra played the several movements with admirable effect, and the audience showed its generous appreciation of the symphony and its presentation. The Hungarian dances, the authorship of which, by the way, should be credited to Remenyi, rather than to Brahms, were played with all the dash and fire with which the gypsy composer would invest them, and fairly electrified the audience by their spirited character, as played by the orchestra. Each hearing of the great "Tannhauser" overture increases the regret that its composer should have wasted so large a part of his life, after its composition, in apparently striving to avoid the melodious characteristics of his earlier work. A better performance of the grand old overture cannot be recalled, that given by the Thomas orchestra, of double the size, last season, failing in every way in comparison with Herr Gericke's brilliant presentation last evening. Miss Garlich, the soloist of the evening, had a cordial greeting and gave very satisfactory evidence of her abilities as a pianist. As a debutante, her modest bearing disarmed severe criticism, and it can be said that in her playing she shows evidence of much talent. Her technical attainments are to be commended, and her evident intelligence and good taste give promise of excellent future results in her studies.

105

Musical.

SEVENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A fine attendance and considerable enthusiasm from one of the most attentive of audiences in Music Hall last Saturday evening again illustrated that the right kind of interest is being taken in the present series of Boston symphony concerts. The programme contained a Schubert symphony in C major, No. 6 (first time); Beethoven's fourth pianoforte concerto; Nos. 1, 2 and 6 of the Brahms Hungarian Dances, and Wagner's overture to Tannhauser. After hearing the symphony, one could readily understand why it has never been performed here before; its right to be regarded as an important work being at least questionable. Surely there is very little of it that would seem out of place as a setting to an opera bouffe libretto, and its symphonic form is so unattended with traits of dignity and depth of feeling as to make it seem as if it were from the work of Haydn or Mozart at the age of six, or an Offenbach in his prime. If such music were to be regarded as standard, it were more elevating to listen to an out-and-out potpourri from Iolanthe, or Patience, or Pounce & Co. music, which if sympathetically treated would sound much more appropriate in a classical series of concerts than Schubert's sixth and simple symphony. Possibly the sins of Schubert are musically superior to the virtues of Offenbach, but it will require a far more meritorious production than the one referred to to justify the comparison. The worthy Beethoven concerto in G was more than ever welcomed after listening to so much that was unworthy of Schubert. The soloist for the work was Miss Mary E. Garlich, who for a number of years was a pupil of Pruchner, and who afterwards studied under Liszt. Before pronouncing in detail upon Miss Garlich's great skill as a pianist, it does not seem inappropriate that certain criticism should be made which does not in the least detract from such skill, howsoever it may reflect upon the performance in its entirety of a Beethoven concerto. Miss Garlich must have been taught by her teachers in Europe never to perform the work in the tempo in which its allegros were taken last Saturday evening. We cannot believe otherwise of such masters as Pruchner and Liszt. It is also difficult of belief that she ever heard the work performed so rapidly by any pianist of eminence with whom she would undoubtedly agree in respecting the traditional readings of the work, were she permitted to do so. It could plainly be recognized that the conductor was enforcing upon her tempi that were not only calculated to do injustice to her intent, but that were simply outrageous in their effect upon the music of the concerto. Had Miss Garlich not possessed a marvellous technique, and an artistic power of endurance far surpassing that of any ordinary soloist, she would have encountered disaster in playing one of the most difficult of concertos in tempi that enhanced its difficulty to the extent of submitting the performer to a most appalling test. That she submitted to it with ease and certainty of technique was surprising. She thereby displayed a mastery of the key-board and a technical proficiency that were simply wonderful to witness. And yet we cannot forget that such virtuosity was prevented from doing the music of the concerto justice, albeit it did not obscure the lady's possession of a true artistic feeling, rare intelligence and nobility of intent, all of which rendered her playing all the more worthy to be commended. It is a pleasure to refer to the piano par excellence, or Steinway, upon which Miss Garlich performed, with its free and pliant action, so naturally lending itself to some of the most delightful shades of tone-coloring.

We cannot forbear a condemnation of the unsteady, unsympathetic and ill-considered accompaniment to which her performance was subjected; but there is still room for a crescendo of disgust at the cadenzas that Balow has inflicted upon the concerto. Of all the rude, ugly and unseemly intrusions that were ever inflicted with malice aforethought to the end of a murder in the first degree upon a great classical work, these two Balow cadenzas must be regarded as most hideous examples. Technical difficulty in the form of cadenzas may well be added to any concerto; but there exists an abundance of such material that has been created by renowned composers; whereas every one knows that Balow is simply a great pianist; a musician who with all his genius has yet none of the heart and soul that would make him a great composer. We know not why his piano playing should have been recently treated with caustic severity by the critics in Berlin, nor why audiences there should have hissed him; but the outrage that he has been brutal enough to inflict upon the fourth concerto of Beethoven were itself a sufficient cause for almost any amount of public censure either in Berlin or any other city. None but a pianist of the highest skill could have mastered the cadenzas as did Miss Garlich, but for all that there could have been no music in attendance upon this portion of the performance with Balow's material itself, so ugly and unmusical; one could yet see evidence of an attempt to treat contrapuntally the themes of the concerto, and with fair success in counterpoint without music to a degree that was simply exasperating in its effect.

The remainder of the concert was devoted to the performance of the Brahms dances and the overture to Tannhauser, referred to, the improvement that Gericke has made in the technique of the orchestra being more noticeable than ever, and exciting as usual the unremitting interest of the audience. To-night the soloist will be Mr. Bernhard Listemann.

anciful, riant gigue about which the wood winds play a syncopated adornment.

Its frequent repetition, however, made tiresome an otherwise clever and welcome sketch. With a piu moto to end the movement it was indeed hard to give it a proper title. Next followed the andante. It is an unbroken ~~song~~ expressive of some equable mood where everything was harmonious. A scherzo followed, possessing all the musical disregard consistent with its elastic outline. A quiet opening by the strings in pianissimo is followed by a startling fortissimo of the same subject by the same instruments, and as the movement advances the double basses in strongly accented phrase aid this musical bustle. The scherzo of a symphony is, under Gericke, as much anticipated as its more formal neighbor, for he has a particularly individual aptitude in showing just how fantastic the classical writer was. The closing movement—allegro moderato—overflows with new life and fresh subjects, which remind one of Haydn.

There is very little contemplation about how a theme shall be developed, for one follows another with a flow which suggests an inexhaustible store.

The large orchestra is more heartily handled in this movement, but nothing is conspicuous as an attempt merely because all is so fitting and perfect.

As has been intimated, the orchestra played this newly-learned work with great warmth and variety of expression.

Mr. Gericke's immediate success with it here would justify one in supposing he had reached an understanding of it through previous performances in other cities. We hope it may be heard again this season. The Brahms's dances were played with the greatest possible consideration of tempo, rhythm, and fine adjustment of balance.

It is certain that their performance made a marked impression. The Tannhauser overture was magnificent under our new conductor. Mr. Thomas's rendering at the Wagner festival is not easily forgotten, yet so delicately graven were all the phases of this gorgeous story that one is likely to say that it is only in point of numbers that our American leader is first. At the close of the overture the audience showed its pleasure by a long-continued demonstration. Miss Mary Garlich of New York city, who has recently returned from long schooling abroad, played the pianoforte part of the concerto. She has a fine technique, and is acceptable because she plays intelligently, accurately and with a promising musical sense. She was evidently nervous during this her first appearance in Boston, and being offered no second opportunity in the programme, could not easily establish herself with her audience. Her manner is reserved, and at the piano she is extremely conscientious. Her later appearance here will be pleasantly anticipated. Mr. Gericke in the seven programmes thus far given has allotted a place as soloist to only two vocalists. Are vocalists so scarce, men singers in particular, that at least an alternating arrangement cannot be maintained between the instrumentalist and the vocalist? This would more surely suit the temper of his audience. The programme for next Saturday evening presents Mr. Bernhard Listemann as solo violinist, who will play the adagio and rondo from the Paganini Concerto in D major. The orchestra will prepare Haydn's Symphony No. 2 in D minor; variations on a theme by Jos. Haydn, Op. 56, by Brahms; overture, scherzo, Wotturno and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seventh Programme of the Season— Miss Garlich, Soloist.

The seventh of the season's programmes by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Miss Mary E. Garlich, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Symphony in C major, No. 8.....Schubert
Concerto for pianoforte in G major, No. 4.....Beethoven
op. 58.....
Hungarian Dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 3.....Brahms
Overture ("Tannhauser").....Wagner

It would be quite interesting to know when the last two or three programmes of this series of concerts were arranged by Herr Gericke. If they were planned before he left Vienna, he is to be complimented for his intelligent estimate of the actual musical culture of the average Boston concert patron; but, if the selections of the last few weeks have been made since the opening of his season of concerts, there is even more cause to commend Herr Gericke for his quick perception and willingness to recognize the demands of the public, rather than the preferences of those of its members who favor the more advanced (?) class of compositions. A study of the audiences present at the rehearsals and concerts of the last few weeks must have proved, to any one open to conviction, that Herr Gericke has hit upon an admirable line of musical selections in his recent programmes; and it is to be hoped that he will see the wisdom of continuing in his present course of action. The unfamiliar symphony by Schubert proved a source of keen enjoyment, and gave more genuine pleasure than any novelty from the hand of any of the present day composers in this line of effort. Written during the latter part of 1817 and the early months of the following year, it shows the first evidences of the composers advance in orchestral work, but it hardly warrants the designation "grand," given it by Schubert. The opening movement (adagio), which is quite in the style of Mozart, lacks something of the dignity and largeness of style appropriate to the introduction of symphonic work, but its themes are so graceful and elaborated with such taste that it puts the hearer in a pleasant mood for what is to follow. The andante has all of the delightful simplicity of Haydn's writings, and its fascination is due to the seeming absence of all art in its development, the themes flowing on in a stream of melody as clear and transparent as the waters of a rock bound brook. In the scherzo there are indications of Beethoven's style, and this part of the work is full of charming characteristics, the instrumentation being wrought out with rare delicacy. The finale, allegro moderato, is hardly in keeping with the andante and scherzo in its musical merits, but it is bright and pleasing, and makes a very brilliant ending to the work. The orchestra played the several movements with admirable effect, and the audience showed its generous appreciation of the symphony and its presentation. The Hungarian dances, the authorship of which, by the way, should be credited to Remenyi, rather than to Brahms, were played with all the dash and fire with which the gypsy composer would invest them, and fairly electrified the audience by their spirited character, as played by the orchestra. Each hearing of the great "Tannhauser" overture increases the regret that its composer should have wasted so large a part of his life, after its composition, in apparently striving to avoid the melodious characteristics of his earlier work. A better performance of the grand old overture cannot be recalled, that given by the Thomas orchestra, of double the size, last season, failing in every way in comparison with Herr Gericke's brilliant presentation last evening. Miss Garlich, the soloist of the evening, had a cordial greeting and gave very satisfactory evidence of her abilities as a pianist. As a debutante, her modest bearing disarmed severe criticism, and it can be said that in her playing she shows evidence of much talent. Her technical attainments are to be commended, and her evident intelligence and good taste give promise of excellent future results in her studies.

Musical.

SEVENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—

A fine attendance and considerable enthusiasm from one of the most attentive of audiences in Music Hall last Saturday evening again illustrated that the right kind of interest is being taken in the present series of Boston symphony concerts. The programme contained a Schubert symphony in C major, No. 6 (first time); Beethoven's fourth pianoforte concerto; Nos. 1, 2 and 6 of the Brahms Hungarian Dances, and Wagner's overture to Tannhauser. After hearing the symphony, one could readily understand why it has never been performed here before; its right to be regarded as an important work being at least questionable. Surely there is very little of it that would seem out of place as a setting to an opera bouffe libretto, and its symphonic form is so unattended with traits of dignity and depth of feeling as to make it seem as if it were from the work of Haydn or Mozart at the age of six, or an Offenbach in his prime. If such music were to be regarded as standard, it were more elevating to listen to an out-and-out potpourri from Iolanthe, or Patience, or Pounce & Co. music, which if symphonically treated would sound much more appropriate in a classical series of concerts than Schubert's sixth and simple symphony. Possibly the sins of Schubert are musically superior to the virtues of Offenbach, but it will require a far more meritorious production than the one referred to to justify the comparison. The worthy Beethoven concerto in G was more than ever welcomed after listening to so much that was unworthy of Schubert. The soloist for the work was Miss Mary E. Garlich, who for a number of years was a pupil of Pruchner, and who afterwards studied under Liszt. Before pronouncing in detail upon Miss Garlich's great skill as a pianist, it does not seem inappropriate that certain criticism should be made which does not in the least detract from such skill, howsoever it may reflect upon the performance in its entirety of a Beethoven concerto. Miss Garlich must have been taught by her teachers in Europe never to perform the work in the tempo in which its allegros were taken last Saturday evening. We cannot believe otherwise of such masters as Pruchner and Liszt. It is also difficult of belief that she ever heard the work performed so rapidly by any pianist of eminence with whom she would undoubtedly agree in respecting the traditional readings of the work, were she permitted to do so. It could plainly be recognized that the conductor was enforcing upon her tempi that were not only calculated to do injustice to her intent, but that were simply outrageous in their effect upon the music of the concerto. Had Miss Garlich not possessed a marvellous technique, and an artistic power of endurance far surpassing that of any ordinary soloist, she would have encountered disaster in playing one of the most difficult of concertos in tempi that enhanced its difficulty to the extent of submitting the performer to a most appalling test. That she submitted to it with ease and certainty of technique was surprising. She thereby displayed a mastery of the key-board and a technical proficiency that were simply wonderful to witness. And yet we cannot forget that such virtuosity was prevented from doing the music of the concerto justice, albeit it did not obscure the lady's possession of a true artistic feeling, rare intelligence and nobility of intent, all of which rendered her playing all the more worthy to be commended. It is a pleasure to refer to the piano par excellence, or Steinway, upon which Miss Garlich performed, with its free and pliant action, so naturally lending itself to some of the most delightful shades of tone-coloring.

We cannot forbear a condemnation of the unsteady, unsympathetic and ill-considered accompaniment to which her performance was subjected; but there is still room for a crescendo of disgust at the cadenzas that Balow has inflicted upon the concerto. Of all the rude, ugly and unseemly intrusions that were ever inflicted with malice aforethought to the end of a murder in the first degree upon a great classical work, these two Balow cadenzas must be regarded as most hideous examples. Technical difficulty in the form of cadenzas may well be added to any concerto; but there exists an abundance of such material that has been created by renowned composers; whereas every one knows that Balow is simply a great pianist; a musician who with all his genius has yet none of the heart and soul that would make him a great composer. We know not why his piano playing should have been recently treated with caustic severity by the critics in Berlin, nor why audiences there should have hissed him; but the outrage that he has been brutal enough to inflict upon the fourth concerto of Beethoven were itself a sufficient cause for almost any amount of public censure either in Berlin or any other city. None but a pianist of the highest skill could have mastered the cadenzas as did Miss Garlich, but for all that there could have been no music in attendance upon this portion of the performance with Balow's material itself, so ugly and unmusical; one could yet see evidence of an attempt to treat contrapuntally the themes of the concerto, and with fair success in counterpoint without music to a degree that was simply exasperating in its effect.

The remainder of the concert was devoted to the performance of the Brahms dances and the overture to Tannhauser, referred to, the improvement that Gericke has made in the technique of the orchestra being more noticeable than ever, and exciting as usual the unremitting interest of the audience. To-night the soloist will be Mr. Bernhard Listemann.

Mus. Corner Music in Boston.

BOSTON, November 1/2

THE seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening at Music Hall. The programme consisted of the following numbers:

Symphony, C major, No. 6.....Schubert
Adagio—Andante—Scherzo (Presto)—Allegro moderato.
(First time.)

Concerto for piano, G major, op. 58.....Beethoven
Hungarian Dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6.....Brahms
"Tannhäuser" overture.....Wagner
Miss Mary E. Garlichs being the soloist.

The symphony is one of Schubert's early works and contained little to remind one of the originality and genius of his later compositions. It is good music, flowing along without any hitch, and is pleasant to listen to, but decidedly immature and leaving no great impression behind. The first movement has some reminiscences of Weber, the andante is Mozartean, while the scherzo and finale were decidedly inspired by Beethoven. It is interesting, however, to hear such works, as it enables one to better appreciate the immense development Schubert had already attained at his early death. If one thinks that there are yet men living born in the same year with Schubert, one cannot help feeling the deepest regret at the grand unwritten works lost to humanity by the untimely end of so great a genius.

The performance of the Beethoven concerto calls for some comment. The first movement is like a beautiful spring day, sunshiny, warm and peaceful, without any passionate upheavals, and calling therefore for a reposeful rendering. Instead of this, however, the conductor started the first tutti at so rapid a tempo that Miss Garlichs, who has evidently not played often enough with an orchestra to take her own tempo, had all she could do to carry out her part successfully. Her excellent technique and sterling musicianly qualities helped her through safely, but the character of the movement was spoiled. In the exquisite andante Miss Garlichs did not use the soft pedal, and played too loud, her part thus losing its peculiarly plaintive and beseeching character. The last movement, however, did not show any of these defects, and was rendered with great brilliancy and in fine style. One little inaccuracy I must mention though, as Miss Garlichs may have overlooked it in studying the concerto, and can easily remedy it by one glance at the score. When the first theme of the first movement is repeated after the Durchführung, in the fourth measure, the chord of the fourth and sixth of G major solves into the dominant D major. This Miss Garlichs did not do, but went straight from the chord of the fourth and sixth of G major to the next chord, without the intervening D major.

Although, as I have shown, the Beethoven concerto was not without flaws, it was perfectly evident that Miss Garlichs is a highly gifted lady, in fact, I have rarely seen so many fine qualities combined in a lady pianiste, as she possesses. She has a superb technique of excellent schooling; she produces a full, round and singing tone from her Steinway, her phrasing is good, and everything she does is, in a word, musicianly, so that without doubt, when she has been a little longer before the public and gathered a little more experience, she will be in the very front rank of pianistes. It is a pity we did not hear her in some solo numbers, as when she felt herself free from the orchestra, as in the two Bülow cadenzas, the excellencies of her playing were most apparent.

The very flattering reception accorded her by her first Boston audience must have been highly gratifying to the talented young lady, and should encourage her to visit Boston again soon.

The three Hungarian dances were given with the spirit and dash by the orchestra that we are now already accustomed to look for from Mr. Gericke and the "Tannhäuser" overture was rendered in a truly inspiring manner. I have never before heard this overture played so entirely to my liking here in Boston, as last evening, and Mr. Gericke's talent as conductor shone forth resplendent in this number. These weekly concerts are becoming more and more what they ought to be and were intended to be—true musical feasts.

LOUIS MAAS.

A UBIQUITOUS VIOLONCELLIST!!—The enterprising manager of Mr. Fritz Giese, first violoncellist of the Boston Symphony Concerts, advertises that artist as "Violoncellist from the New York, Boston and Philadelphia Philharmonic concerts." As there are no Philharmonic concerts in Boston, and as Mr. Berger and other 'cellists occupy their usual positions at the Philharmonic concerts here, and as there are no permanent Philharmonic concerts in Philadelphia, we fail to see wherein that announcement contains any truth. Mr. Giese, who is among the most accomplished violoncellists in this country, is connected with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Mendelssohn Quintet Club, and the advertisement referred to above is misleading.

GERICKE.—Boston is agitated. Mr. Gericke has refused to permit the absence of two of his violinists to allow them to play at another concert, thus breaking into the Euterpe programmes. We await the news of his assassination with intense interest.

Melusine and the Seventh Symphony.

ant Journal
THE vocalist at the Symphony Concert was Agnes Huntington, with songs by Schubert and Schumann, and an aria by Handel. As befits the time, there was also a string concerto by Handel, not before played here. Of these Mr. Lang had nothing to say in his lecture-lesson, confining his attention to the Beethoven Seventh and the Melusine Overture. He began, however, with a few words about Trumpets. Generally the two (or three, upon extraordinary occasion, as in the Wedding March) are in unison. Horns and trombones may be dispensed with under a less penalty, but the trumpet we must have. By the by, it is generally a cornet. Georg Henschel had some real trumpets made to ing of naturalne The mouth-abitat instead of ers, who have is that the moo busy and is decade come n In England

icious France, b In Germany

Tall. The Honeymo...equiem, asks Margaret Math...band within ported by Miln...for grave-ss of its action he density.
yons and Tamin...the Creation e over a life in th...d that he en women are rit. Yet as ter than creatur...the lighter rtured chairs an...for notes staple of comed...is written.

by Delibes, while his purpose;
ash that receives, snarly and out another Freney make these
Mr. Bendix playestra. At this irably. Moore, and

L SOIREE. iree trombones

ooms, overlook...ardiness drew ing-ground, nag, but after a s finished in h...a Beethoven idery—this is effect of these lams' daily wo

Feb. 23, his puy of a husband riends. Emergiout his wife's rrespondent fouen, and lost her on the stairwaermaid. Mene enticed him iafter hearing ladies and gentplauded over-parcel of the oce would write their downsitti says is like a ecome acquaint time. It is asant ways. M In allusion

e was ever at haea and Happy on; with a hued be the last JES No...ure is night
piano to lead t hearer may

Bruch's Arminit this over-o aid those whois the best audience parld your neighted, and there when the overnie Stevens, bei and Bertha solo in the Trov played the adwig Manoly su each move-de Edmunds ddeclared that

; and Annie l only for a noble alto voice he repeated a long and tryir seven min-solos were Festishows what om Arminius, audgment of is. C. N. Colliony was first as his tenor so r the benefit Jephthah. Jacof Freedom, voice and abn it was re-

THOSE UNABLE TO FAVOR

LICER

way.

106
Mus. Courier Music in Boston.

BOSTON, November 1/87

THE seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening at Music Hall. The programme consisted of the following numbers:

Symphony, C major, No. 6.....Schubert
Adagio—Andante—Scherzo (Presto)—Allegro moderato.
(First time.)
Concerto for piano, G major, op. 58.....Beethoven
Hungarian Dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6.....Brahms
"Tannhäuser" overture.....Wagner
Miss Mary E. Garlichs being the soloist.

The symphony is one of Schubert's early works and contained little to remind one of the originality and genius of his later compositions. It is good music, flowing along without any hitch, and is pleasant to listen to, but decidedly immature and leaving no great impression behind. The first movement has some reminiscences of Weber, the andante is Mozartean, while the scherzo and finale were decidedly inspired by Beethoven. It is interesting, however, to hear such works, as it enables one to better appreciate the immense development Schubert had already attained at his early death. If one thinks that there are yet men living born in the same year with Schubert, one cannot help feeling the deepest regret at the grand unwritten works lost to humanity by the untimely end of so great a genius.

The performance of the Beethoven concerto calls for some comment. The first movement is like a beautiful spring day, sunshiny, warm and peaceful, without any passionate upheavals, and calling therefore for a reposeful rendering. Instead of this, however, the conductor started the first tutti at so rapid a tempo that Miss Garlichs, who has evidently not played often enough with an orchestra to take her own tempo, had all she could do to carry out her part successfully. Her excellent technique and sterling musicianly qualities helped her through safely, but the character of the movement was spoiled. In the exquisite andante Miss Garlichs did not use the soft pedal, and played too loud, her part thus losing its peculiarly plaintive and beseeching character. The last movement, however, did not show any of these defects, and was rendered with great brilliancy and in fine style. One little inaccuracy I must mention though, as Miss Garlichs may have overlooked it in studying the concerto, and can easily remedy it by one glance at the score. When the first theme of the first movement is repeated after the Durchführung, in the fourth measure, the chord of the fourth and sixth of G major solves into the dominant D major. This Miss Garlichs did not do, but went straight from the chord of the fourth and sixth of G major to the next chord, without the intervening D major.

Although, as I have shown, the Beethoven concerto was not without flaws, it was perfectly evident that Miss Garlichs is a highly gifted lady, in fact, I have rarely seen so many fine qualities combined in a lady pianiste, as she possesses. She has a superb technique of excellent schooling; she produces a full, round and singing tone from her Steinway, her phrasing is good, and everything she does is, in a word, musicianly, and out doubt, when she has been a little longer before and gathered a little more experience, she will be in the rank of pianistes. It is a pity we did not hear her in numbers, as when she felt herself free from the orchestra the two Bülow cadenzas, the excellencies of her playing most apparent.

The very flattering reception accorded her by her audience must have been highly gratifying to the talented lady, and should encourage her to visit Boston again.

The three Hungarian dances were given with the dash by the orchestra that we are now already accustomed for from Mr. Gericke and the "Tannhäuser" overture rendered in a truly inspiring manner. I have never before this overture played so entirely to my liking here in last evening, and Mr. Gericke's talent as conductor shone splendid in this number. These weekly concerts are more and more what they ought to be and were intended true musical feasts.

A UBIQUITOUS VIOLONCELLIST!!—The manager of Mr. Fritz Giese, first violoncellist of the Symphony Concerts, advertises that artist as "Violoncellist of the New York, Boston and Philadelphia Philharmonic Societies." As there are no Philharmonic concerts in Boston, Berger and other 'cellists occupy their usual positions in harmonic concerts here, and as there are no permanent violoncellists in Philadelphia, we fail to see where the nouncement contains any truth. Mr. Giese, who is one of the most accomplished violoncellists in this country, is with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Quintet Club, and the advertisement referred to is a leading.

GERICKE.—Boston is agitated. Mr. Gericke has been to permit the absence of two of his violinists to allow him to play at another concert, thus breaking into the programmes. We await the news of his assassination with intense interest.

Melusine and the Seventh Symphony
and Journal

THE vocalist at the Symphony Concert, Agnes Huntington, with songs by Schubert and Schumann, and an aria by Handel, befits the time, there was also a string quartet by Handel, not before played here. These Mr. Lang had nothing to say in the lecture-lesson, confining his attention to the Beethoven Seventh and the Melusine overture. He began, however, with a few words about Trumpets. Generally the three, upon extraordinary occasion, a Wedding March) are in unison. Horns and trombones may be dispensed with, a less penalty, but the trumpet we must have. By the by, it is generally a cornet. Henschel had some real trumpets in order, but they didn't work. The mouthpiece was unfamiliar. The players, who have been long at their posts, were too busy and too old to learn new fashions. In England they have the genuine article. In Germany they use sometimes a trumpet with a cornet mouthpiece. Berlioz, for his Requiem, asks for four, eight, twelve trumpets, a band within a band. The trombone is good for graveyard effects. It increases the density. Haydn did not use it, even in the Creation and Seasons. Mendelssohn hurra'd that he could complete St. Paul without it. Yet as the bass-viol gives a basis for the lighter strings, so the trombone comes in for notes below the staff, where the trumpet is written. Wagner calls for more trumpets, and even invented a great basso to serve his purpose; and uses a battery of four tubas, snarly and pungent. Some future Raff may make these a component part of his orchestra. At this point Messrs. Bagley, Rigg, Moore, and Stewart were expected with three trombones and a cornet trumpet. Their tardiness drew some pleasantries from Mr. Lang, but after a pause they dawned upon us with a Beethoven Choral, designed to show the effect of these instruments in a small hall.

The Fair Melusine is the story of a husband who would ask questions about his wife's mysterious absence one day in seven, and lost her by the discovery that she was a mermaid. Mendelssohn liked the plot; and after hearing Kreuzer's opera, disliked the applauded overture so much that he declared he would write a proper one, which Schumann says is like a music leaf torn from primeval time. It is a piece of musical embroidery. In allusion to his Hebrides and his Calm Sea and Happy Voyage, the author said it would be the last of his water music. There is night and inquiry in it. Each hearer may build a pretty picture from this overture, and each one's picture is the best for him. Don't impose yours on your neighbor if he can't see it at once. Then the overture was played by Mr. Lang and Bertha Heidenreich. They presently played the Symphony, Mr. Lang prefacing each movement with a few hints. Weber declared that the author of such music was fit only for a madhouse, alluding partly to the repeated phrase which fills the 4th part for seven minutes—a criticism which only shows what fools musicians can be in their judgment of one another. The Seventh Symphony was first given to an audience of 6,000, for the benefit of soldiers wounded in the cause of Freedom, which Beethoven loved; and soon it was repeated to nearly as many more hearers, at the same high prices. The composer called it one of his best, and had something serious to say in it. He was already deaf, but was proud to have such distinguished men as Meyerbeer and Moscheles in the small orchestra. You may imagine, forgetting that there is already a Pastoral Symphony, that this is one—but not Rustic. In the third movement comes the merry-making. It might go on forever, like Tennyson's Brook, and its cessation is sweetly abrupt. The Allegretto, Beethoven thought of calling Andante. In fact he was of two minds about it.

THOSE UNABLE TO
FAVOR

The sustained A with the trumpet is like a touch of sunshine, yet with a wink in it. Then there is the Pilgrim's Hymn, borrowed from an air well known in Austria. Mr. Lang spoke of a visit to Paul Mendelssohn, who darkened the room for an orgy (as he called it), and then reverently produced, for loving inspection, Beethoven's original score of this Symphony.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.35 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE HUNGARIAN DANCES.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Schubert symphony, which Mr. Gericke introduced to Boston at Saturday evening's concert, was well worth the hearing, and set us to wondering why programme makers do not more often draw upon the vast stores of hitherto unheard symphonies and give some of them at least a single hearing, if only for the sake of the masters who wrote them and for the interest which would attach to them if only on account of their authorship. Many of Haydn, for instance, are left untouched, because two or three instruments of the modern orchestra are unrepresented in them,—“Car, enfin si on paie, c'est pour que tout le monde joue,” as says M. Tull after his experience of operatic accompaniments; and the idea seems to prevail that, if the public ear were not occupied by the full band, the public voice might protest. But such difference between them and the average standard of symphonic music could hardly be greater (in its way) than that observable in this sixth symphony of Schubert, which was yet thoroughly enjoyable and thoroughly enjoyed. There is little trace in it anywhere of strict symphonic severity, and, but for the fulness of the score and the length of most of the movements, it might almost as well be classed among suites. It is brimful of melodies, as fresh, as lucent, as worthily simple and as full of happiness and content as any of Haydn's, that run trippingly along, one interlacing with another, calling and responding, each to each, never shaded or saddened by sombre harmonies, and never lost in any formalism of treatment. There is no imitation of earlier masters, and yet there are times when Schubert seems to have breathed their atmosphere and to have expressed in his own language thoughts most sympathetic with theirs. In the allegro of the first movement, for instance, one feels such an air as blows through Beethoven's “Pastoral” symphony, and later on Mozart and Haydn are thus suggested in the temper and mood of several passages. The greater part of the melodic burden is laid upon the wooden wind—although the theme is first assigned to the violins in the andante—and there is scarcely a prominent phrase for the brass until the last movement is reached. The whole effect is genial and serene with little depth of absolute force or expression, and it leaves a gratifying impression.

Following the symphony came Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in G major,—No. 4, opus 58. The solo part of this was played by Miss Mary E. Garlicks, who is a stranger in Boston, and belongs, we believe, in New York. The unaffected modesty and quiet of the young lady's bearing at once disposed the audience in her favor, and their good opinion was maintained by the sincere earnestness of her playing, which had other excellent qualities whereby to commend itself to the critic as well as to the average listener. And first of all it was truly feminine, and—using the term in its best sense—ladylike. There was no attempt to force her powers into any but their natural channel, to display tricks of technique or to make tours de force, and so she played straight on, with an evident first thought for her author and her duty to him. Technically Miss Garlicks has much to commend her—clear, even scales, a beautiful trill, a sure and decisive, but not harsh, staccato, and a firm grasp of full chords, while, on the other hand, the use of the pedal is not always definite nor the withdrawal of it sufficiently prompt. Her reading of the concerto was rather that of a chamber player than of a concert artist of larger scheme, and hence it was that sometimes a phrase failed to quite fill its place in the complete statement of a passage, which, therefore, seemed ill-balanced. But it is not unlikely that a part at least of this lack of equableness might have been due to the tempo which Mr. Gericke chose for the allegri, which not only were evidently faster than Miss Garlicks had been accustomed to, but were also faster than has been customary here for most players.

The other numbers of the programme were both orchestral—three of Brahms's Hungarian dances, numbers one, two and six, and the “Tanhäuser” overture. These were all splendidly played and were received with great salvos of applause. The individuality of each of the three dances was admirably maintained, and particular effectiveness was felt in the almost languorous movement of the second (with exquisite oboe and horn work in the playing) and the entrain of the third. As for the overture, it only remains to repeat, with added insistence, what was said of “Der Freischütz”—that it might not unreasonably be called a revelation. The new emphasis which Mr. Gericke gave to the familiar phrases, the intellectual light and the passionate heat with which he infused it, as well as the really dramatic proportions which he made it assume, were each and all something to remember long.

At the next concert Mr. Listemann is to play the adagio and rondo from Paganini's first concerto, and the orchestra will give Haydn's second symphony, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, opus 56, and the instrumental numbers of Mendelssohn's “Midsummer Night's Dream” music. And as this mention has brought up Mr. Listemann's name, we may as well suggest that the first violins would do better to follow his bowing invariably. During the Brahms dances and the overture, three different bowings were frequently noticeable, and even Mr. Löffler, occupying the same desk with Mr. Listemann, was not always in agreement with him. And yet further—is it not time that Mr. Schmidt should return to his place at the second desk, or that his chair, which has been vacant for several concerts, should be definitely occupied by some one else?

102
peated to nearly as many more hearers, at the same high prices. The composer called it one of his best, and had something serious to say in it. He was already deaf, but was proud to have such distinguished men as Meyerbeer and Moscheles in the small orchestra. You may imagine, forgetting that there is already a Pastoral Symphony, that this is one—but not Rustic. In the third movement comes the merry-making. It might go on forever, like Tennyson's Brook, and its cessation is sweetly abrupt. The Allegretto, Beethoven thought of calling Andante. In fact he was of two minds about it.

The sustained A with the trumpet is like a touch of sunshine, yet with a wink in it. Then there is the Pilgrim's Hymn, borrowed from an air well known in Austria. Mr. Lang spoke of a visit to Paul Mendelssohn, who darkened the room for an orgy (as he called it), and then reverently produced, for loving inspection, Beethoven's original score of this Symphony.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Schubert symphony, which Mr. Gericke introduced to Boston at Saturday evening's concert, was well worth the hearing, and set us to wondering why programme makers do not more often draw upon the vast stores of hitherto unheard symphonies and give some of them at least a single hearing, if only for the sake of the masters who wrote them and for the interest which would attach to them if only on account of their authorship. Many of Haydn, for instance, are left untouched, because two or three instruments of the modern orchestra are unrepresented in them,—“Car, en fin si on paie, c'est pour que tout le monde joue,” as says M. Titi after his experience of operatic accompaniments; and the idea seems to prevail that, if the public ear were not occupied by the full band, the public voice might protest. But such difference between them and the average standard of symphonic music could hardly be greater (in its way) than that observable in this sixth symphony of Schubert, which was yet thoroughly enjoyable and thoroughly enjoyed. There is little trace in it anywhere of strict symphonic severity, and, but for the fulness of the score and the length of most of the movements, it might almost as well be classed among suites. It is brimful of melodies, as fresh, as lucent, as worthily simple and as full of happiness and content as any of Haydn's, that run trippingly along, one interlacing with another, calling and responding, each to each, never shaded or saddened by sombre harmonies, and never lost in any formalism of treatment. There is no imitation of earlier masters, and yet there are times when Schubert seems to have breathed their atmosphere and to have expressed in his own language thoughts most sympathetic with theirs. In the allegro of the first movement, for instance, one feels such an air as blows through Beethoven's “Pastoral” symphony, and later on Mozart and Haydn are thus suggested in the temper and mood of several passages. The greater part of the melodic burden is laid upon the wooden wind—although the theme is first assigned to the violins in the andante—and there is scarcely a prominent phrase for the brass until the last movement is reached. The whole effect is genial and serene with little depth of absolute force or expression, and it leaves a gratifying impression.

Following the symphony came Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in G major,—No. 4, opus 58. The solo part of this was played by Miss Mary E. Garlicks, who is a stranger in Boston, and belongs, we believe, in New York. The unaffected modesty and quiet of the young lady's bearing at once disposed the audience in her favor, and their good opinion was maintained by the sincere earnestness of her playing, which had other excellent qualities whereby to commend itself to the critic as well as to the average listener. And first of all it was truly feminine, and—using the term in its best sense—ladylike. There was no attempt to force her powers into any but their natural channel, to display tricks of technique or to make tours de force, and so she played straight on, with an evident first thought for her author and her duty to him. Technically Miss Garlicks has much to commend her—clear, even scales, a beautiful trill, a sure and decisive, but not harsh, staccato, and a firm grasp of full chords, while, on the other hand, the use of the pedal is not always definite nor the withdrawal of it sufficiently prompt. Her reading of the concerto was rather that of a chamber player than of a concert artist of larger scheme, and hence it was that sometimes a phrase failed to quite fill its place in the complete statement of a passage, which, therefore, seemed ill-balanced. But it is not unlikely that a part at least of this lack of equableness might have been due to the tempi which Mr. Gericke chose for the allegri, which not only were evidently faster than Miss Garlicks had been accustomed to, but were also faster than has been customary here for most players.

The other numbers of the programme were both orchestral—three of Brahms's Hungarian dances, numbers one, two and six, and the “Tänzer” overture. These were all splendidly played and were received with great salvos of applause. The individuality of each of the three dances was admirably maintained, and particular effectiveness was felt in the almost languorous movement of the second (with exquisite oboe and horn work in the playing) and the entrain of the third. As for the overture, it only remains to repeat, with added insistence, what was said of “Der Freischütz”—that it might not unreasonably be called a revelation. The new emphasis which Mr. Gericke gave to the familiar phrases, the intellectual light and the passionate heat with which he infused it, as well as the really dramatic proportions which he made it assume, were each and all something to remember long.

At the next concert Mr. Listemann is to play the adagio and rondo from Paganini's first concerto, and the orchestra will give Haydn's second symphony, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, opus 56, and the instrumental numbers of Mendelssohn's “Midsummer Night's Dream” music. And as this mention has brought up Mr. Listemann's name, we may as well suggest that the first violins would do better to follow his bowing invariably. During the Brahms dances and the overture, three different bowings were frequently noticeable, and even Mr. Löffler, occupying the same desk with Mr. Listemann, was not always in agreement with him. And yet further—is it not time that Mr. Schmidt should return to his place at the second desk, or that his chair, which has been vacant for several concerts, should be definitely occupied by some one else?

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.35 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE HUNGARIAN DANCES.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.35 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE NOTTURNO OF THE LAST NUMBER.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 6TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HAYDN,

SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major.
Adagio; Allegro.—Andante.—Menuetto.—
Allegro spiritoso.—

PAGANINI,

ADAGIO AND RONDO from the Concerto
No. 1, in D major.

BRAHMS,

VARIATIONS on a THEME by Joseph Haydn,
op. 56.

MENDELSSOHN,

OVERTURE, SCHERZO, NOTTURNO, and WEDDING MARCH, from MIDSUMMERNIGHT'S DREAM.

SOLOIST:

MR. BERNHARD LISTEMANN.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Bernhard Listemann has scarcely no reason to question whether the symphony concert audiences appreciate him or not, after his experience of their temper on Saturday evening, for not only was his reception one of the heartiest, but he was compelled to rise again and again in response to the storm of applause which rewarded his wonderful playing of the adagio and rondo from Paganini's first violin concerto. The first movement was given with a reposeful smoothness which he does not always attain, and the immense difficulties of the second were accomplished with that technical mastery and nervous power which place Mr. Listemann in the front rank of living violinists.

The rest of the programme was all for full orchestra, and began with Haydn's second symphony, which was excellently played, with nothing of exaggeration, and with much variety of volume within a limit which almost never touched an extreme of force. The andante, which continues so long almost in exact string-quartet fashion, was an admirable example of strict ligato playing, and the brief responses of the wind instruments were in nice proportion. The last movement, allegro spiritoso, was justly interpreted, in that spirit was not confounded with noise.

Later came a long set of variations by Brahms upon a theme by Haydn, of which a considerable part might well have been spared, even at the risk of impinging upon the writer's notions of continuity. Two or three of these variations—particularly the last and the last but one—were close to the spirit of the original in their form and color, but the most of them could only be interesting as illustrating Brahms skill in orchestration and his ingenuity in so interweaving theme and counter theme, plot and under plot, as to "make the worse appear the better reason," and perplex the hearer as to whereabouts in the labyrinth of polyphonic he might hope to find even a fragment of the thread which ought to be his guide to light and enjoyment. Really, there is enough fine and delightful music in the world to fill out the concerts of a life time, without eking out programmes which are meant primarily for popular enjoyment with abstruse or irrelevant arrangements, which can appeal to few but students or professional musicians, and must necessarily be wearisome to the majority.

The last part of the concert—which was a long one, not ending until about a quarter of ten—was devoted to a performance of the four orchestral numbers, from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. There were charming traits in the playing of the overture—its delicacy, its clearness, its real pianissimo, and the soft entrances of the brief under phrases which are so often blurted out with a harsh snort; but, on the other hand, it was rushed through at a speed which may be according to present German standards, but which sounded strangely enough here, although perhaps it claimed more with tradition than with the essence of the music. The flute in the scherzo and the horn in the nocturne deserve mention for their goodness, and there was splendid energy in the wedding march, whose trumpets never blared, and whose cymbals clashed with a delightful clangor instead of being banged together on the top of a drum.

Eighth Programme—Mr. Bernhard Listemann, Soloist.

The eighth of the season's series of symphony concerts, given at Music Hall last evening under Herr Gericke's direction, had Mr. Bernhard Listemann, violinist, as soloist, and the following programme:

Symphony No. 2, in D major..... Haydn
Adagio and Rondo from the Concerto, No. 1, in D major..... Paganini
Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn, op. 56..... Brahms
Overture, Scherzo, Notturmo, and Wedding March, from "Midsummer-Night's Dream"..... Mendelssohn

It was a mistake to admit Brahms as a disturbing element in such an otherwise delightful programme. If this composer must juggle with musical themes, he should take those of his own composition rather than meddle with the beautiful ideas of a master mind like that of Haydn. The variations simply proved the remarkable ability possessed by Brahms in the use of the orchestra to present the self-same idea in an infinite variety of forms, and, as an illustration of this ability, they are poorly suited to the concert room. However, only 20 minutes was wasted in this portion of the programme, and the balance of the evening was so enjoyable that it more than rewarded the listener for the weariness caused by the Brahms number. The symphony is the 12th of those composed by Haydn in London when he was in the height of his fame and found a ready recognition for all of his compositions. It is a perfect gem in all its movements and gives uninterrupted delight from first to last, the purity and gracefulness of its themes, the dainty airiness of its measures, and the ever changing moods of the composer making the work to be one of the most fascinating beauty. It is wholesome, restful and elevating to hear such compositions, and it is to be hoped that more than a single one of this composer's similar works will be included in the season's scheme of programmes. The presentation of the symphony was above all criticism, the delicate light and shade of the several movements being presented with charming clearness throughout. Mr. Listemann was the recipient of quite an ovation as he rose from his desk, at the head of the violins, to play the Paganini selection, but the applause which rewarded him at its conclusion was such that he was called to acknowledge it a half-dozen times before the enthusiasm of the audience was quieted. It is hardly necessary to speak at length of the work of this artist, whose sterling worth is equalled only by his modesty. He has never been heard to better advantage than on this occasion, and the skill of the musician, the true instinct of the musician and the genius of the man were alike clearly shown in the masterly playing of these beautiful selections. Herr Gericke and his musicians have done nothing better than the performance of the "Midsummer-Night's Dream" music, and the enjoyment of the audience in listening to Mendelssohn's graceful measures found expression in the most demonstrative fashion. The selections were given with a fascinating wealth of sentiment, and with a poetic expression eminently in keeping with the spirit of the composition.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Bernhard Listemann has scarcely no reason to question whether the symphony concert audiences appreciate him or not, after his experience of their temper on Saturday evening, for not only was his reception one of the heartiest, but he was compelled to rise again and again in response to the storm of applause which rewarded his wonderful playing of the adagio and rondo from Paganini's first violin concerto. The first movement was given with a reposeful smoothness which he does not always attain, and the immense difficulties of the second were accomplished with that technical mastery and nervous power which place Mr. Listemann in the front rank of living violinists.

The rest of the programme was all for full orchestra, and began with Haydn's second symphony, which was excellently played, with nothing of exaggeration, and with much variety of volume within a limit which almost never touched an extreme of force. The andante, which continues so long almost in exact string-quartet fashion, was an admirable example of strict ligato playing, and the brief responses of the wind instruments were in nice proportion. The last movement, allegro spiritoso, was justly interpreted, in that spirit was not confounded with noise.

Later came a long set of variations by Brahms upon a theme by Haydn, of which a considerable part might well have been spared, even at the risk of impinging upon the writer's notions of continuity. Two or three of these variations—particularly the last and the last but one—were close to the spirit of the original in their form and color, but the most of them could only be interesting as illustrating Brahms skill in orchestration and his ingenuity in so interweaving theme and counter theme, plot and under plot, as to "make the worse appear the better reason," and perplex the hearer as to whereabouts in the labyrinth of polyphonic he might hope to find even a fragment of the thread which ought to be his guide to light and enjoyment. Really, there is enough fine and delightful music in the world to fill out the concerts of a life time, without eking out programmes which are meant primarily for popular enjoyment with abstruse or irrelevant arrangements, which can appeal to few but students or professional musicians, and must necessarily be wearisome to the majority.

The last part of the concert—which was a long one, not ending until about a quarter of ten—was devoted to a performance of the four orchestral numbers, from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. There were charming traits in the playing of the overture—its delicacy, its clearness, its real pianissimo, and the soft entrances of the brief under phrases which are so often blurted out with a harsh snort; but, on the other hand, it was rushed through at a speed which may be according to present German standards, but which sounded strangely enough here, although perhaps it claimed more with tradition than with the essence of the music. The flute in the scherzo and the horn in the nocturne deserve mention for their goodness, and there was splendid energy in the wedding march, whose trumpets never blared, and whose cymbals glashed with a delightful clangor instead of being banged together on the top of a drum.

Eighth Programme—Mr. Bernhard Listemann, Soloist.

The eighth of the season's series of symphony concerts, given at Music Hall last evening under Herr Gericke's direction, had Mr. Bernhard Listemann, violinist, as soloist, and the following programme:

Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Haydn
Adagio and Rondo from the Concerto, No. 1, in D major.....Paganini
Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn, op. 56...Brahms
Overture, Scherzo, Notturmo, and Wedding March, from "Midsummer-Night's Dream"....Mendelssohn

It was a mistake to admit Brahms as a disturbing element in such an otherwise delightful programme. If this composer must juggle with musical themes, he should take those of his own composition rather than meddle with the beautiful ideas of a master mind like that of Haydn. The variations simply proved the remarkable ability possessed by Brahms in the use of the orchestra to present the self-same idea in an infinite variety of forms, and, as an illustration of this ability, they are poorly suited to the concert room. However, only 20 minutes was wasted in this portion of the programme, and the balance of the evening was so enjoyable that it more than rewarded the listener for the weariness caused by the Brahms number. The symphony is the 12th of those composed by Haydn in London when he was in the height of his fame and found a ready recognition for all of his compositions. It is a perfect gem in all its movements and gives uninterrupted delight from first to last, the purity and gracefulness of its themes, the dainty airiness of its measures, and the ever changing moods of the composer making the work to be one of the most fascinating beauty. It is wholesome, restful and elevating to hear such compositions, and it is to be hoped that more than a single one of this composer's similar works will be included in the season's scheme of programmes. The presentation of the symphony was above all criticism, the delicate light and shade of the several movements being presented with charming clearness throughout. Mr. Listemann was the recipient of quite an ovation as he rose from his desk, at the head of the violins, to play the Paganini selection, but the applause which rewarded him at its conclusion was such that he was called to acknowledge it a half-dozen times before the enthusiasm of the audience was quieted. It is hardly necessary to speak at length of the work of this artist, whose sterling worth is equalled only by his modesty. He has never been heard to better advantage than on this occasion, and the skill of the musician, the true instinct of the musician and the genius of the man were alike clearly shown in the masterly playing of these beautiful selections. Herr Gericke and his musicians have done nothing better than the performance of the "Midsummer-Night's Dream" music, and the enjoyment of the audience in listening to Mendelssohn's graceful measures found expression in the most demonstrative fashion. The selections were given with a fascinating wealth of sentiment, and with a poetic expression eminently in keeping with the spirit of the composition.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Key note

Dec 13/64

A lighter programme than usual was given at the Boston Symphony Concert last Saturday evening. It consisted of:

Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Haydn.
Adagio—Allegro—Andante—Menuetto—Allegro spiritoso.
Adagio and Rondo, from the Concerto No. 1, in D major...Paganini
B. Listemann.
Variations on a Theme, by Joseph Haydn, op. 56.....Brahms.
Overture, Scherzo, Notturmo, and Wedding March, from Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn.

The Haydn Symphony charmed more by its melodic grace than by any force of treatment. When one views the slender dimensions of some of the Haydn Symphonies, one ceases to wonder that the composer gave forth one hundred and twenty-five symphonies. But at least all of them are melodic, and have spontaneity enough to make the modern symphonist grow green with envy. The last movement with its figure of the folk-dance type, and its delicious drone effect, is the finest of the work. I cannot say that the orchestra played quite as finely as usually, for there was considerable roughness in the first two movements, the violins not being well together. I admired the conservative style in which Mr. Gericke took the first movements. He evidently bore in mind the fact that fast movements have grown faster, and slow movements slower, since Father Haydn's time. But I found the last movement an exception to this reading, for it was taken too rapidly to give its true meaning.

It was a tremendous change to go from Haydn, in the original, to Haydn twisted out of shape by Brahms. The one was all grace and beauty, the other all learning. One felt a vehement desire to strike an average between the two and thus improve both. Haydn would certainly have been astonished to have heard Brahms' treatment of his melody—that is, if he had by any accident discovered that it was his melody. But it was a good study of instrumentation nevertheless, and one could follow the rumblings of contra-bassoon, and the writhings of the contra-basses with some interest, even if without any enthusiasm. Mr. Listemann was the central figure of this concert. He was greeted with enthusiasm when he rose to begin his solo, and a still more vehement applause when he had finished. The rondo teemed with difficulties. Beginning at once with phrases for skipping bow, mingled with pizzicato notes, it gives every species of violin fireworks, even to double stopping on the harmonics. All these difficulties were overcome by Mr. Listemann in good style, save that the harmonics did not speak promptly and clear, possibly because of the damp atmosphere.

The Mendelssohn numbers were admirably given by the orchestra, the skipping, fairy figures on the strings (a premonition of Berlioz's Feu Fallet), the snoring of the enchanted weaver, Bottom, on the Ophicleide (given this time on the bass tuba, we believe), and all the other delicate touches of humor or grace were brought out with excellent effect. Although the overture preceded the rest of the numbers in order of composition by some seventeen years, I find it to be the more spontaneous and generally delightful work of the set. The "Notturmo," however, reveals the Mendelssohn we know best, and its peaceful horn passages (one of which broke badly) are in the composer's most refined vein.

The interest in the concerts is decidedly increasing, and Mr. Gericke is winning a firm hold on the public.

Next week the programme embraces Mme. Fursch Madi (of course only metaphorically and in a solo), and the Heroic Symphony.

L. C. E.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Haydn: Symphony No. 2, in D major.
Paganini: Adagio and Rondo, from Concerto No. 1, in D major.
Brahms: Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn, op. 56.
Mendelssohn: Overture, Scherzo, Notturmo and Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Mr. Bernhard Listemann was the violinist.

This programme was given last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, at the eighth symphony concert. It was certainly, with the exception of one number, one of the most delightful programmes of the season. The Haydn symphony, one of the master's great ones, was admirably played; to do justice to the performance we should have to repeat all that we have written about the singular excellence of Mr. Gericke's readings of the works of this school. One little point seemed new. Mr. Gericke takes the grace note near the end of the first phrase of the principal theme in the andante as an acciaccatura instead of an appoggiatura, as we have been accustomed to hear it played heretofore. This slight change gives a light, airy grace to the phrase which is infinitely charming. It was interesting to hear the Brahms variations almost immediately after a composition by Haydn himself. From the very start Brahms proclaims his own individuality plainly enough. In his very exposition of the theme itself, his ponderous instrumentation (low and medium horn tones, contra fagotto, etc.) robs the theme of all its Haydnish character; it sounds as if Brahms himself had written it. But then it is perfectly evident that Brahms's aim in writing these variations was anything but to perform an act of homage to Haydn. His wholesale appropriation of Haydn's theme for his own purposes results in giving his work a far greater unity of character than it would have had had he begun by letting Haydn occupy the foreground. It were difficult for us to express adequately our admiration for these variations of Brahms. They are simply stupendous. The composer, with all his rich and potent individuality, has worthily walked in the noble path which was travelled before him by Bach (in his chaconne and C minor Passacaglia), Beethoven (in his variations on the Diabelli waltz) and Schumann (in his Etudes Symphoniques). Let us not be understood to mean by this any such nonsense as that these variations by Brahms are the culminating splendor, of which the works of Bach, Beethoven and Schumann were merely the way-breaking forerunners. We merely mean that the Brahms variations are in every way worthy companions of the works in this form by his greatest predecessors. The selections from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music were given with great éclat, if with somewhat less of winsome delicacy than we have learned to expect from our excellent orchestra.

Mr. Listemann played the two movements from the Paganini concerto with complete mastery in every respect. His performance was wonderfully fine. One could wish, however, that this haggard and wizened old concerto (which is quite old enough to know better) would in some way be prevented from practising its selections upon excellent violinists. The work should be impressed with the fact that it is too infirm to risk itself out of bed.

EIGHTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The eighth symphony concert was genial rather than exciting in the effect of about three-fourths of its programme; as for the other fourth it need only be stated that its music was by Brahms—in order to convey an inference as to its thoroughly ungenial character. The symphony was by Haydn, a time-honored favorite—his No. 2 in D major—and a work that even now should be admired for something more than its nominal value. Were the absolute merit of such a symphony to be equalled by any modern composer and yet without the slightest imitation of its style, it would no doubt be treated as of inferior importance; but Haydn was at least a great composer for the age in which he lived, and many years will elapse before an estimate of his fame will cease to interfere with that just appreciation of his symphonies which has more to do with homage than with enjoyment. Mr. Listemann received a perfect ovation when he appeared as soloist for the adagio and rondo of Paganini's concerto in D. His playing was replete with evidences of that skill the possession of which has caused him to be regarded as one of the most gifted and capable violin virtuosos of the present age. The expression he imparted, especially in the adagio movement, seemed to have been more scholastically thought out than deeply felt, and was indeed only spontaneous at times when certain spasms of accentuation seemed to illustrate not so much the intent of the composer as the uncontrollably nervous temperament of the performer. Mr. Listemann seemed wholly unconscious of the technical difficulties of the concerto. As usual the most praiseworthy effect of his playing was in the evidence it afforded of his ability as an executant, double harmonics being played with exquisite nicety of effect, while rapidity of execution added its share to the marvellous virtuosity of his performance. Next followed the variations by Brahms, to a theme by Haydn. The work is charmingly orchestrated, but aside from this its merit is so perverted by that ambiguity of expression so characteristic of Brahms as to cause one to wonder as to why it should ever have been composed. The concert ended with a performance of the music in Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream. The orchestral playing at the concert was exceedingly good in points of tonal contrast and attention to some of the most delicate effects of light and shade, though too much of the music in the Mendelssohn selection was taken at a rate of speed that was unjust if not inartistic in its effect.

Home Journal

[Deferred Notice.] Continued

The extreme pressure upon our columns forbids an extended review of the concert on the 7th inst., nor is a lengthy criticism necessary, for the programme, although pleasing in some of its portions, was not new, either in its general style or in its soloist. The Haydn Symphony is not a highly developed work, and charms far more by its melodic grace than by any force of treatment. One can partially understand how Haydn could write 125 symphonies, when one sees the slender dimensions of some of them. The andante was the most charming movement of the work, giving a melody of much tenderness, which was performed in a style commensurate with its beauty. It was a strange contrast to go from Haydn to Brahms, and one not without educational value. The symphony was all melody, freshness and simple grace, the Brahms variations were all learning and intricacy. One longed to strike an average between the two and thus improve both. Haydn would certainly have been unable to recognize the theme which Brahms treated, or maltreated. Mr. B. Listemann was the central figure of the programme, and was applauded to the echo. His selection from Paganini was a piece of violin pyrotechnics, given in an appropriate fiery manner.

The Mendelssohn music was splendidly given with excellent shading and expression. One cannot perceive the gap of seventeen years between the overture and the remainder of the work in any of the music. The advantage, if any, is on the side of the earlier portion—the overture—where the string figures, illustrating the fairy's revel, ophicleide tones (bass tuba in this instance, we believe), portraying the snoring weaver, Bottom, and other graphic touches combine to make a most effective tone picture.

Eighth Symphony Concert.
The following programme was given at the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, at Union Hall Saturday evening, Mr. Bernhard Listemann, the leading violin of the orchestra, appearing as soloist:

Symphony No. 2 in D major.....Haydn
Adagio and Rondo from the Concerto, No. 1, in D major.....Paganini
Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn, Op. 50.....Brahms
Overture, Scherzo, Notturmo and Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn

Looking at Haydn's portrait, one finds that his face is remarkable quite as much for what it does not as for what it does express. There is no ambition, no avarice, no impatience, very little excitability and no malice at all. On the other hand it indicates a placid flow of health and an exceeding good humor, combined with vivacity which seems to say, "I must lose my temper sometimes, but I cannot lose it for long." There is an expression of warm affection, but not intense; an indication of a mind contented almost anywhere, attaching supreme importance to one thing only—the composing of music—and pursuing this object with the steady instinct of one who believed himself to have come into the world for this purpose alone. Such was Franz Joseph Haydn, born in 1732. At the age of 18 he composed his first stringed quartette, which does not differ materially from other cabinet music of the period, save in being written for four instruments. But when he came to his No. 50 all traces of imitation begin to disappear, the movements become fewer, but longer, and yet quite symphonic in their development, until we break upon such perfect gems as 63, while in 77, 78, 81 the master reaches that perfect form and freedom of harmony which are observed in the quartettes of Mozart and Beethoven. The quartettes of Haydn have never been surpassed. Mozart was richer in resources, Beethoven more sublime, Spohr more melodious and chromatic, Schubert more diffuse and luxuriant, Mendelssohn more orchestral and passionate, but none excelled Haydn in completeness of form, in fine perception of the capacities of the four instruments, in delicate distribution of parts to each, and in effects always legitimate, often tender, playful and pathetic, and sometimes even sublime. At the age of 28 Haydn composed his first symphony, and thus struck the second keynote of his originality. Soon after this he had the good fortune to attract the attention of a man whose family has since become intimately associated with musical genius in Germany. This was old Prince Esterhazy. The fabulous fortune of this Hungarian nobleman allowed him to keep an orchestra composed of first-rate soloists, and he took Haydn for its conductor. Every morning a new composition was laid upon the Prince's breakfast table, generally something for his favorite instrument, the baritone, a kind of violoncello. One hundred and fifty of these pieces, we believe, are extant, and so Haydn lived contented, laborious and entirely unambitious. But it is proved that perfect happiness is not of this world. The luxury and the most extravagant expenses of Prince Esterhazy brought him severe remonstrances from the Emperor Francis II., and the Prince decided to discharge his orchestra and lessen by so much his fabulous expenses. It was decided that the last concert should be given before the whole court, and that Haydn should compose a new symphony for that purpose. During the performance of the allegro, of the menuet and the andante a certain dullness was spread on the face of the conductor, but nobody could guess the conclusion, when suddenly, in the middle of the finale, the kettle drummer struck a very mournful note, blew out his candle and left his seat. The trombones, the horns and other instruments did the same in succession, and finally the violins, blowing out their lights, left their seats also, but Haydn continued to conduct, and with eyes full of tears he looked at the Prince, making him understand that if the orchestra must be discharged he would never leave his friend and protector. Esterhazy, moved to the highest degree, addressed to the Emperor the following words: "Allow me to get ruined. Haydn is dearer to me than the money." The performance of Haydn's second symphony Saturday evening was undoubtedly perfect in its ensemble.

Mr. Listemann rendered the adagio and the rondo of Paganini's concerto with most striking effect. In the adagio he proved himself to belong to the great school of Spohr, Kreutzer, Viotti and Bailat by his way of phrasing and by the way he draws the tone out of his instrument. In the rondo he was scintillating with grace and gaiety. His staccati are of marvelous purity, and he renders the double flageolets, one of the greatest difficulties in Paganini's compositions, with so much ease and the pizzicati with such brio that he must be admitted to be a master in his art. Brahms's variations on a theme of Haydn were probably put in Saturday's programme with the intention of showing how even the finest dish can be spoiled by bad preparation. We must say first that Haydn had nothing to do with these variations except in connection with a few bars in the beginning and at the end. The rest of the work was a sort of Mayonnaise of combinations without rhyme or reason. Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream was very satisfying. This overture, finely performed throughout, is full of the mystery of a summer night, filled with perfume of flowers and the play of the will-o'-the-wisp, the scherzo giving a playful expression of joy, the nocturne melodious and full of suavity and the march replete with majesty. The ninth concert will be given on Saturday evening next, with Mme. Fursch-Madl, soprano, as soloist. The programme will be as follows: Overture, "Rosamunde," Schubert; scena and aria, "Ah, perfido!" Beethoven; variations on the Austrian National Hymn, Haydn; romanza, "Herodiade," Massenet; symphony in E flat, "Eroica," No. 3, op. 55, Beethoven.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Attractive Programme—Mr. Bernhard Listemann's Success.

No stronger proof of the popularity of the symphony concerts could be given than the large audience assembled in Music Hall last evening. Bernhard Listemann was the soloist. He played that enormously difficult violin concerto (Paganini No. 1 in D major) with which so few men on the continent are said to be able successfully to cope. As this is not the first time Mr. Listemann has essayed this work before a Boston audience, his wonderful performance did not at all surprise his hearers, although it caused many of them to hold their breath. His work aroused a storm of applause such as is not often bestowed upon any soloist at these concerts, and that is saying a great deal. The symphony was Haydn's (No. 2) and was played with a nicety and finish which reflects the highest credit upon Mr. Gericke and the orchestra. The programme for next week will be as follows:

Overture (Rosamunde).....Schubert
Scena and Aria (Ah perfido!).....Beethoven
Variations on the Austrian National Hymn.....Haydn
Romanza (Herodiade).....Massenet
Symphony in E flat (Eroica), No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
Soloist, Mme. Fursch-Madl.

In the Boston Symphony Concerts there seems to be a tendency to go to the old files. At least there are a great many Bach numbers. —Courier.

the work, giving a melody of much tenderness, which was performed in a style commensurate with its beauty. It was a strange contrast to go from Haydn to Brahms, and one not without educational value. The symphony was all melody, freshness and simple grace, the Brahms variations were all learning and intricacy. One longed to strike an average between the two and thus improve both. Haydn would certainly have been unable to recognize the theme which Brahms treated, or maltreated. Mr. B. Listemann was the central figure of the programme, and was applauded to the echo. His selection from Paganini was a piece of violin pyrotechnics, given in an appropriate fiery manner.

The Mendelssohn music was splendidly given with excellent shading and expression. One cannot perceive the gap of seventeen years between the overture and the remainder of the work in any of the music. The advantage, if any, is on the side of the earlier portion—the overture—where the string figures, illustrating the fairy's revel, ophicleide tones (bass tuba in this instance, we believe), portraying the snoring weaver, Bottom, and other graphic touches combine to make a most effective tone picture.

Eighth Symphony Concert.
The following programme was given at the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, at Union Hall Saturday evening, Mr. Bernhard Listemann, the leading violin of the orchestra, appearing as soloist:

Symphony No. 2, in D major,.....Haydn
Adagio and Rondo from the Concerto, No. 1, in D major.....Paganini
Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn, op. 50,.....Brahms

Overture, Scherzo, Nocturne and Wedding March, from "Midsummer Night's Dream"....Mendelssohn

Looking at Haydn's portrait, one finds that his face is remarkable quite as much for what it does not as for what it does express. There is no ambition, no avarice, no impatience, very little excitability and no malice at all. On the other hand it indicates a placid flow of health and an exceeding good humor, combined with vivacity which seems to say, "I must lose my temper sometimes, but I cannot lose it for long." There is an expression of warm affection, but not intense; an indication of a mind contented almost anywhere, attaching supreme importance to one thing only—the composing of music—and pursuing this object with the steady instinct of one who believed himself to have come into the world for this purpose alone. Such was Franz Joseph Haydn, born in 1732. At the age of 18 he composed his first stringed quartette, which does not differ materially from other cabinet music of the period, save in being written for four instruments. But when he came to his No. 50 all traces of imitation begin to disappear, the movements become fewer, but longer, and yet quite symphonic in their development, until we break upon such perfect gems as 63, while in 77, 78, 81 the master reaches that perfect form and freedom of harmony which are observed in the quartettes of Mozart and Beethoven. The quartettes of Haydn have never been surpassed. Mozart was richer in resources, Beethoven more sublime, Spohr more mellifluous and chromatic, Schubert more diffuse and luxuriant, Mendelssohn more orchestral and passionate, but none excelled Haydn in completeness of form, in fine perception of the capacities of the four instruments, in delicate distribution of parts to each, and in effects always legitimate, often tender, playful and pathetic, and sometimes even sublime. At the age of 28 Haydn composed his first symphony, and thus struck the second keynote of his originality. Soon after this he had the good fortune to attract the attention of a man whose family has since become intimately associated with musical genius in Germany. This was old Prince Esterhazy. The fabulous fortune of this Hungarian nobleman allowed him to keep an orchestra composed of first-rate soloists, and he took Haydn for its conductor. Every morning a new composition was laid upon the Prince's breakfast table, generally something for his favorite instrument, the baritone, a kind of violoncello. One hundred and fifty of these pieces, we believe, are extant, and so Haydn lived contented, laborious and entirely unambitious. But it is proved that perfect happiness is not of this world. The luxury and the most extravagant expenses of Prince Esterhazy brought him severe remonstrances from the Emperor Francis II., and the Prince decided to discharge his orchestra and lessen by so much his fabulous expenses. It was decided that the last concert should be given before the whole court, and that Haydn should compose a new symphony for that purpose. During the performance of the allegro, of the menuet and the andante a certain dullness was spread on the face of the conductor, but nobody could guess the conclusion, when suddenly, in the middle of the finale, the kettle drummer struck a very mournful note, blew out his candle and left his seat. The trombones, the horns and other instruments did the same in succession, and finally the violins, blowing out their lights, left their seats also, but Haydn continued to conduct, and with eyes full of tears he looked at the Prince, making him understand that if the orchestra must be discharged he would never leave his friend and protector. Esterhazy, moved to the highest degree, addressed to the Emperor the following words: "Allow me to get ruined. Haydn is dearer to me than the money." The performance of Haydn's second symphony Saturday evening was undoubtedly perfect in its ensemble.

Mr. Listemann rendered the adagio and the rondo of Paganini's concerto with most striking effect. In the adagio he proved himself to belong to the great school of Spohr, Kreutzer, Vioti and Baillat by his way of phrasing and by the way he draws the tone out of his instrument. In the rondo he was scintillating with grace and gaiety. His staccati are of marvelous purity, and he renders the double flageolets, one of the greatest difficulties in Paganini's compositions, with so much ease and the pizzicati with such brío that he must be admitted to be a master in his art. Brahms's variations on a theme of Haydn were probably put in Saturday's programme with the intention of showing how even the finest dish can be spoiled by bad preparation. We must say first that Haydn had nothing to do with these variations except in connection with a few bars in the beginning and at the end. The rest of the work was a sort of Mayonnaise of combinations without rhyme or reason. Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream was very satisfying. This overture, finely performed throughout, is full of the mystery of a summer night, filled with perfume of flowers and the play of the will-o'-the-wisp, the scherzo giving a playful expression of joy, the nocturne melodious and full of suavity and the march replete with majesty. The ninth concert will be given on Saturday evening next, with Mme. Fursch-Madl, soprano, as soloist. The programme will be as follows: Overture, "Rosamunde," Schubert; scena and aria, "Ah, perfido!" Beethoven; variations on the Austrian National Hymn, Haydn; romanza, "Herodiade," Massenet; symphony in E flat, "Eroica," No. 3, op. 55, Beethoven.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Attractive Programme—Mr. Bernhard Listemann's Success.

No stronger proof of the popularity of the symphony concerts could be given than the large audience assembled in Music Hall last evening. Bernhard Listemann was the soloist. He played that enormously difficult violin concerto (Paganini No. 1 in D major) with which so few men on the continent are said to be able successfully to cope. As this is not the first time Mr. Listemann has essayed this work before a Boston audience, his wonderful performance did not at all surprise his hearers, although it caused many of them to hold their breath. His work aroused a storm of applause such as is not often bestowed upon any soloist at these concerts, and that is saying a great deal. The symphony was Haydn's (No. 2) and was played with a nicety and finish which reflects the highest credit upon Mr. Gericke and the orchestra. The programme for next week will be as follows:

Overture (Rosamunde).....Schubert
Scena and Aria (Ah perfido!).....Beethoven
Variations on the Austrian National Hymn.....Haydn
Romanza (Herodiade).....Massenet
Symphony in E flat (Eroica), No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
Soloist, Mme. Fursch-Madl.

In the Boston Symphony Concerts there seems to be a tendency to go to the old files. At least there are a great many Bach numbers. —Courier.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The eighth symphony programme, played Saturday evening, consisted of these selections:

Haydn,	Symphony No. 2, in D major.
Paganini,	Adagio and Rondo from the Violin Concerto No. 1, in D major.
Brahms,	Variations on a theme by Joseph Haydn, op. 56.
Mendelssohn,	Overture, Scherzo, Notturmo, and Wedding March, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

The concert was chiefly interesting for the opportunity it afforded to compare the original Joseph Haydn with the recreated Brahms-envisioned Joseph Haydn, as seen in an endless chapter of variations upon an innocent theme of his which Brahms perpetuates in his opus No. 56. In the Symphony are simple, fresh-flowing themes, orchestrated with only modest means, almost unsophisticated in their uniform pleasantness of expression when contrasted with the more formal, vivid and intense manner of Schubert or Rubinstein, developed rather with the method of the heart than the head; while Brahms's treatment of Haydn as shown in these variations expresses just the advance in style that the distance between the epochs in which the two men wrote represents, albeit the form in which they are written is not symphonic. It would be hard to say which of the two is preferable as music. The symphonies of Haydn are always available illustrations for those purists in music who are troubled because form in writing tends to greater elaboration of idea and greater complexity of expression, which, with its corresponding loss of simplicity is, as they assert, a positive step rearward. It is quite probable that their attitude at the Saturday evening concert, while listening to these variations, was an unhappy one; for, of all modern masters, Brahms can represent the extreme of present methods of composition, and here he has unsparingly exercised his art. They number almost a half score, and in varied, rich and strong settings, recognize the simple melody upon which they are built, but with only a chance acquaintance, so to speak, which, while it discerns the subject, raises thereupon a structure of an almost heterogeneous character. The Symphony itself is not remarkable as exemplifying anything more than the great genial soul of one Papa Haydn, whose music stands first among the writers of the last generation for its wholesome, simple and direct expression of abounding, beneficent genius. Its performance gave an excellent opportunity for fine playing among the strings, which was well improved. The relaxation and pleasure which must accompany a revival of anything by Haydn appears, with our players, to have been merged into an understanding to play this symphony with particular and perfect expression, for the points of excellence in its performance were manifold. Especially fine was the Andante. Gericke's tempo in this movement, though very elastic, was never quite as fast as the Andante of Mendelssohn. In the Minuet the usual quaintness of the first figure was made more emphatic in the unity of the first violins, where their trill directly follows a very deliberate rest. The spiritoso of the last movement (Allegro spiritoso) was happily taken; not fast enough to blur, nor yet too moderate. In the Mendelssohn music the orchestra did not so quickly begin their revel, because of certain faulty opening chords, but with the quick violin figure its equilibrium was gained, and everything thereafter was as full of charm as one could wish. The overture is crowded with interest; the incessant whirl of the strings in their buzzing allegro, the vigorous entrance of the double basses, answering some new arrival in Bottom's Kingdom, are only episodes in this epitome of vivid musical characterization. Throughout the Scherzo follows much the same hilarity; here the two flutes in jolly concord were very clever. In the Nocturne the quartet of horns almost equalled their work in the Freischuetz overture; the unpleasant break, so often apparent with any well regulated horn (French horn) did not appear everything being excellently well phrased and sonorous. The well-known March was welcome, but the cymbal player insisted in maintaining his own tempo much of the time. The cymbals have become pleasantly conspicuous by not being tied down to the big drum; they should not become unpleasantly so for any reason. Mr. Bernhard Listemann, the leader of the violins of our orchestra, and a versatile musician, played the two movements from the violin concerto by Paganini. The Adagio is written for one mood, the Rondo for another. It may be well enough to preserve the intended context, but the impression which one receives from the staccato play and visible executant's faculty displayed in the Rondo is entirely opposed to the delightful poise and expressive tenderness shown in the Adagio. Mr. Listemann did not appear at first, to be in more than fair condition; doubtless the hearty greeting he received as he came forward to play did not make him any less nervous than usual. He was at his best in the Rondo, which he played with great abandon, spirit and intensity; the difficult harmonics were given tunefully and clear. At its close he was obliged to acknowledge a loud and long demonstration by the audience, the congratulations contained in a hearty hand grasp of Mr. Gericke and a basket of flowers. Next Saturday evening's concert will be notable. The orchestra will play: Overture (Rosamunde) Schubert; variations on the Austrian National Hymn, Haydn; Symphony in E-flat No. 3 (Eroica), Beethoven. Mme. Fursch-Madi will sing Beethoven's "Ah Perfido" and a Romanza by Massenet.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. We regret that the pressure of advertising patronage upon our columns will not permit us to dwell upon the generally excellent performance of Haydn's fine symphony in D; Mr. Bernard Listemann's playing of the Adagio and Rondo from Paganini's Concerto No. 1 in D; the coarse and slovenly playing of the hideously ugly variations under which Brahms has barbarously mutilated and buried an unoffending little theme by Haydn, and the reading of the overture, scherzo, nocturne and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" music. We also regret that we have not the space to dwell upon Mr. Gericke's tendency to take his allegros at an unwarrantably breakneck pace, as was evidenced on this occasion in his readings of the finale to the symphony and the Mendelssohn overture. The programme for the next concert will be Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde," Beethoven's scena and aria, "Ah Perfido," Haydn's variations on the Austrian National Hymn, a Romanza by Massenet, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Madame Fursch-Madi will be the soloist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The eighth symphony programme, played Saturday evening, consisted of these selections:

Haydn,	Symphony No. 2, in D major.
Paganini,	Adagio and Rondo from the Violin Concerto No. 1, in D major.
Brahms,	Variations on a theme by Joseph Haydn, op. 56.
Mendelssohn,	Overture, Scherzo, Notturmo, and Wedding March, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

The concert was chiefly interesting for the opportunity it afforded to compare the original Joseph Haydn with the recreated Brahms-envisioned Joseph Haydn, as seen in an endless chapter of variations upon an innocent theme of his which Brahms perpetuates in his opus No. 56. In the Symphony are simple, fresh-flowing themes, orchestrated with only modest means, almost unsophisticated in their uniform pleasantness of expression when contrasted with the more formal, vivid and intense manner of Schubert or Rubinstein, developed rather with the method of the heart than the head; while Brahms's treatment of Haydn as shown in these variations expresses just the advance in style that the distance between the epochs in which the two men wrote represents, albeit the form in which they are written is not symphonic. It would be hard to say which of the two is preferable as music. The symphonies of Haydn are always available illustrations for those purists in music who are troubled because form in writing tends to greater elaboration of idea and greater complexity of expression, which, with its corresponding loss of simplicity is, as they assert, a positive step rearward. It is quite probable that their attitude at the Saturday evening concert, while listening to these variations, was an unhappy one; for, of all modern masters, Brahms can represent the extreme of present methods of composition, and here he has unsparingly exercised his art. They number almost a half score; and in varied, rich and strong settings, recognize the simple melody upon which they are built, but with only a chance acquaintance, so to speak, which, while it discerns the subject, raises thereupon a structure of an almost heterogenous character. The Symphony itself is not remarkable as exemplifying anything more than the great genial soul of one Papa Haydn, whose music stands first among the writers of the last generation for its wholesome, simple and direct expression of abounding, beneficent genius. Its performance gave an excellent opportunity for fine playing among the strings, which was well improved. The relaxation and pleasure which must accompany a revival of anything by Haydn appears, with our players, to have been merged into an understanding to play this symphony with particular and perfect expression, for the points of excellence in its performance were manifold. Especially fine was the Andante. Gericke's tempo in this movement, though very elastic, was never quite as fast as the Andante of Mendelssohn. In the Minuet the usual quaintness of the first figure was made more emphatic in the unity of the first violins, where their trill directly follows a very deliberate rest. The spiritoso of the last movement (Allegro spiritoso) was happily taken; not fast enough to blur, nor yet too moderate. In the Mendelssohn music the orchestra did not so quickly begin their revel, because of certain faulty opening chords, but with the quick violin figure its equilibrium was gained, and everything thereafter was as full of charm as one could wish. The overture is crowded with interest; the incessant whirl of the strings in their buzzing allegro, the vigorous entrance of the double basses, answering some new arrival in Bottom's Kingdom, are only episodes in this epitome of vivid musical characterization. Throughout the Scherzo follows much the same hilarity; here the two flutes in jolly concord were very clever. In the Nocturne the quartet of horns almost equalled their work in the Freischuetz overture; the unpleasant break, so often apparent with any well regulated horn (French horn) did not appear everything being excellently well phrased and sonorous. The well-known March was welcome, but the cymbal player insisted in maintaining his own tempo much of the time. The cymbals have become pleasantly conspicuous by not being tied down to the big drum; they should not become unpleasantly so for any reason. Mr. Bernard Listemann, the leader of the violins of our orchestra, and a versatile musician, played the two movements from the violin concerto by Paganini. The Adagio is written for one mood, the Rondo for another. It may be well enough to preserve the intended context, but the impression which one receives from the staccato play and visible executant's faculty displayed in the Rondo is entirely opposed to the delightful poise and expressive tenderness shown in the Adagio. Mr. Listemann did not appear at first, to be in more than fair condition; doubtless the hearty greeting he received as he came forward to play did not make him any less nervous than usual. He was at his best in the Rondo, which he played with great abandon, spirit and intensity; the difficult harmonics were given tunefully and clear. At its close he was obliged to acknowledge a loud and long demonstration by the audience, the congratulations contained in a hearty hand grasp of Mr. Gericke and a basket of flowers. Next Saturday evening's concert will be notable. The orchestra will play: Overture (Rosamunde) Schubert; variations on the Austrian National Hymn, Haydn; Symphony in E-flat No. 3 (Eroica), Beethoven. Mme. Fursch-Madi will sing Beethoven's "Ah Perfido" and a Romanza by Massenet.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. We regret that the pressure of advertising patronage upon our columns will not permit us to dwell upon the generally excellent performance of Haydn's fine symphony in D; Mr. Bernard Listemann's playing of the Adagio and Rondo from Paganini's Concerto No. 1 in D; the coarse and slovenly playing of the hideously ugly variations under which Brahms has barbarously mutilated and buried an unoffending little theme by Haydn, and the reading of the overture, scherzo, nocturne and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" music. We also regret that we have not the space to dwell upon Mr. Gericke's tendency to take his allegros at an unwarrantably breakneck pace, as was evidenced on this occasion in his readings of the finale to the symphony and the Mendelssohn overture. The programme for the next concert will be Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde," Beethoven's scena and aria, "Ah Perfido," Haydn's variations on the Austrian National Hymn, a Romanza by Massenet, and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Madame Fursch-Madi will be the soloist.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 13TH, AT 8. P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUBERT,	OVERTURE, (Rosamunde).
MEYERBEER.	SCENA. (Il Profeta.)
HAYDN,	VARIATIONS on the Austrian National Hymn.
DUDLEY BUCK,	SUNSET. (SONG, with Piano.)
BEETHOVEN,	SYMPHONY in E flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55. Allegro con brio.—Marcia funebre. (Adagio assai.)— Scherzo. (Allegro vivace.)—Allegro molto; Poco Andante; Presto.—

SOLOIST:

MISS MARY H. HOW.

The Management regret that the illness of MME. FURSCH-MADI prevents her appearance as announced.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.35 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

SUNSET. (DUDLEY BUCK.)

Look off, dear love, across the sallow sands,
And mark yon meeting of the sun and sea:
How long they kiss, in sight of all the lands!
Ah longer, longer, longer we.

Now in the sea's red vintage melts the sun;
As Egypt's pearl dissolv'd in rosy wine,
And Cleopatra Night drinks all;
'Tis done! 'Tis done!

Love, lay thy hand in mine.
Come forth, O stars, and comfort heaven's heart;
Glimmer, ye waves, round else-unlighted sands;
O Night, divorce our sky and sun apart;
Never our lips, our hands.

THE NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A beautiful rendering of Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture began the symphony concert of Saturday evening; the announcement of the quick opening movements and the delivery of the pastoral cantabile, which comes a little later, were delicately soft and fine, and the irregular accents which fall here and there upon the last beat of a bar were touched exactly in the sense of their writing. The next orchestral number was Haydn's set of variations on the Austrian national hymn, which was interesting to hear so soon after the Brahms variations, given at the previous concert. The different spirit and tendency of the old school and the new could hardly be better illustrated. Haydn clings lovingly to his theme, never allowing it to be lost or disguised, and enwreathing with ornament through which it ever shines more beautiful, while Brahms seems to desire to get as far from his subject as possible, suggesting it distantly, or using it as a corner stone which is concealed under the architect's superstructure, and can only be recovered by disintegration of it. Haydn seems to hold the theme in highest honor, while Brahms apparently regards it only as a means to his end. Each in his way instructs and sets one thinking; but when pleasure is to be sought the young master cannot hold a place beside the old one. The evening ended with a noble and just performance of Beethoven's third symphony, the "Eroica." If Mr. Gericke's men have to work hard in the preparation of their music, they ought to feel repaid in the appreciation which they receive, for it is they, after all, who make the music, and of whom many are really soloists at one time or another, as their obbligati bring them into prominence. Nothing in this symphony was finer or more noticeable than just the variety of coloring which comes from the leader's persistence in getting the best that his capable forces can give.

The four movements have so often been presented like four great solid statements, that it was refreshing to hear instead the diversified eloquence, full of light and shade, of thought and picture, which the author wrote—to find for instance in the marcia funebre something beside a dull and heavy tramp, and to recognize in it a tenderness of solemn woe, which had its pulses and its phases, and which grew gradually to its stately climax. The first movement, too, was symmetrically worked up to a powerful pitch, without losing its gaiety by the way, while the piantissimi of the third and fourth movements and the brief horn passage in the third were quite perfect.

There devolved upon Miss Mary H. How the ungrateful duty of appearing in the stead of Mme. Fursch-Madl, who was prevented by illness from keeping her engagement. It always puts an artist at a disadvantage to take the place of another, even if both stand upon the same plane and come to meet equal expectations, and this disadvantage is at its height when a resident of modest professions is substituted for a celebrity. Miss How is therefore doubly to be complimented upon her success with the audience. Her first number was the "Ah, mio figlio" from the "Prophet," the limited time allowed her for preparation obliging her to use so common an air, because it was almost the only one in her repertory of which the orchestra parts were ready. She sang it with large style, breadth of tone and a warmth of feeling which showed a great advance in manner and in depth of expression. Later on she sang one of Dudley Buck's dreamy, wandering rancies, "Sunset," with delicate appreciation and enunciation; a stronger song would, perhaps, have been more in her favor, but she made more of this than we should have thought lay in it, and Mr. Gericke accompanied very well at the piano.

Mendelssohn's A minor symphony is chosen for Saturday evening next, preceded by Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and the ballet music from "La Vigne" of Rubinstein. Mr. Loeffler will be the soloist, and will play the adagio from Bruch's second violin concerto, and a Norwegian fantasy by Grieg.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The ninth of the season's series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, Herr William Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Mary H. How, contralto soloist, and the following programme:

Overture, "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Sextet, "Il Profeta," "O mia figlia".....Meyerbeer
Variations on the "Austrian National Hymn".....Haydn
"Sunset," song with piano.....Dudley Buck
Symphony in E flat, "Eroica," No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven

The delightful melodies of the "Rosamunde" overture were given with all possible expression by the orchestra, and made a very pleasing introduction to a most enjoyable concert. The Haydn variations illustrated in a marked fashion the difference between the work of the old-time master of the art of composition and that of the musical mechanic of today, whose treatment of Haydn's theme, in last week's programme, brought out such an expression of just indignation from all sources. Haydn recognizes the beauty of the theme and seeks only to embellish it with graceful ornamentations, retaining at all times the prominence of the grand old hymn, and never attempting to see how many twistings and turnings it can be made to assume, as Brahms has done in the number of last week's programme referred to. The reading of the symphony recalled the presentation of the first of the immortal nine under Herr Gericke's direction a few weeks ago, as the work was presented in a way to fully satisfy the most devoted follower of Beethoven. The merits of the orchestral numbers were keenly appreciated by the large audience in attendance. Miss How kindly consented to appear earlier in the season than her engagement demanded, on account of the illness and consequent absence of Mme. Fursch-Madl, who was to have been the soloist. Despite the somewhat hurried preparation incidental to her appearance under these circumstances, Miss How achieved a distinct success, and more than justified the anticipations caused by her efforts in former seasons. The sterling value of her vocal gifts was proven alike in each of her selections, and the fine intelligence displayed by the singer gave a rare degree of satisfaction. The noble delivery of "O mia figlia" displayed the rich, true tones of her voice to the best advantage, and Miss How was generously applauded upon the conclusion of each of her numbers.

SUNSET. (DUDLEY BUCK.)

Look off, dear love, across the sallow sands,
And mark yon meeting of the sun and sea:
How long they kiss, in sight of all the lands!
Ah longer, longer, longer we.

Now in the sea's red vintage melts the sun;
As Egypt's pearl dissolv'd in rosy wine,
And Cleopatra Night drinks all;
'Tis done! 'Tis done!

Love, lay thy hand in mine.
Come forth, O stars, and comfort heaven's heart;
Glimmer, ye waves, round else-unlighted sands;
O Night, divorce our sky and sun apart;
Never our lips, our hands.

THE NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A beautiful rendering of Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture began the symphony concert of Saturday evening; the announcement of the quick opening movements and the delivery of the pastoral cantabile, which comes a little later, were delicately soft and fine, and the irregular accents which fall here and there upon the last beat of a bar were touched exactly in the sense of their writing. The next orchestral number was Haydn's set of variations on the Austrian national hymn, which was interesting to hear so soon after the Brahms variations, given at the previous concert. The different spirit and tendency of the old school and the new could hardly be better illustrated. Haydn clings lovingly to his theme, never allowing it to be lost or disguised, and enwreathing with ornament through which it ever shines more beautiful, while Brahms seems to desire to get as far from his subject as possible, suggesting it distantly, or using it as a corner stone which is concealed under the architect's superstructure, and can only be recovered by disintegration of it. Haydn seems to hold the theme in highest honor, while Brahms apparently regards it only as a means to his end. Each in his way instructs and sets one thinking; but when pleasure is to be sought the young master cannot hold a place beside the old one. The evening ended with a noble and just performance of Beethoven's third symphony, the "Eroica." If Mr. Gericke's men have to work hard in the preparation of their music, they ought to feel repaid in the appreciation which they receive, for it is they, after all, who make the music, and of whom many are really soloists at one time or another, as their obbligati bring them into prominence. Nothing in this symphony was finer or more noticeable than just the variety of coloring which comes from the leader's persistence in getting the best that his capable forces can give.

The four movements have so often been presented like four great solid statements, that it was refreshing to hear instead the diversified eloquence, full of light and shade, of thought and picture, which the author wrote—to find for instance in the marcia funebre something beside a dull and heavy tramp, and to recognize in it a tenderness of solemn woe, which had its pulses and its phases, and which grew gradually to its stately climax. The first movement, too, was symmetrically worked up to a powerful pitch, without losing its gaiety by the way, while the pianissimi of the third and fourth movements and the brief horn passage in the third were quite perfect.

There devolved upon Miss Mary H. How the ungrateful duty of appearing in the stead of Mme. Fursch-Madi, who was prevented by illness from keeping her engagement. It always puts an artist at a disadvantage to take the place of another, even if both stand upon the same plane and come to meet equal expectations, and this disadvantage is at its height when a resident of modest professions is substituted for a celebrity. Miss How is therefore doubly to be complimented upon her success with the audience. Her first number was the "Ah, mio figlio" from the "Prophet," the limited time allowed her for preparation obliging her to use so common an air, because it was almost the only one in her repertory of which the orchestra parts were ready. She sang it with large style, breadth of tone and a warmth of feeling which showed a great advance in manner and in depth of expression. Later on she sang one of Dudley Buck's dreamy, wandering tancies, "Sunset," with delicate appreciation and enunciation; a stronger song, perhaps, have been more in her favor, but she made more of this than we should have thought lay in it, and Mr. Gericke accompanied very well at the piano.

Beethoven's A minor symphony is chosen for Saturday evening next, preceded by Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and the ballet music from "La Vierge" of Rubinstein. Mr. Loeffler will be the soloist, and will play the adagio from Bruch's second violin concerto, and a Norwegian fantasy by Edvard Grieg.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The ninth of the season's series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, Herr William Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Mary H. How, contralto soloist, and the following programme:

Overture, "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Sextet, "Il Profeta," "O mia figlia".....Meyerbeer
Variations on the "Austrian National Hymn".....Haydn
"Sunset," song with piano.....Dudley Buck
Symphony in E flat, "Eroica," No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven

The delightful melodies of the "Rosamunde" overture were given with all possible expression by the orchestra, and made a very pleasing introduction to a most enjoyable concert. The Haydn variations illustrated in a marked fashion the difference between the work of the old-time master of the art of composition and that of the musical mechanic of today, whose treatment of Haydn's theme, in last week's programme, brought out such an expression of just indignation from all sources. Haydn recognizes the beauty of the theme and seeks only to embellish it with graceful ornamentations, retaining at all times the prominence of the grand old hymn, and never attempting to see how many twistings and turnings it can be made to assume, as Brahms has done in the number of last week's programme referred to. The reading of the symphony recalled the presentation of the first of the immortal nine under Herr Gericke's direction a few weeks ago, as the work was presented in a way to fully satisfy the most devoted follower of Beethoven. The merits of the orchestral numbers were keenly appreciated by the large audience in attendance. Miss How kindly consented to appear earlier in the season than her engagement demanded, on account of the illness and consequent absence of Mme. Fursch-Madi, who was to have been the soloist. Despite the somewhat hurried preparation incidental to her appearance under these circumstances, Miss How achieved a distinct success, and more than justified the anticipations caused by her efforts in former seasons. The sterling value of her vocal gifts was proven alike in each of her selections, and the fine intelligence displayed by the singer gave a rare degree of satisfaction. The noble delivery of "O mia figlia" displayed the rich, true tones of her voice to the best advantage, and Miss How was generously applauded upon the conclusion of each of her numbers.

Schubert's Rosamunde and Beethoven's Heroic Symphony. Dec 20/89

THE Ninth Boston Symphony Concert included Haydn's Variations on the Austrian Hymn, but Mr. Lang's lesson the day before touched two compositions only.

1. Schubert's Rosamunde Overture is essentially theatric, not polyphonic. One aesthetically minded critic fancies that he finds Old Folks at Home in it, but the audience could detect no resemblance. Originally written for a different play, Magic Harp perhaps, Schubert subsequently gave it the name of Rosamunde, because he wrote an intermezzo and other music for the latter play and fitted thereto his ready-made overture.

2. Beethoven's Third Symphony Mr. Lang treated with less regard to the technique than usual. As a Republican, Beethoven had great hopes of Napoleon during the Consulate. Endeavoring to disentangle truth from a snarl of fiction, the facts about the symphony were these. In 1802 it was suggested to Beethoven to pay Napoleon a superb musical tribute, when that conqueror was dictating laws to kings. In two years the Symphony was finished, and its title-page bore simply the names of Beethoven and Napoleon, in the copy sent to the French Ambassador. Soon Napoleon assumed the crown. Beethoven tore the old title-page, and dedicated the Symphony, when printed in 1805, simply to a Great Man; yet it bears the impress of the great personality which was in the composer's mind. Its Allegro con brio is restless, using a rhythm that always signifies motion, whether heard in melodrama or cradle-song. There are two themes in the Allegro. One indicates power, and is heard throughout. It is not only the rudder, but the impulsive motor. Here the lecturer indicated the likeness to a life-voyage, which might be traced in the music. The Funeral March in the Adagio is expressive of regret. The Scherzo is full of friendly, careless rejoicing. There is a horn passage in it, both difficult and dangerous. The players may slip on it, and produce a very disagreeable effect, as once Mr. Lang heard done in the best orchestra in Vienna; but this does not in the least affect the general excellence of the performance. As if the voyagers were groping about for the right path in the untracked regions of freedom newly reached, there is introduced a technical chords which always respect on the stage; only Beethoven contrasted finely. Beethoven even borrowed of his own, which is to be credited over a destination reached, for thy that belongs to a happy nation. In closing Mr. Lang's description written by Wagner, when the Symphony was repeated. sa, assisted in playing the taken judgement used being Otto Williams hands—expensive, but the de Zielin to be in the neighborhood of New listened attentively to the much musical whispering in Detroit as to distract my attention from the misapprehensions of the usual. As a Republican, Beethoven had great hopes of Napoleon during the Consulate. Endeavoring to disentangle truth from a snarl of fiction, the facts about the symphony were these. In 1802 it was suggested to Beethoven to pay Napoleon a superb musical tribute, when that conqueror was dictating laws to kings. In two years the Symphony was finished, and its title-page bore simply the names of Beethoven and Napoleon, in the copy sent to the French Ambassador. Soon Napoleon assumed the crown. Beethoven tore the old title-page, and dedicated the Symphony, when printed in 1805, simply to a Great Man; yet it bears the impress of the great personality which was in the composer's mind. Its Allegro con brio is restless, using a rhythm that always signifies motion, whether heard in melodrama or cradle-song. There are two themes in the Allegro. One indicates power, and is heard throughout. It is not only the rudder, but the impulsive motor. Here the lecturer indicated the likeness to a life-voyage, which might be traced in the music. The Funeral March in the Adagio is expressive of regret. The Scherzo is full of friendly, careless rejoicing. There is a horn passage in it, both difficult and dangerous. The players may slip on it, and produce a very disagreeable effect, as once Mr. Lang heard done in the best orchestra in Vienna; but this does not in the least affect the general excellence of the performance. As if the voyagers were groping about for the right path in the untracked regions of freedom newly reached, there is introduced a

MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last night's concert presented an interesting programme, which, however, suffered somewhat, as its predecessors have done, from a lack of modern elements in its make-up. Haydn's variations are well enough up to a certain point, but they fail as steady musical diet. Another disappointment was the absence of Madame Fursch Madi, who was ill, and whose place was taken by Miss Mary H. How at short notice. Miss How sang with much expression and taste "Ah Mon Fils" and a passionate song by Dudley Buck. The symphony was the great eroica, the first Beethoven symphony where the master reached his real individuality and power. It was played with general unity and finish, but some portions were taken at a pace which was novel to our concert-goers. The first movement was taken somewhat slower than heretofore, and gained by the change, the vast swells of tone of the broad crescendi being splendidly effective, although there were some roughness of execution. The Funeral March, however, lost much of its impressiveness, because of its rapid pace, which was rather an andante than an adagio Assai. The difficult horn passage of the Trio in the scherzo went well, and the counterpoint of the variations of the finale was clearly brought out, the last passages, however, being a little hurried.

The Christmas season, with its great pressure on the columns of a newspaper, is not very favorable to long reviews, and we make this week's notice brief with promise of amends in the future.

MR. LANG'S LESSON.—Mr. Lang's fourth symphony concert lesson was given yesterday afternoon. Referring to the Rosamunde overture, Mr. Lang calls it theatric. As a matter of record he also said that although called the Rosamunde overture, the name had no significance; for notwithstanding Schubert wrote an opera of that name it had no overture, the so-called Rosamunde overture being originally written for his opera, "The Magic Harp." The similarity between the song theme of the overture and "Old Folks at Home" is often cited. Mr. Lang played it to show its dissimilarity. The overture was played on one pianoforte by Mr. Fenollosa and Mr. Lang. Beethoven's Eroica Symphony (No. 3 in E flat), received the most attention from Mr. Lang. He spoke of it from an imaginative point of view—the side which he wished his hearers most to foster—rather than the technical, pleasantly relating that Beethoven originally dedicated it to Napoleon when consul of France. He told, too, of his repudiating the dedication when Napoleon became emperor, the reason being that, a Republican himself, Beethoven had an attachment for Napoleon as the great Republican consul which he could not consistently hold when the consul became emperor. This lesson was more of the character of a pianoforte recital than any of its predecessors, so much time being occupied by a four-hand performance of the symphony as well as the overture. Wagner's opinion of the symphony was quoted by Mr. Lang, and it was very delightful reading. The version of the symphony played by Mr. Lang and Mr. Fenollosa was that of Mr. Otto Dresl.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The ninth programme, changed on account of the indisposition of Mme. Fursch-Madi, who was to have sung, was as follows:

- Schubert.....Overture, (Rosamunde).
- Meyerbeer.....Aria. Ah! mon fils. (Il Profeta.)
- Haydn.....Variations on the Austrian National Hymn.
- Dudley Buck.....Sunset. (Song with piano).
- Beethoven.....Symphony in E-flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55.

Miss Mary H. How was the singer. That the performance of the symphony was disappointing, especially in view of the anticipation of the past week, is an opinion one has to admit. The conditions for a noble performance of this great work by our orchestra seemed certain; yet the absence of two of the first violins, Mr. Glese's non-appearance, or something less tangible even, must serve to excuse a rendering that was neither brilliant, impressive, nor compatible with what we unenlightened New Englanders call our standard. But, it is not necessary to state, few definable shortcomings are to be charged either to conductor or orchestra. Mr. Gericke has never seemed more in earnest; the band was not forgetful of the new atmosphere he has created; more than agreeable even was their attention to him; yet the work did not absorb the listener as it should. The great hero to whom it was dedicated did not appear the magnificent character Beethoven intended. The spirit of the performance was, instead of heroic, sedate and uninspired. The tempi of the whole, excepting the march, were defensible enough, though the opening allegro con brio sounded more as if it were being played allegro moderato, and in giving out the few foundation notes that constitute the basis of the closing allegro molto, the quickening was enough to seriously lessen the dignity of the announcement. The marcia funebre (adagio assai) lacked impressiveness; the solemn grand movement of its opening measures is no idle picture; it is startlingly real in effect, and any mistaking the beat is almost unbearable. Mr. Gericke's tempo in this movement seemed very strange, and one halts at the near approach of the fifth and seventh symphonies of Beethoven, wondering if our new leader will, after all, interpret these in opposition to our hopes, our longings or our knowledge. The scherzo was played with great delicacy; the quartet of horns improved with each repetition of their dangerous phrase. There were fine things in the rendering of both the large divisions of the symphony. Especially discreet were the variations of tempo in the first allegro; they gave appreciable feeling to its fervent, uplifting theme which may be said to be Beethoven's motor, his lever; for its use to him in this movement is shown in infinite variety of form. The best playing by the orchestra was done in the Haydn variations on the Austrian National Hymn. Writing of variations, it seems strange to see so many times in the symphony programme variations, arrangements, etc., which, while never to be sneered at in toto, are, nevertheless, uncertain elements of taste. The hymn is familiar to all through the innumerable books of Psalmody, where it is usually quite well arranged. For a national hymn it compares well with that of Germany or France; but the genial Haydn in his graceful and sweetest style perpetuates it, so that if Austria should some time dissolve, politically, her name even be taken, she may thank the great musician whose music will command a future quite outrunning empires. The Rosamunde overture (belonging with the opera, "The Magic Harp") is a clear, bright work; a bit theatric, but not trivial. It received the favor of the audience

124

Schubert's Rosamunde and Beethoven's Heroic Symphony.

THE Ninth Boston Symphony Concert concluded Haydn's Variations on the Hymn, but Mr. Lang's lesson the day touched two compositions only.

1. Schubert's Rosamunde Overture essentially theatric, not polyphonic. The critic fancies that he finds Old Home in it, but the audience could detect no resemblance. Originally written for a magic harp perhaps, Schubert subsequently gave it the name of Rosamunde because he wrote an intermezzo and music for the latter play and fitted his ready-made overture.

2. Beethoven's Third Symphony treated with less regard to the technical than usual. As a Republican, Beethoven had great hopes of Napoleon during the Campaign of 1805. Endeavoring to disentangle truth from fiction, the facts about the symphony are these. In 1802 it was suggested to Beethoven to pay Napoleon a superb musical tribute, when that conqueror was dictating laws to kings. In two years the Symphony was finished, and its title-page bore simply the names of Beethoven and Napoleon, in the copy sent to the French Ambassador. Soon Napoleon assumed the crown. Beethoven tore the old title-page, and dedicated the Symphony, when printed in 1805, simply to a Great Man; yet it bears the impress of the great personality which was in the composer's mind. Its Allegro con brio is restless, using a rhythm that always signifies motion, whether heard in melodrama or cradle-song. There are two themes in the Allegro. One indicates power, and is heard throughout. It is not only the rudder, but the impulsive motor. Here the lecturer indicated the likeness to a life-voyage, which might be traced in the music. The Funeral March in the Adagio is expressive of regret. The Scherzo is full of friendly, careless rejoicing. There is a horn passage in it, both difficult and dangerous. The players may slip on it, and produce a very disagreeable effect, as once Mr. Lang heard done in the best orchestra in Vienna; but this does not in the least affect the general excellence of the performance. As if the voyagers were groping about for the right path in the untracked regions of freedom newly reached, there is introduced a curious use of chords which always suggests mystery on the stage; only Beethoven phrases it finely. Beethoven even borrows a theme of his own, which is to be greeted as an old friend. In the last movement there is joy over a destination reached at last—the joy that belongs to a happy united couple or nation. In closing Mr. Lang read a poetic description written by Wagner in 1850, to Zurich, when the Symphony was to be there produced.

W. S. Fenollosa, assisted in playing the music, the arrangement used being Otto Dresel's, for four hands—expensive, but the best. I chanced to be in the neighborhood of two ladies who listened attentively to the music, but did so much musical whispering during the explanations as to distract my attention into possible misapprehensions of the speaker's meaning.

In the illness of Fursch-Madi, Mary S. Howe (the contralto at Dr. Hale's Church) sang at the concert.

MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last night's concert presented an interesting programme, which, however, suffered somewhat, as its predecessors have done, from a lack of modern elements in its make-up. Haydn's variations are well enough up to a certain point, but they fail as steady musical diet. Another disappointment was the absence of Madame Fursch Madi, who was ill, and whose place was taken by Miss Mary H. How at short notice. Miss How sang with much expression and taste "Ah Mon Fils" and a passionate song by Dudley Buck. The symphony was the great eroica, the first Beethoven symphony where the master reached his real individuality and power. It was played with general unity and finish, but some portions were taken at a pace which was novel to our concert-goers. The first movement was taken somewhat slower than heretofore, and gained by the change, the vast swells of tone of the broad crescendi being splendidly effective, although there were some roughness of execution. The Funeral March, however, lost much of its impressiveness, because of its rapid pace, which was rather an andante than an adagio Assai. The difficult horn passage of the Trio in the scherzo went well, and the counterpoint of the variations of the finale was clearly brought out, the last passages, however, being a little hurried.

The Christmas season, with its great pressure on the columns of a newspaper, is not very favorable to long reviews, and we make this week's notice brief with promise of amends in the future.

MR. LANG'S LESSON.—Mr. Lang's fourth symphony concert lesson was given yesterday afternoon. Referring to the Rosamunde overture, Mr. Lang calls it theatric. As a matter of record he also said that although called the Rosamunde overture, the name had no significance; for notwithstanding Schubert wrote an opera of that name it had no overture, the so-called Rosamunde overture being originally written for his opera, "The Magic Harp." The similarity between the song theme of the overture and "Old Folks at Home" is often cited. Mr. Lang played it to show its dissimilarity. The overture was played on one pianoforte by Mr. Fenollosa and Mr. Lang. Beethoven's Eroica Symphony (No. 3 in E flat), received the most attention from Mr. Lang. He spoke of it from an imaginative point of view—the side which he wished his hearers most to foster—rather than the technical, pleasantly relating that Beethoven originally dedicated it to Napoleon when consul of France. He told, too, of his repudiating the dedication when Napoleon became emperor, the reason being that, a Republican himself, Beethoven had an attachment for Napoleon as the great Republican consul which he could not consistently hold when the consul became emperor. This lesson was more of the character of a pianoforte recital than any of its predecessors, so much time being occupied by a four-hand performance of the symphony as well as the overture. Wagner's opinion of the symphony was quoted by Mr. Lang, and it was very delightful reading. The version of the symphony played by Mr. Lang and Mr. Fenollosa was that of Mr. Otto Dresel.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The ninth programme, changed on account of the indisposition of Mme. Fursch-Madi, who was to have sung, was as follows:

Schubert.....Overture, (Rosamunde).
Meyerbeer.....Aria. Ah! mon fils. (Il Profeta).
Haydn.....Variations on the Austrian National Hymn.
Dudley Buck.....Sunset. (Song with piano).
Beethoven.....Symphony in E-flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55.

Miss Mary H. How was the singer. That the performance of the symphony was disappointing, especially in view of the anticipation of the past week, is an opinion one has to admit. The conditions for a noble performance of this great work by our orchestra seemed certain; yet the absence of two of the first violins, Mr. Glese's non-appearance, or something less tangible even, must serve to excuse a rendering that was neither brilliant, impressive, nor compatible with what we unenlightened New Englanders call our standard. But, it is not necessary to state, few definable shortcomings are to be charged either to conductor or orchestra. Mr. Gericke has never seemed more in earnest; the band was not forgetful of the new atmosphere he has created; more than agreeable even was their attention to him; yet the work did not absorb the listener as it should. The great hero to whom it was dedicated did not appear the magnificent character Beethoven intended. The spirit of the performance was, instead of heroic, sedate and uninspired. The tempi of the whole, excepting the march, were defensible enough, though the opening allegro con brio sounded more as if it were being played allegro moderato, and in giving out the few foundation notes that constitute the basis of the closing allegro molto, the quickening was enough to seriously lessen the dignity of the announcement. The marcia funebre (adagio assai) lacked impressiveness; the solemn grand movement of its opening measures is no idle picture; it is startlingly real in effect, and any misreading the beat is almost unbearable. Mr. Gericke's tempo in this movement seemed very strange, and one halts at the near approach of the fifth and seventh symphonies of Beethoven, wondering if our new leader will, after all, interpret these in opposition to our hopes, our longings or our knowledge. The scherzo was played with great delicacy; the quartet of horns improved with each repetition of their dangerous phrase. There were fine things in the rendering of both the large divisions of the symphony. Especially discreet were the variations of tempo in the first allegro; they gave appreciable feeling to its fervent, uplifting theme which may be said to be Beethoven's motor, his lever; for its use to him in this movement is shown in infinite variety of form. The best playing by the orchestra was done in the Haydn variations on the Austrian National Hymn. Writing of variations, it seems strange to see so many times in the symphony programme variations, arrangements, etc., which, while never to be sneered at in toto, are, nevertheless, uncertain elements of taste. The hymn is familiar to all through the innumerable books of Psalmody, where it is usually quite well arranged. For a national hymn it compares well with that of Germany or France; but the genial Haydn in his graceful and sweetest style perpetuates it, so that if Austria should some time dissolve, politically, her name even be taken, she may thank the great musician whose music will command a future quite outrunning empires. The Rosamunde overture (belonging with the opera, "The Magic Harp") is a clear, bright work; a bit theatric, but not trivial. It received the favor of the audience.

Schubert's Rosamunde and Beeth-roic Symphony. Dec 2

THE Ninth Boston Symphony Concluded Haydn's Variations on the Hymn, but Mr. Lang's lesson the day touched two compositions only.

1. Schubert's Rosamunde Overturessentially theatric, not polyphonic.
tute critic fancies that he finds Old B
Home in it, but the audience could do resemblance. Originally written for ent play, Magic Harp perhaps, Schub-sequently gave it the name of Rosbecause he wrote an intermezzo an music for the latter play and fitted his ready-made overture.

2. Beethoven's Third Symphony M treated with less regard to the technic usual. As a Republican, Beetho great hopes of Napoleon during the C Endeavoring to disentangle truth from of fiction, the facts about the sympho these. In 1802 it was suggested to Beethoto pay Napoleon a superb musical tribute, when that conqueror was dictating laws to kings. In two years the Symphony was finished, and its title-page bore simply the names of Beethoven and Napoleon, in the copy sent to the French Ambassador. Soon Napoleon assumed the crown. Beethoven tore the old title-page, and dedicated the Symphony, when printed in 1805, simply to a Great Man; yet it bears the impress of the great personality which was in the composer's mind. Its Allegro con brio is restless, using a rhythm that always signifies motion,
whether heard in melodrama or cradle-song.
There are two themes in the Allegro. One indicates power, and is heard throughout. It is not only the rudder, but the impulsive motor. Here the lecturer indicated the likeness to a life-voyage, which might be traced in the music. The Funeral March in the Adagio is expressive of regret. The Scherzo is full of friendly, careless rejoicing. There is a horn passage in it, both difficult and dangerous. The players may slip on it, and produce a very disagreeable effect, as once Mr.
Lang heard done in the best orchestra in Vienna; but this does not in the least affect the general excellence of the performance.
As if the voyagers were groping about for the right path in the untracked regions of freedom newly reached, there is introduced a curious use of chords which always suggests mystery on the stage; only Beethoven phrases it finely. Beethoven even borrows a theme of his own, which is to be greeted as an old friend. In the last movement there is joy over a destination reached at last—the joy that belongs to a happy united couple or nation. In closing Mr. Lang read a poetic description written by Wagner in 1850, to Zurich, when the Symphony was to be there produced.

W. S. Fenollosa, assisted in playing the music, the arrangement used being Otto Drosel's, for four hands—expensive, but the best. I chanced to be in the neighborhood of two ladies who listened attentively to the music, but did so much musical whispering during the explanations as to distract my attention into possible misapprehensions of the speaker's meaning.

In the illness of Fursch-Madi, Mary S
Howe (the contralto at Dr. Hale's Church) sang at the concert.

MUSIC. Conner

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last night's concert presented an interesting programme, which, however, suffered somewhat, as its predecessors have done, from a lack of modern elements in its make-up. Haydn variations are well enough up to a certain point, but they fail as steady musical diet. Another disappointment was the absence of Madame Fursch Madi, who was ill, and whose place was taken by Miss Mary H. How at short notice. Miss How sang with much expression and taste "Ah Mon Fils" and a passionate song by Dudley Buck. The symphony was the great eroica, the first Beethoven symphony where the master reached his real individuality and power. It was played with general unity and finish, but some portions were taken at a pace which was novel to our concert-goers. The first movement was taken somewhat slower than heretofore, and gained by the change, the vast swells of tone of the broad crescendi being splendidly effective, although there were some roughness of execution.
The Funeral March, however, lost much of its impressiveness, because of its rapid pace, which was rather an andante than an adagio Assai. The difficult horn passage of the Trio in the scherzo went well, and the counterpoint of the variations of the finale was clearly brought out, the last passages, however, being a little hurried.

The Christmas season, with its great pressure on the columns of a newspaper, is not very favorable to long reviews, and we make this week's notice brief with promise of amends in the future.

MR. LANG'S LESSON.—Mr. Lang's fourth symphony concert lesson was given yesterday afternoon.
Referring to the Rosamunde overture, Mr. Lang calls it theatric. As a matter of record he also said that although called the Rosamunde overture, the name had no significance; for notwithstanding Schubert wrote an opera of that name it had no overture, the so-called Rosamunde overture being originally written for his opera, "The Magic Harp."
The similarity between the song theme of the overture and "Old Folks at Home" is often cited. Mr.
Lang played it to show its dissimilarity. The overture was played on one pianoforte by Mr. Fenollosa and Mr. Lang. Beethoven's Eroica Symphony
(No. 3 in E flat), received the most attention from Mr. Lang. He spoke of it from an imaginative point of view—the side which he wished his hearers most to foster—rather than the technical, pleasantly relating that Beethoven originally dedicated it to Napoleon when consul of France. He told, too, of his repudiating the dedication when Napoleon became emperor, the reason being that, a Republican himself, Beethoven had an attachment for Napoleon as the great Republican consul which he could not consistently hold when the consul became emperor.
This lesson was more of the character of a pianoforte recital than any of its predecessors, so much time being occupied by a four-hand performance of the symphony as well as the overture. Wagner's opinion of the symphony was quoted by Mr. Lang, and it was very delightful reading. The version of the symphony played by Mr. Lang and Mr. Fenollosa was that of Mr. Otto Dresil.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The ninth programme, changed on account of the indisposition of Mme. Fursch-Madi, who was to have sung, was as follows:

Schubert.....Overture, (Rosamunde).
Meyerbeer.....Aria. Ah! mon fils. (Il Profeta)
Haydn.....Variations on the Austrian National Hymn.
Dudley Buck.....Sunset. (Song with piano).
Beethoven.....Symphony in E-flat. (trio.) No. 3,
op. 55.

Miss Mary H. How was the singer. That the performance of the symphony was disappointing, especially in view of the anticipation of the past week, is an opinion one has to admit. The conditions for a noble performance of this great work by our orchestra seemed certain; yet the absence of two of the first violins, Mr. Glese's non-appearance, or something less tangible even, must serve to excuse a rendering that was neither brilliant, impressive, nor compatible with what we unenlightened New Englanders call our standard. But, it is not necessary to state, few definable shortcomings are to be charged either to conductor or orchestra. Mr. Gericke has never seemed more in earnest; the band was not forgetful of the new atmosphere he has created; more than agreeable even was their attention to him; yet the work did not absorb the listener as it should. The great hero to whom it was dedicated did not appear the magnificent character Beethoven intended. The spirit of the performance was, instead of heroic, se-date and uninspired. The tempi of the whole, excepting the march, were defensible enough, though the opening allegro con brio sounded more as if it were being played allegro moderato, and in giving out the few foundation notes that constitute the basis of the closing allegro molto, the quickening was enough to seriously lessen the dignity of the announcement.
The marcia funebre (adagio assai) lacked impressiveness;
the solemn grand movement of its opening measures is no idle picture; it is startlingly real in effect, and any mistaking the beat is almost unbearable. Mr. Gericke's tempo in this movement seemed very strange, and one halts at the near approach of the fifth and seventh symphonies of Beethoven, wondering if our new leader will, after all, interpret these in opposition to our hopes, our longings or our knowledge. The scherzo was played with great celicacy; the quartet of horns improved with each repetition of their dangerous phrase. There were fine things in the rendering of both the large divisions of the symphony. Especially discreet were the variations of tempo in the first allegro; they gave appreciable feeling to its fervent, uplifting theme which may be said to be Beethoven's motor, his lever; for its use to him in this movement is shown in infinite variety of form. The best playing by the orchestra was done in the Haydn variations on the Austrian National Hymn. Writing of variations, it seems strange to see so many times in the symphony programme variations, arrangements, etc., which, while never to be sneered at in toto, are, nevertheless, uncertain elements of taste. The hymn is familiar to all through the innumerable books of Psalmody, where it is usually quite well arranged. For a national hymn it compares well with that of Germany or France; but the genial Haydn in his graceful and sweetest style perpetuates it, so that if Austria should some time dissolve, politically, her name even be taken, she may thank the great musician whose music will command a future quite outrunning empires. The Rosamunde overture (belonging with the opera, "The Magic Harp") is a clear, bright work; a bit theatric, but not trivial. It received the favor of the audience

Miss Mary H. How has not sung at these concerts since the first season. Her selections were not of any moment; perhaps if she had received a regular and not a substitute appointment to sing they would have been different. The Buck song is hardly great, but it can be made effective. As How did not give it with sufficient breadth its several climaxes are worth much more to the vocalist than she estimated. The aria from "Il Profeta" is very beautiful and it was justly, tunefully, and intelligently sung. Miss How is a better artist than when she appeared at the earlier symphony concert referred to, but she should warm up and cultivate her enthusiasms for a while. Next Saturday's programme is—

Beethoven,.... Overture, (Egmont.)
 Bruch,.....(a) Adagio from the Concerto for Violin No. 2, in D minor, op. 44.
 E. Lalo,.....(b) Fantasia Norwegienne, in A.
 Rubinstein,.... Ballet Music, "La Vigne."
 (a) Pas de degustation des vins.
 (b) Vins d'Italie.
 (c) Vins de Hongrie.
 Mendelssohn,.... Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.
 Mr. M. Loeffler, the violinist, will be the soloist.

Ninth Symphony Concert.

Mme. Fursch-Madl was to have been the soloist at the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, in Music Hall on Saturday evening, but was prevented by illness from appearing, her place being supplied at short notice by Miss Mary H. How, contralto, who acquitted herself with great credit, especially in view of the circumstances under which she appeared. The following programme was given:

Overture, "Rosamunde".....Schubert
 Scene, "Il Profeta," "Of mia figlia".....Meyerbeer
 Variations on the "Austrian National Hymn".....Haydn
 "Sunset," song with piano.....Dudley Buck
 Symphony in E flat, "Eroica" No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven

The overture was finely played. Miss How's singing of the scene from "Il Profeta" was a thoroughly intelligent and artistic performance, and much more enjoyable than her later work in Mr. Buck's song, which afforded her no opportunity for any display of her fine abilities, the composition being dull and monotonous, unmarked by any of the fire and emotion characterizing the words of the song, which, by the way, go to the excess of sentiment. Haydn's Variations and Beethoven's noble Eroica Symphony were both given admirably, the latter commanding in its fine rendering the full attention of the audience. At the tenth concert, next Saturday evening, Mr. M. Loeffler, violinist, will be the soloist, and the programme will be: Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; a. Adagio from the concerto for violin, No. 2, in D minor, op. 44, Bruch; b. "Fantasia Norwegienne," in A, E. Lalo; ballet music, "La Vigne," Rubinstein; Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56, Mendelssohn.

NINTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The ninth symphony concert was of unusual interest, the orchestra playing finely and with notably good effect in their performance of Beethoven's "Eroica," or third symphony. It seemed at first as though an unreconcilable disappointment would be experienced on account of the absence of Mme. Fursch-Madl; but the substitution of Miss Mary How, contralto, was exceedingly well received. The lady is to be congratulated upon her artistic success in rendering Meyerbeer's "Ah mio Figlia," as she sang with excellent expression and with a notable degree of artistic proficiency. Miss How was enthusiastically applauded and recalled. Her second selection was Dudley Buck's aria entitled "Sunset." We regret that so brief an attention to the concert is inevitable. How Journal

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The ninth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Schubert. Overture—"Rosamunde."
 Meyerbeer. Scene from "Il Profeta."
 Haydn. Variations on the Austrian National Hymn.
 Dudley Buck. Sunset

(Song with piano.)
 Beethoven. Symphony in E-flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55.

Miss Mary H. How was the singer.

The fascinating "Rosamunde" overture was delightfully played. The Haydn variations, however, sounded unexpectedly dull and colorless. Whether string-quartet movements, when played "by all the strings" in a large hall, will ever produce an effect comparable to that which they make, when given in their original shape, as chamber music, is an open question. Certainly in this case the effect was singularly disappointing. For one thing, the doubling of the 'cello part with all the eight contrabasses, in some portions of the work, seems unquestionably a mistake; it gave a ponderousness to the bass that sounded wholly unquartet-like. Mr. Thomas, if we remember aright, used to double the 'celli with two contrabasses in similar cases, so that the weight of the contrabass tone was felt rather than heard. The "Eroica" symphony was superbly given and made a profound impression. Mr. Gericke's tempi seemed perfect. It was a true delight to hear the Scherzo taken so moderately, and the funeral march not dragged out to a too doleful slowness.

Miss How's singing of Meyerbeer's "Figlio mio" was sincerely painstaking, but, upon the whole, rather dry and ineffective. The selection is a dangerous one, for the song depends for its effect almost wholly upon the richness of voice and the intrinsic dramatic power of the singer. Dudley Buck's "Sunset" is hardly the best of the composer's songs. It is all too vague and rambling in melody, and its somewhat flacid sentiment assorts but ill with the fantastic, Oriental gorgeousness of Sidney Lanier's verses.

The next programme is:

Beethoven. Overture to Egmont.
 Bruch. (a) Adagio from the Concerto for Violin, No. 2, in D minor, op. 44.
 E. Lalo. (b) Fantasia Norwegienne, in A.
 Rubinstein. Ballet Music, "La Vigne."
 (a) Pas de Degustation des Vins.
 (b) Vins d'Italie.
 (c) Vins de Hongrie.
 Mendelssohn. Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.

Mr. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

A CRYING WANT.

It is reported that Gounod, the celebrated composer, on being asked whether the English are or are not a musical nation, took advantage of the opportunity to exercise his wit, and by no means to answer the question. He says that there exists no unmusical nation at all; that those who do not like music are deceased, and for their benefit there ought to be created hospitals, which he thinks as badly wanted as the usual ones.

The idea is an ingenious and original one, and one which ought especially to interest the good people of the town of Boston, which above all things prides itself upon its musical discernment and cultivation. We have endowed and established about everything that was ever imagined, yet there are undoubtedly many persons even in this favored city who do not like music in any high and enlightened manner. Even the Boston symphony concerts and the innumerable recitals which come in with the March winds and the spring thaws to add new horrors to an already sufficiently trying season, have not wholly done to death the unfortunates who are bored by a harmonious concord of sweet sounds, and who are afflicted by the disease of hating a piano worse than they hate a hand-organ. Of course these music-haters are diseased, as Gounod declares, and a hospital should be prepared for them at once. They should no longer be allowed to go at large, with the danger of spreading contagion and undermining the musical health of the city. They should be captured and confined, a suitable hospital provided, and measures taken to restore them to health—harmonically speaking—as speedily as might be. The selection might be made by taking the audience at a symphony concert, playing something not down on the programme and capturing those who applauded. A wicked waltz of Strauss, skillfully introduced in place of a scherzo in one of Beethoven's symphonies would, we are confident, bring down seventy or eighty per cent.—to speak guardedly—of the hearers on the first trial; while similar tests, properly devised, would take in fully half of the remainder. The hospital would needs be large—perhaps the New England Conservatory could be used as a sort of temporary make-shift until a proper edifice could be erected, in which case the disputed and disused cemetery could be utilized as a place of deposit for the incurables.

Just what should be the method of treatment to be employed in these hospitals it might not be easy to determine. Gounod is unfortunately silent upon the subject, but the Massachusetts Medical Society has never yet encountered a subject, either within or without the pale of its authority, of which it could not quickly and finally dispose by means of a simple vote, so that this question need cause no perplexity. Wrangles and discussions there might be, but those who know the society will feel no fear that its final action would be influenced by argument or facts, so that if the hospitals can but be founded, the course of treatment will be provided as easily and as mechanically as its stair-carpets. For the rest, the Common Council will, with the aid of benevolent patent-medicine men, attend to the art features of the hospital; and there is no decent or reasonable excuse for delaying longer the foundation of this asylum for the musically diseased inhabitants of our harmony-mad city.

A discussion as to who was the smallest musician in Boston took place in the symphony concert green room last Saturday evening. One musician maintained that no musician could be shorter than A. Foote, but he was splendidly put down by the statement that a couple of our best vocalists were only two (W) inches!!

The Steinway piano used at the Symphony Concert last night, was one of the finest toned recently heard in Boston.

Last Evening's Symphony Concert.

The chief number of the symphony programme last evening was the third symphony of Beethoven. Mr. Gericke gave a broad and scholarly reading of the great work, and the orchestra acquitted itself in a manner which left nothing to be desired. There was scarcely a flaw from beginning to end, and it was truly an ideal performance of one of the most remarkable of orchestral writings.

Mme. Fursch-Madl was to have been the soloist, but sickness prevented her appearance. Miss Mary H. How took the place on the programme which had been assigned that lady, and acquitted herself extremely well. The audience recognized her merit with unstinted applause. The other numbers of the programme do not call for any special mention.

Next week the following works will be presented:

Overture (Egmont).....Beethoven
 (a) Adagio from the concerto for violin, No. 2.....Bruch
 (b) Fantasia Norwegienne, in A.....E. Lalo
 Ballet music, "La Vigne".....Rubinstein
 (a) Pas de degustation des vins.
 (b) Vins d'Italie.
 (c) Vins de Hongrie.
 Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.....Mendelssohn
 Soloist, Mr. M. Loeffler.

Miss Mary H. How has not sung at these concerts since the first season. Her selections were not of any moment; perhaps if she had received a regular and not a substitute appointment to sing they would have been different. The Buck song is hardly great, but it can be made effective. As How did not give it with sufficient breadth its several climaxes are worth much more to the vocalist than she estimated. The aria from "Il Profeta" is very beautiful and it was justly, tunefully, and intelligently sung. Miss How is a better artist than when she appeared at the earlier symphony concert referred to, but she should warm up and cultivate her enthusiasms for a while. Next Saturday's programme is:

Beethoven,.... Overture. (Egmont.)
 Bruch,.....(a) Adagio from the Concerto for Violin No. 2, in D minor, op. 41.
 E. Lalo,.....(b) Fantasia Norvegienne, in A.
 Rubinstein,.... Ballet Music, "La Vigne."
 (a) Pas de degustation des vins.
 (b) Vins d'Italie.
 (c) Vins de Hongrie.
 Mendelssohn,.... Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.
 Mr. M. Loeffler, the violinist, will be the soloist.

Ninth Symphony Concert.
 Mme. Fursch-Madi was to have been the soloist at the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, in Music Hall on Saturday evening, but was prevented by illness from appearing, her place being supplied at short notice by Miss Mary H. How, contralto, who acquitted herself with great credit, especially in view of the circumstances under which she appeared. The following programme was given:

Overture, "Rosamunde".....Schubert
 Scene, "Il Profeta," "O! mia figlia".....Meyerbeer
 Variations on the "Austrian National Hymn"....Haydn
 "Sunset," song with piano.....Dudley Buck
 Symphony in E flat, "Eroica" No. 3, op. 55....Beethoven

The overture was finely played. Miss How's singing of the scene from "Il Profeta" was a thoroughly intelligent and artistic performance, and much more enjoyable than her later work in Mr. Buck's song, which afforded her no opportunity for any display of her fine abilities, the composition being dull and monotonous, unmarked by any of the fire and emotion characterizing the words of the song, which, by the way, go to the excess of sentiment. Haydn's Variations and Beethoven's noble Eroica Symphony were both given admirably, the latter commanding in its fine rendering the full attention of the audience. At the tenth concert, next Saturday evening, Mr. M. Loeffler, violinist, will be the soloist, and the programme will be: Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; a, Adagio from the concerto for violin, No. 2, in D minor, op. 44, Bruch; b, "Fantasia Norvegienne," in A, E. Lalo; ballet music, "La Vigne," Rubinstein; Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56, Mendelssohn.

NINTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The ninth symphony concert was of unusual interest, the orchestra playing finely and with notably good effect in their performance of Beethoven's "Eroica," or third symphony. It seemed at first as though an unreconcilable disappointment would be experienced on account of the absence of Mme. Fursch-Madi; but the substitution of Miss Mary How, contralto, was exceedingly well received. The lady is to be congratulated upon her artistic success in rendering Meyerbeer's "Ah mio Figlia," as she sang with excellent expression and with a notable degree of artistic proficiency. Miss How was enthusiastically applauded and recalled. Her second selection was Dudley Buck's aria entitled "Sunset." We regret that so brief an attention to the concert is inevitable. How Journal

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The ninth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Schubert. Overture—"Rosamunde."
 Meyerbeer. Scene from "Il Profeta."
 Haydn. Variations on the Austrian National Hymn.
 Dudley Buck. (Song with piano.) Sunset

Beethoven. Symphony in E-flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55.

Miss Mary H. How was the singer.

The fascinating "Rosamunde" overture was delightfully played. The Haydn variations, however, sounded unexpectedly dull and colorless. Whether string-quartet movements, when played "by all the strings" in a large hall, will ever produce an effect comparable to that which they make, when given in their original shape, as chamber music, is an open question. Certainly in this case the effect was singularly disappointing. For one thing, the doubling of the 'cello part with all the eight contrabasses, in some portions of the work, seems unquestionably a mistake; it gave a ponderousness to the bass that sounded wholly unquartet-like. Mr. Thomas, if we remember aright, used to double the 'cello with two contrabasses in similar cases, so that the weight of the contrabass tone was felt rather than heard. The "Eroica" symphony was superbly given and made a profound impression. Mr. Gericke's tempi seemed perfect. It was a true delight to hear the Scherzo taken so moderately, and the funeral march not dragged out to a too doleful slowness.

Miss How's singing of Meyerbeer's "Figlio mio" was sincerely painstaking, but, upon the whole, rather dry and ineffective. The selection is a dangerous one, for the song depends for its effect almost wholly upon the richness of voice and the intrinsic dramatic power of the singer. Dudley Buck's "Sunset" is hardly the best of the composer's songs. It is all too vague and rambling in melody, and its somewhat flaccid sentiment assorts but ill with the fantastic, Oriental gorgeousness of Sidney Lanier's verses.

The next programme is:

Beethoven. Overture to Egmont.
 Bruch. (a) Adagio from the Concerto for Violin, No. 2, in D minor, op. 44.
 E. Lalo (b) Fantasia Norvegienne, in A.
 Rubinstein. Ballet Music, "La Vigne."
 (a) Pas de Degustation des Vins.
 (b) Vins d'Italie.
 (c) Vins de Hongrie.
 Mendelssohn. Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.

Mr. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

A CRYING WANT.

It is reported that Gounod, the celebrated composer, on being asked whether the English are or are not a musical nation, took advantage of the opportunity to exercise his wit, and by no means to answer the question. He says that there exists no unmusical nation at all; that those who do not like music are deceased, and for their benefit there ought to be created hospitals, which he thinks as badly wanted as the usual ones.

The idea is an ingenious and original one, and one which ought especially to interest the good people of the town of Boston, which above all things prides itself upon its musical discernment and cultivation. We have endowed and established about everything that was ever imagined, yet there are undoubtedly many persons even in this favored city who do not like music in any high and enlightened manner. Even the Boston symphony concerts and the innumerable recitals which come in with the March winds and the spring thaws to add new horrors to an already sufficiently trying season, have not wholly done to death the unfortunates who are bored by a harmonious concord of sweet sounds, and who are afflicted by the disease of hating a piano worse than they hate a hand-organ. Of course these music-haters are diseased, as Gounod declares, and a hospital should be prepared for them at once. They should no longer be allowed to go at large, with the danger of spreading contagion and undermining the musical health of the city. They should be captured and confined, a suitable hospital provided, and measures taken to restore them to health—harmonically speaking—as speedily as might be. The selection might be made by taking the audience at a symphony concert, playing something not down on the programme and capturing those who applauded. A wicked waltz of Strauss, skillfully introduced in place of a scherzo in one of Beethoven's symphonies would, we are confident, bring down seventy or eighty per cent.—to speak guardedly—of the hearers on the first trial; while similar tests, properly devised, would take in fully half of the remainder. The hospital would needs be large—perhaps the New England Conservatory could be used as a sort of temporary make-shift until a proper edifice could be erected, in which case the disputed and disused cemetery could be utilized as a place of deposit for the incurables.

Just what should be the method of treatment to be employed in these hospitals it might not be easy to determine. Gounod is unfortunately silent upon the subject, but the Massachusetts Medical Society has never yet encountered a subject, either within or without the pale of its authority, of which it could not quickly and finally dispose by means of a simple vote, so that this question need cause no perplexity. Wrangles and discussions there might be, but those who know the society will feel no fear that its final action would be influenced by argument or facts, so that if the hospitals can but be founded, the course of treatment will be provided as easily and as mechanically as its stair-carpets. For the rest, the Common Council will, with the aid of benevolent patent-medicine men, attend to the art features of the hospital; and there is no decent or reasonable excuse for delaying longer the foundation of this asylum for the musically diseased inhabitants of our harmony-mad city.

A discussion as to who was the smallest musician in Boston took place in the symphony concert green room last Saturday evening. One musician maintained that no musician could be shorter than A. Foote, but he was splendidly put down by the statement that a couple of our best vocalists were only two (W) inches!!

The Steinway piano used at the Symphony Concert last night, was one of the finest toned recently heard in Boston.

Last Evening's Symphony Concert.

The chief number of the symphony programme last evening was the third symphony of Beethoven. Mr. Gericke gave a broad and scholarly reading of the great work, and the orchestra acquitted itself in a manner which left nothing to be desired. There was scarcely a flaw from beginning to end, and it was truly an ideal performance of one of the most remarkable of orchestral writings.

Mme. Fursch-Madi was to have been the soloist, but sickness prevented her appearance. Miss Mary H. How took the place on the programme which had been assigned that lady, and acquitted herself extremely well. The audience recognized her merit with unstinted applause. The other numbers of the programme do not call for any special mention.

Next week the following works will be presented:

Overture (Egmont).....Beethoven
 (a) Adagio from the concerto for violin, No. 2....Bruch
 (b) Fantasia Norvegienne, in A.....E. Lalo
 Ballet music, "La Vigne".....Rubinstein
 (a) Pas de degustation des vins.
 (b) Vins d'Italie.
 (c) Vins de Hongrie.
 Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.....Mendelssohn
 Soloist, Mr. M. Loeffler.

Music in Boston.

1884

BOSTON, December 14.

THE ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening at Music Hall. The programme rendered was the following:

Overture ("Rosamunde")..... Schubert
Scena ("Il Profeta")..... Meyerbeer
Variations on the Austrian National Hymn..... Haydn
"Sunset" (song with piano)..... Dudley Buck
Symphony, E flat ("Eroica"), op. 55..... Beethoven

The soloist was Miss Mary H. How.

Schubert is having a fair show at these concerts this year, at which we have only reason to rejoice. We hope, however, that his great symphony in C major will also be played, especially as its last rendering, two years ago, was not very successful. The "Rosamund" overture is well known and was played with much spirit by the orchestra. The Meyerbeer number is a fine piece of music, but scarcely adapted for concert performance, as it proved last night. Taken out of its surroundings in the opera, and without the text on the programme, the average concert-goer did not evidently know what to make of it. It was very finely sung by Miss How. She possesses a beautiful alto voice, which she also knows how to use in a musicianly manner. The lower tones are especially fine, ringing out clear and full. Her success with the audience was not what it might have been, as, owing to her unfortunate selection, the good qualities of her singing could only be appreciated by a musician, or, at least, one who knew the opera thoroughly. Haydn's beautiful variations were excellently rendered. It seems one cannot tire of them. I have heard them often enough, to be sure, but every time new beauties are apparent. The exquisite counterpoint, a theme in itself, given out by the first violins, while the celli are playing the hymn, never fails in its effect. The piece is the slow movement to one of the composer's string quartets, the so-called Kaiser quartet, but last evening was played by the entire body of strings. It was much applauded by the listeners. The song entitled "Sunset," by Dudley Buck, I must confess rather disappointed me. It appears to lack unity altogether and the music wanders on and on from modulation to modulation without any apparent purpose and without touching the hearer with any of the poetical feelings, which might have been called forth if the music had been inspired by the words and properly illustrated them. It certainly cannot stand comparison with the fine things Buck has already written. However, it was beautifully sung by Miss How, although it did not make any great impression on the audience, the ensuing applause being evidently mainly due to her fine singing. The Beethoven Symphony, with the exception of one place in the first part, and one in the scherzo, which were not quite firm enough, went well. The solo for the three horns in the scherzo came out beautifully and without any mishap whatever, which is quite rarely the case. At the next concert we are to hear Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor, Rubinstein's ballet music, "La Vigne," which is new here, Beethoven's Egmont overture, and some violin playing by Mr. Löffler. LOUIS MAAS.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The following was the programme last Saturday:

Overture, "Rosamunde,"..... Schubert
Scena, "Il Profeta,"..... Meyerbeer
Miss Mary H. How.
Variations on the Austrian National Hymn..... Haydn
"Sunset"..... Dudley Buck
(Song, with piano.)
Miss How.
Symphony in E flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55..... Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Marcha funebre. (Adagio assai.)—Scherzo.
(Allegro vivace.)—Allegro molto; Poco Andante; Presto.

And, since I am in the critical vein, I may preach a few words about these programmes. They are too one sided. It may be that the traditional policy of the management is to give the Boston concert-goer the nine Beethoven symphonies every season as Mrs. Squeers gave the schoolboys brimstone and treacle regularly for their health; and as we know the influence is healthy we will not complain, although we could bear to skip one or two of them from the regular routine. But when we have two Mendelssohn symphonies, Haydn, Bach and Brahms, in regular rotation, variations in unlimited quantities, we must rise up and demand more brimstone with our treacle, and crave the more sulphurous works of St. Saens, or Berlioz, and the modern efforts of Bizet, Massenet, or others of the later composers.

We have been having the German school, and the old German school at that, to the exclusion of the French, or the Northern composers. To be sure these works have been very finely rendered, thanks to Mr. Gericke's able leadership, but the sameness of the selections begins to be an element of weakness in the concert course.

The Schubert overture was very finely given at this concert. Mr. Gericke understands thoroughly how to balance the power of this orchestra, and brings into clearness many figures which are lost under the direction of other conductors. Miss How sang "Ah, mon Fils" with considerable breadth in the lower tones, but there is a decided inequality between her upper and lower register, and the tremolo is too frequently used. These defects marred the passionate love song by Dudley Buck, which trembled as if it had St. Vitus' Dance. But as Miss How was called upon suddenly to take the place of Mme. Fursch-Madi, who was reported ill, it may be possible that some part of the shortcomings were due to an excusable nervousness. Miss How was warmly applauded and recalled after each number. Haydn's variations were very tuneful after the Brahms variations of Haydn of the last concert. The strings played admirably in this number.

The Symphony had some marked merits and a few defects. Its opening movement was taken in a very effective manner, not too fast, and had a dignity and power well suited to the subject. The broad sweep of the crescendo passages was finely shaded, and the fierce dissonances, and sudden contrasts were given a faithful reading, but at the first there was not perfect unity of attack, and the ensemble was not altogether commendable, although the Durchführungssatz and the wonderful coda were given with technical precision. The funeral march was taken at a strangely rapid pace. It became an andante rather than an adagio assai, and of course lost dignity and character by the change. Of course it is understood that this is no whining movement, but the avoidance of sentimentality was here pushed too far. The scherzo went excellently, even the trying trio for horns being given without much sputter. It is a difficult passage, which often puts the conductor in a dilemma, or worse, for a dilemma has only two horns, and this has three. The contrapuntal variations of the finale were generally well rendered, although a few blurs were noticeable towards the end.

The attendance at these concerts keeps up finely, but, as said at the beginning of this article, we greatly fear the effect of the continuance of this heavy and uncontrasted style of programme, and hope that the modern school will have a better showing in the future than in the past, and also that Mr. Gericke may become cognizant of the fact that sundry American composers have written worthy orchestral works.

L. C. E.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 20TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- | | |
|--------------|--|
| BEETHOVEN, | OVERTURE. (Egmont.) |
| BRUCH, | a) ADAGIO from the CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN, No. 2, in D minor, op. 44.
(First time.) |
| E. LALO, | b) FANTASIE NORWEGIENNE, in A.
Andante; Allegretto.—Andante.—Allegro.—
(First time.) |
| RUBINSTEIN, | BALLET MUSIC, "LA VIGNE."
a) PAS DE DEGUSTATION DES VINS.
b) VINS D'ITALIE.
c) VINS DE HONGRIE.
(First time.) |
| MENDELSSOHN, | SYMPHONY in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.
Introduction; Allegro agitato.—
Scherzo assai vivace.—Adagio cantabile.—
Allegro guerriero; Finale maestoso.— |

SOLOIST:

MR. M. LOEFFLER.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9:35 WILL CONFER A
FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

adv.

THE TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony chosen for last Saturday evening's Boston Orchestra concert was Mendelssohn's third,—in A minor, opus 56,—commonly known as the "Scotch" symphony, because of the taste of Highland flavor that creeps into the scherzo. The playing was masterly, but the reading of the first movement was in some respects new in the peculiar development of its time and force. The long introduction was taken by Mr. Gericke seriously and calmly, but when the allegro agitato succeeded he caused the whole of that portion of the movement to tend gradually and steadily toward an almost tempestuous ending. A similar treatment was given to the "Egmont" overture of Beethoven, with which the concert began. At first there was a soft but strong contrast between the broad, full chords and the short, half uncertain utterances of the single voices; but when the allegro was fairly established, and especially when the end was near, the movement was increased to a most rapid one and the vigor of the playing was excited almost to turbulence. That these readings are innovations is unquestionable; that they are necessarily censurable, because they are innovations, is not so sure. Boston has a pretty good musical judgment and a fair stock of musical knowledge, but it has no monopoly of learning or discretion, and, being remote from the great musical centres of the world, it may sometimes be at fault in one or the other particular. Mr. Gericke comes from a city where tradition, knowledge, taste and criticism all unite in establishing a standard worthy of respect; he shows that he is not erratic or whimsical, that he is not swayed to and fro by the feeling of the moment, and that what he does is the result of reflective determination. May it not then be reasonable to suppose that when conservatism is startled, and perhaps shocked, by some novel outline or apparently inconsistent coloring, he is not deviating from old models merely of his own motion, but is conforming to such newer ones as the Vienna of today accepts and follows?

There were novelties on the programme—three bits of ballet music from Rubinstein's "La Vigne" and two solos for violin. The former seemed less meant for dancing than for posing and grouping, although two of the numbers consented to end in the rhythmical balance of possible ballabile.

The first, "Le Pas de De gustation des Vins," suggests a great deal of tiptoeing about the casks and bottles, and sundry little wails and squeaks might even be taken for the tortuous entrance of the corkscrew and the spigot; after these comes a movement of more genial tone and a sudden little satisfied whistle winds up the whole. "Wines of Italy" and "Wines of Hungary" are the names of the other two pieces; the former develops into a fairish tarantella, and the latter takes a more even turn, half minuet, half mazurka. Neither really amounts to any more in melody or treatment than the music of a score of here unknown ballet spectacles, and cannot advantageously be compared for brilliancy and verve to that of De Giosa's "Brahma" or Devadacy, or of the German "Flik und Flak." The violin solos were a noble, almost sad, adagio, rising to a heroic temper at its close, by Bruch,—from his second violin concerto,—dignifiedly sustained by large but unobtrusive orchestration, and a Norwegian fantasy by Lalo—not an impressive work for loftiness or severity, but quaint, fresh and original, and therefore interesting. In general style of thought and manner it belongs with such music as Dr. Louis Maas's national compositions (to choose a known illustration), and its slender threads and light ornamentation might easily be broken by heavy handling or made to appear insignificant if rendered like the classic epics of the violin. Mr. Loeffler played both selections thoroughly well with better finish and securer ease than on his former appearance in one of these concerts. His technique was sufficient to accomplish all difficulties without betraying a consciousness of them, his phrasing was plain and proportionate, his tone was strong enough and of agreeable quality, and there was much just sentiment in his expression. The adagio showed that he could sustain himself well in simple strains, and the allegretto of the fantasy showed plenty of light and almost tricky skill.

Next Saturday evening the fourth Beethoven overture will be played, together with Cherubini's "Water Carrier" and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overtures, and two movements from a Beethoven quartette for all the strings of the orchestra. Miss Louise Rollwagen will sing from Handel, Brahms and Schumann.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 10th of the season's series of symphony concerts under the direction of Her Wilhelm Gericke at Music Hall last evening had Mr. M. Loeffler, the violinist, who shares Mr. Listemann's desk in the orchestra as soloist, and for a programme the following:

Overture (Egmont).....Beethoven
(a) Adagio from the concerto for violin, No. 2, in D minor, op. 44.....Bruch
(b) Fantasy Norwegian, in A; Andante; Allegretto; Andante.....Lalo
Ballet music, "La Vigne".....Rubinstein
Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.....Mendelssohn

There was an ample showing of novelties, the Rubinstein ballet music and both of Mr. Loeffler's selections being given for the first time here; but good taste and judgment were shown in the choice of the programme as a whole, and it proved an interesting and enjoyable one throughout. Mr. Loeffler's playing showed a marked improvement over his work of last season at these concerts, and his presentation of the Bruch and Lalo numbers displayed abilities of sterling worth. While he lacks something in breadth and freedom of style in his work, there is an intelligence, taste and expression in his playing which give rare satisfaction, and the purity of his tone and his ease and lack of ostentation give added enjoyment. He was generously applauded for his efforts, and is to be congratulated upon the success attending his appearance as soloist. The fantasy by Lalo is a delightful composition, and full of the quaint characteristics of Norwegian music, notwithstanding that the composer is a native of Spain. The characteristics of the three movements in the Rubi-stein ballet music were presented in a skill by Herr Gericke, the "Honore" especially being given with spirit and expression. The symphony and the grand "Egmont" were both played in a masterly fashion. It is only to be regretted that the weather prevented a larger attendance.

Tenth Symphony Concert.

The tenth symphony concert in Music Hall was attended by the usual large audience. The soloist was Mr. M. Loeffler, of merit, who played the adagio from second concerto and a Norwegian fantasia. Both of these numbers were heard for the first time. Rubinstein's odd and charming ballet music, "La Vigne," was the only novelty. It was also received with much favor. The symphony was Mendelssohn's (No. 3 in A minor), as a matter of course, finely given. The programme for next week will be as follows:

Overture (Sakuntala).....
Aria.....
Menuetto and Fugue from the quartet in C major, op. 40.....
(For strings.)
(a) Liebestreu.....
(b) Fruhlingslied.....
(Songs with piano.)
Overture (The Water-Carrier).....
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.....
Soloist, Miss Louise Rollwagen.

Music in Boston.

BOSTON, December 21.

THE tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening with the following programme:

Overture, "Egmont".....
Adagio from violin concerto No. 2 in D minor, op. 44 (first time).....
"Fantasia Norvegienne" in A (first time).....
Ballet music "La Vigne".....
a. Pas de dégustation de Vins.
b. Vins d'Italie.
c. Vins de Hongrie (first time).
Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.....
Soloist, Mr. M. Loeffler.

The Beethoven overture was finely rendered from the first note to the last, and was one of the best achievements of the orchestra this season. The tempi were well chosen, and the grand finale came out wonderfully well. In Mr. Loeffler we made the acquaintance of a thorough artist. His playing is distinguished by a noble tone, pure intonation, and careful phrasing. He belongs to the so-called French school of violin-playing. This is the third solo violinist we have thus far heard from the ranks of the orchestra, and there are some more yet. Surely few orchestras can boast of so many fine soloists among their first violins as the Boston Orchestra. The adagio of Bruch is good music, and contains a number of interesting passages. One theme reminds one very much of the last movement of his G minor concerto, and another theme is almost identical with the "Riesen Motive" from the "Rheingold" of Wagner. Lalo's "Fantasia" was much relished by the audience. It is written in the Scandinavian character, and contains some quaint melodies, interestingly scored and cleverly put together.

Mr. Loeffler was heartily applauded and repeatedly recalled. It was rather unfortunate for the Rubinstein ballet music that it came immediately after the Lalo number, not that there was any similarity in the compositions but because of their being both written in simple dance form, whereby a certain repetition of the same effects necessarily produced monotony after a while. It was a good opportunity for the thinking musician to notice how small the scope is, if one goes outside of the sonata form, and how impossible it is to build up any large movement without it. Aside from this, however, the Rubinstein numbers were neither as original in invention nor as finely scored as the Lalo "Fantasia." The Mendelssohn symphony was taken rather faster than I have been accustomed to hear it in Leipsic, where the tempi were, of course, handed down from Mendelssohn himself, but it was excellently played all the same by the orchestra and evidently delighted the audience present. To-night the Handel and Haydn Society will give the "Messiah" under Carl Zerrahn, of which performance I will speak in my next letter.

LOUIS MAAS.

Gazette MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," which was read in a manner that somewhat surprised us, notwithstanding we have become fairly well accustomed to the somewhat startling liberties Mr. Gericke takes with the tempi of well-known masterpieces; but, in this instance, his propensity for rapid tempi was carried so far that it should not be passed by without remonstrance. The allegro was taken at such a pace that it was made to vibrate in style between a lively waltz and a heavy scherzo, with a result that robbed it of all its nobility and appropriate color. At times the effect was almost distressing. It was followed by the adagio from Max Bruch's second concerto for the violin, a very fine movement, noble in character, heroic in style, and beautiful in its easy flow and its melodiousness. The orchestration is exceedingly rich and effective, and forms an admirable background to the solo without overpowering it at any time. It was beautifully interpreted by Mr. M. Loeffler in a large, clear, and thoroughly artistic manner, with an intonation that was always refined and sincere. Mr. Loeffler's bowing is broad and easy, his technique clean-cut and finished, and he brings a remarkably round, pure tone from his violin. He well deserved the hearty applause his performance drew forth. He also played a Norwegian Fantasia by E. Lalo, which consists of four movements. We cannot say that we greatly admired this work. It is well written, but it is not of any especial musical value. Its chief merit is in the opportunities it affords the soloist for display, and of these Mr. Loeffler took every advantage, playing and reading with marked grace and brilliancy of style, and yet without anything that approached trickery or effect for mere effect's sake. It was frank, loyal and admirable work from beginning to end, and reflected great credit on both the skill and the judicious taste of the artist, who was again cordially and appreciatively applauded. After this came Rubinstein's ballet music "La Vigne," which was given for the first time. The first movement is entitled "Pas de Dégustation des Vins," which is only remarkable for a passage in the violins which seems vividly to indicate that the wine disagreed with at least one of its tasters. The second movement, descriptive of "Vins d'Italie," begins with a suggestion that said wines were heavy, and then breaks into a rather indifferent tarentelle. The third movement was "Vins de Hongrie," which opens with a slow movement in which the familiar Hungarian cadence predominates, and then changes into a bright and lively dance. The music as a whole scarcely partakes of a ballet character. It is solidly and brilliantly scored, but it is not in its composer's happiest vein, and will add nothing to his reputation. It was finely and expressively interpreted, but made no very profound impression. The symphony was Mendelssohn's in A minor, perhaps his finest work of the kind, and that which wears the best. Mr. Gericke made an innovation in the opening of the first movement by taking it quite slowly, and gradually working up to the allegro agitato demanded by the score. The change did not strike us as felicitous in effect. The scherzo was given with spirit, but somewhat disjointedly, owing to too great an effort to produce variety in color. The adagio was turned into an andante con moto, and lost proportionately in dignity, largeness, and appropriate expressiveness, while the succeeding allegro was taken at a presto pace, and the finale with a rapidity that deprived it to a great extent of the broad, majestic effect it produces when read in a larger and more impressive tempo. Mr. Gericke's conducting is so artistic and so excellent generally in its clearness, precision, firmness, and flexibility of style that his peculiar tendency to take liberties with the tempi marked in the scores is to be the more regretted. At the next concert the programme will be as follows: Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala"; Aria by Handel; Minuet and Fugue from Beethoven's Quartette in C, op. 49; songs by Brahms and Schumann; Cherubini's overture to the "Water Carrier," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 4. Miss Louise Rollwagen is to be the soloist.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The tenth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being:

Beethoven. Overture to "Egmont."
Bruch. (a) Adagio from the Concerto for Violin, No. 2, in D minor, op. 44.
E. Lalo. (b) Fantasia Norvegienne, in A.
Rubinstein. Ballet Music, "La Vigne."
(a) Pas de Dégustation des Vins.
(b) Vins d'Italie.
(c) Vins d'Hongrie.
Mendelssohn. Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.

Mr. M. Loeffler was the violinist.

Mr. Gericke takes the "Egmont" overture very much as we used to hear it played here years ago, perhaps even a little faster. The opinions of conductors all over the world seem to be pretty evenly divided as to the rate at which the Allegro of this overture should be played. Of the conductors who have given the overture in Boston, Mr. Thomas stands at the head of the "slow" faction. He used to take the movement so that one was impelled to count three rapid beats to a measure. Mr. Henschel took it in the same spirit, although his tempo was not quite so slow as Mr. Thomas's. Mr. Zerrahn, on the other hand, belonged manifestly to the "quick" party; for if, during the last few years that he conducted symphony concerts here, he moderated the rate of his beat a little, in the old times, if we remember aright, he used to take the movement so that it made the impression on the ear of a four-bar rhythm with one beat to a measure. Mr. Gericke does the same, "only more so." The difference between the slow and the quick tempo is, rhythmically speaking, this: With the former, as one hears the music with closed eyes, one naturally counts "One, two, three; one, two, three" quite rapidly; with the latter, one instinctively counts "One, two, three, four," but not so rapidly. Naturally the two tempi give a totally different character to the overture; which is the right one is a matter open to discussion. It is to be suspected, however, that Mr. Gericke has the Viennese tradition on his side. The music from Rubinstein's "La Vigne" is light and easily charming; cleverly orchestrated, graceful in style, if not overburdened with ideas. The composer seems to have taken national dance-rhythms as characteristic of the wines of Italy and Hungary, although there is a certain effervescent fizzing of the strings in the Italian movement that might be considered suggestive of the Moscato spumante d'asti. But the Hungarian dance movement suggests anything but the cloying richness, fruity bouquet and next-day's headache of the wines of Hungary. All three of the movements were delightfully played, and much enjoyed. The playing of the "Scotch" symphony was well calculated to give rise to divers reflections on the part of the careful listener. Mr. Gericke took the first movement just as it is set down in the score, beginning the Allegro moderately, and quickening the tempo at the first fortissimo. But it seems as if the modifications of tempo indicated in the score were manifestly insufficient, careful as Mendelssohn usually was in such matters. A return to the original tempo is nowhere indicated, and Mr. Gericke made none; after he had got to his faster rate of speed he stuck to it throughout. Now, it can only be said that if Mendelssohn did not really intend to return to stein ballet music were presented with admirable skill by Herr Gericke, the "Vins de Hongrie" especially being given with all desired spirit and expression. The melodious symphony and the grand "Egmont" overture were both played in a masterly fashion, and it is only to be regretted that the severity of the weather prevented a larger attendance.

Tenth Symphony Concert.

The tenth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening was attended by the usual large audience. The soloist was Mr. M. Loeffler, a violinist of merit, who played the adagio from Bruch's second concerto and a Norwegian fantasia by E. Lalo. Both of these numbers were heard for the first time. Rubinstein's odd and characteristic ballet music, "La Vigne," was the only other novelty. It was also received with much favor. The symphony was Mendelssohn's (No. 3 in A minor) and was, as a matter of course, finely given. The programme for next week will be as follows:

Overture (Sakuntala).....Goldmark
Aria.....Handel
Mennetto and Fugue from the quartet in C major, op. 49.....Beethoven
(For strings.)
(a) Liebestreu.....Brahms
(b) Fruhlingslied.....Schumann
(Songs with piano.)
Overture (The Water-Carrier).....Cherubini
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.....Beethoven
Soloist, Miss Louise Rollwagen.

Music in Boston.

BOSTON, December 21.

THE tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening with the following programme:

Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Adagio from violin concerto No. 2 in D minor, op. 44 (first time).....Bruch
"Fantasia Norwegienne" in A (first time).....E. Lalo
Ballet music "La Vigne".....Rubinstein
a. Pas de dégustation de Vins.
b. Vins d'Italie.
c. Vins de Hongrie (first time).
Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.....Mendelssohn
Soloist, Mr. M. Loeffler.

The Beethoven overture was finely rendered from the first note to the last, and was one of the best achievements of the orchestra this season. The tempi were well chosen, and the grand finale came out wonderfully well. In Mr. Loeffler we made the acquaintance of a thorough artist. His playing is distinguished by a noble tone, pure intonation, and careful phrasing. He belongs to the so-called French school of violin-playing. This is the third solo violinist we have thus far heard from the ranks of the orchestra, and there are some more yet. Surely few orchestras can boast of so many fine soloists among their first violins as the Boston Orchestra. The adagio of Bruch is good music, and contains a number of interesting passages. One theme reminds one very much of the last movement of his G minor concerto, and another theme is almost identical with the "Riesen Motive" from the "Rheingold" of Wagner. Lalo's "Fantasia" was much relished by the audience. It is written in the Scandinavian character, and contains some quaint melodies, interestingly scored and cleverly put together.

Mr. Loeffler was heartily applauded and repeatedly recalled. It was rather unfortunate for the Rubinstein ballet music that it

THE CLUB CONCERT.

Club gave their first chamber concert hall of the Metropolitan Opera the 16th inst. This new concert hall, which has been built for the purpose, is very well suited for people, and was filled on the occasion in question with a fashionable audience. The programme consisted of works by Beethoven. Messrs. Beethoven and A. Hartdegen gave a fine arrangement of the first movement of the Ven's trio, op. 11, in B flat major, for piano and violin. This is a very interesting though not a very great master, and the slow movement is particularly beautiful. Mr. Bockelman brought out the first movement with musicianly understanding. The keyboard also shows a gain

Gazette MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," which was read in a manner that somewhat surprised us, notwithstanding we have become fairly well accustomed to the somewhat startling liberties Mr. Gericke takes with the tempi of well-known masterpieces; but, in this instance, his propensity for rapid tempi was carried so far that it should not be passed by without remonstrance. The allegro was taken at such a pace that it was made to vibrate in style between a lively waltz and a heavy scherzo, with a result that robbed it of all its nobility and appropriate color. At times the effect was almost distressing. It was followed by the adagio from Max Bruch's second concerto for the violin, a very fine movement, noble in character, heroic in style, and beautiful in its easy flow and its melodiousness. The orchestration is exceedingly rich and effective, and forms an admirable background to the solo without overpowering it at any time. It was beautifully interpreted by Mr. M. Loeffler in a large, clear, and thoroughly artistic manner, with an intonation that was delightfully true, and with an expressiveness that was always refined and sincere. Mr. Loeffler's bowing is broad and easy, his technique clean-cut and finished, and he brings a remarkably round, pure tone from his violin. He well deserved the hearty applause his performance drew forth. He also played a Norwegian Fantasia by E. Lalo, which consists of four movements. We cannot say that we greatly admired this work. It is well written, but it is not of any especial musical value. Its chief merit is in the opportunities it affords the soloist for display, and of these Mr. Loeffler took every advantage, playing and reading with marked grace and brilliancy of style, and yet without anything that approached trickery or effect for mere effect's sake. It was frank, loyal and admirable work from beginning to end, and reflected great credit on both the skill and the judicious taste of the artist, who was again cordially and appreciatively applauded. After this came Rubinstein's ballet music "La Vigne," which was given for the first time. The first movement is entitled "Pas de Dégustation des Vins," which is only remarkable for a passage in the violins which seems vividly to indicate that the wine disagreed with at least one of its tasters. The second movement, descriptive of "Vins d'Italie," begins with a suggestion that said wines were heavy, and then breaks into a rather indifferent tarentelle. The third movement was "Vins de Hongrie," which opens with a slow movement in which the familiar Hungarian cadence predominates, and then changes into a bright and lively dance. The music as a whole scarcely partakes of a ballet character. It is solidly and brilliantly scored, but it is not in its composer's happiest vein, and will add nothing to his reputation. It was finely and expressively interpreted, but made no very profound impression. The symphony was Mendelssohn's in A minor, perhaps his finest work of the kind, and that which wears the best. Mr. Gericke made an innovation in the opening of the first movement by taking it quite slowly, and gradually working up to the allegro agitato demanded by the score. The change did not strike us as felicitous in effect. The scherzo was given with spirit, but somewhat disjointedly, owing to too great an effort to produce variety in color. The adagio was turned into an andante con moto, and lost proportionately in dignity, largeness, and appropriate expressiveness, while the succeeding allegro was taken at a presto pace, and the finale with a rapidity that deprived it to a great extent of the broad, majestic effect it produces when read in a larger and more impressive tempo. Mr. Gericke's conducting is so artistic and so excellent generally in its clearness, precision, firmness, and flexibility of style that his peculiar tendency to take liberties with the tempi marked in the scores is to be the more regretted. At the next concert the programme will be as follows: Goldmark's Overture to "Sakuntala"; Aria by Handel; Minuet and Fugue from Beethoven's Quartette in C, op. 49; songs by Brahms and Schumann; Cherubini's overture to the "Water Carrier," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 4. Miss Louise Rollwagen is to be the soloist.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The tenth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being: Beethoven. Overture to "Egmont." Bruch. (a) Adagio from the Concerto for Violin, No. 2, in D minor, op. 44. E. Lalo. (b) Fantasia Norwegienne, in A. Rubinstein. Ballet Music, "La Vigne." (a) Pas de Dégustation des Vins. (b) Vins d'Italie. (c) Vins d'Hongrie.

Mendelssohn. Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.

Mr. M. Loeffler was the violinist.

Mr. Gericke takes the "Egmont" overture very much as we used to hear it played here years ago, perhaps even a little faster. The opinions of conductors all over the world seem to be pretty evenly divided as to the rate at which the Allegro of this overture should be played. Of the conductors who have given the overture in Boston, Mr. Thomas stands at the head of the "slow" faction. He used to take the movement so that one was impelled to count three rapid beats to a measure. Mr. Henschel took it in the same spirit, although his tempo was not quite so slow as Mr. Thomas's. Mr. Zerrahn, on the other hand, belonged manifestly to the "quick" party; for if, during the last few years that he conducted symphony concerts here, he moderated the rate of his beat a little, in the old times, if we remember aright, he used to take the movement so that it made the impression on the ear of a four-bar rhythm with one beat to a measure. Mr. Gericke does the same, "only more so." The difference between the slow and the quick tempo is, rhythmically speaking, this: With the former, as one hears the music with closed eyes, one naturally counts "One, two, three; one, two, three" quite rapidly; with the latter, one instinctively counts "One, two, three, four," but not so rapidly. Naturally the two tempi give a totally different character to the overture; which is the right one is a matter open to discussion. It is to be suspected, however, that Mr. Gericke has the Viennese tradition on his side. The music from Rubinstein's "La Vigne" is light and easily charming; cleverly orchestrated, graceful in style, if not overburdened with ideas. The composer seems to have taken national dance-rhythms as characteristic of the wines of Italy and Hungary, although there is a certain effervescent fizzing of the strings in the Italian movement that might be considered suggestive of the Moscato spumante d'asti. But the Hungarian dance movement suggests anything but the cloying richness, fruity bouquet and next-day's headache of the wines of Hungary. All three of the movements were delightfully played, and much enjoyed. The playing of the "Scotch" symphony was well calculated to give rise to divers reflections on the part of the careful listener. Mr. Gericke took the first movement just as it is set down in the score, beginning the Allegro moderately, and quickening the tempo at the first fortissimo. But it seems as if the modifications of tempo indicated in the score were manifestly insufficient, careful as Mendelssohn usually was in such matters. A return to the original tempo is nowhere indicated, and Mr. Gericke made none; after he had got to his faster rate of speed he stuck to it throughout. Now, it can only be said that if Mendelssohn did not really intend to return to the original tempo of this movement when he returned to its first theme, the movement stands utterly alone and unparalleled among the composer's works. We think Mr. Gericke took the second movement a shade too fast, making it lose thereby all the quaint bonhomie of its rhythm; it sounded like too much of a scramble. On the other hand he began the Adagio exactly at the rate set down in the score (albeit he quickened the tempo unduly later on in the movement). It was no unnoteworthy example of how completely the true Mendelssohnian spirit is becoming a thing of the past with the present generation, that there were probably very few people in the audience who did not feel that this tempo was too rapid. We were all aching to have it go slower; but it was Mendelssohn's tempo, for all that, if there be faith in metronome marks. The symphony, as a whole, was excellently played. But why did Mr. Gericke make a decided wait between all the movements? Mr. Loeffler is a violinist well armed at all technical points. His tone is brilliant, his intonation flawless, his phrasing artistic, often graceful. He plays with great musicianly feeling, and never for an instant descends to trickery. He played the Bruch Adagio like a master. The composition itself is strongly effective, one which one would fain hear again. Mr. Loeffler also gave much zest to the quaint, tricky picturesqueness of Lalo's Norwegian Fantasy, albeit that he has not in him quite enough native devilry fully to enter into the spirit of the last Halling movement. De Sève would have been the man of men to play this. But Mr. Loeffler is so thorough an artist that he can afford to do without that diable-à-quatre dash with which some players can fiddle an audience into frenzy.

The next programme is—

Goldmark—Overture ("Sakuntala.")
Handel—Aria.
Beethoven—Menuetto and fugue from the quartet in C major, op. 49. (For strings.)
Brahms—(a) "Liebestreu."
Schumann—(b) "Frühlingslied." (Songs with piano.)
Cherubini—Overture to "The Water-Carrier."
Beethoven—Symphony in B-flat. No. 4, op. 60.
Miss Louise Rollwagen will be the singer.

Journalist

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—At the Saturday-evening concert, the tenth of the series, novelties were numerous, though the necessary conservative element had happy and wise representation. This was the programme; Mr. M. Loeffler being the soloist:

Beethoven, Bruch	Overture. (Egmont.) a) Adagio from the Concerto for violin, No. 2, in D minor, op. 44. (First time.)
E. Lalo,	b) Fantasia Norwegienne, in A, for violin (with orchestra). (First time.)
Rubinstein,	Ballet music, "La Vigne." a) Pas de degustation des vins. b) Vins d'Italie. c) Vins de Hongrie. (First time.)
Mendelssohn,	Symphony in A minor, No. 3. op. 56.

Of the new works, the movement from the Violin Concerto of Bruch is the most serious, though concerning Mr. Loeffler's selections this inquiry is superfluous. Why did he not play the whole of the Concerto? The work has so much contemporary value, it has been deemed so important by the best players, —Joachim Carrodus, Rhodes (of Philadelphia), have played it,—that it is hardly creditable to Boston to have had performed but a single movement. Placing this Adagio upon the programme in juxtaposition to the inconsequential concert-salon music by Lalo, gave one a feeling that Mr. Loeffler desired to make an impression upon his audience by means more common with the unreflecting and superficial musician. The Adagio is written very gracefully. The theme is fervid and musically well sustained. Its second subject is almost suppliant in its tenderness. As performed, Mr. Loeffler's tone was insufficient in ensemble passages, though there is unusually heavy scoring for the low strings. His style is more noticeable for finish than breadth; though he uses a commonplace sort of instrument, his playing gives good satisfaction. His intonation is admirable. In the suite by the Spaniard, Lalo, written in four movements, the player had opportunity for much that is eccentric, fanciful and bizarre, and orchestra likewise; a rendering marked by much freedom of style on the part of both resulted, which quite won the audience. Three numbers were played from Rubinstein's elaborate ballet d'action, "The Grape." With the second scene (b) the guardian spirits of the wines of various countries assert themselves and execute chorographic feats; Vins d'Italie, le Hongrie and the others being examples of Rubinstein's faculty at musical nationalization. His success in catching the genius of the several countries in this respect is not so apparent as that he has here written some very difficult music, with which an orchestra must struggle hard in order to do well. The performance of the Egmont overture was in every sense superb. The No. 3 (Scotch) Symphony of Mendelssohn was also played delightfully. As original as its predecessor (the Italian), it is more lofty and impressive. Mendelssohn never departed from tradition; he followed models like many a humbler man, but always with so much individuality and glow of genius that he is almost alone in his epoch, contemporary with himself. The Scotch Symphony should properly be played through without pause; its final movement, too, is hardly more than an impressive coda to the brilliant Allegro. The programme of the next concert, with Miss Louise Rollwagen

vocalist, is:	Overture, (Sakuntala.)
Goldmark,	Aria.
Handel,	Menuetto and Fugue from the quartet in C major, op. 49. (For strings.)
Beethoven,	a) Liebestreu. b) Frühlingslied. (Songs with piano.)
Brahms,	Overture, (The Water-Carrier.)
Schumann,	Symphony in B-flat. No. 4, op. 60.
Cherubini,	Adagio; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—Scherzo. (Allegro vivace).—Allegro man non troppo.
Beethoven,

MUSIC.

Continued

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night exhibited the usual merits of performance, and also the deficiencies in selection that have been apparent in recent programmes. To give two symphonies of Mendelssohn—and we understand that a third is to follow—while Berlioz, Bizet, Duorak, Svendsen and other moderns are denied a hearing for lack of room, is to treat Boston rather like a provincial town than a musical centre, and when we find the American muse conspicuous only by her absence from the programmes, we must lift our voice in vehement assertion that the first duty of an American orchestra would be to present what is good among native orchestral works. The Mendelssohn Symphony, called the "Scotch," is like many of the works of the composer which have titles, more subjective than the general school of programme music. The first movement presents a clashing of dissonances, and mournful cries of grief that seem to call up scenes from Ossian, while the Scherzo gives a melody in the style of the Scotch folk song with all the snap and geniality of its school. Beyond this there is nothing that is essentially Scotch in the work. It received—if we except a rather rapid execution of the Adagio—an excellent reading, elastic in its tempo, clear in its balance and phrasing. A trifle of burlesqueness in the Scherzo can scarcely be classed as a fault. The responses between woodwind and strings, in the finale, were finely given, and the close of the work evoked some well deserved enthusiasm. We cannot so cordially praise the Egmont overture, which was taken in a light and hurried manner, which made it appear somewhat trivial. Spite of our opening criticism we have to thank Mr. Gericke for two new works on this programme. Rubinstein's ballet music, "La Vigne," is by no means as sparkling as his "Feramors" music of the same genre. It is light and playful, characteristic also in the last two movements, having an Italian dance and a Hungarian "Friska" to picture the wines of these countries.

What the first movement means we can only guess at. A heavy passage of brass and double bass possibly is a tone picture of drinking out of the demijohn, and a subsequent chromatic phrase on violins portrays the fact that it disagreed with the party. But we will not be tempted further into the field of imaginative "intention finding."

Mr. M. Loeffler was the soloist of the concert, and his violin playing was broad, effective and musicianly, free from the tricks of virtuosity, and yet brilliant enough to leave nothing to be desired. The adagio from Bruch's second, violin concerto, was full of nobility and power. The tutti passages, lofty and military in their character, added greatly to the effect. The Norwegian Fantasie was, of course, of a less elevated school, attempting graphic bits of local color and winding up with a hilarious "Halling" or rustic dance. When one sees the Norwegian peasant dancing in the barn and directing his entire energies to kicking the beam over his head, while the admiring spectators shout their delight and the fiddlers scratch away for dear life, he can understand the wild frenzy of the latter part of this fantasie. The ensemble in the furious close was not always perfect, but Mr. Loeffler's work was most spirited and commendable. Next week the programme will be Teutonic in an intense degree.

The tenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall Saturday evening with Mr. M. Loeffler, violinist, as the solo performer. The following programme was given:

Overture (Egmont).....	Beethoven
(a) Adagio from the concerto for violin, No. 2, in D minor, op. 44.....	Bruch
(b) Fantasia Norwegienne, in A; Andante; Allegretto; Andante; Allegro.....	E. Lalo
Ballet music, "La Vigne".....	Rubinstein
Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.....	Mendelssohn

The performance of this programme was generally very excellent, the Mendelssohn symphony being especially well given. Apropos of this work a pleasing story is told to the effect that curious to observe what effect his symphony produced in Paris, Mendelssohn went to the Conservatory of Music incognito and unknown to any in the audience, changed his seat several times in order to hear the expressions of opinion on the part of various people. He heard always the one thing—"C'est magnifique, mais c'est Beethoven!" or "C'est Beethoven pur!" After his death among his letters was found one to his friend Devrient, in which he describes the painful impression it made upon him to hear that his work was very much like Beethoven's Symphony in A Major, but he concludes by saying, "It is true, but I could not help it, it is so beautiful." Mr. Loeffler has a pure, simple and elaborate method of playing, and never descends to mere gymnastic effects, as do too many modern violinists. He gave a fine performance of the Bruch selection, but the Fantasia Norwegienne was rather long, and has not sufficient color to give Mr. Loeffler's abilities full opportunity. There was also a disagreement as to pitch between Mr. Loeffler and the orchestra in this selection, which marred the tout ensemble of the performance. The eleventh concert will be given next Saturday evening, the public rehearsal preceding it on Friday afternoon. The soloist will be Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto, and the selections as follows: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Aria, Handel; Menuetto and fugue from the quartet in C major, op. 49, Beethoven; for strings—(a) Liebestreu, Brahms; (b) Frühlingslied, songs with piano, Schumann; Overture, "The Water Carrier," Cherubini; Symphony in B-flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven.

meno presto; tempo primo.

brio.

LOIST:

HUNTINGTON.

the original tempo of this movement when he returned to its first theme, the movement stands utterly alone and unparalleled among the composer's works. We think Mr. Gericke took the second movement a shade too fast, making it lose thereby all the quaint bonhomie of its rhythm; it sounded like too much of a scramble. On the other hand he began the Adagio exactly at the rate set down in the score (albeit he quickened the tempo unduly later on in the movement). It was no unnoteworthy example of how completely the true Mendelssohnian spirit is becoming a thing of the past with the present generation, that there were probably very few people in the audience who did not feel that this tempo was too rapid. We were all aching to have it go slower; but it was Mendelssohn's tempo, for all that, if there be faith in metronome marks. The symphony, as a whole, was excellently played. But why did Mr. Gericke make a decided wait between all the movements? Mr. Loeffler is a violinist well armed at all technical points. His tone is brilliant, his intonation flawless, his phrasing artistic, often graceful. He plays with great musicianly feeling, and never for an instant descends to trickery. He played the Bruch Adagio like a master. The composition itself is strongly effective, one which one would fain hear again. Mr. Loeffler also gave much zest to the quaint, tricky picturesqueness of Lalo's Norwegian Fantasy, albeit that he has not in him quite enough native devilry fully to enter into the spirit of the last Halling movement. De Sève would have been the man of men to play this. But Mr. Loeffler is so thorough an artist that he can afford to do without that diable-à-quatre dash with which some players can fiddle an audience into frenzy.

The next programme is—
Goldmark—Overture ("Sakuntala.")
Handel—Aria.
Beethoven—Menuetto and fuge from the quartet in C major, op. 49. (For strings.)
Brahms—(a) "Liebestreu."
Schumann—(b) "Frühlingslied." (Songs with piano.)
Cherubini—Overture to "The Water-Carrier."
Beethoven—Symphony in B-flat. No. 4, op. 60.
Miss Louise Rollwagen will be the singer.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—At the Saturday-evening concert, the tenth of the series, novelties were numerous, though the necessary conservative element had happy and wise representation. This was the programme, Mr. M. Loeffler being the soloist:

Beethoven,	Overture. (Egmont.)
Bruch	a) Adagio from the Concerto for violin, No. 2, in D minor, op. 44. (First time.)
E. Lalo,	b) Fantasia Norwegienne, in A, for violin (with orchestra). (First time.)
Rubinstein,	Ballet music, "La Vigne." a) Pas de degustation des vins. b) Vins d'Italie. c) Vins de Hongrie. (First time.)
Mendelssohn,	Symphony in A minor. No. 3, op. 56.

Of the new works, the movement from the Violin Concerto of Bruch is the most serious, though concerning Mr. Loeffler's selections this inquiry is superfluous. Why did he not play the whole of the Concerto? The work has so much contemporary value, it has been deemed so important by the best players, —Joachim Carrodus, Rhodes (of Philadelphia), have played it,—that it is hardly creditable to Boston to have had performed but a single movement. Placing this Adagio upon the programme in juxtaposition to the inconsequential concert-salon music by Lalo, gave one a feeling that Mr. Loeffler desired to make an impression upon his audience by means more common with the unreflecting and superficial musician. The Adagio is written very gracefully. The theme is fervid and musically well sustained. Its second subject is almost suppliant in its tenderness. As performed, Mr. Loeffler's tone was insufficient in ensemble passages, though there is unusually heavy scoring for the low strings. His style is more noticeable for finish than breadth; though he uses a commonplace sort of instrument, his playing gives good satisfaction. His intonation is admirable. In the suite by the Spaniard, Lalo, written in four movements, the player had opportunity for much that is eccentric, fanciful and bizarre, and orchestra likewise; a rendering marked by much freedom of style on the part of both resulted, which quite won the audience. Three numbers were played from Rubinstein's elaborate ballet d'action, "The Grape." With the second scene (b) the guardian spirits of the wine of various countries assert their and execute chorographic feats; Vins d'Italie, le Hoangne and the others being examples of Rubinstein's faculty at musical nationalization. His success in catching the genius of the several countries in this respect is not so apparent as that he has here given some very difficult music, with which an orchestra must struggle hard in order to do well. The performance of the Egmont overture was in every sense superb. The No. 3 (Scotch) Symphony of Mendelssohn was also played delightfully. As original as its predecessor (the Italian), it is more lofty and impressive. Mendelssohn never departed from tradition; he followed models like many a humbler man, but always with so much individuality and glow of genius that he is almost alone in his epoch, contemporary with himself. The Scotch Symphony should properly be played through without pause; its final movement, too, is hardly more than an impressive coda to the brilliant Allegro. The programme of the next concert, with Miss Louise Rollwagen

vocalist, is:	Overture, (Sakuntala.)
Goldmark,	Aria.
Handel,	Menuetto and Fugue from the quartet in C major, op. 49. (For strings.)
Beethoven,	a) Liebestreu. b) Frühlingslied. (Songs with piano.)
Brahms,	Overture, (The Water-Carrier.)
Schumann,	Symphony in B-flat. No. 4, op. 60.
Cherubini,	Adagio; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—Scherzo. (Allegro vivace).—Allegro man non troppo.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night exhibited the usual merits of performance, and also the deficiencies in selection that have been apparent in recent programmes. To give two symphonies of Mendelssohn—and we understand that a third is to follow—while Berlioz, Bizet, Duorak, Svendsen and other moderns are denied a hearing for lack of room, is to treat Boston rather like a provincial town than a musical centre, and when we find the American muse conspicuous only by her absence from the programmes, we must lift our voice in vehement assertion that the first duty of an American orchestra would be to present what is good among native orchestral works. The Mendelssohn Symphony, called the "Scotch," is like many of the works of the composer which have titles, more subjective than the general school of programme music. The first movement presents a clashing of dissonances, and mournful cries of grief that seem to call up scenes from Ossian, while the Scherzo gives a melody in the style of the Scotch folk song with all the snap and geniality of its school. Beyond this there is nothing that is essentially Scotch in the work. It received—if we except a rather rapid execution of the Adagio—an excellent reading, elastic in its tempo, clear in its balance and phrasing. A trifle of burlesqueness in the Scherzo can scarcely be classed as a fault. The responses between woodwind and strings, in the finale, were finely given, and the close of the work evoked some well deserved enthusiasm. We cannot so cordially praise the Egmont overture, which was taken in a light and hurried manner, which made it appear somewhat trivial. Spite of our opening criticism we have to thank Mr. Gericke for two new works on this programme. Rubinstein's ballet music, "La Vigne," is by no means as sparkling as his "Femors" music of the same genre. It is light and playful, characteristic also in the last two movements, having an Italian dance and a Hungarian "Friska" to picture the wines of these countries.

What the first movement means we can only guess at. A heavy passage of brass and double bass possibly is a tone picture of drinking out of the demijohn, and a subsequent chromatic phrase on violins portrays the fact that it disagreed with the party. But we will not be tempted further into the field of imaginative "intention finding."

Mr. M. Loeffler was the soloist of the concert, and his violin playing was broad, effective and musicianly, free from the tricks of virtuosity, and yet brilliant enough to leave nothing to be desired. The adagio from Bruch's second, violin concerto, was full of nobility and power. The tutti passages, lofty and military in their character, added greatly to the effect. The Norwegian Fantasia was, of course, of a less elevated school, attempting graphic bits of local color and winding up with a hilarious "Halling" or rustic dance. When one sees the Norwegian peasant dancing in the barn and directing his entire energies to kicking the beam over his head, while the admiring spectators shout their delight and the fiddlers scratch away for dear life, he can understand the wild frenzy of the latter part of this fantasia. The ensemble in the furious close was not always perfect, but Mr. Loeffler's work was most spirited and commendable. Next week the programme will be Teutonic in an intense degree.

The tenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall Saturday evening with Mr. M. Loeffler, violinist, as the solo performer. The following programme was given:

Overture (Egmont).....	Beethoven
a) Adagio from the concerto for violin, No. 2, in D minor, op. 44.....	Bruch
b) Fantasia Norwegienne, in A; Andante; Allegretto; Andante; Allegro.....	E. Lalo
Ballet music, "La Vigne".....	Rubinstein
Symphony in A minor, No. 3, op. 56.....	Mendelssohn

The performance of this programme was generally very excellent, the Mendelssohn symphony being especially well given. Apropos of this work a pleasing story is told to the effect that curious to observe what effect his symphony produced in Paris, Mendelssohn went to the Conservatory of Music Incognito and unknown to any in the audience, changed his seat several times in order to hear the expressions of opinion on the part of various people. He heard always the one thing—"C'est magnifique, mais c'est Beethoven!" or "C'est Beethoven pur!" After his death among his letters was found one to his friend Devrient, in which he describes the painful impression it made upon him to hear that his work was very much like Beethoven's Symphony in A Major, but he concludes by saying, "It is true, but I could not help it, it is so beautiful." Mr. Loeffler has a pure, simple and elaborate method of playing, and never descends to mere gymnastic effects, as do too many modern violinists. He gave a fine performance of the Bruch selection, but the Fantasia Norwegienne was rather long, and has not sufficient color to give Mr. Loeffler's abilities full opportunity. There was also a disagreement as to pitch between Mr. Loeffler and the orchestra in this selection, which marred the tout ensemble of the performance. The eleventh concert will be given next Saturday evening, the public rehearsal preceding it on Friday afternoon. The soloist will be Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto, and the selections as follows: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Aria, Handel; Menuetto and fugue from the quartet in C major, op. 49, Beethoven; for strings—(a) Liebestreu, Brahms; (b) Frühlingslied, songs with piano, Schumann; Overture, "The Water Carrier," Cherubini; Symphony in B-flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven.

meno presto; tempo primo.

LOIST:

HUNTINGTON.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.35 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICHKE, CONDUCTOR.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27TH, AT 8. P. M.

PROGRAMME.

GOLDMARK,	OVERTURE, (Sakuntala.)
HÆNDEL,	ARIA.
BEETHOVEN,	MENUETTO AND FUGUE from the Quartette in C major, op. 59. (For STRINGS.)
BRAHMS,	a) LIEBESTREU.
SCHUBERT,	b) WOHN ? (SONGS with Piano.)
CHERUBINI,	OVERTURE, (The Water-Carrier.)
BEETHOVEN,	SYMPHONY in B flat. No. 4, op. 60. Adagio; Allegro vivace.— Adagio.— Scherzo. (Allegro vivace).— Allegro ma non troppo.—

SOLOIST:

MISS LOUISE ROLLWAGEN.

ARIA. (HÆNDEL.)

O Lord! as from the mouth of the Child arose the sacred strain, so we, who faithfully consecrate ourselves to Thee, offer most humble praise.

LIEBESTREU. (BRAHMS.)

"O my child, thy grief, thy sorrow drown
In the sea, in the deep, dark sea!"
"A stone may rest on the ocean's bed,
My sorrow comes back to me."
"And thy love, the love of thy heart so fond,
Cast it out from thy bosom's shrine."
"Tho' the sever'd blossom droop and die,
Faithful love fore'er is mine."
"But thy faith, thy faith 't was but a word,
To the winds it hath been given."
"O mother, a rock may be cleft by the winds,
But my faith shall endure unto Heaven."

WHOHIN? (SCHUBERT.)

I heard a brooklet rushing
From its rocky fountain near,
Adown the valley rushing
So fresh and wondrous clear.
I know not what came o'er me.
Nor who the counsel gave,
But I must hasten downward,
All with my pilgrim stave;
Still downward and even farther
And ever the brook beside,
While ever fresher murmur'd
And clearer ran the tide.

Is this the way I was going?
Oh! brooklet, whither, say?
Thou hast with thy soft murmur
My senses charm'd away.
What do I call a murmur?
That can no murmur be!
The water-nymphs are singing
Their roundelays for me.
Oh! still let them sing and wander,
And blithely murmur near,
The wheels of a mill are going
In every brooklet clear.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony played at the eleventh Boston Orchestra concert on Saturday evening last, was Beethoven's fourth, and the reading of at least three of its movements may be praised without qualification. In the first, the transition from the adagio of the introduction to the allegro vivace was admirably made, and this subsequent portion was all limpidly given, there being especial beauty and clearness in the long pianissimo some half dozen pages before the end. The second movement, the adagio, was exceedingly well done, and the rustling groups of short notes in the undercurrent of the orchestration were never allowed to press upon or to hurry the calm breadth of the theme. It seemed to us, however, that in some cases these groups of six notes were occasionally accented by the wooden wind as two triplets. The scherzo went well and lightly, but the final allegro was surely a shade too fast. Non troppo is of course an elastic phrase, and may be applied to the spirit or to the technical fashion of expressing the thought; it cannot be objected that the orchestra did not get through with their work smoothly enough, but it may be said that the movement did stir now and then an uneasy tear lest they should not.

There were two overtures on the programme—Goldmark's "Sakuntala" and Cherubini's "Water Carrier"—and the contrast between their styles and the appropriateness of the readings given to them were most interesting. In the latter there is a broad theme or two, simply treated and gradually worked out in direct and logical fashion to a strong, decided conclusion; in the former there is a constant shifting of the ground, brief phrases, quick responses, fanciful adornment, and a desire for poetic expression first and foremost. The orchestra have done nothing, to our thinking, to show so well Mr. Gericke's delicate and varied taste and their own accordance with it, as this "Sakuntala." Their tone was rich and persuasive, the scores of little obbligati were bright and soft, and the whole effect was as of a deep, lucent opal.

The other orchestral number was an arrangement for all the strings of the minuet and fugue from Beethoven's quartette in C major, opus 59. While we recognize the admirable technical command and perfect unity of movement which the string-players have acquired, and are delighted to hear it, we can but enter another protest against the exhibition of it in such irrelevant ways. A quartette is not meant to be played in a huge hall, nor by a full band; still less ought it to be tinkered into a quintette by stuffing a double bass part into it, which at one moment makes the fourth voice too heavy by doubling it, and next makes it sound strangely weak by its silence, and is absolutely intrusive if it is given something separate to say. A whole chorus might just as well sing the solo lines of the ninth symphony and be done with it.

The soloist of the evening was the contralt singer, Miss Louise Rollwagen, whom we wish we might praise heartily, for she is a careful and conscientious musician, and has a natural organ of pleasant and extensive range. Her singing was very unequal—or, perhaps, we should say her vocalization; for we cannot really call that singing in which scarcely one single word of the text is intelligible. In her first selection, which was Handel—"Oh, Lord, as from the mouth of the child arose the sacred strain,"—and accompanied by the orchestra, she was quite successful and delivered the finest melody smoothly and agreeably, but whether to German or English text we do not know; for this she merited and received a recall. But her two songs with pianoforte, Brahms's "Liebestreu" and Schubert's "Wohin," were far from good, the former being almost all out of tune and quite without the contrast of its little dialogue, while the second although nicely in time and tune, lacked both grace and spirit.

A prime attraction will be found in the scheme for the next concert—Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto, to be played by Professor Baermann. The other numbers will be Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, the variations and march from Lachner's suite, opus 113, and Schumann's fourth symphony.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted an excellent audience to Music Hall, last night. It opened with Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," which was read in a broad, richly-colored, and impressive manner, and with fine contrasts of light and shade and great beauty and flexibility of expression. It was one of Mr. Gericke's decided successes, and may be ranked with his noteworthy reading of the "Tannhäuser" overture. Cherubini's "Water Carrier" overture, later in the concert, was also interpreted admirably, the opening movement having been given with striking dignity, and the allegro with rare spirit and brilliancy. The Minuet and Fugue from Beethoven's quartette in C, op. 59, was played by the strings with clearness, fluency and precision, and served to demonstrate with the best results the efficiency of this feature of the orchestra; but we cannot see what advantage has been gained or what artistic principle has been enforced by turning two movements that Beethoven wrote as a quartette into a quintette. It was well enough as the composer left it. It was never intended for orchestral effect, and the fugued movement, weak enough in its original form, had its fugue weakness intensified when played by some forty instruments, instead of four,—as the irregularities on the surface of a highly polished needle are seen when it is magnified under a microscope. When there is so much good music written for an orchestra that has not been heard, and is well worth the hearing, why play these impertinent and perverted arrangements? The symphony was Beethoven's No. 4 in B-flat. The opening adagio was largely and impressively read, and the first allegro received excellent treatment generally, especially in the refinement of light and shade that characterized it. The performance of the adagio was clear, broad and sympathetic. The finale was given forth with a rapidity that was as dangerous as it was exciting, but no disaster ensued, though the bassoon was very nearly wrecked on the little solo passage that falls to its lot. The soloist was Miss Louise Rollwagen, who sang Handel's aria, "O, Lord, as from the mouth," and the songs "Liebestreu" by Brahms, and Schubert's "Wohin," with great earnestness, and much taste and expression. She was warmly applauded. At the next concert will be given Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," variations and march from Lachner's suite op. 113, and Schumann's Symphony in D-minor. The soloist will be Mr. Carl Baermann, who will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

ARIA. (HÄNDEL.)

O Lord! as from the mouth of the Child arose the sacred strain, so we, who faithfully consecrate ourselves to Thee, offer most humble praise.

LIEBESTREU. (BRAHMS.)

"O my child, thy grief, thy sorrow drown
In the sea, in the deep, dark sea!"
"A stone may rest on the ocean's bed,
My sorrow comes back to me."
"And thy love, the love of thy heart so fond,
Cast it out from thy bosom's shrine."
"Tho' the sever'd blossom droop and die,
Faithful love fore'er is mine."
"But thy faith, thy faith 't was but a word,
To the winds it hath been given."
"O mother, a rock may be cleft by the winds,
But my faith shall endure unto Heaven."

WHOHIN? (SCHUBERT.)

I heard a brooklet rushing
From its rocky fountain near,
Adown the valley rushing
So fresh and wondrous clear.
I know not what came o'er me,
Nor who the counsel gave,
But I must hasten downward,
All with my pilgrim stave;
Still downward and even farther
And ever the brook beside,
While ever fresher murmur'd
And clearer ran the tide.

Is this the way I was going?
Oh! brooklet, whither, say?
Thou hast with thy soft murmur
My senses charm'd away.
What do I call a murmur?
That can no murmur be!
The water-nymphs are singing
Their roundelays for me.
Oh! still let them sing and wander,
And blithely murmur near,
The wheels of a mill are going
In every brooklet clear.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony played at the eleventh Boston Orchestra concert on Saturday evening last, was Beethoven's fourth, and the reading of at least three of its movements may be praised without qualification. In the first, the transition from the adagio of the introduction to the allegro vivace was admirably made, and this subsequent portion was all limpidly given, there being especial beauty and clearness in the long pianissimo some half dozen pages before the end. The second movement, the adagio, was exceedingly well done, and the rustling groups of short notes in the undercurrent of the orchestration were never allowed to press upon or to hurry the calm breadth of the theme. It seemed to us, however, that in some cases these groups of six notes were occasionally accented by the wooden wind as two triplets. The scherzo went well and lightly, but the final allegro was surely a shade too fast. Non troppo is of course an elastic phrase, and may be applied to the spirit or to the technical fashion of expressing the thought; it cannot be objected that the orchestra did not get through with their work smoothly enough, but it may be said that the movement did stir now and then an uneasy fear lest they should not.

There were two overtures on the programme—Goldmark's "Sakuntala" and Cherubini's "Water Carrier"—and the contrast between their styles and the appropriateness of the readings given to them were most interesting. In the latter there is a broad theme or two, simply treated and gradually worked out in direct and logical fashion to a strong, decided conclusion; in the former there is a constant shifting of the ground, brief phrases, quick responses, fanciful adornment, and a desire for poetic expression first and foremost. The orchestra have done nothing, to our thinking, to show so well Mr. Gericke's delicate and varied taste and their own accordance with it, as this "Sakuntala." Their tone was rich and persuasive, the scores of little obligati were bright and soft, and the whole effect was as of a deep, lucent opal.

The other orchestral number was an arrangement for all the strings of the minuet and fugue from Beethoven's quartette in C major, opus 59. While we recognize the admirable technical command and perfect unity of movement which the string-players have acquired, and are delighted to hear it, we can but enter another protest against the exhibition of it in such irrelevant ways. A quartette is not meant to be played in a huge hall, nor by a full band; still less ought it to be tinkered into a quintette by stuffing a double bass part into it, which at one moment makes the fourth voice too heavy by doubling it, and next makes it sound strangely weak by its silence, and is absolutely intrusive if it is given something separate to say. A whole chorus might just as well sing the solo lines of the ninth symphony and be done with it.

The soloist of the evening was the contralt singer, Miss Louise Rollwagen, whom we wish we might praise heartily, for she is a careful and conscientious musician, and has a natural organ of pleasant and extensive range. Her singing was very unequal—or, perhaps, we should say her vocalization; for we cannot really call that singing in which scarcely one single word of the text is intelligible. In her first selection, which was Handel—"Oh, Lord, as from the mouth of the child arose the sacred strain,"—and accompanied by the orchestra, she was quite successful and delivered the finest melody smoothly and agreeably, but whether to German or English text we do not know; for this she merited and received a recall. But her two songs with pianoforte, Brahms's "Liebestreu" and Schubert's "Wohn," were far from good, the former being almost all out of tune and quite without the contrast of its little dialogue, while the second although nicely in time and tune, lacked both grace and spirit.

A prime attraction will be found in the scheme for the next concert—Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto, to be played by Professor Baermann. The other numbers will be Mendelssohn's "Ray Blas" overture, the variations and march from Lachner's suite, opus 113, and Schumann's fourth symphony.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted an excellent audience to Music Hall, last night. It opened with Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," which was read in a broad, richly-colored, and impressive manner, and with fine contrasts of light and shade and great beauty and flexibility of expression. It was one of Mr. Gericke's decided successes, and may be ranked with his noteworthy reading of the "Tannhauser" overture. Cherubini's "Water Carrier" overture, later in the concert, was also interpreted admirably, the opening movement having been given with striking dignity, and the allegro with rare spirit and brilliancy. The Minuet and Fugue from Beethoven's quartette in C, op. 59, was played by the strings with clearness, fluency and precision, and served to demonstrate with the best results the efficiency of this feature of the orchestra; but we cannot see what advantage has been gained or what artistic principle has been enforced by turning two movements that Beethoven wrote as a quartette into a quintette. It was well enough as the composer left it. It was never intended for orchestral effect, and the fugued movement, weak enough in its original form, had its fugue weakness intensified when played by some forty instruments instead of four,—as the irregularities on the surface of a highly polished needle are seen when it is magnified under a microscope. When there is so much good music written for an orchestra that has not been heard, and is well worth the hearing, why play these impertinent and perverted arrangements? The symphony was Beethoven's No. 4 in B-flat. The opening adagio was largely and impressively read, and the first allegro received excellent treatment generally, especially in the refinement of light and shade that characterized it. The performance of the adagio was clear, broad and sympathetic. The finale was given forth with a rapidity that was as dangerous as it was exciting, but no disaster ensued, though the bassoon was very nearly wrecked on the little solo passage that falls to its lot. The soloist was Miss Louise Rollwagen, who sang Handel's aria, "O, Lord, as from the mouth," and the songs "Liebestreu" by Brahms, and Schubert's "Wohn," with great earnestness, and much taste and expression. She was warmly applauded. At the next concert will be given Mendelssohn's overture to "Ray Blas," variations and march from Lachner's suite op. 113, and Schumann's Symphony in D-minor. The soloist will be Mr. Carl Baermann, who will play Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Review

Here is the programme of last weeks' symphony concert, and a more teutonic bill of fare it would be difficult to imagine;

Overture, "Sakuntala" Goldmark
Aria Handel

Miss Rollwagen.

Menuetto and Fugue, from the Quartette in C major, op. 59, for strings Beethoven

Songs with Piano... { a. Liebestreu Brahms
 b. Wohin? Schubert

Miss Rollwagen.

Overture, "The Water Carrier" Cherubini
Symphony in B flat. No. 4, op. 60 Beethoven

Adagio; Allegro vivace—Adagio.

Scherzo. (Allegro vivace)—Allegro ma non troppo.

The maker of these regular German doses, evidently looks upon Berlioz, Liszt and St. Saëns, as the world, the flesh and the devil, and has determined to renounce them forever. We are rigidly orthodox in our programmes now, but alas, we still hanker after the flesh-pots of Egypt.

Mr. Gericke has made some of his greatest successes thus far in overtures. His readings of the overtures to "Freischütz" and "Tannhauser," revealed those works in a new light and won instantaneous recognition. The overture to "Sakuntala" made as great a success. The opening deep phrases for strings were solemn and impressive, the sforzando chords were given with an absolute unity; the strong contrasts were all sharply defined, the rapid figures for the brasses went without a trace of insecurity, the repetition of a single motif by the different instruments of the wood wind was clearly given, but when the noble climax was reached the effect was especially magnificent and the accelerando with which it was taken was a well chosen tempo. Almost equally successful was the overture to the "Water-Carrier," which, barring a slight break in the wood-wind, was beautifully given. In the matter of light and shade the orchestra stands far in advance of any we have had in Boston yet, and this was finely shown in the symphony. There was a slight leaning towards extreme rapidity in some of the passages of the finale, but for all that, it was not a capricious reading. Mr. Gericke is to be greatly commended that he does not too rigidly adhere to the set tempo marked at the beginning of movements. He evidently takes these as guide-posts, and not as laws fixed as those of the Medes and Persians. His readings are always elastic in this respect, and vary entirely with the passing emotions. Thus, there were many grades of rapidity to be found in the finale, but none seemed to violate the composer's thought. In the performance of this symphony, the orchestra gave some refined nuances which could scarcely have been excelled.

I do not think that the fourth symphony gives Beethoven at his best. Perhaps this is because it comes between two of his greatest symphonies, and it is dwarfed by comparison. Nevertheless, I see no reason why the fourth,—and also the first and the sixth—should be given to us with annual regularity, while in the outlying provinces—Cincinnati for example—they are having Dvorak and Raff, and Rubinstein and other richness.

145
5

And also, I see no reason for giving Beethoven's fugues with a full string orchestra. Beethoven's fugues (whisper it not in Gath), are not admirable models in the first place, and do not become any better by magnifying them. But this number was a very difficult affair and at least served to show what excellent material Mr. Gericke's string band is composed of.

The vocalist, Miss Louisa Rollwagen, was not quite at home in the "Haydn School," her round, rich voice and sympathetic expression, found a much more congenial field in the German lieder which followed. Whether from nervousness or from a cold under which her voice seemed struggling, her intonation was not always perfect, a tendency to decline in pitch was at times apparent, a fault which many heavy voices are subject to, but which is by no means chronic with this earnest and expressive contralto.

Next week we are to have some more of the German composers, and also for the fourth time, some variations. At present we seem to be getting variations without any variation.

L. C. E.

REVIEW OF RECENT CONCERTS

THE month has been prolific in important concerts; and we can do little more than name some of them, in the press of a specially crowded musical season. Naturally, the most important were the

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

At these, the chief symphonies have been Schumann's B-flat, a new one (to America) by Schubert, and Beethoven's Second and Third. Schumann's First Symphony, the one where he pictures spring and joy, the happiest work in all his list, was finely played, although we must reprehend a tendency of the violins to go ahead of the conductor's beat. Schubert's Symphony in C—not the great one—was a delightful work, full of beauty and melody and dainty orchestral color. It is not a highly developed work, but we must not expect that of Schubert at an age when Beethoven had not finished his First Symphony. Mr. Gericke deserves thanks for having rescued so fine a work from oblivion. The Beethoven Symphonies were well played. The orchestra has advanced so steadily in proficiency that we are safe in saying that it never was in such excellent working order as at present. Some of its readings come like a revelation. The Freischütz Overture has seldom been so well performed by the best orchestras of Europe as it was by the Boston

14 146

Symphony Orchestra during the past month. Such light and shade, such perfection of horn-playing, such clearness of phrasing, can call forth only enthusiasm on the part of the critic, as they certainly did on the part of the audience. The same eulogy may be pronounced on the performance of the Tannhäuser Overture. We have heard this work many times, but never in as perfect a manner as it was given at these Symphony Concerts. Mr. Gericke's reading was different in many respects from that we have been accustomed to, and it was more effective. The brasses were no longer used in a continuous fortissimo, but were as full of effects of shading as the other instruments. The famous figure of the violins at the finale was not taken so rapidly as usual, and came out the more clearly for this change. It was pleasant to note the keen appreciation of the audience at these concerts. Not only has the hall been more thronged than ever before, but every fine point seemed, by the liberal applause, to be intelligently understood by the public. Boston, at this rate, will soon become a city of critics. The chief soloists at the recent concerts have been Miss Garlichs, pianist, and Mr. B. Listemann, violinist. Miss Garlichs gave the Fourth Concerto of Beethoven a very faithful and intelligent reading, although the proof that her powers were somewhat overtaxed by the work lay in the fact that the last movement was not so finely rendered as the first. Mr. Listemann played two movements of a Paganini Concerto in a very brilliant manner. Of course, the music belonged to the firework order of violin playing; but the audience gave him a perfect ovation for his virtuosity. It was a case of virtuosity being its own reward.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1884.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The eleventh concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being: Goldmark. Overture, "Sakuntala."

Handel. Aria.

Beethoven. Menuetto and fugue from the quartet in C major, op. 59. For strings.

Brahms. a. Liebestreu.

Schubert. b. Wohin? Songs with piano.

Cherubini. Overture to "The Water Carrier."

Beethoven. Symphony in B-flat. No. 4, op. 60.

Miss Louie Rollwagen was the singer.

In these days, when so much stress is laid upon the style in which music is given, it is interesting to hear an unquestionably authentic version of a composition, especially if that composition be the work of a prominent contemporary composer. There are very few modern overtures which have won for themselves so conspicuous a position in the concert repertory of the day as Goldmark's "Sakuntala" (we note, by the way, that Harvard College spells it Sakuntala).

It is a work warmly admired by some, rather pooh-poohed by others; but any music-lover who is fond of patting this and that together must have picked up his ears to hear it conducted by Mr. Gericke, who, as a personal friend of the composer, was sure to know the correct rendering of his work. The performance was in every way a surprise, and showed plainly enough that the conductors who have given the overture here before shot far wide of the composer's intention. Mr. Gericke takes the tempo of the greater part of the "Sakuntala" a good third faster than we have ever heard it before. The effect is very brilliant, and clears the overture of all reproach of sickly sentimentality. Personally, we do not like the composition much, but we like it far better right than wrong. Against the playing of the minuet and fugue from Beethoven's C-major Quartet by all the strings we must protest. Such abnormal transplanting of chamber music into the symphony concert hall can only be excused by surpassing excellence of effect; the effect in this case was bad—there is no use in mincing matters. In face of the large quantity of existing orchestral music of which almost every one is only too anxious to get at least a trial hearing, these flights into the "illegitimate" are difficult to explain. There are too many things composed for orchestra which we have not heard here for us to afford to fill up the gaps in our symphony concert programmes with "arrangements." Cherubini's "Water-Carrier" overture was very brilliantly played, and made a superb effect. Mr. Gericke made his men insist upon certain accents in just the right way. Bravo! With the performance of Beethoven's B-flat symphony the only fault reasonably to be found was that most of it seemed taken unaccountably fast. Mr. Gericke takes the Finale even faster than Mr. Heaschel did, and heaven knows what vials of critical wrath were uncorked for his benefit. One could wish to have done with this eternal question of tempo, which seems all too dry and technical, albeit that it really lies very close to the heart of the matter of musical performance. But there really seems little else to talk about. Such a tempo as Mr. Gericke's in this Finale can come only from a conception formed by reading the notes alone, without consideration of the "allegro, ma non troppo" which Beethoven wrote at the head of the movement, or else from tradition. Now "tradition" is a ticklish customer at best. We all know the story of the three black crows. Here is a true story in point. Halévy allowed Duprez to take a certain allegro phrase in one of the ensemble movements of his "Jewess" a little slower than he had intended it to go, simply because the great tenor could not force his huge voice to the furious pace of the original tempo. The result of this concession of Halévy's has been that, wherever the "Jewess" is given, this phrase is now sung as an adagio, and there is not an opera conductor in the world who will not tell you that such is the unalterable "tradition." Berlioz wrote from Germany in 1841: "Lindpaintner astonished me * * * by the rapid tempo he took in certain numbers. I have since then seen many German kapellmeisters who have the same way of thinking on this point; such are, among others, Mendelssohn, Krebs and Guhr. As to the tempi in * * * I have nothing to say, for they have undoubtedly the true traditions much better than I." Traditions, yes! But nothing is so liable to variation as the tradition of a tempo. Mr. Gericke has a manifest right to his own opinions and to the traditions he chooses to follow. It is even interesting to see a man who has an idea follow out that idea through thick and thin. But one is not bound to agree with him.

Miss Rollwagen was evidently very nervous and hardly did herself justice in the Handel air, which, moreover, was not particularly well suited to her voice. In spite of the earnestness and concentration with which she entered upon her task, her better powers seemed to desert her for the moment. The air itself, taken from one of the anthems (the score filled out, and, to our mind, rather over-instrumented, by Mr. Gericke), is beautiful, because Handelian, but can hardly rank with the master's really great things. Neither did the song by Brahms make any very decided impression. For one thing, Mr. Gericke's style of accompanying songs of this sort on the pianoforte seems wholly a mistake. That delicate smothering of the accompaniment to give sole prominence to the singer's voice belongs properly to a totally different class of music. Mr. Gericke's accompanying, which would be simply exquisite in a Gordigiani canzonet, or a Bellini cavatina, is inadequate in a Brahms or Franz song, where the pianoforte has full as much to say as the voice. Miss Rollwagen is too excellent a singer and musician to have her only partial success last Saturday counted against her record. The selections she made (or that were made for her?) were unwise, to begin with.

The next programme is:

Mendelssohn. Overture to "Ruy Blas."

Beethoven. Concerto for pianoforte in E-flat, No. 5, op. 73.

Lachner. Variations and march from the suite op. 113.

Schumann. Symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.

Mr. Carl Baermann will be the pianist.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The organ being finished, our reconstructed Music Hall is complete; thus sensitive Bostonians are provided with a structure analogous in point of humiliating suggestiveness to the Perkins fountain. To those who have faithfully tried to forget the result of the efforts of the colorist whose decorative sense secured to our whilom noble hall such inharmonious effects as did exist up to the time of opening the new organ, it will be living the struggle over again to see this aided band of color on the organ case, which is inharmonious and makes more hideous what was already so. While this state of affairs is a source of constant grief to many who love the place, candor compels one to admit that the orchestra at the Saturday-evening concert played the eleventh programme of the series indifferent to the speculations of the audience concerning the eventual spoliation of the red screen behind them, or their arguments as to the drabs and browns with which they were surrounded. This was the programme:

Goldmark,	Overture (Sakuntala).
Handel,	Aria.
Beethoven,	Menuetto and Fugue from the Quartet in C major, op. 59.
	(For strings.)
Brahms,	(a) Liebestreu.
Schubert,	(b) Wohin?
	(Songs with piano.)
Cherubini,	Overture (The Water Carrier).
Beethoven,	Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.
	Adagio; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—
	Scherzo. (Allegro vivace.)—Allegro ma non troppo.

Miss Louise Rollwagen was the singer, and her negative success is a matter of regret. No soloist of the season has been so indifferently treated by the audience; her recall after the aria, which (without the aid(?) of the printed programme) is found to be a part from Handel's XVI. Anthem was urged by it quite as a matter of form. Of course the recall at these concerts stands now only as an indication of courtesy or habit on the part of the audience; it does not signify a discriminating quality. A large hiss at the proper moment would doubtless have been unpleasant to the singer, but it would have brought the audience to a realization of its duty. The Handel selection is very agreeable music to sing; its broad, sustained phrases, requiring only infrequent displacing of the vowel form, serve the singer well. This, the church type of Handel, less stately than the oratorio, without the boldness of his opera mood and subject, is ineffective as concert music. Miss Rollwagen sings intelligently and represents in her ample voice a good school of vocal culture; but she has not a command of timbre to allow the greatest scope in her selections, and unless she sings more tunefully she cannot hope for an advanced position among singers. The beautiful Brahms's "Liebestreu," and the less-known song of Schubert were sung with Mr. Gericke's accompaniment. The larger sentiment of the Brahms is more in Miss Rollwagen's best style, but owing to what appeared to be the indisposition of the singer, she was not able to do herself justice with either. The orchestra worked hard and achieved much. The Sakuntala overture seems an aggregation of musical elements, many being of marked beauty, but they are joined together with a genius-like disregard of form which produces bewilderment. Its analysis would show a very complex work, and were it not for the contrast it affords, its kaleidoscopic treatment would be monotonous. It is a great show piece; the transition from moments of great animation and exuberant tumult to the brief calm of the andante, or the frequently-heard choral figure, are to the confident conductor, eloquent in opportunities. Mr. Gericke has never been more successful with his orchestra than in performing this overture. The Water Carrier overture was well played and afforded an excellent example of the politic, delightful, but never-beyond-his-epoch Cherubini. To perform the two movements from Beethoven's C major quartet with a large body of strings is to do a misdeed, but to do it well removes for the time the curse. The furious work demanded of the quartet of strings in the Allegro Molto (Fugue) was formidable indeed when undertaken by so many. The tempo was full fast enough, and while the union of all the parts was good, brilliancy was the chiefest result; it could hardly be otherwise, as the scoring when placed before the full string band of the modern orchestra (the bass often doubles the 'cello part) is heavy, and defies, at true tempo, a clear-cut rendering. Some great effects were produced by this performance; the crescendo, which is in itself the climax of the last movement, was wrought out magnificently; the final attack of the first violin came like a thunderous exultation. The tempi taken in Beethoven's Fourth Symphony agreed with the metronomic marks, excepting in the closing Allegro, Ma Non Troppo. Lying between the superb Eroica and the inspired Fifth, the Fourth Symphony has suffered somewhat from its surroundings, and its position before connoisseurs has always seemed dwarfed. No one of the immortal series has in its introductory movement more perfect suggestion of hidden force or unbidden thought than this first Adagio. The Allegro vivace rivals any similar movement in the clearness with which is expressed a buoyant and telling theme. The middle movement (Adagio) has an exquisite story, in meaning and sentiment as elevated as anything the master ever wrote; the beauty of the theme, played in constantly-varied combinations between the wood-winds and the strings, is a constant revelation. The Scherzo, with its alternating Allegro vivace, is inimitable; the Allegro Ma Non Troppo superb. The performance of the Symphony left nothing to be desired; most perfect attention on the part of the player rewarded a reading from the conductor's desk which was invariably sympathetic. It is pleasant to note improved ventilation throughout the hall; the interest of one of the ushers in the atmospheric indicator placed in the second balcony is almost sufficient to excuse him from such ill-timed visits as have become his habit. Carl Baermann will play the E-flat Concerto No. 5 at the next concert; the selections for orchestra then will be: Mendelssohn overture, "Ruy Blas," variations and march from the Lachner suite, opus 113, and Schumann's D-minor Symphony.

Last Night's Symphony Concert.

The programme of the symphony concert last evening contained no novelties. It was not arranged with any more taste than usual, and the symphony was placed at the end. An evening of orchestral music undoubtedly is somewhat stimulating, but it is safe to say that there are a considerable number whose appetites clog rather than become sharper as the feast progresses. If it requires any freshness of mind thoroughly to appreciate the beauties of the greatest and most complicated of orchestral works such a work certainly should not be placed at the end of a long programme. No properly conducted dinner begins with the champagne and ends with the meat, and though the simile may be a trifle clumsy it none the less expresses the feelings of a large number of the patrons of the symphony concerts on this point.

Miss Rollwagen was the soloist last night, and she did fairly well. There were no flaws in the work of the orchestra and the conductor acquitted himself with his usual discretion.

Next week the programme will be:

Overture (Ruy Blas).....	Mendelssohn
Concerto for Pianoforte in E flat, No. 5.....	Beethoven
Variations and March from the Suite op. 113.....	Lachner
Symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.....	Schumann
Soloist—Mr. Carl Baermann.

It is possible that the present series of concerts in the Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will end on March 28, will be supplemented by four concerts in April. Engagements for Western concert tours of several of the leading members of the orchestra may prevent the carrying out of this scheme.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

Eleventh Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given at Music Hall Saturday night, with Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto, as soloist. The following was the programme:

Overture ("Sakuntala").....	Goldmark
Aria.....	Handel
Menuetto and fugue from the quartet in C major, op. 59.....	Beethoven
(a) Liebestreu.....	Brahms
(b) Wohin?.....	Schubert
Overture ("The Water Carrier").....	Cherubini
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.....	Beethoven

Goldmark's overture is written in a grandiose style. The introduction, full of sentimental melody, with very fine effects for string instruments, is followed by an allegro full of pathos and rich in harmonical effects. To follow such a work is in the first place a bracing exercise of the intellect. Despite the great difficulties with which Sakuntala is filled from the beginning to the end, the string instruments were fireproofable, and the performance was remarkably satisfactory. Miss Louise Rollwagen sang with much taste the Grand Air of Handel. Her strong and rich contralto voice produced a very pleasant impression, but she sang a little out of tune Wohin? by Schubert, and Liebestreu, by Brahms. This last work is written in the usual style of German lieder, but without any decided character. The Menuetto by Beethoven was admirably rendered by the string instruments, and the Fugue, with its theme of a charmingly coquettish style, and treated in a masterly way, had an irresistible effect. A great difference exists between Cherubini's style of composition and that of his Italian contemporaries. This lies in his perfect ensemble. Every point is treated with a skillful and consummate master hand, and the composition is made full of poetry and musical science. But it must be said that the overture Le Porteur d'eau was not advantageously put on the programme of Saturday evening's concert, among such works as the Menuetto, Fugue and the symphony in B flat by Beethoven, compared with which the Water-carrier appeared small and without elevation. Added to this, the clarionets and the flutes were completely out of tune, and it is not to be wondered at that the work did not produce much effect. The symphony in B flat by Beethoven was rendered in an exquisite way. The Allegro, so playful in both its principal themes and so finely developed in the orchestral and melodic parts; the Adagio, with its religious and suave theme, was admirably rendered by the clarionets, and for the second time by the flute and the bassoon; the Scherzo, full of vivacity, was given with excellent spirit, and the finale was also admirably played. The twelfth concert, next Saturday evening, will be given with the following programme, Mr. Carl Baermann appearing as solo pianist:

Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; concerto for pianoforte in E flat, No. 5, op. 73; Beethoven; variations and march from the suite op. 113; Lachner; symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120, Schumann.
--

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Eleventh of the Season's Series, Miss Rollwagen Soloist.

The 11th of the season's series of symphony concerts, Herr Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto, as soloist, and the following as the programme:

Overture ("Sakuntala").....	Goldmark
Aria.....	Handel
Menuetto and fugue from the quartet in C major, op. 59.....	Beethoven
(a) Liebestreu.....	Brahms
(b) Wohin?.....	Schubert
Overture ("The Water Carrier").....	Cherubini
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.....	Beethoven

Herr Gericke's masterly abilities were clearly shown in his reading of the symphony of the evening, as the manifold beauties of the composition were presented with a freshness and vitality which gave them almost a new meaning, and again proved the wisdom of making an annual repetition of the Beethoven symphonies the corner-stone of the scheme of these concerts. The wonderful richness of the work in melodious ideas, and the still more remarkable skill shown by the master in his marvellous use of light and shade throughout the several movements, were brought out in such a distinct fashion that the enthusiasm of the audience was but natural, and the applause which rewarded the conductor was worthily bestowed. The choice of the programme aside from the symphony, was not altogether a happy one, as it proved, though the failure of the soloist of the evening to meet the demands made by her selections had much to do with this result. It would be mistaken kindness to commend a singer for such work as that contributed by Miss Rollwagen; and it seems an ill advised action to put forward so prominently an artist who is, at present, so poorly prepared to meet the requirements demanded from the soloists of such concerts. There is a lack of character in her singing and such an ever present evidence of studied effort, that there is little enjoyment given the listener. The Goldmark overture is one of the best of this composer's compositions in this line, and was played with admirable taste as was also the brilliant "Water Carrier" overture of Cherubini. The menuetto and fugue served to again demonstrate the marked abilities of the string players, but many more enjoyable selections could be named which would afford equal opportunities in this direction.

CTOBER 17TH.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The organ being finished, our reconstructed Music Hall is complete; thus sensitive Bostonians are provided with a structure analogous in point of humiliating suggestiveness to the Perkins fountain. To those who have faithfully tried to forget the result of the efforts of the colorist whose decorative sense secured to our whilom noble hall such inharmonious effects as did exist up to the time of opening the new organ, it will be living the struggle over again to see this aided band of color on the organ case, which is inharmonious and makes more hideous what was already so. While this state of affairs is a source of constant grief to many who love the place, candor compels one to admit that the orchestra at the Saturday-evening concert played the eleventh programme of the series indifferent to the speculations of the audience concerning the eventful spoliation of the red screen behind them, or their arguments as to the drabs and browns with which they were surrounded. This was the programme:

Goldmark,	Overture (Sakuntala).
Handel,	Aria.
Beethoven,	Menuetto and Fugue from the Quartet in C major, op. 59. (For strings.)
Brahms,	(a) Liebestreu.
Schubert,	(b) Wohin?
	(Songs with piano.)
Cherubini,	Overture (The Water Carrier).
Beethoven,	Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60. Adagio; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.— Scherzo. (Allegro vivace.)—Allegro ma non troppo.

Miss Louise Rollwagen was the singer, and her negative success is a matter of regret. No soloist of the season has been so indifferently treated by the audience; her recall after the aria, which (without the aid(?) of the printed programme) is found to be a part from Handel's XVI. Anthem was urged by it quite as a matter of form. Of course the recall at these concerts stands now only as an indication of courtesy or habit on the part of the audience; it does not signify a discriminating quality. A large hiss at the proper moment would doubtless have been unpleasant to the singer, but it would have brought the audience to a realization of its duty. The Handel selection is very agreeable music to sing; its broad, sustained phrases, requiring only infrequent displacing of the vowel form, serve the singer well. This, the church type of Handel, less stately than the oratorio, without the boldness of his opera mood and subject, is ineffective as concert music. Miss Rollwagen sings intelligently and represents in her ample voice a good school of vocal culture; but she has not a command of timbre to allow the greatest scope in her selections, and unless she sings more tunefully she cannot hope for an advanced position among singers. The beautiful Brahms's "Liebestreu," and the less-known song of Schubert were sung with Mr. Gericke's accompaniment. The larger sentiment of the Brahms is more in Miss Rollwagen's best style, but owing to what appeared to be the indisposition of the singer, she was not able to do herself justice with either. The orchestra worked hard and achieved much. The Sakuntala overture seems an aggregation of musical elements, many being of marked beauty, but they are joined together with a genius-like disregard of form which produces bewilderment. Its analysis would show a very complex work, and were it not for the contrast it affords, its kaleidoscopic treatment would be monotonous. It is a great show piece; the transition from moments of great animation and exuberant tumult to the brief calm of the andante, or the frequently-heard choral figure, are to the confident conductor, eloquent in opportunities. Mr. Gericke has never been more successful with his orchestra than in performing this overture. The Water Carrier overture was well played and afforded an excellent example of the politic, delightful, but never-beyond-his-epoch Cherubini. To perform the two movements from Beethoven's C major quartet with a large body of strings is to do a misdeed, but to do it well removes for the time the curse. The furious work demanded of the quartet of strings in the Allegro Molto (Fugue) was formidable indeed when undertaken by so many. The tempo was full fast enough, and while the unison of all the parts was good, brilliancy was the chiefest result; it could hardly be otherwise, as the scoring when placed before the full string band of the modern orchestra (the bass often doubles the 'cello part) is heavy, and defies, at true tempo, a clear-cut rendering. Some great effects were produced by this performance; the crescendo, which is in itself the climax of the last movement, was wrought out magnificently; the final attack of the first violin came like a thunderous exultation. The tempi taken in Beethoven's Fourth Symphony agreed with the metronomic marks, excepting in the closing Allegro, Ma Non Troppo. Lying between the superb Eroica and the inspired Fifth, the Fourth Symphony has suffered somewhat from its surroundings, and its position before connoisseurs has always seemed dwarfed. No one of the immortal series has in its introductory movement more perfect suggestion of hidden force or unbidden thought than this first Adagio. The Allegro vivace rivals any similar movement in the clearness with which is expressed a buoyant and telling theme. The middle movement (Adagio) has an exquisite story, in meaning and sentiment as elevated as anything the master ever wrote; the beauty of the theme, played in constantly-varied combinations between the wood-winds and the strings, is a constant revelation. The Scherzo, with its alternating Allegro vivace, is inimitable; the Allegro Ma Non Troppo superb. The performance of the Symphony left nothing to be desired; most perfect attention on the part of the player rewarded a reading from the conductor's desk which was invariably sympathetic. It is pleasant to note improved ventilation throughout the hall; the interest of one of the ushers in the atmospheric indicator placed in the second balcony is almost sufficient to excuse him from such ill-timed visits as have become his habit. Carl Baermann will play the E-flat Concerto No. 5 at the next concert; the selections for orchestra then will be: Mendelssohn overture, "Ruy Blas," variations and march from the Lachner suite, opus 113, and Schumann's D-minor Symphony.

Last Night's Symphony Concert.

The programme of the symphony concert last evening contained no novelties. It was not arranged with any more taste than usual, and the symphony was placed at the end. An evening of orchestral music undoubtedly is somewhat stimulating, but it is safe to say that there are a considerable number whose appetites clog rather than become sharper as the feast progresses. If it requires any freshness of mind thoroughly to appreciate the beauties of the greatest and most complicated of orchestral works such a work certainly should not be placed at the end of a long programme. No properly conducted dinner begins with the champagne and ends with the meat, and though the simile may be a trifle clumsy it none the less expresses the feelings of a large number of the patrons of the symphony concerts on this point.

Miss Rollwagen was the soloist last night, and she did fairly well. There were no flaws in the work of the orchestra and the conductor acquitted himself with his usual discretion.

Next week the programme will be:

Overture (Ruy Blas).....	Mendelssohn
Concerto for Pianoforte in E flat, No. 5.....	Beethoven
Variations and March from the Suite op. 113.....	Lachner
Symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.....	Schumann
Soloist—Mr. Carl Baermann.

It is possible that the present series of concerts in the Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will end on March 28, will be supplemented by four concerts in April. Engagements for Western concert tours of several of the leading members of the orchestra may prevent the carrying out of this scheme.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

Eleventh Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given at Music Hall Saturday night, with Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto, as soloist. The following was the programme:

Overture ("Sakuntala").....	Goldmark
Aria.....	Handel
Menuetto and fugue from the quartet in C major, op. 59.....	Beethoven
(a) Liebestreu.....	Brahms
(b) Wohin?.....	Schubert
Overture ("The Water Carrier").....	Cherubini
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.....	Beethoven

Goldmark's overture is written in a grandiose style. The introduction, full of sentimental melody, with very fine effects for string instruments, is followed by an allegro full of pathos and rich in harmonical effects. To follow such a work is in the first place a bracing exercise of the intellect. Despite the great difficulties with which Sakuntala is filled from the beginning to the end, the string instruments were fireproofable, and the performance was remarkably satisfactory. Miss Louise Rollwagen sang with much taste the Grand Air of Handel. Her strong and rich contralto voice produced a very pleasant impression, but she sang a little out of tune Wohin? by Schubert, and Liebestreu, by Brahms. This last work is written in the usual style of German lieder, but without any decided character. The Menuetto by Beethoven was admirably rendered by the string instruments, and the Fugue, with its theme of a charmingly coquettish style, and treated in a masterly way, had an irresistible effect. A great difference exists between Cherubini's style of composition and that of his Italian contemporaries. This lies in his perfect ensemble. Every point is treated with a skillful and consummate master hand, and the composition is made full of poetry and musical science. But it must be said that the overture Le Porteur d'eau was not advantageously put on the programme of Saturday evening's concert, among such works as the Menuetto, Fugue and the symphony in B flat by Beethoven, compared with which the Water-carrier appeared small and without elevation. Added to this, the clarionets and the flutes were completely out of tune, and it is not to be wondered at that the work did not produce much effect. The symphony in B flat by Beethoven was rendered in an exquisite way. The Allegro, so playful in both its principal themes and so finely developed in the orchestral and melodic parts; the Adagio, with its religious and suave theme, was admirably rendered by the clarionets, and for the second time by the flute and the bassoon; the Scherzo, full of vivacity, was given with excellent spirit, and the finale was also admirably played. The twelfth concert, next Saturday evening, will be given with the following programme, Mr. Carl Baermann appearing as solo pianist:

Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; concerto for pianoforte in E flat, No. 5, op. 73, Beethoven; variations and march from the suite op. 113, Lachner; symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120, Schumann.
--

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Eleventh of the Season's Series, Miss Rollwagen Soloist.

The 11th of the season's series of symphony concerts, Herr Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Louise Rollwagen, contralto, as soloist, and the following as the programme:

Overture ("Sakuntala").....	Goldmark
Aria.....	Handel
Menuetto and fugue from the quartet in C major, op. 59.....	Beethoven
(a) Liebestreu.....	Brahms
(b) Wohin?.....	Schubert
Overture ("The Water Carrier").....	Cherubini
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.....	Beethoven

Herr Gericke's masterly abilities were clearly shown in his reading of the symphony of the evening, as the manifold beauties of the composition were presented with a freshness and vitality which gave them almost a new meaning, and again proved the wisdom of making an annual repetition of the Beethoven symphonies the corner-stone of the scheme of these concerts. The wonderful richness of the work in melodious ideas, and the still more remarkable skill shown by the master in his marvellous use of light and shade throughout the several movements, were brought out in such a distinct fashion that the enthusiasm of the audience was but natural, and the applause which rewarded the conductor was worthily bestowed. The choice of the programme aside from the symphony, was not altogether a happy one, as it proved, though the failure of the soloist of the evening to meet the demands made by her selections had much to do with this result. It would be mistaken kindness to commend a singer for such work as that contributed by Miss Rollwagen; and it seems an ill advised action to put forward so prominently an artist who is, at present, so poorly prepared to meet the requirements demanded from the soloists of such concerts. There is a lack of character in her singing and such an ever present evidence of studied effort, that there is little enjoyment given the listener. The Goldmark overture is one of the best of this composer's compositions in this line, and was played with admirable taste as was also the brilliant "Water Carrier" overture of Cherubini. The menuetto and fugue served to again demonstrate the marked abilities of the string players, but many more enjoyable selections could be named which would afford equal opportunities in this direction.

CTOBER 17TH.

150
COURIER
BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last night's concert emphasized the remarks which we have frequently made regarding the programmes of the Boston Symphony series this season. Entirely in the German school, and one work an arrangement at that, it would have been of interest to Boston a generation ago, but now, when we have heard these works, so these many days, it has a certain familiarity which, while it does not "breed contempt," at least gives satiety. We have just received a programme of the Philharmonic Orchestra, of Cincinnati, which may, perhaps, illustrate our meaning vividly. Look on this picture:

CINCINNATI, Nov. 20.—"A Faust Overture," Wagner; Chante de Dalila, "Printemps qui commence," from "Sampson et Dalila," Saint-Saens, Miss Emma Cranch; Adagio for Violoncello, Goltermann, Mr. Michael Brand; Slavonic Rhapsody, in E flat, No. 3, Dvorak; Symphony, "Im Walde" (In the Woods), Raff. Part I.—At day: a, allegro, impressions and sensations. Part II.—In the twilight: b, largo, Traumerei (Reverie); c, allegro assai, Dance of the Dryads. Part III.—At night: d, allegro, stillness of night in the woods; entrance and departure of the wild hunt with Frau Holle and Wotan; break of day.

And then look on this:

Boston, Dec. 27.—Goldmark, overture, (Sakuntala); Handel, Aria; Beethoven, Menuetto and Fugue from the quartette in C major, op. 49, (for strings); Brahms, a Liebestreu; Schurbert, b Wohin, (songs with piano); Cherubini, overture, (the water-carrier); Beethoven, Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.

We are not so heterodox as to run after strange gods, and are loyal enough to believe that it is better to play a triangle in the Boston orchestra than to dwell as leader in the tents of the Cincinnatians. But we think it orthodox enough to go through the nine Beethoven Symphonies every season, without giving us all the other old masters with equal regularity. It might also be whispered that numbers 1, 2, 4 and 6 of the Beethoven series are not absolutely essential for study every year. But if we cavil at the programmes we may not do so at the manner in which they are executed. Mr. Gericke has splendid material in his orchestra, and he has used it in a masterly manner. He has given some readings that came with the force of revelations, and he has been indefatigable in bringing out all possible effects of light and shade, and in having the orchestra "balance" properly. A crescendo with him does not advance with square-cut steps, and his diminuendi rival those of Thomas' orchestra in its best days. He has made his greatest triumphs thus far in overtures, and last night was no exception to this rule, the overtures to "Sakuntala" and to the "Water Carrier" being the most charming portions of the programme. The first-named was an especially stirring performance. The opening deep and gloomy figures in the strings being given with effective solemnity, and the unity in the sforzando effects being admirable. But the finale was glorious in its sweeping climax. We did not especially admire the Beethoven fugue (he never was very great in his fugues) and felt that it was not improved by its magnified form. It was enormously difficult for the strings, and served admirably to display their ability. But was it not Dorian, the ancient Athenian, who, on being told that a certain piece was extremely difficult, exclaimed: "Difficult! I wish it had been impossible."

151

Miss Rollwagen was not as much at home in Handel as in the German lieder which followed. In "Wohin" her rich voice and instinctively correct expression were at their best, but unfortunately all the numbers were marred by occasional lapses from true intonation. The symphony was well played. The mournful introduction—to the most light-hearted of all of Beethoven's symphonies, except the eighth—was well given, and the shading of the first movement was the best we have heard. Occasionally, in the later movements, there was a tendency to rapidity in too great a degree, but we can compliment Mr. Gericke again upon the elasticity of his tempi. He never forces a movement rigidly into a set speed throughout, but varies effectively according to the emotions.

Next week for a change, we are to have some music by German composers, and some more variations. If the list has little variation, at least we get plenty of variations.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 3D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MENDELSSOHN,	OVERTURE, (Ruy Blas.)
BEETHO EN,	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in E flat, No. 5, op. 73. Allegro.—Adagio un poco mosso.—Allegro.
BOCCHERINI,	MINUET.
SCHUMANN,	SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 4, op. 120. Introduction; Allegro; Romance; Scherzo and Finale.—

SOLOIST:

MR. CARL BAERMANN.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night before one of the largest audiences of the season. The programme opened with Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture, which obtained a faultless performance. Boccherini's familiar Minuet was very daintily and delicately played by the strings, and the concert ended with an exceptionally fine reading and performance of Schumann's Symphony in D-minor, No. 4. We have seldom listened to a more satisfying interpretation of this work, or one that made it more interesting in the hearing. The reading was distinguished throughout by a fine vigor, admirable coloring and great clearness. The soloist was Mr. Carl Baermann, who is too seldom heard on our concert stage when it is considered that he represents what is best and truest in his art in respect to both technique and artistic taste. The delight of the public in seeing him once again before it, was manifested in the spontaneously cordial and enthusiastic welcome it gave him. He played Beethoven's Concerto in E-flat, No. 5. His playing was, as ever, marked by a noble breadth, an unerring touch, perfect finger work, beautiful phrasing, and a deep fidelity to his composer's meaning. The interpretation, from beginning to end, was clear, consistent and masterly, and was without affectation of any description. It was all for the music and nothing for mere display. The player never obtruded himself, but, with that fine artistic conscience which is so delightful a feature in his work, gave his entire devotion to the composer. A marked characteristic of the performance was the artist's ceaseless attention to the orchestra with the evident desire to form a part of it and to produce a harmonious whole instead of striving to press himself into the foreground as a mere virtuoso. The opening movement was taken in perfect spirit, and was played with delightful clearness, and with a touch that was fascinating in the brilliant scale runs. A large, manly spirit also marked the reading, and the color throughout was as masterly as it was consistent and appropriate. The adagio was played in an exquisitely tender, delicate and flowery style, and with a freedom from weak sentimentality that was as welcome as it was unusual. The playing of the finale was worthy the rest. The ease with which it was performed suggested nothing of the difficulties with which it bristles. There were no rough edges; everything was of the highest finish and faultlessly joined. It was a brilliant and noble reading throughout, and worthy both the artist and the work. At its conclusion Mr. Baermann was recalled three times with the greatest enthusiasm. The orchestra is to be praised for the excellence with which it acquitted itself. Mr. Baermann played upon a splendid Steinway piano of majestic tone, sonority, and power. At the next concert Mozart's Symphony in D, No. 5, Lachner's Suite, op. 113, and the Vorspiel and Liebestod, from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," will be given. The soloist is to be Mr. W. J. Winch, who will sing a barcarolle from Gounod's "Polyeucte," and songs by Purcell, Raff, and Jensen.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The performance on Saturday evening of Beethoven's fifth pianoforte concerto—in E flat, opus 73—was perfect and memorable, and it may be doubted if Boston has ever known so fine and able an illustration of how such music should be played. For once the soloist and conductor were men who—apparently, at least—hold similar ideas in regard to interpretation, and whose artistic temperaments are sympathetic and naturally seek similar means of expression. Each desires to give the author his due respect, to obey his slightest hints, and to acquire the greatest technical skill in order to be able to denote him truly, and to express, with all the eloquence possible to material, instruments, his thoughts and sentiments, the power of his passion and the fancies of his imagination. Hence it was that each supported and complimented the other's efforts, striving far more for the general good of the whole composition than for the effect of any special passage; pianoforte and orchestra were thus united in one real, symmetrical ensemble. Professor Baermann, whom we hold in many respects as great a pianist as has ever been heard here, was at his very best, not only in that easy and absolute control of the instrument which makes the most intricate passage seem as though it were as light to the hand as it is comprehensible to the ear, and which makes the strings give their most limpid flow without a moment of obscurity, and their greatest power without an instant's jarring reluctance, but also in a lucidity of statement and a fervor and fullness of enforcement which often surpassed even his own usual high degree of warm and earnest work. He amply merited the triple recall which he received, and the orchestra also deserved high commendation, especially for their smooth and elastic reading of the adagio.

The concert began with a splendid delivery of Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture—notable for the perfect unity of the strings and the wind, as their phrases are contrasted in the opening, for the exceeding delicacy of the quaint, fine figure that accompanies the 'cello obbligato, and for the precision of the rapid finale. After the concerto came the always fascinating Boccherini minuet, played with dainty distinctness by the muted strings, and fading away at last like the melting of a fairy vision. The evening ended with a clear and forcible performance of Schumann's fourth symphony, the last three movements of which, directly as they pass one into the next, were well individualized both in time and temper. The romance movement was particularly good, and the finale vigorous without excess.

On Saturday evening next Mr. William J. Winch will be the soloist and will sing a barcarole from Gounod's "Polyeucte," with orchestra, and songs for piano accompaniment by Purcell, Raff and Jensen. The symphony will be Mozart's fifth, and the other numbers will be Lachner's suite, opus 113, entire, and the prelude and finale to Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

Boston Correspondence.

BOSTON, January 3.

THE twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening at Music Hall. The programme was the following: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Concerto, E flat, No. 5 (for pianoforte), Beethoven; Minuet (for strings), Boccherini; Symphony D minor, op. 120, Schumann, being all tolerably well-known works. Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist of the occasion. The variations from Lachner's suite, op. 113, were originally announced to be given in the place of the minuet, but it was changed, as the next concert is to bring the entire work. That the change was a happy one I cannot say. It always seems to me absurd for a body of eighty picked musicians to sit down and play such trifles, letting alone the time wasted in rehearsing them, instead of playing works which such a body can only render efficiently. They are only "catches," and the deafening applause with which they are invariably greeted serves but to show the real standard of the majority of the audience. People will sit and listen to classical music and be bored and say nothing, because it's the thing to do; but give them such a trifle for bait and they always show their true feelings. To all outward appearance, Boccherini carried off the honors of the evening, while poor Schumann scarcely got a hand. A rather humiliating spectacle for the musician who loves his art. How are great American composers to arise in this country, if representative American audiences enthuse over the cheapest kind of music, in preference to one of the most beautiful symphonies ever written? How differently have I seen this same symphony received by German audiences! But, then!!—

The Mendelssohn overture was well played and given a spirited reading. It has been played a great deal here and, perhaps, a less well-known number would have been acceptable. Mr. Baermann played the Beethoven concerto technically, probably, as near perfection as it is possible. Wonderful fingers his, indeed! The tempi, especially of the last movement, were rather too fast for my individual taste, but there are numbers, no doubt, that like it just so. A great artist like Baermann, of course, has his own conception of such a work and his reasons for playing it so which I do not pretend to criticise by my observation. He is deservedly a great favorite with a Boston audience and was heartily applauded and repeatedly recalled after his fine performance of this ever-beautiful concerto. The Schumann Symphony went very well, especially the last movement. It is, in my opinion, the finest symphonic work of the composer, although by no means the most popular. Next week we are to have, among other things, a barcarole by Gounod, from "Polyeucte," and prelude and closing scene from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." Owing to my absence I was unable to write about last week's concert, at which Miss Rollwagen, the contralto, was the soloist.

LOUIS MASS.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT. The programme given at the twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall on Saturday evening was as follows:

Overture, "Ruy Blas".....Mendelssohn.
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat, No. 5, op. 73.....Beethoven.
Minuet.....Boccherini.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.....Schumann.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke was in his place as conductor and Mr. Carl Baermann was the piano soloist. The performance of the Beethoven Concerto by Mr. Baermann was such as to freshen the interest which that excellent artist created here by his performances of last season, and it was received with a degree of favor which was fully merited. He plays with great sincerity of purpose, an evident appreciation of the spirit of the composer whom he interprets, and in a style which is both strong and graceful. The orchestral numbers were all admirably performed, the "Ruy Blas" overture and Boccherini's Minuet affording a good contrast to the Schumann Symphony. The thirteenth concert next Saturday evening will be given with Mr. William J. Winch, tenor and soloist, and the following programme: Symphony in D major, No. 5, Mozart; barcarolle ("Polyeucte") Gounod; suite op. 113, F. Lachner; (a) "I Attempt from Love's Sickness to Fly," Purcell; (b) Mädchenlied, Raff; (c) Marmelades Luftchen Blüthenwind (songs with piano,) Jensen; prelude and closing scene ("Tristan and Isolde," Wagner.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 12th concert in the present season's series by the Boston symphony orchestra was given under Herr Wilhelm Gericke's direction, at Music Hall last evening, with Mr. Carl Baermann as the pianist, in the following programme:

Overture, "Ruy Blas".....Mendelssohn.
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat, No. 5, op. 73.....Beethoven.
Minuet.....Boccherini.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.....Schumann.

The event of the evening was the playing of the concerto by Mr. Baermann, as it is difficult to recall a more satisfactory presentation of this grand composition. There is such an air of honesty about this artist's playing that his efforts have a peculiar charm at all times, but on this occasion he seemed more fully than ever before to infuse his own nature into his presentation of the master's work and to thoroughly identify himself with the composition. The straightforward, clear, graceful and intelligent interpretation of the several movements gave the ideas of the composer their full meaning, and the striking beauties of the work were revealed in a most delightful fashion. Without doubt, the followers of the Schumann school of composition are entitled to a share in the programmes of this scheme of concerts, but Herr Gericke shows an inclination to give an undue preference to works of German origin hardly in keeping with the liberal spirit which should direct his programme making. The symphony of the evening was played in such a faultless manner that it must have delighted the Schumann followers who heard it, however much it wearied those who cannot unqualifiedly endorse all of this composer's efforts. The "Ruy Blas" overture and the charming "Minuet" by Boccherini, made popular years ago by Theodore Thomas, added still more to the pleasant cast at the opening portion of the programme, both numbers being given with admirable effect.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The programme of last Saturday night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was: Overture ("Ruy Blas"), Mendelssohn; concerto for pianoforte in E flat, No. 5, op. 73, allegro, adagio un poco mosso, allegro, Beethoven; minuet, Boccherini; symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120, introduction, allegro, romance, scherzo and finale. Soloist, Mr. Carl Baermann.

In looking through the programmes of the 12 concerts already given—and one half the course is ended—it is evident that as the symphony is each evening the piece de resistance of the programme, so Mr. Gericke's choice of symphonies, and when he shall perform them, has been made with a far-reaching purpose. Both Mendelssohn and Schumann have been represented by two symphonies, Beethoven by four; now, calling them all classic writers, we find that the separate works of these three composers are being played in strict chronological order, not by any chance arrangement or even by the order of the opus number. There are other indications which go to show that this is not a coincidence; the Schumann overture, scherzo, and finale (played at the fourth concert), deserving to be called a symphony as much as the one in D minor, was only his third symphonic work; also, the single symphony of Schubert's performed, though catalogued as number six, was written quite early in his career. Now a plan which will permit an unfolding of the method and mind of certain of the great masters in the sequence in which they wrote, would be more valuable every patron of these concerts than any other; and to him, who sees that in accomplishing this the euphony of individual programmes is sacrificed, must be given the virtue of holding his peace. But the Saturday programme must be heeded. The impromptu Ruy Blas overture, which Mendelssohn wrote in two days, to please a friend who needed an attraction to make a certain concert successful, was fairly well played; a good appearance of the brasses was followed by a scratchy awakening in the increased ensemble; though this, too, was softened by an excellent pianissimo of the first violins, who prelude a sterling theme for the cellos. The Ruy Blas overture is the fifth of the half-dozen Mendelssohn wrote, four of which Mr. Henschel played last season. The original title of the Schumann symphony in D minor was "Symphonistische Phantasie," and it is his second orchestral work. It received its comparatively late numeral and opus classification because it was revised in 1851 (ten years after it was written), and then catalogued with the works of that period. The form in which it is written is entirely new; for—and in this respect it has a companion in the Scotch symphony of Mendelssohn—it should be played without pauses. The themes of one movement reappear in another; one looks in vain for the traditional song-theme in either movement; it is not there; and until it is recalled that the work was originally a symphonic fantasia, there seems no reason for this departure from tradition. It is not so comprehensible as the one in B flat. The allegro is more lucid than the scherzo and finale, and the romance abounds in beauties and in novel effects; but as a whole it strangely typifies the writer, whose individuality was so strong that he knew no model; his own generation could not rightly estimate him for 20 years after he ceased writing. The symphony was played in a fearless way, that seemed inspired by one of the rare smiles of its composer. Prior to the symphony and following the great pianoforte concerto, came the Boccherini minuet,—a strange place for such a bit of froth, for the gravity of its surroundings was tre-

Boston Correspondence.

BOSTON, January 3.

THE twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening at Music Hall. The programme was the following: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Concerto, E flat, No. 5 (for pianoforte), Beethoven; Minuet (for strings), Boccherini; Symphony D minor, op. 120, Schumann, being all tolerably well-known works. Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist of the occasion. The variations from Lachner's suite, op. 113, were originally announced to be given in the place of the minuet, but it was changed, as the next concert is to bring the entire work. That the change was a happy one I cannot say. It always seems to me absurd for a body of eighty picked musicians to sit down and play such trifles, letting alone the time wasted in rehearsing them, instead of playing works which such a body can only render efficiently. They are only "catches," and the deafening applause with which they are invariably greeted serves but to show the real standard of the majority of the audience. People will sit and listen to classical music and be bored and say nothing, because it's the thing to do; but give them such a trifle for bait and they always show their true feelings. To all outward appearance, Boccherini carried off the honors of the evening, while poor Schumann scarcely got a hand. A rather humiliating spectacle for the musician who loves his art. How are great American composers to arise in this country, if representative American audiences en- thusiase over the cheapest kind of music, in preference to one of the most beautiful symphonies ever written? How differently have I seen this same symphony received by German audiences! But, then!—

The Mendelssohn overture was well played and given a spirited reading. It has been played a great deal here and, perhaps, a less well-known number would have been acceptable. Mr. Baermann played the Beethoven concerto technically, probably, as near perfection as it is possible. Wonderful fingers his, indeed! The tempi, especially of the last movement, were rather too fast for my individual taste, but there are numbers, no doubt, that like it just so. A great artist like Baermann, of course, has his own conception of such a work and his reasons for playing it so which I do not pretend to criticise by my observation. He is deservedly a great favorite with a Boston audience and was heartily applauded and repeatedly recalled after his fine performance of this ever-beautiful concerto. The Schumann Symphony went very well, especially the last movement. It is, in my opinion, the finest symphonic work of the composer, although by no means the most popular. Next week we are to have, among other things, a barcarole by Gounod, from "Polyeucte," and prelude and closing scene from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." Owing to my absence I was unable to write about last week's concert, at which Miss Rollwagen, the contralto, was the soloist.

LOUIS MASS.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT. The programme given at the twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall on Saturday evening was as follows:

Overture, "Ruy Blas".....Mendelssohn.
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat, No. 5, op. 73.....Beethoven.
Minuet.....Boccherini.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.....Schumann.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke was in his place as conductor and Mr. Carl Baermann was the piano soloist. The performance of the Beethoven Concerto by Mr. Baermann was such as to freshen the interest which that excellent artist created here by his performances of last season, and it was received with a degree of favor which was fully merited. He plays with great sincerity of purpose, an evident appreciation of the spirit of the composer whom he interprets, and in a style which is both strong and graceful. The orchestral numbers were all admirably performed, the "Ruy Blas" overture and Boccherini's Minuet affording a good contrast to the Schumann Symphony. The thirteenth concert next Saturday evening will be given with Mr. William J. Winch, tenor and soloist, and the following programme: Symphony in D major, No. 5, Mozart; Barcarolle ("Polyeucte"), Gounod; suite op. 113, F. Lachner; (a) "I Attempt from Love's Sickness to Fly," Purcell; (b) "Mädchenlied," Raff; (c) "Murmeltöne," Lüticken; (d) "Blüthenwind" (songs with piano), Jensen; prelude and closing scene ("Tristan and Isolde," Wagner).

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 12th concert in the present season's series by the Boston symphony orchestra was given under Herr Wilhelm Gericke's direction, at Music Hall last evening, with Mr. Carl Baermann as the pianist, in the following programme:

Overture, "Ruy Blas".....Mendelssohn.
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat, No. 5, op. 73.....Beethoven.
Minuet.....Boccherini.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.....Schumann.

The event of the evening was the playing of the concerto by Mr. Baermann, as it is difficult to recall a more satisfactory presentation of this grand composition. There is such an air of honesty about this artist's playing that his efforts have a peculiar charm at all times, but on this occasion he seemed more fully than ever before to infuse his own nature into his presentation of the master's work and to thoroughly identify himself with the composition. The straightforward, clear, graceful and intelligent interpretation of the several movements gave the ideas of the composer their full meaning, and the striking beauties of the work were revealed in a most delightful fashion. Without doubt, the followers of the Schumann school of composition are entitled to a share in the programmes of this scheme of concerts, but Herr Gericke shows an inclination to give an undue preference to works of German origin hardly in keeping with the liberal spirit which should direct his programme making. The symphony of the evening was played in such a faultless manner that it must have delighted the Schumann followers who heard it, however much it wearied those who cannot unqualifiedly endorse all of this composer's efforts. The "Ruy Blas" overture and the charming "Minuet" by Boccherini, made popular years ago by Theodore Thomas, added still more to the pleasant cast at the opening portion of the programme, both numbers being given with admirable effect.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The programme of last Saturday night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was: Overture ("Ruy Blas"), Mendelssohn; concerto for pianoforte in E flat, No. 5, op. 73, Beethoven; allegro, adagio un poco mosso, allegro, Beethoven; minuet, Boccherini; symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120, introduction, allegro, romance, scherzo and finale. Soloist, Mr. Carl Baermann.

In looking through the programmes of the 12 concerts already given—and one half the course!—ended—it is evident that as the symphony is each evening the piece de resistance of the programme, so Mr. Gericke's choice of symphonies, and when he shall perform them, has been made with a far-reaching purpose. Both Mendelssohn and Schumann have been represented by two symphonies, Beethoven by four; now, calling them all classic writers, we find that the separate works of these three composers are being played in strict chronological order, not by any chance arrangement or even by the order of the opus number. There are other indications which go to show that this is not a coincidence; the Schumann overture, scherzo, and finale (played at the fourth concert), deserving to be called a symphony as much as the one in D minor, was only his third symphonic work; also, the single symphony of Schubert's performed, though catalogued as number six, was written quite early in his career. Now a plan which will permit an unfolding of the method and mind of certain of the great masters in the sequence in which they wrote, would be more valuable every patron of these concerts than any other; and to him, who sees that in accomplishing this the euphony of individual programmes is sacrificed, must be given the virtue of holding his peace. But the Saturday programme must be heeded. The impromptu Ruy Blas overture, which Mendelssohn wrote in two days, to please a friend who needed an attraction to make a certain concert successful, was fairly well played; a good appearance of the brasses was followed by a scratchy awakening in the increased ensemble; though this, too, was softened by an excellent pianissimo of the first violins, who prelude a sterling theme for the cellos. The Ruy Blas overture is the fifth of the half-dozen Mendelssohn wrote, four of which Mr. Henschel played last season. The original title of the Schumann symphony in D minor was "Symphonistische Phantasie," and it is his second orchestral work. It received its comparatively late numeral and opus classification because it was revised in 1851 (ten years after it was written), and then catalogued with the works of that period. The form in which it is written is entirely new; for—and in this respect it has a companion in the Scotch symphony of Mendelssohn—it should be played without pauses. The themes of one movement reappear in another; one looks in vain for the traditional song-theme in either movement; it is not there; and until it is recalled that the work was originally a symphonic fantasia, there seems no reason for this departure from tradition. It is not so comprehensible as the one in B flat. The allegro is more lucid than the scherzo and finale, and the romance abounds in beauties and in novel effects; but as a whole it strangely typifies the writer, whose individuality was so strong that he knew no model; his own generation could not rightly estimate him for 20 years after he ceased writing. The symphony was played in a fearless way, that seemed inspired by one of the rare smiles of its composer. Prior to the symphony and following the great pianoforte concerto, came the Boccherini minuet,—a strange place for such a bit of froth, for the gravity of its surroundings was tremenous. Its performance almost aroused a cheer from the irreverent audience. Mr. Carl Baermann was as cordially received as ever an artist was at these concerts, and that means a good noisy greeting. His choice was the great emperor concerto of Beethoven, which he played before the symphony audience during the season of 1881-2. Mr. Baermann was never more nobly equipped for this concerto, at least so it would seem; himself in apparently perfect condition, his pianoforte a noble one, and at his left hand, a conductor whose care to make a good second with the orchestra under him, was unremitting and sincere. The reading Mr. Baermann gives to the concerto is familiar; it is now made even more poetic than before. The charm of the player's touch and sympathetic manner while playing give his interpretation a grace that is irresistible. The excellence of his technique is so great that there is no restraining the soul of the man; it illumines and flashes and advances in to the heart of the composition where the loftiest sentiment is met by as lofty an interpreter. No player appears here who so completely disarms restraint; the laxity of Mr. Baermann's physical self, his toying with and caressing his instrument while at the key-board impart such perfect repose to the listener that the hearing of a pianoforte concerto by Baermann is almost equal in the kind of effect it produces to that received from a fine reading of the andante from Beethoven's symphony in C or the adagio from the beautiful septet. The orchestra were so sympathetically led that in many respects the concerto was never so well given here. At its close Mr. Baermann responded to two recalls, which were hearty and warm outbursts of gratitude. Sometimes at these concerts, if the listener be in a particularly susceptible mood, the ununited character of the bowing of the first violins is disturbing; it would be hard to follow certain rhythms with the opposing motion of the violinist's arm to contend against. Unless the printer has made a vast mistake, there is a man singer announced for next Saturday evening. It seems too good to be true that one has been found for these concerts, and that that choice is Mr. W. J. Winch is a matter for additional thanksgiving. This will be his first appearance at home since his season of notable successes in England.

158

Last Night's Symphony Concert.

The symphony concert in Music Hall last evening was simply unexceptionable from whatever standpoint it might be reviewed. Professor Baermann as the soloist was welcomed back to the scene of his old triumphs in a royal way. He played Beethoven's concerto in E flat (No. 5). There could be nothing finer than his broad and musicianly performance of this charming work. Schumann's delightful fourth symphony was given in a faultless manner. The overture, Ruy Blas, and the Boccherini minuet were both specimens of the exceedingly high standard which the orchestra has attained under the efficient drilling of its successive conductors. The delicacy and finish of the fine shading and the accuracy of the work was beyond criticism. The audience was very large, and the enthusiasm, especially after Mr. Baermann's great effort, was unbounded.

Next week the programme is unusually good, and for a change the symphony is placed at the beginning. The arrangement is:

Symphony in D major, No. 5.....Mozart
Barcarolle (Polyeucte).....Gounod
Suite op. 113.....F. Lachner
(a) "I Attempt from Love's Sickness to fly."...Purcell
(b) Mädchenlied.....Raff
(c) Mädeln's Luftchen Blütenwind.....Jensen
Prelude and closing scene (Tristan and Isolde). Wagner
Soloist, Mr. William J. Winch.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Judging by the size of the audience in Music Hall last night, the public preferred to hear Professor Baermann play to hearing Madame Dotti attempt to sing. The opera certainly did not influence the patronage of the symphony concerts, either at the rehearsal or at the evening concert.

The programme, although still too intensely German, was so well performed that it was interesting to every auditor. It began with Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, a work which the composer himself did not prize very highly, and which bears some traces of being a "made-to-order" work. It was finely performed, as every overture seems to be under Mr. Gericke's direction.

Now followed the Beethoven piano concerto, No. 5, the emperor of all piano concertos. It is always with the keenest delight that we welcome Professor Baermann to the concert stage, for in all that concerns pure, faithful musical performance, and especially in every reading of Beethoven, we would have to search long to find a rival to this modest pianist. That the public share this feeling was evinced by the applause which greeted the appearance of the artist, and the double recall which followed the close of the concerto. The usual self-abnegation and care of ensemble was apparent in the performance of the piano part, and the orchestra seconded every point finely. The shading of the first movement was excellently done, especially in the octave scales which many pianists make too prominent. In the adagio the sweet legato effects could not have been better given. Every part of the work was free from sensationalism. Professor Baermann charms rather than surprises by his playing, and even in the finale, when after the piano and kettledrum have given a few muffled phrases, the piano shoots off in a fiery scale leading to the closing cadence, nothing was forced or too vehement. It was the best possible illustration of artistic conservatism.

The Boccherini minuet served to display the delicacy of shading of the strings, but as it has been performed in Boston ever since the first settler arrived, it is beginning to lose the charm of novelty.

The symphony was Schumann's fourth; the one which he originally marked the "second," and which he composed almost at the same time as the first, in B flat. It is not so great a work as the last named, but, nevertheless one cannot assent to the English attacks upon it, which call it labored, obtruse, and every other derogatory adjective. Its only unspon-taneous portion is the development of the finale. Its intertwining of themes is ingeniously managed. The first motif appearing in the introduction, then in the allegro, and finally in the last movement. The melody of the introduction is the foundation of the "Romanze" movement, and other themes are trans-planted thus from movement to movement with good effect. Martinets may object that the symphonic form is wholly distorted and departed from, but the composer first desired to call it a Symphonic Fan-tasie, and as such it should be judged.

The figure first alluded to is the most important, and has been adversely criticised. To us it seems to serve an emphatic design in its turbulence; the whole allegro seems a conflict between passion and reason, the latter coming in peacefully in contrast, in an episode of the development, and after this the passion-ate figure is made quieter, a truly dramatic effect. If one follows out this clue and regards the entire work as a conflict between two opposing elements, it will be seen that Schumann's object could be better attained outside of the symphonic form than within it.

Mr. Gericke certainly seized upon the true mean-ing of the work, judging by his reading of it. The tempi were elastically varied according to the emo-tions, and the shading was perfection. The end of the finale became a whirlwind of rapidity, but was given without a blur. The first movement had just the right turbulence and unrest, and the suave, con-trasting theme was artistically played.

The Romanze—which reminds one of the funeral march of the Eroica Symphony—was given with true sympathetic pathos. The brusque syncopations of the scherzo were strongly brought out, and its trio was trippingly given by the strings. The unity of the tutti chords of the finale also calls for com-mendation. Altogether a programme which was carried out in the most artistic manner, and proves how excellent an orchestra and how musical a leader Boston now possesses. Next week, strange to say, some German music is to be performed, but at least there will be an element of novelty in Wagner's "Isolde's Liebes Tod."

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, JANUARY 5, 1885.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twelfth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being:

Mendelssohn. Overture, "Ruy Blas."
Beethoven. Concerto for pianoforte in E-flat, No. 5.
op. 73.
Boccherini. Minuet.
Schumann—Symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.

Mr. Carl Baermann was the pianist.

The Mendelssohn overture, the most theatrical of all the composer's works, was played with great fire; the 'celli and bassoons are especially to be praised for their clear phrasing of the cantabile melody of the second theme. It is interesting to remember of this overture, so different in style is it from the composer's other overtures, how Mendelssohn himself thought about it. It was none of his favorites; he wrote it in a hurry, and more out of kindness of heart than from artistic impulse, to precede a performance of "Ruy Blas" given for the benefit of a charity. As he heartily detested the play, he found no great source of inspiration in the text; he afterwards used to call the overture the "Overture to the Charitable Association." The Boccherini Minuet was very nicely played, but one has long since become tired of this stale little lollipop. Schumann's D minor symphony was superbly given; the great work was shown in its full glory; we can remember no finer symphonic performance. With every new hearing of this symphony we wonder more and more at the comparatively low estimate of its merits made by many excellent critics both here and abroad. We think that considerable distortion of critical judgment has resulted from too closely comparing it with Schumann's other symphonies. The work is so irregular in form, it departs so from the traditional symphonic canons, that a too servile comparison between it and other more regularly constructed symphonies does little good. Point out, if you please, the absence of the usual "third part" in the first movement, and the wealth of only partially developed thematic material in the Finale; the only rational reply to such analysis seems to be the question, "What of it?" To our mind Schumann never wrote a more characteristic work; it contains, as the Germans say, the whole Schumann. Never was greater fixity and unity of purpose shown throughout a long composition. One excellent critic writes—"The principal theme of the first movement is, it must be confessed, not a very attractive one. Trite and uninteresting as it is, it follows us relentlessly—now in the bass, now in the middle, now in the upper parts, now passages of imitation; till when we reach the end of the movement we hardly know whether to feel aggravated at its pertinacity or astonished at the effect produced by such an unpromising subject." Now this criticism seems, after all, very much of the sort of Berloiz's counting the number of times the chromatic violin-figure occurred in the "Tannhäuser" overture, and then, after footing up his sum in addition, naively asking, "Is this not too much?" If one cannot feel the terrible, daemonic impetus of this theme, and the superb vigor with which it is worked out, he can certainly have no adequate appreciation of the splendors of this symphony. We know of little in all music that is more titanic.

159

Mr. Baermann even surpassed his superb playing of the "Emperor" concerto in previous years. For vigor, totality of conception, depth of feeling, and splendid brilliancy, his performance was incomparably fine. His peculiar artistic temperament suits this concerto exactly, and happy is the man who is, so to speak, predestined to play such a work thoroughly well. The next programme is—

Mozart. Symphony in D major, No. 5.
Gounod. Barcarolle from "Polyeucte."
F. Lachner. Suite op. 113.
Purcell. (a) "I attempt from love's sickness to fly."
Raff. (b) Mädchenlied.
Jensen. (c) Mädeln's Luftchen Blütenwind.
(Songs with piano).
Wagner. Prelude and closing scene from "Tristan und Isolde."

Mr. William J. Winch will be the singer.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The chief work performed at the twelfth Boston symphony concert, last Saturday evening, was Beethoven's concerto in E flat, No. five, or "The Emperor," as it is appropriately called. Schumann's fourth symphony, op. 120, in D minor, ended the concert. The overture was Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas," while sandwiched between the concerto and symphony was the time-worn "Minuet" by mendous. Its performance almost aroused a cheer from the irreverent audience. Mr. Carl Baermann was as cordially received as ever an artist was at these concerts, and that means a good noisy greeting. His choice was the great emperor concerto of Beethoven, which he played before the symphony audience during the season of 1881-2. Mr. Baermann was never more nobly equipped for this concerto, at least so it would seem; himself in apparently perfect condition, his pianoforte a noble one, and at his left hand, a conductor whose care to make a good second with the orchestra under him, was unremitting and sincere. The reading Mr. Baermann gives to the concerto is familiar; it is now made even more poetic than before. The charm of the player's touch and sympathetic manner while playing give his interpretation a grace that is irresistible. The excellence of his technique is so great that there is no restraining the soul of the man; it illumines and flashes and advances in to the heart of the composition where the loftiest sentiment is met by as lofty an interpreter. No player appears here who so completely disarms restraint; the laxity of Mr. Baermann's physical self, his toying with and caressing his instrument while at the key-board impart such perfect repose to the listener that the hearing of a pianoforte concerto by Baermann is almost equal in the kind of effect it produces to that received from a fine reading of the andante from Beethoven's symphony in C or the adagio from the beautiful septet. The orchestra were so sympathetically led that in many respects the concerto was never so well given here. At its close Mr. Baermann responded to two recalls, which were hearty and warm outbursts of gratitude. Sometimes at these concerts, if the listener be in a particularly susceptible mood, the ununited character of the bowing of the first violins is disturbing; it would be hard to follow certain rhythms with the opposing motion of the violinist's arm to contend against. Unless the printer has made a vast mistake, there is a man singer announced for next Saturday evening. It seems too good to be true that one has been found for these concerts, and that that choice is Mr. W. J. Winch is a matter for additional thanksgiving. This will be his first appearance at home since his season of notable successes in England.

Last Night's Symphony Concert.

The symphony concert in Music Hall last evening was simply unexceptionable from whatever standpoint it might be reviewed. Professor Baermann as the soloist was welcomed back to the scene of his old triumphs in a royal way. He played Beethoven's concerto in E flat (No. 5). There could be nothing finer than his broad and musicianly performance of this charming work. Schumann's delightful fourth symphony was given in a faultless manner. The overture, Ruy Blas, and the Boccherini minuet were both specimens of the exceedingly high standard which the orchestra has attained under the efficient drilling of its successive conductors. The delicacy and finish of the fine shading and the accuracy of the work was beyond criticism. The audience was very large, and the enthusiasm, especially after Mr. Baermann's great effort, was unbounded.

Next week the programme is unusually good, and for a change the symphony is placed at the beginning. The arrangement is:

Symphony in D major, No. 5.....Mozart
Barcarolle (Polyenete).....Gounod
Suite op. 113.....F. Lachner
(a) "I Attempt from Love's Sickness to fly." Purcell
(b) Mädchenlied.....Raff
(c) Marmeludes Luftchen Blüthenwind.....Jensen
Prelude and closing scene (Tristan and Isolde), Wagner
Soloist, Mr. William J. Winch.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Judging by the size of the audience in Music Hall last night, the public preferred to hear Professor Baermann play to hearing Madame Dotti attempt to sing. The opera certainly did not influence the patronage of the symphony concerts, either at the rehearsal or at the evening concert.

The programme, although still too intensely German, was so well performed that it was interesting to every auditor. It began with Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, a work which the composer himself did not prize very highly, and which bears some traces of being a "made-to-order" work. It was finely performed, as every overture seems to be under Mr. Gericke's direction.

Now followed the Beethoven piano concerto, No. 5, the emperor of all piano concertos. It is always with the keenest delight that we welcome Professor Baermann to the concert stage, for in all that concerns pure, faithful musical performance, and especially in every reading of Beethoven, we would have to search long to find a rival to this modest pianist. That the public share this feeling was evinced by the applause which greeted the appearance of the artist, and the double recall which followed the close of the concerto. The usual self-abnegation and care of ensemble was apparent in the performance of the piano part, and the orchestra seconded every point finely. The shading of the first movement was excellently done, especially in the octave scales which many pianists make too prominent. In the adagio the sweet legato effects could not have been better given. Every part of the work was free from sensationalism. Professor Baermann charms rather than surprises by his playing, and even in the finale, when after the piano and kettledrum have given a few muffled phrases, the piano shoots off in a fiery scale leading to the closing cadence, nothing was forced or too vehement. It was the best possible illustration of artistic conservatism.

The Boccherini minuet served to display the delicacy of shading of the strings, but as it has been performed in Boston ever since the first settler arrived, it is beginning to lose the charm of novelty.

The symphony was Schumann's fourth; the one which he originally marked the "second," and which he composed almost at the same time as the first, in B flat. It is not so great a work as the last named, but, nevertheless one cannot assent to the English attacks upon it, which call it labored, obtruse, and every other derogatory adjective. Its only spontaneous portion is the development of the finale. Its intertwining of themes is ingeniously managed. The first motif appearing in the introduction, then in the allegro, and finally in the last movement. The melody of the introduction is the foundation of the "Romanze" movement, and other themes are transplanted thus from movement to movement with good effect. Martinets may object that the symphonic form is wholly distorted and departed from, but the composer first desired to call it a Symphonic Fantasia, and as such it should be judged.

The figure first alluded to is the most important, and has been adversely criticised. To us it seems to serve an emphatic design in its turbulence; the whole allegro seems a conflict between passion and reason, the latter coming in peacefully in contrast, in an episode of the development, and after this the passionate figure is made quieter, a truly dramatic effect. If one follows out this clue and regards the entire work as a conflict between two opposing elements, it will be seen that Schumann's object could be better attained outside of the symphonic form than within it.

Mr. Gericke certainly seized upon the true meaning of the work, judging by his reading of it. The tempi were elastically varied according to the emotions, and the shading was perfection. The end of the finale became a whirlwind of rapidity, but was given without a blur. The first movement had just the right turbulence and unrest, and the suave, contrasting theme was artistically played.

The Romanze—which reminds one of the funeral march of the Eroica Symphony—was given with true sympathetic pathos. The brusque syncopations of the scherzo were strongly brought out, and its trio was trippingly given by the strings. The unity of the tutti chords of the finale also calls for commendation. Altogether a programme which was carried out in the most artistic manner, and proves how excellent an orchestra and how musical a leader Boston now possesses. Next week, strange to say, some German music is to be performed, but at least there will be an element of novelty in Wagner's "Isolde's Liebes Tod."

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, JANUARY 5, 1885.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The twelfth concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being: Mendelssohn. Overture, "Ruy Blas." Beethoven. Concerto for pianoforte in E-flat, No. 5, op. 73. Boccherini. Minuet. Schumann—Symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.

Mr. Carl Baermann was the pianist.

The Mendelssohn overture, the most theatrical of all the composer's works, was played with great fire; the 'celli and bassoons are especially to be praised for their clear phrasing of the cantabile melody of the second theme. It is interesting to remember of this overture, so different in style is it from the composer's other overtures, how Mendelssohn himself thought about it. It was none of his favorites; he wrote it in a hurry, and more out of kindness of heart than from artistic impulse, to precede a performance of "Ruy Blas" given for the benefit of a charity. As he heartily detested the play, he found no great source of inspiration in the text; he afterwards used to call the overture the "Overture to the Charitable Association." The Boccherini Minuet was very nicely played, but one has long since become tired of this stale little lollipop. Schumann's D minor symphony was superbly given; the great work was shown in its full glory; we can remember no finer symphonic performance. With every new hearing of this symphony we wonder more and more at the comparatively low estimate of its merits made by many excellent critics both here and abroad. We think that considerable distortion of critical judgment has resulted from too closely comparing it with Schumann's other symphonies. The work is so irregular in form, it departs so from the traditional symphonic canons, that a too servile comparison between it and other more regularly constructed symphonies does little good. Point out, if you please, the absence of the usual "third part" in the first movement, and the wealth of only partially developed thematic material in the Finale; the only rational reply to such analysis seems to be the question, "What of it?" To our mind Schumann never wrote a more characteristic work; it contains, as the Germans say, the whole Schumann. Never was greater fixity and unity of purpose shown throughout a long composition. One excellent critic writes—"The principal theme of the first movement is, it must be confessed, not a very attractive one. Trite and uninteresting as it is, it follows us relentlessly—now in the bass, now in the middle, now in the upper parts, now passages of imitation; till when we reach the end of the movement we hardly know whether to feel aggravated at its pertinacity or astonished at the effect produced by such an unpromising subject." Now this criticism seems, after all, very much of the sort of Berlioz's counting the number of times the chromatic violin-figure occurred in the "Tannhäuser" overture, and then, after footing up his sum in addition, naïvely asking, "Is this not too much?" If one cannot feel the terrible, demonic impetus of this theme, and the superb vigor with which it is worked out, he can certainly have no adequate appreciation of the splendors of this symphony. We know of little in all music that is more titanic.

Mr. Baermann even surpassed his superb playing of the "Emperor" concerto in previous years. For vigor, totality of conception, depth of feeling, and splendid brilliancy, his performance was incomparably fine. His peculiar artistic temperament suits this concerto exactly, and happy is the man who is, so to speak, predestined to play such a work thoroughly well. The next programme is—

Mozart. Symphony in D major, No. 5.
Gounod. Barcarolle from "Polyenete."
F. Lachner. Suite op. 113.
Purcell. (a). "I attempt from love's sickness to fly."
Raff. (b). Mädchenlied.
Jensen. (c). Marmeludes Luftchen Blüthenwind.
(Songs with piano).
Wagner. Prelude and closing scene from "Tristan and Isolde."

Mr. William J. Winch will be the singer.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The chief work performed at the twelfth Boston symphony concert, last Saturday evening, was Beethoven's concerto in E flat, No. five, or "The Emperor," as it is appropriately called. Schumann's fourth symphony, op. 120, in D minor, ended the concert. The overture was Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas," while sandwiched between the concerto and symphony was the time-worn "Minuet" by

160
Boccherini. Schumann's symphony in D minor has many interesting parts, but it has never held very high rank. It was written in 1841, and revived by its composer in 1851, at a time when he was suffering from mental as well as bodily infirmity. At all events one is justified in believing that such may have been the case, as the musical character of the work is pregnant with none of the royalty and force of Schumann's grander moods, and there are certain irregularities in its form which its composer at his best never could have seriously premeditated. The principal theme in the first movement lacks nobility, nor is its treatment all that could be expected from a great master. The charming part of the work is the romanzé, which, despite its brevity, affords such positive relief to the effect of the preceding movement as to be heartily welcome. The scherzo and finale are nothing remarkable, and the entire work is, as has been described, a composition which might do credit to a composer of far less genius than Schumann, but which from him is disappointing. The performance of the E flat concerto was by Mr. Carl Baermann, whose great ability as a pianist is so invariably shown at its best with the music of Beethoven. Mr. Baermann in his playing does something more than excite awe. While the evidences are replete of his perfect technique and of a conceptive ability such as none but the most remarkable of living pianists possess, his individuality never obtrudes itself upon the effect of his performance, the charm of which is in its strict justice. He invariably plays from the heart, yet not to an extent that would cause him to forget the higher qualities by which a true interpreter pays tribute to the composer, and hence it is that his playing disarms criticism. His performance constituted the powerful event in the concert, and was so treated by the large audience present, who could not have been more cordial and appreciative in their applause. The orchestra, under Herr Gericke's able lead, effectively assisted Mr. Baermann with an exceedingly good accompaniment, and throughout the concert played finely. To-night, the soloist will be Mr. Wm. J. Winch, who will make his first public appearance since his return from abroad.
Home Journal

161
Lang's New Year's Day Lecture.

WATCHING the Old Year out till two in the morning is not a good preparation for hearing a music lecture, especially with a few hours of New Year's accounts sandwiched between. Mr. Lang began with some account of the range of the flute, piccolo, oboe, limpid clarinet, pathetic and grotesque bassoon, double-bassoon—members of the wood-wind family—a range co-extensive with that of a piano. Mr. Lang had hoped to have some players to show us these instruments, and perhaps to play some passages, but in this was disappointed. He urged the identification of different instruments, as an additional pleasure to the listener, who should not think of an orchestra as if it were a piano or an organ. First the eye must distinguish the vehicle of sound, and soon the ear will learn to distinguish each instrument. Some interesting facts were added about the differing keys for the wood-wind instruments. The score for them is commonly written in one key and played in another.

Coming, then, to the Symphony programme for Concert XII., the Ruy Blas overture was taken up, and played on two Grands, by Mr. Lang and H. G. Tucker. Mendelssohn called it the Overture to the Theatrical Pension Fund. He had written a Romance for a charitable occasion. The managers regretted that there was not time for an overture, but hoped for one next year. This nettled him to work, and in two or three days the beautiful overture was ready for rehearsal, being performed March 11, 1839, though the composer wrote that the play was trash, and he refused to call the overture by its name. It is peculiar in certain theatric passages, in the use of the trombone, and in a grand rush of the wind and string instruments in opposite directions.

Beethoven wrote not many concerted pieces for the piano and other instruments. The E-flat Concerto, called the Emperor, is generally considered his greatest, but Mr. Lang preferred the G-flat Concerto, and wished we could hear Carl Baermann (the pianist of the Symphony Concert) play first one and then the other, that we might test this question. The Emperor was written for his pupil Czerny, whose success Beethoven desired, and is full of those trills and ornaments which he knew Czerny would play so well. It has musical figures, but scarcely theme for the piano portion of it. It is brilliant, and shows off the piano with arpeggi all over it, but is not so great a composition as the G-flat. Von Bülow was not satisfied with the Boston interpretation of the rhythm of the last bars by the orchestra, and finally slammed the piano-cover, banged on his hat and left the rehearsal, anathematizing the wind-players, so that at the Bülow concert the Concerto was given without proper preparation. There is a curious duet between kettle-drum and piano. The Concerto was originally played at a picture exhibition, an Italian cavatina (badly sung) preceding it, and a new picture following it. Only one movement was played at Mr. Lang's lesson, on account of the great length of the composition.

162

Lachner's Variations and March from Suite, op. 113, were not commented upon by Mr. Lang. Neither, as it happened, were they played at the concert, but postponed a week, giving place to Boccherini's well-worn Minuet. The lecture closed with an analysis of Schumann's D-minor Symphony—called the Fourth, though chronologically the Second. The lecturer read Chorley's severe criticism, written long ago, though the injurious words almost stuck in his throat. How odd it seems that the first critic of his time could talk of Schumann's impure and licentious harmony, and call a few of his songs oases in a musical desert; adding that the poorest compositions of other masters were revelations of beauty in comparison with Schumann's. This Symphony is rarely heard, but was given in Boston 25 years ago. The Romance of the 3d movement originally had a guitar accompaniment, and for a long time Schumann insisted upon this point, but now the strings take the passage pizzicato. The whole composition needs to be played continuously, as one theme (which the introduction suggests) runs on and on, recurring even in the Romance.

163
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 10TH, AT 8. P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART,	SYMPHONY in D major, No. 5. Allegro con spirito.—Andante.—Menuetto.—Presto.
GOUNOD,	BARCAROLLE, (Polyeucte.)
F. LACHNER,	SUITE op. 113. Prelude.—Minuet.—Variations and March.— Introduction and Fugue.—
PURCELL,	a) "I ATTEMPT FROM LOVE'S SICKNESS TO FLY."
RAFF,	b) MÄDCHENLIED.
JENSEN,	c) MURMELNDES LUFTCHEN BLÜTHENWIND. (SONGS with Piano.)
WAGNER,	PRELUDE AND CLOSING SCENE, from TRISTAN AND ISOLDE. (Vorspiel und Liebestod.)

SOLOIST:

MR. WILLIAM J. WINCH.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA

Adver

THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

For the first time since the current series of symphony concerts began has the voice of a male solo singer been heard in the course of one of them. On Saturday evening last, Mr. William J. Winch made his first appearance in Boston since his return from his successful spring and summer tournee in England. He chose for his orchestral song the barcarole from Gounod's "Polyenete," and for those with pianoforte accompaniments Purcell's "I Attempt from Love's Sickness to Fly," Raff's "Mädchen," and Jensen's "Murméludes Lüftchen Blütenwind"; the programme loftily disdained to give either the original texts or the translations of these numbers, and Mr. Winch's verbal enunciation is not of the best; it was evident, however, that the group of songs were given in their respective vernaculars, while the barcarole was apparently sung to an Italian version. Mr. Winch was heartily welcomed and was heard with great pleasure. He will probably never make his tone-production really free, and his voice may be expected to be therefore always qualified by a slight throatiness, but in his style he has made a great improvement: certain little roughnesses of phrasing, an occasional disposition to be over loud and almost explosive in energetic passages, and a tendency to use force rather than finesse by way of emphasis, seem to have entirely disappeared, while he has so gained in grace, smoothness and sustained equanimity of delivery that his singing is not only more interesting and more grateful to the ear, but is also more effective, because of its nicer gradations. The dreamy barcarole, so slow in its pulsing and so tender in its sway, that it might suit with the rapt mood of lovers drifting over the moonlighted lagoons of Venice, and the Jensen song, scarcely ever rising above a sweet mezza voce, were each beautifully turned and were markedly contrasted against the sturdier, more animated strains of Raff and Purcell; these latter were broadly and spiritedly rendered, but we could not help wishing that Mr. Winch might manage so to dispose his phrasing of the English song as to favor both the sense of the words and of the melody; "I attempt from love's rapture—to fly," so often repeated gives an odd distortion of meaning, which "I attempt (here a half breath) from love's rapture to fly (here a whole breath) in vain (another half breath) for, etc.," going on thence, according to the singer's own phrasing, would entirely prevent.

The orchestra began the evening by playing Mozart's fifth symphony—in D major—thoroughly well in excellent technical form, and in fine conformity to its bright, cheerful, easy going spirit, neither over grave for their author in the andante, nor vociferously or intrusively lively in the allegro and presto, and giving grace to the minuet, with its faint taste of the flavor of that in "Don Giovanni." Their second number was by far their most enjoyable and interesting one —Lachner's suite, op. 113—and with it they stirred the unusually small audience to very great expressions of pleasure. The first movement is a prelude that is just what such a movement ought to be—a preparation of mind and a gathering of forces for what is to come. The phrases at first go sweeping hither and thither, up and down, as if they were trying their wings and debating whither to take their flight, but they soon concentrate from their dispersion, and after a brief, strong phrase given out by the basses and repeated by the other voices, the movement ends with a few decisive bars in presto. Then follows a beautiful minuet, which on this occasion was curiously contrasted against that of the symphony, and showed how a single generic form may suggest strange diversity of specific treatment to different minds. Against the airy lightness of Mozart, Lachner seemed almost sombre: where the one glided and tripped, the other moved with grave steps that scarcely left the earth; where the one was all fluent in melody, the other spoke in clinging chromatic phrases, and where Mozart hinted his thought through high violins and flutes, Lachner asserted his with the grave weight of basses. After this came a movement—Variations and March—magnificent in harmonious effect, rich in unexpected variety of tempo as well as of figurative treatment, and ending with romantic beauty and splendor of phrase and sound. The fundamental phrase is one of great dignity and sweetness, of such peculiar cast—so indovinato, and almost so inspired—that, while it impresses at once by its calm and controlling individuality, it is yet submissive enough to bear much addition of imposed ornament, and plastic enough to be the central spirit as well of one form which seems a very funeral march as of others in which it is bidden to assume a guise of milder melancholy or even of pleasant cheer. The march which ends the movement has the ring and clash, the shrilling of the piccolo, the dull thump of the drums and the long rinforzandi of the "Turkish" marches, but is still original and vivid and immensely effective. The suite ends with a short introduction and a brilliant fugue on a striking subject, beginning with two or three curt ejaculations, as one might call them, immediately followed by a phrase of many rapid notes; the subject is given out by the basses and as soon as it has been answered the harmony is kept full, close and strong to the end. The concert ended with the prelude and closing scene from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," which gave the audience no very lively pleasure, and received no particular approval. However enjoyable the Wagnerian drama may be upon the stage, when sustained by great artists and illustrated by those scenic effects upon which Wagner depended more than any other dramatic or lyric author that ever lived; however beautiful its scenes may be as art and inspiration; however much study and philosophy and imagination may endear them to us, the fact still remains that, in the concert room, and especially in mere orchestral transcription, a very little of them goes a great way. The preludes, the interludes, the overtures, the great choruses and processional marches have something direct to tell which nobody can mistake; but the personal episodes, with their "continuous melody" (or continuous recitative, if one prefers to call it so), their phrases which seem never to begin and never to end, their perpetual rambling from one tonality and one tempo to another, their thousand qualifications dependent upon the exact turn of the unknown text and the invisible action, have no real intellectual significance to a general audience, and, after the first few moments, no adequate or correspondent result in mood or sentiment.

The orchestra merited much praise for all their work; the Lachner suite showed appropriate variety, the long, immense crescendi in the Wagner selection reached a climax of even power which seemed almost incredible for no larger a band, and the harp and 'cello obbligati to the Gounod barcarole were beautifully read. A gentleman whose name we do not know played Mr. Winch's pianoforte accompaniments pretty badly, but with perfect aplomb; he certainly got in all the notes, but he managed to miss completely such incidentals as rhythm, color and accent.

Next Saturday the programme (without a soloist) will contain Brahms' second symphony, Weber's "Oberon" overture, Liszt's "Orpheus" (first time), and one of Mr. Gericke's favorite perversions of Beethoven, being an adaptation of the famous septette, in which all the strings of the orchestra will unite on their respective parts, leaving, we suppose, the unhappy wind instruments to get on as best they may in their solitude.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMMES.

Thirteen of the twenty-four symphony concerts of the present season have been given, and the programme for the fourteenth has been announced. We cannot, therefore, be fairly accused of undue haste in here declaring a disapproval of those programmes which we, in common with hundreds of other attendants upon these concerts, have long felt, but which we have until now refrained from expressing, in the hope that the cause from which it sprung might be removed. But of this there seems to be no prospect, and it is time to speak frankly and urgently.

In coming, a stranger, to this city, Mr. Gericke met that warm welcome which Boston so well knows how to extend, and that impartiality with which she judges the artistic merits even of her own people. He has proved himself to be, in many particulars, a musician worthy of admiration and respect, and an orchestral director whose intelligence, taste, skill and control of himself and his forces are unsurpassed—some good judges think unequalled—by any conductor who has been here. But in one important respect he has shown himself strangely narrow-minded, or strangely unsusceptible to the real extent of the musical knowledge, experience and desire of Boston audiences.

So far as his programmes truly represent him, he would seem to be ignorant that there are any composers of consequence who are not Germans, or that any considerable amount of important music has been written, even by Germans, within the last half century, or the last generation. Out of sixty-eight numbers included in the fourteen programmes, only eleven are by other than German authors; of these eleven, five were solo numbers, three being songs selected by the singers, while of the three, one (Buck's "Sunset") took the place meant for a German song, simply because Miss How was substituted at short notice for Mme. Fursch-Madi. The other two solos were for the violin—one by Paganini and one by Vieuxtemps, neither certainly an author of today. Of the six orchestral numbers, two were overtures by Cherubini, one a movement by Bernoz, one Gade's "Os-sian" overture, one the Boccherini minuet, and one (the only recent work of them all) Lalo's Norwegian fantasy.

Almost the only contemporaneous authors represented in the other fifty-seven numbers are Wagner, Brahms, Fuchs, Volkmann, Liszt, Rubinstein and Mr. Gericke himself, and these seldom in works not already known to the audience. Of the authors who are thought good enough to be heard in the great concerts of London, Paris, Berlin, Cologne, Dresden, Milan and even Vienna, and whose writings would richly furnish programmes for dozens of such "novelty" concerts as have delighted New York—of the work of Sgambati, Bizet, Massener, Cowen, Dvorák, Tschaiowsky, Saint-Saëns, Rheinberger, Mackenzie, Bennett, Dräseke—not a note has been heard, nor has any promise, even the faintest, been given. The splendid playing of the orchestra has been confined to programmes which are the virtual equivalents of such as weighed down the Harvard Musical Association's concerts, and are, in representing the spirit of the time and the present place and the present demands of Boston culture, far behind those of the short-lived, but enterprising, Philharmonic Society.

The murmuring dissatisfaction of the audiences has been almost as long as the season; it is now growing loud, and it must be heeded. The number of vacant seats was large enough at the beginning of the season; it grows larger on every night when some special inducement to attendance is not offered, and the absentees are among the most intelligent and influential ticket holders. They know now what standard of performance conductor and orchestra have reached; they take this for granted, and they stay away when this fine power of performance is only—or even chiefly—to be shown in music with which they have been familiar ever since they were old enough to go to a concert. It is a very good thing to have a band which keeps abreast of the best orchestral work of the day; but this amounts to comparatively little in the scale of artistic or educational importance, if the programmes in which it exhibits its virtuosity are essentially fifty, or even twenty-five, years behind the times.

A CHAT WITH HERR GERICKE.

But little has been heard from Herr Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, since he has taken up his residence here, aside from the results attending his presentation of his concert programmes at Music Hall. Rarely, if ever before, has an artistic nature in so short a time so completely gained the warm esteem and admiration, not only of the musical public, but of all those who have had the good fortune to meet him socially. Equally far removed from the trivial idolatries of dilettantism and the petty pedantry of theorists and doctrinaires, he presents a broad mental make-up, well balanced, genial and essentially harmonious, comme de juste. From the first uprising of his baton almost, his audiences have felt that they were in the presence of a master of his art, calmly competent to keep the musical forces under his direction well in hand, while allowing them sufficient latitude for the adequate expression of the composition executed by them.

By nothing, surely, have the visitors at this season's symphony concerts been more deeply impressed than by the intelligent and well poised readings of the various programme numbers presented under Mr. Gericke's leadership.

When to fine artistic perceptions are allied social graces of no mean order, the whole constitutes a personality which it is a pleasure to meet, and such was the good fortune of the writer of these lines one day this week. Mr. Gericke has taken up his abode in one of the quiet by-streets that dreamily doze under the shadow of the gilded dome; it is traditional ground, hallowed by many cherished memories of old Boston. The distant hum of the busy marts of trade here but faintly strikes the ear; the whole atmosphere is charged with that tender, ideal calmness, dear to poetic natures and favorable to the conception and development of artistic ideas.

Ushered into a room whose old-fashioned spaciousness combined with modern comfort to produce a homelike impression, the writer sunk into a cushioned chair and introduced the conversation by querying:

"Would you mind mentioning some of the more notable works you intend to have performed this season?"

"Not at all," answered Mr. Gericke, going to a closet and returning with a large sheet on which was written a schedule of the whole season's programmes. Occasional scorings emphasized in thick black marks the concerts where it was found necessary to deviate from the original intention. "In the first place, of course, come the Beethoven symphonies, from the fifth to the ninth, four having already been produced. Then there will be a Schumann symphony played—No. 3 in E flat. Mozart will be represented in this class of works by the Jupiter and the G minor symphony. I shall give one Haydn symphony, but have not as yet decided which one I shall choose. Of Wagner's works I shall present the 'Vorspiel' to the 'Meistersinger von Nürnberg' and the 'Siegfried Idyl.'

Among the Lighter Numbers

I would mention Von Weber's 'Invitation à la Danse' and Herbeck's 'Tanzmomente'; the latter is quite a recent work."

"How are you pleased with your life here?"

"Very much indeed; in many respects its pleasantness far exceeds anything I dared to expect. Everywhere I have been most amiably received; indeed, I may say that I have found a very pleasant substitute for that undefinable social quality which the Germans call 'Gemüthlichkeit,' and for which no word exists in other languages. This quality of 'Gemüthlichkeit,' you know, is a distinguishing characteristic of social life in Vienna, my recent home. Now, as regards my orchestra: I must say that I am simply delighted with it. The people play better from concert to concert; I note some new quality or progressive improvement each time. Without wishing to make invidious comparisons, I must testify to the peculiar excellence of the violins." Mr. Gericke seems to have a remarkable fondness for this instrument, and whenever alluding to good performers of, or performances on, the same, his voice would take an almost caressing intonation. "Yes," he continued, "I would not hesitate to pit them on equal terms against the best that European capitals can boast. Some of my Vienna friends said to me: 'Oh, you'll surely want to return before long; you won't find things according to your ideas and habits in the new world, and then comes the mal de pays.' But my good friends were mistaken; I haven't the slightest idea of wanting to return; certainly not as long as my contract lasts, and quite possibly not then. And yet I was most pleasantly situated in Vienna."

"I can easily imagine that."

"See here," said Mr. Gericke, spreading out what looked like two elegantly bound large books on the table. On lifting the covers, they were found to contain expressions of esteem from two of the most prominent musical societies of Vienna, the Singverein and the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. The concerts of the latter society were directed by Herr Gericke during four years. The Singverein is a club of mixed voices, like our Boylston, and can be called in requisition to assist at the concerts of the other society. "Now the reason I left such congenial surroundings was this: Although I had wrought in theatres for 19 years, and had been formerly passionately fond of such work, I suddenly became, in a sense, weary of it. I don't try to explain this change. Yet my position as musical director at the Opera was the only one on which I could definitely rely. Just about the time I was devising ways and means to relinquish it, and obtain equally reliable employment in purely orchestral or concert work, Mr. Higginson appeared in Vienna in quest of a leader for his Symphony orchestra. You know the rest."

"Have you heard any music in this city outside of your concerts?"

"I have attended a performance of the 'Messiah' by the Handel and Haydn society, also concerts by the Boylston and Cecilia clubs. I was surprised and delighted beyond measure to find

The Art of Choral Singing

so highly advanced in your city."

"What do you think of music as a general factor in education?"

"I do not believe in those indiscriminate attempts to force music on every one. If a child has talent or taste for music, it is well enough to cultivate it, even though it turn out

168
a mere society accomplishment; in other cases it is not only a waste of time, money and sweetness of spirit, but a pointless torment to others, both in its incipient and developed stages of useless annoyance."

Taking a Vienna paper from the table, Mr. Gericke, with evident delight, read a criticism by Herr Hauslick condemning the pedantry of a certain critic in carping at the tempo taken in the performance of a certain piece. "These things cannot be regulated by metronome; else they were within everybody's reach. A slight variation in tempo, according to the musician's mood at the time, is not only allowable, but ever highly compatible with artistic rendering. Take, for instance, the sign andante (walking). Who shall presume to dictate its exact interpretation? Some people walk quickly, others slowly, and grand old Bach probably touched the core of the matter when he said: 'I'll put no tempo indications on my works; those that can't understand them without needn't play them!'"

Thanking Mr. Gericke for his communications, the writer withdrew. Herald Jan 11/85

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT Herald

The 13th concert of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Mr. William J. Winch, tenor, as soloist, and the following programme:

Symphony, in D major, No. 5.....Mozart
Barcarolle ("Polyeucte").....Gounod
Suite, op. 113.....F. Lachner
(a) "I Attempt from Love's Sickness to Fly".....Purcell
(b) Mädchenlied.....Raff
(c) Mädeliedes Lüftchen Blütenwind.....Jensen
Prelude and closing scene from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner

The reappearance of Mr. Winch made quite a notable event on account of his long absence from Boston concert halls, and his great popularity was shown by the cordial greeting given him on his entrance. His singing had all the charm of former days, the same purity of tone, clear, intelligent phrasing, and clean enunciation characterizing his interpretation of each of his several numbers. The Gounod Barcarolle was given in a delightfully artistic fashion, which fitted its characteristics most happily and made its beauties most distinct. The group of songs, sung to the piano accompaniments of Mr. Mollenhauer, were equally pleasing and the audience showed its keen enjoyment of Mr. Winch's numbers by the most generous applause. The melodious themes of the several movements of the Mozart symphony were played with admirable taste and caused unqualified pleasure to all who still find Mozart's composition more fully satisfying than the works of the so-called advanced musicians of today. The Lachner suite proved equally pleasing, and it displayed the skill and absolute control had over the orchestra by its conductor most completely. The composition calls for a perfect presentation to reveal all its beauties, and this demand was met with rare fidelity by the players. The march was given with exceeding taste, and the reading of the fugue was delightfully clear throughout. Having entire confidence in the ability of Herr Gericke and his musicians to present the "Tristan and Isolde" selection in a way to challenge the criticism of the most devout follower of Wagner, it appeared unnecessary to endure the weariness incidental to a hearing of the number. One experience of this sort serves for a life time.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last evening was one of the finest of the series thus far. Not only were the selections given with admirable effect, but the programme showed some signs of a departure from the beaten track, and the old German school was represented by a short Mozart Symphony only. This was a fine example of Mozart's clear, concise and symmetrical style and Mr. Gericke took the tempi in a conservative manner only quickening a trifle at the very end, as is his wont. He seemed to recognize the fact that a Mozart Allegro is not as quick as a modern movement, bearing the same mark of tempo. Mr. William J. Winch was the soloist, and was welcomed with some degree of enthusiasm which he soon justified by singing a Gounod Barcarolle in a broader, fuller style than we had credited him with possessing. He has improved in Europe, of that there is no question. He was formerly a sweet and refined singer, but now he has added to these qualities a degree of passion and force that were lacking in his previous efforts. We should have liked a little less of tenderness and more of directness in "I Attempt from Love's Sickness," as in this earliest effort of the British muse to free herself from Italian shackles, the tropical languor is out of place, but in the last two songs the vocalist was perfect, if we except the demifalsetto close. Lachner's Suite is an inspiring work, admirable in form and treatment, full of interesting counterpoints and fine contrasts. The odd pizzicato end of the minuet, the beautiful cello figure of its trio, the swinging rhythm of its march, so like that of Raff's Lenore symphony, the splendid work of the contrabasses in the fugue, and the excellent stretto, were the salient points of the well-nigh perfect performance. With "Isolde's Liebes Tod" the concert closed. It is safe to say that there has never been a better performance of the work in Boston. The great waves of tone were given with absolute unity, and when one compared this music with the musical confections on which Boston has fed so eagerly during the last two weeks, one could not but feel that the applause of the masses is not the standard of art.

In no concert thus far has the orchestra so thoroughly proved its progress. It stands today far in advance of any point it has reached before, and, as we see that Liszt is one of the composers to have a hearing at the next concert, we believe that Mr. Gericke is preparing to recognize the moderns, and who can tell but that he may yet even hear of Paine, and Whiting, and Parker, and Chadwick, and other American workers in music, who have caught some of the divine "inflatus" and have given out worthy compositions as the result of their inflation.

Conner

Boston Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There was an excellent audience, but few seats being vacant. The concert opened with Mozart's always delightful symphony in D major, No. 5 (Breit & Haert.) It has, we believe, the smallest combination of instruments for which its composer wrote a work of this class, it being without flute or clarinets, the wood wind consisting only of two oboes and two bassoons. The large and imposing allegro with which it opens was beautifully read, and the symphony as a whole had full justice done it if we except the finale, of which the presto was taken too fast for the instruments to perform the demands made upon them with proper clearness. Lachner's fine suite op. 113, was admirably played particularly the noble and fiery fugue with which it ends. The concert ended with the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," in which about one idea and a half are worried over and over again. We doubt if these selections ever had a more spirited or more perfect performance than was accorded them on this occasion. The soloist was Mr. W. J. Winch, who made his first appearance since his return from Europe. He had a very cordial reception. His contributions to the concert consisted of the lovely barcarolle from Gounod's "Polyeucte," Purcell's wonderfully fresh song, "I Attempt from Love's Sickness to Fly," Raff's "Mädchenlied," and Jensen's "Mädeliedes Lüftchen Blütenwind." Mr. Winch's style has broadened greatly, and has acquired a deeper warmth, finish, and sincerity since he was last heard here. His singing of all his selections was highly artistic, and was particularly noticeable for its fine phrasing, manliness, and the varied grace of expression and purity of taste that distinguished it. The cordial and appreciative applause that attended it was fairly earned and wholly merited. At the end of the last named group of songs he was twice recalled enthusiastically.

At the next concert will be given Weber's "Oberon" overture; Beethoven's Septette, op. 20; Liszt's "Orpheus," and Brahms's Symphony in D, No. 2. There will be no soloist.

Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, at Music Hall on Saturday evening introduced to a Boston audience, for the first time since his return from Europe, Mr. William J. Winch, one of our local singers, whose recent successes in concerts abroad have been a matter of gratification to his many friends at home. Mr. Winch had a very cordial reception. The programme was as follows:

Symphony, in D major, No. 5.....Mozart
Barcarolle ("Polyeucte").....Gounod
Suite, op. 113.....F. Lachner
(a) "I Attempt from Love's Sickness to Fly".....Purcell
(b) Mädchenlied.....Raff
(c) Mädeliedes Lüftchen Blütenwind.....Jensen
Prelude and closing scene from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner

Considered as a whole the concert was one of the best of the series, the orchestral finely played as a rule, a possible exception being in regard to the quickening of the movement toward the close of the symphony. Lachner's Suite was admirably performed, while the Wagner selections were given such an interpretation as might have been expected from a conductor who is an admirer of the "music of the future." Mr. Winch's selections were all heard with unmistakable pleasure, and this popular tenor was given reason to feel that his merits as an artist are not at all unappreciated here in his home. He appears to have profited by his trip abroad, and retaining all the fine qualities of voice and the excellence of method which have characterized his singing heretofore, sings now with greater breadth and fuller expression than was his wont before. Gounod's barcarole was splendidly given, and the group of songs, accompanied on the piano by Mr. Mollenhauer, were sung in a very artistic manner, though there was a trifle of exaggeration in the sentiment infused into the rendering of Purcell's song. All Mr. Winch's selections were heartily

a mere society accomplishment; in other cases it is not only a waste of time, money and sweetness of spirit, but a pointless torment to others, both in its incipient and developed stages of useless annoyance."

Taking a Vienna paper from the table, Mr. Gericke, with evident delight, read a criticism by Herr Hauslick condemning the pedantry of a certain critic in carping at the tempo taken in the performance of a certain piece. "These things cannot be regulated by metronome; else they were within everybody's reach. A slight variation in tempo, according to the musician's mood at the time, is not only allowable, but ever highly compatible with artistic rendering. Take, for instance, the sign andante (walking). Who shall presume to dictate its exact interpretation? Some people walk quickly, others slowly, and grand old Bach probably touched the core of the matter when he said: 'I'll put no tempo indications on my works; those that can't understand them without needn't play them!'"

Thanking Mr. Gericke for his communications, the writer withdrew. Herald, Jan 11/85

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 13th concert of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Mr. William J. Winch, tenor, as soloist, and the following programme:

Symphony, in D major, No. 5.....Mozart
Barcarolle ("Polyeucte").....Gounod
Suite, op. 113.....F. Lachner
(a) "I Attempt from Love's Sickness to Fly".....Purcell
(b) Mädchenlied.....Raff
(c) Mädeliedes Lüftchen Blütenwind.....Jensen
Prelude and closing scene from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner

The reappearance of Mr. Winch made quite a notable event on account of his long absence from Boston concert halls, and his great popularity was shown by the cordial greeting given him on his entrance. His singing had all the charm of former days, the same purity of tone, clear, intelligent phrasing, and clean enunciation characterizing his interpretation of each of his several numbers. The Gounod Barcarolle was given in a delightfully artistic fashion, which fitted its characteristics most happily and made its beauties most distinct. The group of songs, sung to the piano accompaniments of Mr. Mollenhauer, were equally pleasing and the audience showed its keen enjoyment of Mr. Winch's numbers by the most generous applause. The melodious themes of the several movements of the Mozart symphony were played with admirable taste and caused unqualified pleasure to all who still find Mozart's composition more fully satisfying than the works of the so-called advanced musicians of today. The Lachner suite proved equally pleasing, and it displayed the skill and absolute control had over the orchestra by its conductor most completely. The composition calls for a perfect presentation to reveal all its beauties, and this demand was met with rare fidelity by the players. The march was given with exceeding taste, and the reading of the fugue was delightful clear throughout. Having entire confidence in the ability of Herr Gericke and his musicians to present the "Tristan and Isolde" selection in a way to challenge the criticism of the most devout follower of Wagner, it appeared unnecessary to endure the weariness incidental to a hearing of the number. One experience of this sort serves for a life time.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last evening was one of the finest of the series thus far. Not only were the selections given with admirable effect, but the programme showed some signs of a departure from the beaten track, and the old German school was represented by a short Mozart Symphony only. This was a fine example of Mozart's clear, concise and symmetrical style and Mr. Gericke took the tempi in a conservative manner only quickening a trifle at the very end, as is his wont. He seemed to recognize the fact that a Mozart Allegro is not as quick as a modern movement, bearing the same mark of tempo. Mr. William J. Winch was the soloist, and was welcomed with some degree of enthusiasm which he soon justified by singing a Gounod Barcarolle in a broader, fuller style than we had credited him with possessing. He has improved in Europe, of that there is no question. He was formerly a sweet and refined singer, but now he has added to these qualities a degree of passion and force that were lacking in his previous efforts. We should have liked a little less of tenderness and more of directness in "I Attempt from Love's Sickness," as in this earliest effort of the British muse to free herself from Italian shackles, the tropical languor is out of place, but in the last two songs the vocalist was perfect, if we except the demifalsetto close. Lachner's Suite is an inspiring work, admirable in form and treatment, full of interesting counterpoints and fine contrasts. The odd pizzicato end of the minuet, the beautiful cello figure of its trio, the swinging rhythm of its march, so like that of Raff's Lenore symphony, the splendid work of the contrabasses in the fugue, and the excellent stretto, were the salient points of the well-nigh perfect performance. With "Isolde's Liebes Tod" the concert closed. It is safe to say that there has never been a better performance of the work in Boston. The great waves of tone were given with absolute unity, and when one compared this music with the musical confections on which Boston has fed so eagerly during the last two weeks, one could not but feel that the applause of the masses is not the standard of art.

In no concert thus far has the orchestra so thoroughly proved its progress. It stands today far in advance of any point it has reached before, and, as we see that Liszt is one of the composers to have a hearing at the next concert, we believe that Mr. Gericke is preparing to recognize the moderns, and who can tell but that he may yet even hear of Paine, and Whiting, and Parker, and Chadwick, and other American workers in music, who have caught some of the divine "inflatus" and have given out worthy compositions as the result of their inflation.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There was an excellent audience, but few seats being vacant. The concert opened with Mozart's always delightful symphony in D major, No. 5 (Brett & Haert.) It has, we believe, the smallest combination of instruments for which its composer wrote a work of this class, it being without flute or clarinets, the wood wind consisting only of two oboes and two bassoons. The large and imposing allegro with which it opens was beautifully read, and the symphony as a whole had full justice done it if we except the finale, of which the prelude was taken too fast for the instruments to perform the demands made upon them with proper clearness. Lachner's fine suite op. 113, was admirably played particularly the noble and fiery fugue with which it ends. The concert ended with the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," in which about one idea and a half are worried over and over again. We doubt if these selections ever had a more spirited or more perfect performance than was accorded them on this occasion. The soloist was Mr. W. J. Winch, who made his first appearance since his return from Europe. He had a very cordial reception. His contributions to the concert consisted of the lovely barcarolle from Gounod's "Polyeucte," Purcell's wonderfully fresh song, "I Attempt from Love's Sickness to Fly," Raff's "Mädchenlied," and Jensen's "Mädeliedes Lüftchen Blütenwind." Mr. Winch's style has broadened greatly, and has acquired a deeper warmth, finish, and sincerity since he was last heard here. His singing of all his selections was highly artistic, and was particularly noticeable for its fine phrasing, manliness, and the varied grace of expression and purity of taste that distinguished it. The cordial and appreciative applause that attended it was fairly earned and wholly merited. At the end of the last named group of songs he was twice recalled enthusiastically.

At the next concert will be given Weber's "Oberon" overture; Beethoven's Septette, op. 20; Liszt's "Orpheus," and Brahms's Symphony in D, No. 3. There will be no soloist.

Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, at Music Hall on Saturday evening introduced to a Boston audience, for the first time since his return from Europe, Mr. William J. Winch, one of our local singers, whose recent successes in concerts abroad have been a matter of gratification to his many friends at home. Mr. Winch had a very cordial reception. The programme was as follows:

Symphony, in D major, No. 5.....Mozart
Barcarolle ("Polyeucte").....Gounod
Suite, op. 113.....F. Lachner
(a) "I Attempt from Love's Sickness to Fly".....Purcell
(b) Mädchenlied.....Raff
(c) Mädeliedes Lüftchen Blütenwind.....Jensen
Prelude and closing scene from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner

Considered as a whole the concert was one of the best of the series, the orchestral finely played as a rule, a possible exception being in regard to the quickening of the movement toward the close of the Symphony. Lachner's Suite was admirably performed, while the Wagner selections were given such an interpretation as might have been expected from a conductor who is an admirer of the "music of the future." Mr. Winch's selections were all heard with unmistakable pleasure, and this popular tenor was given reason to feel that his merits as an artist are not at all unappreciated here in his home. He appears to have profited by his trip abroad, and retaining all the fine qualities of voice and the excellence of method which have characterized his singing heretofore, sings now with greater breadth and fuller expression than was his wont before. Gounod's barcarole was splendidly given, and the group of songs, accompanied on the piano by Mr. Mollenhauer, were sung in a very artistic manner, though there was a trifle of exaggeration in the sentiment infused into the rendering of Purcell's song. All Mr. Winch's selections were heartily appeared. For the fourteenth concert next Saturday evening the programme is: Overture ("Oberon"), Weber; septet for violin, viola, horn, clarinet, bassoon, violoncello and double bass, op. 20 (string parts by full string orchestra), Beethoven; symphonic poem ("Orpheus"), Liszt; symphony in D major, No. 2, op. 73, Brahms.

170

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert of the Boston series took place in Music Hall last Saturday, and offered the following programme:

Symphony in D major, No. 5.....Mozart
 Allegro con spirito—Andante—Menuetto—Presto.
 Barcarolle (Polyeucte).....Gounod
 Mr. W. J. Winch.
 Suite op. 113.....F. Lachner
 Prelude—Minuet—Variations and March—Introduction and Fugue.
 a. "I attempt from love's sickness to fly".....Purcell
 b. Mädchenlied.....Raff
 c. Murmelndes Lüftchen Blütenwind.....Jensen
 (Songs with Piano.)
 (Mr. Winch.)
 Prelude and closing scene from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
 (Vorspiel und Liebestod.)

Not only was this programme of a broader and more liberal character than many of its predecessors, but it was performed in a manner that left nothing to be desired. The orchestra, under Mr. Gericke, has been brought to a perfection which makes it the equal of almost any celebrated European orchestra. The reading of the Mozart symphony was a well-considered one. Mr. Gericke has a habit of accelerating his tempo a little at the finale of any work that will stand it, but, with this exception, the tempi were just as Mozart might have desired them. We must never forget that the quick movements were slower, and the slow movements quicker in the "classical age" than they are at present.

Mr. Winch was received with enthusiasm, which he speedily merited by proving that his singing has improved since he went abroad. He was always a refined and cultured singer, but his constant sweetness was sometimes cloying. Now he has breadth, manliness and power, and yet has lost none of his grace and delicacy. The Gounod number was full of fine orchestral color in its accompaniment, and had some striking modulations. It gave the vocalist plenty of opportunity to display his ability in shading. In his subsequent songs Mr. Winch sang with fervor and passion. There was, perhaps, a little too much of contrast, of languor and varying emotion in the Purcell song for its straightforward English school, but in the two lieder the vocalist was—with the exception of an occasional overuse of falsetto—about perfect.

What a noble example of pure music Lachner's suite is. Such masterly counterpoint, such an interesting fugue with such an admirable stretto are rarely found in modern orchestral works. The minuet was exquisitely played, and the cello figure of the trio was clearly brought out against the melody. The march is strangely similar to that of Raff's "Leonore" symphony, rhythm, and whole figures at times being identical. I must compliment the contrabasses on the manner in which they did their work in the fugue, and also the steadiness of the brasses in the stretto.

The glorious Wagner number, "Isolde's Liebestod," was performed with surprising unanimity, the great waves of tone ebbing and swaying with perfect ensemble.

If I indulge in a little enthusiasm over this concert, I am sure that I may be pardoned, for I had been listening for two weeks to the artistic Arditri trying to extract an impossible ensemble from a cheap Maplesonian orchestra, and it was a relief to hear something given with fidelity to the score again. Beside the programme itself showed that Mr. Gericke begins to see that Boston demands some of the modern works and cannot content itself forever with Beethoven, Haydn and Bach. Wagner in this concert, and a work by Liszt in the next prove that he has heard our entreaties, and begins to thaw from his too classical frigidity. When he is quite melted we will present the names of Paine, Whiting, Parker, Gilchrist and others to him, and perhaps even the homeless American muse may find shelter in the Boston Symphony Concerts. But we also see with regret that Beethoven's septette is to be performed by the whole orchestra. We are sorry that with so many real orchestral works in the field, Beethoven's chamber music cannot be allowed to remain as he wrote it.

L. C. E.

How to Listen to Music.

AUDIENCES vs. CONDUCTOR.

Again considerable fault is being found with the Boston symphony concerts. One finds a typical expression of it in editorials that have recently appeared in the Advertiser. An eminent musician in Chickering Hall last Saturday concluded his interesting lecture upon musical history by drawing a contrast between one of its episodes and the appreciation of native music in this country; and then made a number of very suggestive comments upon the importation to this country of musicians, and notably conductors. His intent was clear and well defined. It at least so advantageously reflected an existing prejudice as to reform to principle, its prejudicial trait. Criticism is also made that Herr Gericke's programmes are too utterly old-fashioned to be tolerated by our highly cultivated—self-conceited, we should say—Boston audiences. It is further charged that the tempi of the lead are oftener too fast than exactly au fait, especially in allegro movements. The bilious, or more justly speaking, the splenetic state of feeling that prevails is again illustrated by such highly patriotic natives as fail to understand why Mr. H. L. Higginson should find it necessary to import a great conductor from Europe. May we be pardoned, however, for suggesting that Mr. Higginson naturally entertains a well-founded suspicion that the quality of the vocation of conductors in America is far more insignificant than the bulk of its membership. Fault-finding in other directions is very prolific, and in one instance at least it is made evident how profoundly difficult one may appear in attempts to find fault. We refer to the musical editor of the Herald, who evidently does not agree with conductor Gericke that Brahms is a great composer. Our esteemed friend would have such deference shown his opinion as would prevent a repetition of the symphonies of Brahms.

But let us return to the question of imported music and musicians, especially as it has been raised in an artistic and sincere spirit; and yet we fancy with more impulse than with any pretence of well-considered views as to its advisability. Surely native men of letters would not object to the importation of such conductors of modern thought as Matthew Arnold; for thereby would the literary reputation of the country be improved. It is equally true that the more great composers, conductors and performers that come here from Germany, the more beneficial will be the effect of such migration upon our musical atmosphere; and in such inspirational directions as no amount of native talent and culture can af-applauded. For the fourteenth concert, next Saturday evening the programme is: Overture ("Oberon"), Weber; septet for violin, viola, horn, clarinet, bassoon, violoncello and double bass, op. 20 (string parts by full string orchestra). Beethoven; symphonic poem ("Orpheus"), Liszt; symphony in D major, No. 2, op. 73, Brahms.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert of the Boston series took place in Music Hall last Saturday, and offered the following programme:

Symphony in D major, No. 5.....Mozart
Allegro con spirito—Andante—Menuetto—Presto.
Barcarolle (Polyeucte).....Gounod
Mr. W. J. Winch.
Suite op. 113.....F. Lachner
Prelude—Minuet—Variations and March—Introduction and Fugue.
a. "I attempt from love's sickness to fly".....Purcell
b. Mädchenlied.....Raff
c. Marmelades Lüftchen Blütenwind.....Jensen
(Songs with Piano.)
(Mr. Winch.)
Prelude and closing scene from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
(Vorspiel und Liebestod.)

Not only was this programme of a broader and more liberal character than many of its predecessors, but it was performed in a manner that left nothing to be desired. The orchestra, under Mr. Gericke, has been brought to a perfection which makes it the equal of almost any celebrated European orchestra. The reading of the Mozart symphony was a well-considered one. Mr. Gericke has a habit of accelerating his tempo a little at the finale of any work that will stand it, but, with this exception, the tempi were just as Mozart might have desired them. We must never forget that the quick movements were slower, and the slow movements quicker in the "classical age" than they are at present.

Mr. Winch was received with enthusiasm, which he speedily merited by proving that his singing has improved since he went abroad. He was always a refined and cultured singer, but his constant sweetness was sometimes cloying. Now he has breadth, manliness and power, and yet has lost none of his grace and delicacy. The Gounod number was full of fine orchestral color in its accompaniment, and had some striking modulations. It gave the vocalist plenty of opportunity to display his ability in shading. In his subsequent songs Mr. Winch sang with fervor and passion. There was, perhaps, a little too much of contrast, of languor and varying emotion in the Purcell song for its straightforward English school, but in the two lieder the vocalist was—with the exception of an occasional overuse of falsetto—about perfect.

What a noble example of pure music Lachner's suite is. Such masterly counterpoint, such an interesting fugue with such an admirable stretto are rarely found in modern orchestral works. The minuet was exquisitely played, and the cello figure of the trio was clearly brought out against the melody. The march is strangely similar to that of Raff's "Leonore" symphony, rhythm, and whole figures at times being identical. I must compliment the contrabasses on the manner in which they did their work in the fugue, and also the steadiness of the brasses in the stretto.

The glorious Wagner number, "Isolde's Liebestod," was performed with surprising unanimity, the great waves of tone ebbing and swaying with perfect ensemble.

If I indulge in a little enthusiasm over this concert, I am sure that I may be pardoned, for I had been listening for two weeks to the artistic Arditri trying to extract an impossible ensemble from a cheap Maplesonian orchestra, and it was a relief to hear something given with fidelity to the score again. Beside the programme itself showed that Mr. Gericke begins to see that Boston demands some of the modern works and cannot content itself forever with Beethoven, Haydn and Bach. Wagner in this concert, and a work by Liszt in the next prove that he has heard our entreaties, and begins to thaw from his too classical frigidity. When he is quite melted we will present the names of Paine, Whiting, Parker, Gilchrist and others to him, and perhaps even the homeless American muse may find shelter in the Boston Symphony Concerts. But we also see with regret that Beethoven's septette is to be performed by the whole orchestra. We are sorry that with so many real orchestral works in the field, Beethoven's chamber music cannot be allowed to remain as he wrote it.

L. C. E.

Music.

AUDIENCES vs. CONDUCTOR.

Again considerable fault is being found with the Boston symphony concerts. One finds a typical expression of it in editorials that have recently appeared in the Advertiser. An eminent musician in Chickering Hall last Saturday concluded his interesting lecture upon musical history by drawing a contrast between one of its episodes and the appreciation of native music in this country; and then made a number of very suggestive comments upon the importation to this country of musicians, and notably conductors. His intent was clear and well defined. It at least so advantageously reflected an existing prejudice as to reform to principle, its prejudicial trait. Criticism is also made that Herr Gericke's programmes are too utterly old-fashioned to be tolerated by our highly cultivated—self-conceited, we should say—Boston audiences. It is further charged that the tempi of the lead are oftener too fast than exactly au fait, especially in allegro movements. The bilious, or more justly speaking, the splenetic state of feeling that prevails is again illustrated by such highly patriotic natives as fail to understand why Mr. H. L. Higginson should find it necessary to import a great conductor from Europe. May we be pardoned, however, for suggesting that Mr. Higginson naturally entertains a well-founded suspicion that the quality of the vocation of conductors in America is far more insignificant than the bulk of its membership. Fault-finding in other directions is very prolific, and in one instance at least it is made evident how profoundly difficult one may appear in attempts to find fault. We refer to the musical editor of the Herald, who evidently does not agree with conductor Gericke that Brahms is a great composer. Our esteemed friend would have such deference shown his opinion as would prevent a repetition of the symphonies of Brahms.

But let us return to the question of imported music and musicians, especially as it has been raised in an artistic and sincere spirit; and yet we fancy with more impulse than with any pretence of well-considered views as to its advisability. Surely native men of letters would not object to the importation of such conductors of modern thought as Matthew Arnold; for thereby would the literary reputation of the country be improved. It is equally true that the more great composers, conductors and performers that come here from Germany, the more beneficial will be the effect of such migration upon our musical atmosphere; and in such inspirational directions as no amount of native talent and culture can afford. All honor to the greatest of our American composers, the esteemed professor at Harvard who raises the objection; and yet though he occupy the foremost place in the American musical profession, he would nevertheless take even higher rank and do more justice to his genius in that more invigorating atmosphere of music, which Germany affords, and from which continual benefit is being imparted by her sons and musicians who in times past have done—who are even now doing—so much for the creation of native music in America. It is yet, it will ever be, too early for American musicians to follow in the footsteps of that phenomenal "know nothing" party which about a quarter of a century ago met with its deserved fate in the political world. It neither seems polite nor advisable to inform any great musician who may come here from abroad that his room is better than his company.

It has not been our intent to take the slightest exception to well-grounded criticisms of Herr Gericke's lead at individual concerts. Herr Gericke is deservedly before the public in a highly important position. He is therefore possessed of a certain divine right to be criticised that never associates itself with mediocrity. But in moods of criticism it should not be forgotten that he has vastly improved the playing of the Boston symphony orchestra; that the orchestra to a man appears to entertain a profound respect for his lead and for his musical ability, and that this respect is not so much shown in any extravagant laudations of his individuality, as in a remarkably unanimous and responsive attention to the dictation of his baton. His fidelity and good sound common sense at the basis of his musical cultivation are displayed at the rehearsals in a manner that enforces the very experience of pupillage, so essential to the development of an organized body of musicians, under a conductor who is their appointed superior. Artistically it is not at all probable that the Boston symphony orchestra could be improved by a change of conductors, despite any mistakes that Herr Gericke inevitably has made. His mistakes are those of a great conductor, and would be liable to create differences of opinion among his peers. The justice of his European reputation which rated him as one of the best qualified conductors of the age, has been illustrated in Boston in a manner that entitles him to the highest appreciation. That he is conservative in the arrangement of his programmes is all the more fortunate for the interests of a musical public that is ever more or less restless unless being entertained by novelty and sensation.

It should be borne in mind that if Herr Gericke, according to the Advertiser's criticism, fails to satisfy our fastidious Boston audiences, either as regards programmes or the performance of programmes, he is none the less the same Herr Gericke who for years was so eminently satisfactory to the Vienna public. Possibly, then, our Boston audiences are a trifle more nice but not quite so wise as those in Vienna. We are well aware that the suggestion will be regarded as pregnant with the taint of treason, but we are none the less conscious that it is well founded. The Advertiser argues that the present series of programmes are the same as regards character as those which contributed to the unpopularity of the Harvard concerts. The criticism must indeed be gratifying to the Harvard Musical Association, for it is practically an indorsement of the course pursued by Mr. John S. Dwight and Mr. Carl Zerrahn, not it is true from the Advertiser, but from one of the two most eminent of European conductors, the one for whose importation the city of Boston is indebted to Mr. H. L. Higginson. It would seem that in Boston there is really no stability nor unanimity of public opinion as to what symphony concerts should be, but an ever restless desire for a change. A is dissatisfied because more of Wagner's music is not performed; B complains because the opportunities are so meagre of hearing the Haydn and Mozart symphonies; C is too utterly conscious that the symphonic works of Haydn and Mozart are but the crumbling monuments of antique genius; D will affirm that a certain tempo taken by the conductor is too fast, at the same time that E will be delighted with its originality. And what is the poor conductor to do in the meantime—try and please everybody? If so he may meet with the fate of the man whom Aesop describes as with the boy and an ass trying to please everybody, satisfying no one and eventually losing the ass. At last we have a conductor who is not only independent in thought and action, but who as the result of experience, cultivation and reputation can afford to be independent. If he fails to satisfy the demands of the Boston public, if he becomes unpopular here, it is not at all likely that his reputation in other parts of the world will be affected thereby. Should the symphony concert enterprise, the concerto, orchestra and conductor be viewed, as it were, through rose-colored spectacles? Not at all. Are we not willing to contribute a share to the over-generous amount of fault-finding that prevails? That were human. From an individual standpoint it were easy enough to make suggestions. We would enjoy a repetition of the worthiest specimen of native music that has yet been compiled, namely, the Spring symphony of John K. Paine; or a performance of the "Rip Van Winkle" overture of Chadwick, a work that every one who has heard it before would like to hear again; and in short, such programmes as would be most acceptable to the largest number of auditors. But in a city where there are so many pessimists as is the case in Boston, it is liable to become proverbial in other parts of the world, that the permanent success here of any annual series of classical concerts is more or less dependent upon the dictates of fashion or the whims of the dilettanti. The Harvard concerts and their faithful conductor, who now so splendidly holds his own as the leader of the Handel and Haydn society, were once fashionable. It is exceedingly doubtful if their decline was in the least degree owing to a lack of merit. At a time when symphony concerts in Boston came near being wholly abandoned because of a lack of support, the Philharmonic society came to the rescue, only to be frowned upon by Beacon street and company, and this of course settled the fate of the Philharmonic society. It may not be long before Mr. Higginson will be placed in a similar position, especially if he sustains, as he undoubtedly will, a conductor who has not come to Boston to be conducted, but to make the best use of his ability, and, as we trust, with a result that shall develop an unrivalled fame for the Boston symphony orchestra.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES.

We have already received several communications agreeing or disagreeing with the article printed in these columns in regard to the programmes of the present series of symphony concerts. One of these, as being a fair sample of those which take an opposite view from ours, we publish over the signature of its writer, a young gentleman whose own interest and proficiency in music are an assurance that what he says is worth reading, considering and answering. Our reply need not be long, nor will it concern itself with the pleasant bits of sarcasm and historical anecdote in his letter; because, although pretty and erudite, they are rather irrelevant to our line of criticism.

No attendant upon the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever been more prompt than we to recognize and laud—in private and in public—the modest munificence and earnest purpose of their founder and supporter, nor has any one given warmer and less stinted praise to the present conductor,—witness the very words spoken of him in the article of Monday,—and we have even found justification for some points in his directing which other critics, learned and professional musicians, have given good reason for censuring severely.

The only point is, whether the programmes as a whole fairly represent the whole broad field of orchestral music as it is today. We maintain that they do not, and that they should. These concerts are not those of an educational institution, nor are they intended only for persons whose musical experiences began but a few years ago, or who are, perhaps, attending orchestral concerts for the first time in their lives. Their purpose, as we understand it, is as catholic as their foundation is generous. To imply that, because we remember the concerts which were taking place when our critic was a baby, we now only want novel and ephemeral music, is hasty and unreasonable. What we claim is, that no narrow lines should circumscribe the composition of the programmes, and that with the old and the revered should be heard the young and the respectable. If an analysis of the individual numbers referable to the later authors whom we cited had accompanied the mention of their names, and all the transcriptions and arrangements been subtracted, the showing would have been less favorable; and if we had gone further (as some correspondents wish we had) and added the names of Paine, Chadwick and other Americans to the list of ignored authors, we should still have been asking no more than a broad view of musical art would justify.

But if foreign standards may be used, and if further reference to the Philharmonic programmes must run the risk of being called an evidence of local partiality, and reference to Mr. Theodore Thomas must be ruled out, let us merely make mention of some programmes which ought to carry authority, and which we find in one week's issue of Le Menestrel and the London Musical World: The Meiningen Orchestra,—which has lately played Mackenzie's "Belle Dame Sans Merci",—overture and Sicilienne from "Beatrice and Benedict," Berlioz, Tarantella and Second Symphony, Saint-Saëns, Spanish suite, Lalo; this, followed by a concert in which Glinka, Borodin, Tschaikowsky and Rubinstein were the chief authors. Godard's Paris Concerts: Violoncello concerto, Lalo; extracts from the Walküre, Wagner; trio for harp, violoncello and orchestra, Handel; Alsatian suite, Massenet; and a ballad for harp. At Berlin the Philharmonic programme includes a spring fantasy by Bronsart; at Frankfort there is a new scherzo capriccioso, by Dvorák; at Paris (Godard again) a new Concert-Stück by Bazzini; and at Cologne, London, and elsewhere, Cowen's "Welsh" symphony. The last Richter concerts need not be quoted, as they consist almost entirely of extracts from the Wagner tetralogy.

It is, it seems to us, a pretty good illustration of the mote and the beam parable, when we are accused of illiberality and narrowness of view, when our only appeal is for greater and richer resources for the basis of these splendid performances. "Want the earth" has generally been thought to be evidence of a grasping disposition, and that is just our postulate. We yield even to no ardent baccalauréate in music in our love for the great masters, as these columns have for nearly thirty years given proof; nor would we say one criticising word about programmes of concerts purporting to be strictly classical; but, when a six months' series of large orchestral concerts is in question, we hold that it is right and proper to urge that their scope should be the widest and most varied, known in concerts of similar scale and dignity anywhere in the world.

And here, we think, the discussion may be allowed to drop. We agree with those who honor the founder and admire the di-ector's skill and taste; with those who are thoroughly satisfied with the programmes, also, there can be no agreement on our part; nor would any further assertion of our views convince them. We spoke deliberately, after hearing many persons and reading many letters, and we shall adhere to what we have said—not to please some and to combat others, but because we believe in a catholicity which not only reveres the spirit of the past, but is also willing to know and to deal fairly by the spirit of the time.

MR. GERICKE'S PROGRAMMES.

To the Editors of the Boston Daily Advertiser:—

In a criticism of the symphony concert programmes which appeared in your columns this morning some strictures are passed upon the character of the selections of this season, which, though they undoubtedly contain something of justice, seem to be an over statement of the case and an over statement founded on not altogether unassailable ground.

An absolute numerical statement of how many new, or how many not, German works have been played in a certain number of concerts is misleading. Such figures mean nothing at all unless they be compared with the figures of other first rate concert programmes. To tell a man that a mountain is 15,000 feet high will not give him any adequate idea of the size of the mountain unless he know that other mountains vary from 2000 to 28,000 feet in their height. Your critic informs us that so far we have heard only 11 not-German works; in another place he speaks of our having an orchestra 50 or 25 years behind the times; and still in another he alludes to the programmes in the cities of Europe, implying that their selections are more liberal. To take up this last statement first. Has he compared the recent programmes of the concerts in these cities with our own programmes? In the Richter autumn concert season in London, 1883, the proportion of German works was nearly seven-eighths of the whole. His last concert was as follows:—

Overture, Oberon.....Weber
Violin suite in D.....Bach
Symphony in A.....Beethoven
Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner

In the Paris season of 1882-83, the selections of Mr. Deldevez (of the Conservatoire), and of Messrs. Lamoureux, Colonne and Pasdeloup (of the Château d'Eau, the Châtelet, and the Cirque d'Hiver, respectively), contained the works of no late German composers save Wagner and Liszt, with the two exceptions of the ballet music from Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba," and Raff's 1m Walde symphony; while for the following season Mr. Pasdeloup announced 29 pianoforte concertos of Mozart. The rest of these programmes was composed of Mendelssohn, Schumann, Beethoven, Haydn, Glück, and so forth, with a sprinkling of modern French works, showing in the choice of these latter—to the absolute exclusion of Brahms, Gade, Volkmann, etc.—a narrowness quite as marked as the narrowness to which your critic complains that we have been subjected. This I say, merely to show that we are no worse off (if this is to be badly off) than are other places. On the other hand, we have already heard three symphonies entirely new to us, and two of them by very modern composers, which saves our concerts somewhat from the crime of being 50 years behind the times.

And now to take up this same crime of which your critic accuses the programmes—although he elsewhere remarks, with more of candor than consistency, that we have heard Wagner, Brahms, Fuchs, Volkmann, Liszt and Rubinstein. It has not yet occurred to the intelligent world to value Homer, Shakspeare, Molière, Goethe, and other intellects of this rank, by their chronological recentness. The educated community of mankind, which alone gives or withholds the seal of greatness, has hitherto been inclined to believe that certain works are not for their time, but for all time. Your critic seems to make an exception to this custom in favor of music, and does not wish to hear any music that has lived more than 25 years. He wants hale and hearty young music, that was not born when our gray headed concert goers were in their teens. An explanation of this remarkable view would be interesting. He would have us give up Thackeray and Shelley in favor of Ouida and Swinburne.

If our orchestra is to be an educator—and it surely should—the question is not then whether people are to hear new things but whether they are to hear good things. We are safe in following the verdict of the European musical world, until we know more than they do, in placing the German school at the head of polyphonic music. For this opinion we have the authority of every city in Europe where there exists a respectable concert season. There is a story of the Greek generals who voted what men of them should receive the first and second prize for military excellence in a certain war. Every general voted for himself as the first candidate and for Themistocles as the second. He therefore received the only election, and that election was unanimous. This may illustrate our position. England, France, Germany and Italy unite in playing the German music of the last 150 years; after this each country shows a weakness for its own composers. More need not be said, except that if it be true that the intelligent and influential ticket holders are vacating their seats because they wish to hear Massenet, Lalo and Saint Saëns in preference to music 50 years old, there is more room for musical education in Boston than has been hitherto supposed.

OWEN WISTER

Boston, Jan. 12, 1885.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Saturday evening's concert, the 13th of the course, contained a relish for widely varying tastes. A symphony by the divinely simple Mozart; songs chosen from Purcell, the father of English melody, and Raff, the sumptuous melodist of the modern German school; an orchestral fancy by another modern (Lachner); a selection from Wagner, the giant and prophet of the present, with a glance at Gounod, the sensuous French writer of much immediate prominence. These constituted a menu so suggestive to the seriously minded, and so interesting withal that the symphony audience rejoiced. This is its formal statement:

Mozart.....Symphony in D major, No. 5. Allegro con spirito.—Andante.—Menuetto.—Presto.
Gounod.....Barcarolle (Poleuete.)
F. Lachner.....Suite op. 113. Prelude.—Minuet.—Variations and March.—Introduction and Fugue.
Purcell.....(a) "I attempt from Love's Sickness to fly."
Raff.....(b) Mädchenlied.
Jensen.....(c) Marmelades Luftchen Blüthenwind.
(Songs with Piano.)
Wagner.....Prelude and Closing Scene, from Tristan and Isolde. (Vorspiel und Liebestod.)

Mr. William J. Winch was the soloist. The friendly audience was glad to see him, as was manifested in its hearty applause when he came upon the platform for his first number. Mr. Winch has passed a season in England since he last sung in Boston. He is the same vital singer as before; possessing an exquisite musical sense, a voice into which can come the noble and the gentle as well, an intelligence equal and satisfying under all circumstances, and a hearty frankness of demeanor which makes friends and keeps them. Is it not gratifying for any city to own such a singer? His selections were disappointing, and, all in all, hardly serious enough for the occasion. Delightful in itself, and as beautifully sung as was the barcarolle from Gounod's latest opera, "Poleuete," this should have given way to something more heroic, towards which the group of three songs would then have stood in more positive and beneficial contrast. The Purcell song, "I attempt from Love's Sickness to fly," is from the ripest period of that earliest of English writers, whose qualities were strong enough to establish themselves, be copied, and gain a following which is in England still loyal and active. Purcell's style seems to anticipate Handel, in its simplicity, exactness of form, and often in some quaint and feeling melody. In the Raff song, the style of the singer was magnificent, and the favorite Jensen lieder was sung with a gracefulness and delicacy of motion that will ever be the envy of all the tenors of the town.

Mr. Winch's mezza voce is even more artistic than formerly. A notably good accompaniment was played by Mr. Mollenhauer to the three songs grouped together. Mr. Winch was thrice heartily recalled after his second appearance. It was such a pleasure to the audience to hear a man sing that it is to be hoped that at least one other male vocalist may be engaged during the season. The orchestra acquitted itself splendidly, and its task was a hard one. Mozart, Lachner, Wagner—and the greatest of these was? The kind of work required of the band in the Symphony and in the Wagner Vorspiel and Liebestod was so divergent, that its success in each selection is of greater moment. The Symphony was faultlessly played; its moods unruffled and guileless as the genius who summoned them were clear from beginning to end. The naïveté of the Andante, the eminently proper and decorous Minuet, the mild vigor of the Presto, bespeak for Mozart a multitude of admirers who seek recreation, pleasure and content in music; but those who stand ready to welcome greater qualities in their composer, who would have music in its highest realm, a companion art to sculpture and painting because of the mind that lies therein, must accept the something in the later school of Wagner as indicative of a stronger, more vigorous and greater type. Of "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner himself says: "I am willing to submit it to the severest tests that result from my theoretic assertions; not because I formed it in accordance with my system—for all theory was completely forgotten by me—but because here at last I moved about with the utmost freedom and the most absolute disregard for every theoretic consideration, in such a manner that in the course of its composition I became aware that I went far beyond my system." It is indeed a prodigious flight towards the future. It is now no longer a question of music in the sense formerly attached to the word, but a perfect welding of poetry in superb form to sonorous utterance. The force of emotional music can go no farther than in "Tristan and Isolde." Mr. Gericke's reading of the single selection granted from this work will deservedly rank as a performance with the Overture to "Tannhauser," but the choice itself is far more lofty. It seems to us the most impressive thing yet accomplished by this orchestra. The Lachner suite is an affair of considerable proportions. Its manner of statement admits of much variety, and some of its episodes are richly ornate. A master of orchestral color, the suite seems to have been first undertaken in a spirit of jest, which is soon lost in the very excellent development and dignity of expression evolved. It was played entire, but its length was a bit against its being so freely welcome, considering all that was to follow, which the audience was eagerly anticipating.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The thirteenth concert, last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Mozart. Symphony in D major, No. 5.
Gounod. Barcarolle from "Polyeucte."
F. Lachner. Suite op. 113.
Purcell. (a). "I attempt from love's sickness to fly."
Raff. (b). Mädchenlied.
Jensen. (c). Marmelades Luftchen Blüthenwind.
(Songs with piano).
Wagner. Prelude and closing scene from "Tristan und Isolde."

Mr. William J. Winch was the singer.

Nothing could have been more satisfying than the playing of the delightful Mozart symphony; the bright, vigorous accents in the minuet were in themselves strokes of genius. The Lachner suite was equally well given. If any one should steal this suite from the concert repertory, we do not think any detective could get a commission on recovering it again. The work has little to recommend it, save a lukewarm respectability, and the march which closes the long and dreary variations, and the fugue which closes the whole, are the only bright points in it. The manner in which the orchestra played these two numbers was beyond praise. Mr. Gericke gave the most passionate rendering of the "Tristan" prelude that we have yet heard here or elsewhere. His strenuous accelerando in the middle of the movement is immensely effective in itself; only one finds that it rather annuls another effect, which we remember hearing Hans Richter bring out with tremendous emphasis when he conducted "Tristan" in London last year. Mr. Gericke seemed somewhat to miss the threatening terror of the chromatic trombone figure which alternates with the ascending scales of the strings. With Richter, the effect of the trombones in this passage was something awful; neither Mr. Thomas nor Mr. Henschel ever emphasized it as he did. The heavenly finale seems to be a movement about which all conductors agree. The orchestra played both it and the prelude wonderfully well.

Mr. Winch comes back to us from his English triumphs with the beauty of his voice unimpaired. He stands today as he has stood for some years, as one of the few American singers who show an appreciation of what constitutes style in singing. If at times he allow his predilection for delicate effects almost to degenerate into a mannerism, his singing is always musical and effective. He sings as if he really had something to say, and were bent upon saying it. One feels that he has an idea; his merits are not merely negative. What stands in the way of his being a wholly great singer is that his physical command over his voice is not absolute. He cannot implicitly rely upon his technique. The effect he made with the Gounod barcarolle was very fine; and how exquisitely the orchestra accompanied it! In Jensen's song, too, his singing was delightful; but in the Purcell selection his singing seemed a little mannered, and wanting in the directness which characterizes the music.

director's skill and taste; with those who are thoroughly satisfied with the programmes, also, there can be no agreement on our part; nor would any further assertion of our views convince them. We spoke deliberately, after hearing many persons and reading many letters, and we shall adhere to what we have said—not to please some and to combat others, but because we believe in a catholicity which not only reveres the spirit of the past, but is also willing to know and to deal fairly by the spirit of the time.

MR. GERIQUE'S PROGRAMMES.

To the Editors of the Boston Daily Advertiser:—

In a criticism of the symphony concert programmes which appeared in your columns this morning some strictures are passed upon the character of the selections of this season, which, though they undoubtedly contain something of justice, seem to be an over statement of the case and an over statement founded on not altogether unassailable ground.

An absolute numerical statement of how many new, or how many not, German works have been played in a certain number of concerts is misleading. Such figures mean nothing at all unless they be compared with the figures of other first rate concert programmes. To tell a man that a mountain is 15,000 feet high will not give him any adequate idea of the size of the mountain unless he know that other mountains vary from 2000 to 28,000 feet in their height. Your critic informs us that so far we have heard only 11 not-German works; in another place he speaks of our having an orchestra 50 or 25 years behind the times; and still in another he alludes to the programmes in the cities of Europe, implying that their selections are more liberal. To take up this last statement first. Has he compared the recent programmes of the concerts in these cities with our own programmes? In the Richter autumn concert season in London, 1883, the proportion of German works was nearly seven-eighths of the whole. His last concert was as follows:—

Overture, Oberon.....Weber
Violin suite in D.....Bach
Symphony in A.....Beethoven
Vorspiel "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner

In the Paris season of 1882-83, the selections of Mr. Deldevez (of the Conservatoire), and of Messrs. Lamoureux, Colonne and Pasdeloup (of the Château d'Eau, the Châtelet, and the Cirque d'Hiver, respectively), contained the works of no late German composers save Wagner and Liszt, with the two exceptions of the ballet music from Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba," and Raff's 1st Walde symphony; while for the following season Mr. Pasdeloup announced 29 pianoforte concertos of Mozart. The rest of those programmes was composed of Mendelssohn, Schumann, Beethoven, Haydn, Gluck, and so forth, with a sprinkling of modern French works, showing in the choice of these latter—to the absolute exclusion of Brahms, Gade, Volkmann, etc.—a narrowness quite as marked as the narrowness to which your critic complains that we have been subjected. This I say, merely to show that we are no worse off (if this is to be badly off) than are other places. On the other hand, we have already heard three symphonies entirely new to us, and two of them by very modern composers, which saves our concerts somewhat from the crime of being 50 years behind the times.

And now to take up this same crime of which your critic accuses the programmes—although he elsewhere remarks, with more of candor than consistency, that we have heard Wagner, Brahms, Fuchs, Volkmann, Liszt and Rubinstein. It has not yet occurred to the intelligent world to value Homer, Shakspeare, Molière, Goethe, and other intellects of this rank, by their chronological recentness. The educated community of mankind, which alone gives or withholds the seal of greatness, has hitherto been inclined to believe that certain works are not for their time, but for all time. Your critic seems to make an exception to this custom in favor of music, and does not wish to hear any music that has lived more than 25 years. He wants hale and hearty young music, that was not born when our gray headed concert goers were in their teens. An explanation of this remarkable view would be interesting. He would have us give up Thackeray and Shelley in favor of Ouida and Swinburne.

If our orchestra is to be an educator—and it surely should—the question is not then whether people are to hear new things but whether they are to hear good things. We are safe in following the verdict of the European musical world, until we know more than they do, in placing the German school at the head of polyphonic music. For this opinion we have the authority of every city in Europe where there exists a respectable concert season. There is a story of the Greek generals who voted what men of them should receive the first and second prize for military excellence in a certain war. Every general voted for himself as the first candidate and for Themistocles as the second. He therefore received the only election, and that election was unanimous. This may illustrate our position. England, France, Germany and Italy unite in playing the German music of the last 150 years; after this each country shows a weakness for its own composers. More need not be said, except that if it be true that the intelligent and influential ticket holders are vacating their seats because they wish to hear Massenet, Lalo and Saint Saëns in preference to music 50 years old, there is more room for musical education in Boston than has been hitherto supposed.

OWEN WISTER

Boston, Jan. 12, 1885.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Saturday evening's concert, the 13th of the course, contained a relish for widely varying tastes. A symphony by the divinely simple Mozart; songs chosen from Purcell, the father of English melody, and Raff, the sumptuous melodist of the modern German school; an orchestral fancy by another modern (Lachner); a selection from Wagner, the giant and prophet of the present, with a glance at Gounod, the sensuous French writer of much immediate prominence. These constituted a menu so suggestive to the seriously minded, and so interesting withal that the symphony audience rejoiced. This is its formal statement:

Mozart.....Symphony in D major, No. 5. Allegro con spirito.—Andante.—Menuetto.—Presto.
Gounod.....Barcarolle (Poleu'e.)
F. Lachner.....Suite op. 113. Prelude.—Minuet.—Variations and March.—Introduction and Fugue.
Purcell.....(a) "I attempt from Love's Sickness to fly."
Raff.....(b) Mädchenlied.
Jensen.....(c) Mädeln des Lütfchen Blüthenwind. (Songs with Piano.)
Wagner.....Prelude and Closing Scene, from Tristan and Isolde. (Vorspiel und Liebestod.)

Mr. William J. Winch was the soloist. The friendly audience was glad to see him, as was manifested in its hearty applause when he came upon the platform for his first number. Mr. Winch has passed a season in England since he last sung in Boston. He is the same vital singer as before; possessing an exquisite musical sense, a voice into which can come the noble and the gentle as well, an intelligence equal and satisfying under all circumstances, and a hearty frankness of demeanor which makes friends and keeps them. Is it not gratifying for any city to own such a singer? His selections were disappointing, and, all in all, hardly serious enough for the occasion. Delightful in itself, and as beautifully sung as was the barcarolle from Gounod's latest opera, "Poleu'e," this should have given way to something more heroic, towards which the group of three songs would then have stood in more positive and beneficial contrast. The Purcell song, "I attempt from Love's Sickness to fly," is from the ripest period of that earliest of English writers, whose qualities were strong enough to establish themselves, be copied, and gain a following which is in England still loyal and active. Purcell's style seems to anticipate Handel, in its simplicity, exactness of form, and often in some quaint and feeling melody. In the Raff song, the style of the singer was magnificent, and the favorite Jensen lieder was sung with a gracefulness and delicacy of motion that will ever be the envy of all the tenors of the town.

Mr. Winch's mezza voce is even more artistic than formerly. A notably good accompaniment was played by Mr. Mollenhauer to the three songs grouped together. Mr. Winch was thrice heartily recalled after his second appearance. It was such a pleasure to the audience to hear a man sing that it is to be hoped that at least one other male vocalist may be engaged during the season. The orchestra acquitted itself splendidly, and its task was a hard one. Mozart, Lachner, Wagner—and the greatest of these was? The kind of work required of the band in the Symphony and in the Wagner Vorspiel and Liebestod was so divergent, that its success in each selection is of greater moment. The Symphony was faultlessly played; its moods unruffled and guileless as the genius who summoned them were clear from beginning to end. The naïveté of the Andante, the eminently proper and decorous Minuet, the mild vigor of the Presto, bespeak for Mozart a multitude of admirers who seek recreation, pleasure and content in music; but those who stand ready to welcome greater qualities in their composer, who would have music in its highest realm, a companion art to sculpture and painting because of the mind that lies therein, must accept the something in the later school of Wagner as indicative of a stronger, more vigorous and greater type. Of "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner himself says: "I am willing to submit it to the severest tests that result from my theoretic assertions; not because I formed it in accordance with my system—for all theory was completely forgotten by me—but because here at last I moved about with the utmost freedom and the most absolute disregard for every theoretic consideration, in such a manner that in the course of its composition I became aware that I went far beyond my system." It is indeed a prodigious flight towards the future. It is now no longer a question of music in the sense formerly attached to the word, but a perfect welding of poetry in superb form to sonorous utterance. The force of emotional music can go no farther than in "Tristan and Isolde." Mr. Gerিকে's reading of the single selection granted from this work will deservedly rank as a performance with the Overture to "Tannhäuser," but the choice itself is far more lofty. It seems to us the most impressive thing yet accomplished by this orchestra. The Lachner suite is an affair of considerable proportions. Its manner of statement admits of much variety, and some of its episodes are richly ornate. A master of orchestral color, the suite seems to have been first undertaken in a spirit of jest, which is soon lost in the very excellent development and dignity of expression evolved. It was played entire, but its length was a bit against its being so freely welcome, considering all that was to follow, which the audience was eagerly anticipating.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The thirteenth concert, last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Mozart. Symphony in D major, No. 5.
Gounod. Barcarolle from "Poleu'e."
F. Lachner. Suite op. 113.
Purcell. (a). "I attempt from love's sickness to fly."
Raff. (b). Mädchenlied.
Jensen. (c). Mädeln des Lütfchen Blüthenwind. (Songs with piano).
Wagner. Prelude and closing scene from "Tristan und Isolde."

Mr. William J. Winch was the singer.

Nothing could have been more satisfying than the playing of the delightful Mozart symphony; the bright, vigorous accents in the minuet were in themselves strokes of genius. The Lachner suite was equally well given. If any one should steal this suite from the concert repertory, we do not think any detective could get a commission on recovering it again. The work has little to recommend it, save a lukewarm respectability, and the march which closes the long and dreary variations, and the fugue which closes the whole, are the only bright points in it. The manner in which the orchestra played these two numbers was beyond praise. Mr. Gerিকে gave the most passionate rendering of the "Tristan" prelude that we have yet heard here or elsewhere. His strenuous accelerando in the middle of the movement is immensely effective in itself; only one finds that it rather annuls another effect, which we remember hearing Hans Richter bring out with tremendous emphasis when he conducted "Tristan" in London last year. Mr. Gerিকে seemed somewhat to miss the threatening terror of the chromatic trombone figure which alternates with the ascending scales of the strings. With Richter, the effect of the trombones in this passage was something awful; neither Mr. Thomas nor Mr. Henschel ever emphasized it as he did. The heavenly finale seems to be a movement about which all conductors agree. The orchestra played both it and the prelude wonderfully well.

Mr. Winch comes back to us from his English triumphs with the beauty of his voice unimpaired. He stands today as he has stood for some years, as one of the few American singers who show an appreciation of what constitutes style in singing. At times he allow his predilection for delicate effects almost to degenerate into a mannerism. His singing is always musical and effective. He sings as if he really had something to say, and were bent upon saying it. One feels that he has an idea; his merits are not merely negative. What stands in the way of his being a wholly great singer is that his physical command over his voice is not absolute. He cannot implicitly rely upon his technique. The effect he made with the Gounod barcarolle was very fine; and how exquisitely the orchestra accompanied it! In Jensen's song, too, his singing was delightful; but in the Purcell selection his singing seemed a little mannered, and wanting in the directness which characterizes the music.

REVIEW OF RECENT CONCERTS

THERE has been a continued increase of interest in the concerts given by the Mrs. Harold Folsom

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

although the programmes have stayed in the old rut of German music of the Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven epochs. Yet in the last concerts there has been an evident desire to make the selections less one-sided. The orchestra has been brought to a higher plane than ever before, and will now compare favorably with several of the famous bands of Europe. There is a unity of attack, a precision of shading, that one can seldom find in so large a body of musicians. The most important symphonies which have recently been given were the Schumann D minor, Beethoven's fourth, and Mozart's D major, No. 5. All of these were given in a manner that defies criticism. The Schumann work especially was given with the most perfect understanding of its true Innigkeit. This is the symphony which the English critics, led by Chorley, have attacked so savagely. It may be acknowledged that, in this work, Schumann has departed as far from symphonic form as it was safe to go; but he did it with a definite object, and it was his intention to call it, not a symphony, but a Symphonic Fantasia. It might almost represent in its first movement a conflict between passion and reason; while the constant transferring of themes from one movement to another gives the work a unity, which may, in this case, stand in the place of the regular form.

Of the lesser works given at these concerts, the most striking have been Isolde's Liebestod, Goldmark's Sakuntala Overture, and Cherubini's overture to the Water Carrier. In the Wagnerian work, the orchestra reached its highest point of execution. The broad waves of tone in its finale were shaded to perfection, and all the warmth of orchestral color which Wagner could desire was there.

The soloists of the concerts were Miss Rollwagen, Messrs. W. J. Winch and Carl Baermann. The last two made very decided successes. Mr. Winch's voice has broadened greatly during the last year, and yet has not lost any of the sweetness and delicacy which used to be its chief characteristics. Prof. Baermann played the Beethoven piano concerto in E-flat with flawless technique and an artistic understanding of its ensemble effects. Miss Rollwagen seemed somewhat nervous, and made some slips from true intonation, but in her last number—Schubert's "Wohin"—recovered her self-possession sufficiently to give an artistic and expressive rendering.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.35 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

WEBER,

OVERTURE, (Oberon.)

BEETHOVEN,

SEPTETTE for VIOLIN, VIOLA, HORN, CLARINET, BASSOON, VIOLONCELLO, and DOUBLE BASS.
op. 20.
Adagio; Allegro con brio.—Adagio cantabile.—
Scherzo.—Andante con moto alla marcia; Presto.—

MESSRS. LISTEMANN, HEINDL, HACKEBARTH, STRASSER, BERNHARDI, GIESE, GOLDSTEIN.

LISZT,

SYMPHONIC POEM. (Orpheus.)
(First time.)

BRAHMS

SYMPHONY, in D major, No. 2, op. 73.
Allegro non troppo.—Adagio non troppo.—
Allegretto grazioso (Quasi Andantino).—
Allegro con spirito.—

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fourteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Weber. Overture to "Oberon."
Beethoven. Septet for violin, viola, horn, clarinet, bassoon, violoncello and double-bass.
Op. 20 (omitting the minuet and the variations).

Messrs. Listemann, Heindl, Hackebarth, Strasser, Bernhardi, Glese, Goldstein.

Liszt. Symphonic Poem: "Orpheus."

Brahms. Symphony No. 2, in D, op. 73.

I rather a queerly arranged programme, upon the whole! Beethoven's septet, a piece of chamber music sure to lose much of its warmth of coloring and vigor of accent in a large hall, coming immediately after Weber's immensely brilliant "Oberon" overture; then Brahms's very taxing, not to say perplexing, symphony coming at the end of the programme, when the endurance of the audience had been already pretty severely tested, and its receptive power was no longer fresh! Such a programme, so arranged, seems to presuppose an audience with nerves of iron, and a power of endurance more than Teutonic. One asks, for one thing, what the Beethoven Septet has to do with a symphony concert in the Music Hall. It was first announced to be played "by all the strings," and one was glad to find that this violence was not really done it—for it was given in its original shape, albeit curtailed of two movements—but it was none the less an intruder into a concert of a character quite distinct from its own. The introduction of chamber music into a symphony concert is essentially illegitimate, no matter what precedents there may be, and this illegitimate practice is of a sort which brings its own punishment with it. You might just as well ice Burgundy as subject chamber music to the chill of a large concert hall, and that, too, immediately after and contrasted with one of the most brilliant overtures in the whole repertory. Indeed, one can hardly imagine a concert programme which could properly begin with the "Oberon" overture; such a dazzling and sparkling piece of sheer brilliancy tends to kill almost anything that comes after it. When Mendelssohn once conducted a symphony by Schumann immediately after the overture to "William Tell," at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig, it took all Mendelssohn's reputation for unimpeachable honesty and devotion to save him from the suspicion of intentionally playing a shabby trick upon his friend. Then, if it be hard to conceive of a concert which the "Oberon" overture could fitly open, what imagination can picture to itself a programme at the end of which the Brahms D. major symphony would come as a welcome guest? We, personally, are wholly unfit to pass judgment upon this symphony, for, of all Brahms's larger works that have been given here, it is the one with which we are least familiar; in Germany it is considered, we believe, the most popular of Brahms's symphonies, but its most ardent admirers must own that it needs study to be appreciated. Admitting, for the nonce, that it is a stupendous work, fully worthy of the finest things that have been said about it, one would, at least, be fresh and untired when one listens to it. The climax theory of concert programmes, which would have the greatest and grandest things come last, as a worthy crown to the ideal edifice, is fascinating enough on paper, but there is an immense practical objection to it. In music, the greatest works are almost of necessity those which must tax the attention, and which make the heaviest demands upon the vital power of both listener and performer. In concerts arranged on the climax principle, this vital power goes on decreasing just in the ratio in which the demands made upon it increase. Take last Saturday's concert as an example. When the audience was in all its first freshness, it was given the "Oberon" overture, which Hercules might have enjoyed after performing any one of his twelve labors; and when the same audience was just beginning to feel tired, it was invited to summon up what was left of its strength to crack such a prodigiously hard nut as the Brahms symphony. This is simply unreasonable. Then take Liszt's "Orpheus," the most delicate, dreamy and ethereal of all his symphonic poems; it came immediately after the faint twittering of the Beethoven Septet (heard though the wrong end of the opera glass, so to speak), just at the moment when we felt like offering something handsome for a good, solid blast from all the trumpets and trombones in town, with a crash on the big drum and cymbals by way of extra pepper. One received those opening dreamy horn notes and gauzy harp arpeggi with very much the same enthusiasm which Mr. Eccles, senior, exhibited when he found the famous jug of milk in the cupboard. Upon the whole, as the programme stood, we think it would not have been a half bad idea to have played it through backwards. Let us, for once, say nothing about the performance; it was probably very fine, as usual, but our ears were warped.

The next programme is—

Mendelssohn. Overture to "Son and Stranger."

Henselt. Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, op. 16.

Weber. Invitation to the Dance.

Goldmark. Rustic Wedding, op. 26.

Wedding March, (Variations.)

Bridal Song, (Intermezzo.)

Serenade, (Scherzo.)

In the Garden, (Andante.)

Dance, (Finale.)

Miss Fannie Bloomfield will be the pianist.

Boston Symphony Concert. Saville

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The performances opened with a spirited and brilliant reading and rendering of Weber's "Oberon" overture. It was followed by Beethoven's Septette, given as it was written, and not with the whole string orchestra. The work, though carefully played, was not heard to as good advantage as it would have been in a smaller hall. Liszt's "Orpheus" followed. It was admirably performed, but its intention was not made apparent. In fact, to us it seemed almost exasperatingly dull and meaningless. Brahms's Symphony in D, No. 2, ended the concert. The interpretation accorded it by Mr. Gerleke was clearer and more definite than any we have previously had, but the work did not impress us any more favorably, despite the beauty of its instrumentation, its marvellously fine harmonic developments and its admirable form. The music seemed a dry, as labored, and as free from what is generally understood as inspiration as ever. The programme for the next concert is Overture "Son and Stranger," Mendelssohn; Concerto for piano-forte in F minor, Henselt; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," op. 26. The soloist is to be Miss Fannie Bloomfield, who will perform the concerto.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday afforded the following programme:

Overture, (Oberon).....	Weber
Septette, { for violin, viola, horn, clarinet, bassoon, { violinello, and double bass. op. 20. }	Beethoven
Adagio; Allegro con brio.—Adagio cantabile— Scherzo.—Andante con moto alla marcia; Presto—Messrs. Listemann, Heindl, Hackebarth, Strasser, Bernhardt, Giese, Goldstein.
Symphonic Poem, (Orpheus.) (First time).....	Liszt
Symphony, in D major, No. 2, op. 73.....	Brahms
Allegro non troppo—Adagio non troppo— Allegretto grazioso (Quasi Andantino)— Allegro con spirito.—

It will be seen from this list that Mr. Gericke is beginning to open the door to modern works, and that he is beginning to make his concerts less one sided. In a conversation with the writer of this article, he expressed his willingness to give numerous modern works after he had brought his orchestra thoroughly forward in the matter of technic. He is a very cautious as well as talented musician, I find, and will not rush at new works as fearlessly as Mr. Henschel did. He has spoken to one of our native composers regarding the production of one of his works, and it is quite possible that the homeless American muse will soon find shelter in Boston.

I am glad that Mr. Gericke changed his mind about giving the Beethoven Septette with all the strings of the orchestra. It is, perhaps, as well not to tamper with Beethoven's scores, although one must confess that the bit of chamber music sounded thin in Music Hall, especially when compared with the richly scored works by which it was surrounded. The overture went finely, except that the horns broke once or twice. Poor brass martyrs; the evening had a good many more horns than a dilemma, and in each piece they were taxed to the utmost. The finale of the overture went especially well, and was probably the most appreciated part of the varied, but abstruse programme.

The Liszt symphonic poem was heard here for the first time. I cannot judge of it on a first hearing, and (a la Rossini) I do not want to give it a second.

It seems to me extremely ecstatic, and not at all melodic. It is a marvel of tone-color, but not of idea. I should have preferred the "Tasso" or "Mazeppa," or the first two movements of the "Faust" symphony by this composer.

The Brahms' symphony received the best performance it has yet had in Boston, and its reading was one which made many of the rough places smooth, and the complex passages clear. There is no need of mentioning the beauties of its performance, or of the work in detail, for it is familiar to New York and Brooklyn concert-goers, and has been described frequently before in the columns of THE KEYNOTE. In the next concert, Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding" symphony will be given, and a general lightening of the programme take place. The attendance continues large, and the concerts have thus far been very successful.

L. C. E.

July 15/85 MUSIC. Connoisseur

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

We are glad to note that the programmes given by Mr. Gericke and his orchestra, are gradually becoming more varied, and that the modern school, formerly only conspicuous by its absence, is gradually being represented in the numbers given. The conductor has also assured us that he is making efforts to give a hearing to some American works, and that as soon as his labors upon the perfection of the technique of the orchestra are completed, there will be many modern additions to the repertoire, but at the same time he repudiates the idea of giving merely "novelty concerts." In this respect he is dealing with Boston exactly as he has dealt with Vienna, where he trained his public to appreciate the old music, even while listening to the new. As we were the earliest to point out the deficiencies of the programmes, we feel called upon also to be the earliest to give the explanation and to allude to the already improved character of the repertoire. In the matter of technique every one must accord to Mr. Gericke unlimited praise; he has brought the orchestra to a point of excellence beyond that of any previous organization which Boston has possessed, and has given us an ensemble equalled only by that of Thomas' orchestra in its best days.

The great number of the programme of last night was the second Brahms Symphony. While we do not say that the reading was intrinsically different from that previously given in Boston concerts, we can emphatically state that the performance was vastly superior to any yet heard in this city. As to the work itself we hold it to be an unequal one, and repeated hearing only confirms this impression. The first two movements had something of the feu sacré, but the last two exhibit that deliberation of treatment which causes Brahms to appear frigid to many hearers. In the Haydn and Mozart symphonies melody is often more in the foreground than development, but that pendulum has swung too far back in modern music, and in the mania for development, "working out," and thematic treatment, our composers seem to out-Wagner Wagner, and discard pure melodies altogether. Formerly music was too entirely emotional; today it stands in danger of becoming too entirely intellectual. Beethoven's great position in symphonic writing lay chiefly in the fact that he so perfectly combined the two. Yet there is much of Beethoven's mode of treatment in Brahms' second symphony, and the work has moments of beautiful melody. In the allegretto, for example, there is, at the return of the principal subject, a dallying with keys which reminds entirely of Beethoven, who frequently in his symphonies would establish a figure before definitely establishing a key. There is also a resemblance to Beethoven in the masterly manner in which, in the first movement, the themes are re-introduced at the close of the development, and also in the alterations made in the themes themselves on their re-appearance, a device almost never found in Mozart and constantly found in Beethoven. The unity of the allegretto, which leads a theme and its derivations through both the body of the movement and the trio, is, however, rather in the vein of Schumann than of any other composer.

The first movement at once showed that the work had been studied to some purpose for it had the swing and elan which only springs from absolute confidence. The horns were occasionally insecure; this was excusable, however, for the entire concert had borne heavily upon them; there had been as many horn passages as if it had been a bull fight. "Oberon," "Orpheus," the Septette, all had conspired to exhaust these unfortunates, and on this occasion we are forced to accept quantity in place of quality as regards them. In the Adagio the ensemble was excellent, and the pastoral theme of the wood-wind which began the Allegretto was perfect as also the joyous, bold rejoinder of the strings, like a ringing carillon. The working up of the last movement was given with appropriate grandeur, but at the close the fatigue of the musicians found vent occasionally in a tardy attack. The Liszt number, "Orpheus," was heard here for the first time, and we do not greatly care if it be the last as well. It contains too much ecstasy and too little music; it seems all color and no tune. Liszt's "Mazeppa" would have been much more inspiring.

The Beethoven Septette was put in the programme in lieu of a solo. We are glad that the original intention of giving this as a full orchestral work was abandoned. It is as well to have Beethoven's scores as he gave them to the world. Nevertheless a bit of chamber music sounded thin among the fully scored numbers, although it was performed by Messrs. Listemann, Heindl, Hackebarth, Strasser, Bernhardt, Giese, and Goldstein. The horn did well in its difficult work in the Scherzo and made amends for the break made in the Oberon overture. The last named piece was finally played as a whole, and its pleasing finale went with commendable unity and was perhaps the most generally appreciated portion of the programme. Next week comes the charming "Rustic Wedding" Symphony by Goldmark, and also another novelty in the shape of a new pionist, Miss Bloomfield.

* * * At a recent symphony concert. Young Listener, to her escort—"What does 'Liebestod' mean?" Escort, an enthusiastic Wagnerite—"It means 'love death.' Isn't it beeyoutiful?" Young Listener—"Beautiful? It's awful! If Wagner ever felt a love which died as disagreeably as that, and was so long and tiresome about it, I really feel sorry for him. It's more like a baby with cramps." Enthusiast does not deign to reply.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The fourteenth of the season's Boston Symphony Concerts was given Saturday evening, when this programme was performed: Weber, Overture (Oberon.) Beethoven, Septette for violin, viola, horn, clarinet, bassoon, violoncello, and double bass. Op. 20. Adagio: Allegro con brio.—Adagio cantabile.—Scherzo.—Andante con moto alla marcia; Presto. Liszt, Symphonic Poem. (Orpheus.) (First time.) Brahms, Symphony in D major, No. 2, op. 73. Allegro non troppo.—Adagio non troppo.—Allegretto grazioso (Quasi Andantino).—Allegro con spirito.

Instead of one soloist, there were seven; for Messrs. B. Listemann, Heindl, Hackebarth, Strasser, Bernhardt, Giese and Goldstein played the septette. A legitimate effect was thus obtained, and Mr. Gericke avoided another "arrangement" in not doubling some of the string parts, as was threatened; but the selection is no more justifiable, played in the large Music Hall. Why invade again the field of chamber music for a concert divertissement? The German school cannot be expected to furnish enough legitimate orchestral variety for a 24-programmed season. Why not give a Frenchman or an Englishman or an American a chance? Can it be that our new conductor is a small-grooved, minor man in his recognition of the composers of the present, or of the not too remote past, who were not born tributary to the Rhine? We have progressed thus far with Mr. Gericke to find him an ably-equipped, talented, brilliant and thorough conductor, and as an interpreter of the writers whom he has studied, a gratifying success; but his orchestra have barely touched upon anything outside standard German classics. This is not fair; there are many other things our people want to hear, and they do rightly expect them from this organization whose watchword from its inception has been "Progress." An earnest, critical and sincere summons on Mr. Gericke for a larger catholicity of selection, recently made by a local contemporary of the Traveller, should be heeded. The performance of the septette—and we do not say "under these circumstances"—was sadly negative. The place had much to do with this result; but the faulty ensemble, the frequent listless ness, and questionable intonation of the group cannot all be excused under this head. It seemed a most unfortunate thing, and to conjure up a reason for choosing it is to defend an exhibition of poor taste. To come to pleasanter things: the orchestral performances of the evening were all excellent. The Oberon overture was notably well done; in the wood-winds there was single and concerted action of especial delicacy. The only novelty of the programme was Liszt's Orpheus. It is decidedly less theatrial, more consistent and better told than any of its companions from the same pen. A unison note among the woods, breathed upon by the harp's soft appoggios, ushers in the prologue. The imagination is quickened and the story is made real at each new orchestral episode. The single climax of the work is arrived at with a quite normal emphasis and by diversions of varied beauty. The violin (solo) tells of the wearied Orpheus journeying; while a restless, almost uncouth figure in the double bass may indicate the passing judgment of some indignant populace upon the guileless player of the lute. A clear, telling theme for the brass, with a strong subsidiary movement amongst the whole band, is the natural outcome of a mission performed, or a journey ended. A fugal return to orchestral quiet precludes the end. The Brahms symphony in D, No. 2, were it not for the mightiness of its closing Allegro con spirito, might be called his pastoral. It has not been heard here since Mr. Henschel's second season with this orchestra. The audience did not show an especially good temper towards its performance, for many left the hall after the first and after the second movements. The symphonies of Brahms represent his culminated thought; for, as a writer for the voice, for the pianoforte and for the string quartet he had achieved renown before even his first symphony—the one in C minor—had been written. As that is the most strongly abstract and scientific of the three, so the latest—in F major—is the most comprehensible, most freely melodic and most interesting. But the D major symphony is by no means a relentless creation of cold genius; there is a vein of warmth in the Allegretto grazioso which is the more enhanced because from so erudite and distinguished a pen. Though the grand band of a master works in fashions subtle and oft-times too intellectual in its first and in its closing movements, yet the greatness of mind is so apparent (and is it not welcome, too, to all musical learners who would go forward always?) that this work and its fellows—an earlier and a later opus—must necessarily offer the worthiest possible lesson. At the next concert Miss Fannie Bloomfield will play Henselt's concerto for pianoforte in F minor, and Mr. Gericke further establishes German art—which is always noble—by proposing Mendelssohn's overture to "Son and Stranger;" Weber's "Invitation to the Dance;" Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding."

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The late Mr. Levi Thaxter won deserved repute for accomplishing with the poetry of Robert Browning what a vast majority of plain people,—I bookish folk, at that,—would have thought impossible. Reading that poetry aloud, he made it almost all intelligible to his audience. What Mr. Thaxter was to Browning, Mr. Gericke is—and more—to Brahms. The two authors have much in common, in spite of their different vehicles of expression. Each has great, clear, new and valuable thoughts, each has control of various and potent means of utterance, and each is at times so direct and effective that the wonder is how he can content himself ever to be else or less than that. But each loves periphrasis, digression, parenthesis within parenthesis, and sudden interruptions of the half-finished phrase by intercalations which to the reader are but foreign, forced and misleading, although some subtle connection of thought in the writer's mind may have made their intrusion appear to him most relevant. Some considerable part of Browning's work will always be to any but delving students of his mental equipment and processes, bewildering, confused, pedantic, affected and wearisome; and it seems probable that parts of almost everything which Brahms has hitherto written must always be to the general body of good musical listeners and lovers, far-fetched, perplexing, unmeaning and fatiguing. It is difficult to imagine that even Brahms himself, with a band of his own choosing, could give a better interpretation of his see-symphony than did Mr. Gericke and his orchestra at the concert of Saturday evening last; yet on that occasion (as also at the Friday afternoon rehearsal) great numbers of people left the hall after the second movement, thereby losing the best, sweetest and most lucid part of all the work; while, that not merely popular taste was not pleased and popular understanding not reached, was proved by the confession of a professional musician—a person of authoritative opinion and almost an extremist in his admiration for Brahms—that he had been very often unable to find the thread of the thought.

Either the programme of last week misrepresented Mr. Gericke's intentions, or—what seems more likely—he wisely, upon reflection, altered his plans in regard to the Beethoven septette, opus 20, for it was performed in its proper form and proportion by Messrs. Listemann, Heindl, Hackebarth, Strasser, Bernhardt, Giese and Goldstein, respectively, playing the violin, viola, horn, clarinet, bassoon, 'cello and double bass. Of the six movements, two—the minuet and the air with variations—were omitted, and the others were played exceedingly well. Something of of even so large and full a piece of chamber music must be lost in a great hall; but the balance of the parts was so good, the basses not dominating even in their vigorous passages in the march movement, and the wind instruments sustaining so smoothly, that the performance gave more pleasure than could have been anticipated, and the adagio cantabile found especial favor with the audience.

The concert began with a masterly performance of Weber's "Oberon" overture, and its only number not yet mentioned was Liszt's "Orpheus," a work now given for the first time in these concerts,—although we believe it has been played before in Boston in one of Mr. Thomas's,—and which bears the rather too pretentious title of a symphonic poem, when its single movement might better be classed with romances or fantasias. The playing of it was beautiful, and as the pleasant, plaintive, and at last almost pleading melodies passed from one instrument to another, there was feeling as well as grace in the several obbligati. The programme of the previous week omitted the text of Mr. Winch's songs, and that of this concert, with graver neglect, failed to include with its nomination of this piece the explanatory paragraph which Liszt considered essential to a proper understanding of his score. There is too wide a scope for the imagination when only so vague a hint as "Orpheus" is given; author and audience should both have the advantage to be derived from common understanding of what episode came in the fabled musician's life is meant, and therefore such an oversight is not easily excusable.

At the next concert a Chicago pianist of excellent local repute, Miss Fannie Bloomfield, will make her first appearance, courageously choosing Henselt's tremendously difficult concerto in F minor. The overture will be Mendelssohn's "Son and Stranger," the place of a symphony will be taken by Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," and the programme will be completed by the "Invitation to the Dance," to be played, of course, according to Berlioz, although the advance announcements attribute it at once (as if it were the pianoforte original) to Weber.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

The programme given at the fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, at Music Hall on Saturday night was:

Overture (Oberon).....Weber
Septette for violin, viola, horn, clarinet, bassoon, violoncello and double bass (op. 20).....Beethoven
Symphonic Poem (Orpheus).....Liszt
Symphony in D major, No. 2 (op. 73).....Brahms

Both in itself and in the admirable rendering of it this programme enlisted the evident interest of the audience, and the attention with which the performance of each number and movement was followed was as marked as the heartiness of the applause which followed it. The Oberon overture was a thoroughly acceptable opening and was given with graceful effect, the delicacy of the opening measures finding full expression and the poetical spirit of the entire work being interpreted with exquisite taste. Messrs. Listemann, Heindl, Hackebarth, Strasser, Bernhardt, Giese and Goldstein were the artists selected for the performance of Beethoven's Septette, and the selection could scarcely have been better. Under Mr. Listemann's lead the several movements were given in a manner which did not appear to offer any occasion for criticism, the second movement, adagio cantabile, being especially good, not only in ensemble, but in the perfect expression and finish of the solos occurring in it. The scherzo was given with much spirit, and the final movement was in character with the rest of the performance. Liszt's Symphonic Poem was marked in the programme as given for the first time. It is a very dramatic composition, and possessed throughout a character to command the most interested attention. With an impressive opening, it develops in descriptive power throughout, recalling vividly the story of the bard of Thrace. It was heard to the best advantage, Mr. Gericke having his forces completely at command, and giving to the work, which is thoroughly grand in its orchestration, a majestic interpretation. The Brahms Symphony was also finely given. The allegro with which it opens though rather long, was relieved of tediousness by the smooth and graceful way in which it was given, and the third movement, allegretto grazioso, was one of the most pleasing performances of the evening.

The Symphony Concert Last Evening.

The lack of a soloist at the symphony concert last evening did not decrease in any perceptible degree the enjoyment of the large audience. The programme contained much fine music, but as it worked up in a graduated scale, from a Weber overture to a Brahms symphony, its arrangement cannot be said to have been particularly happy. The strings did very excellent work in the Beethoven septet, as, of course, everybody knew they would, and no fault could be found with the conduct or execution of any of the several numbers. The programme for next week is announced as follows:

Overture (Son and Stranger).....Mendelssohn
Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, op. 16.....Henselt
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber
Rustic Wedding, op. 26.....Goldmark
Soloist, Miss Fannie Bloomfield. Globe

SOLOIST:

MISS AGNES HUNTINGTON.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The fourteenth of the season's Boston Symphony Concerts was given Saturday evening, when this programme was performed: Weber, Overture (Oberon). Beethoven, Septette for violin, viola, horn, clarinet, bassoon, violoncello, and double bass. Op. 20. Adagio: Allegro con brio.—Adagio cantabile.—Scherzo.—Andante con moto alla marcia; Presto. Liszt, Symphonic Poem. (Orpheus.) (First time.) Brahms, Symphony in D major, No. 2, op. 73. Allegro non troppo.—Adagio non troppo.—Allegretto grazioso (Quasi Andantino).—Allegro con spirito.

Instead of one soloist, there were seven; for Messrs. B. Listemann, Heindl, Hackebarth, Strasser, Bernhardt, Giese and Goldstein played the septette. A legitimate effect was thus obtained, and Mr. Gericke avoided another "arrangement" in not doubling some of the string parts, as was threatened; but the selection is no more justifiable, played in the large Music Hall. Why invade again the field of chamber music for a concert divertissement? The German school cannot be expected to furnish enough legitimate orchestral variety for a 24-programmed season. Why not give a Frenchman or an Englishman or an American a chance? Can it be that our new conductor is a small-grooved, minor man in his recognition of the composers of the present, or of the not too remote past, who were not born tributary to the Rhine? We have progressed thus far with Mr. Gericke to find him an ably-equipped, talented, brilliant and thorough conductor, and as an interpreter of the writers whom he has studied, a gratifying success; but his orchestra have barely touched upon anything outside standard German classics. This is not fair; there are many other things our people want to hear, and they do rightly expect them from this organization whose watchword from its inception has been "Progress." An earnest, critical and sincere summons on Mr. Gericke for a larger catholicity of selection, recently made by a local contemporary of the Traveller, should be heeded. The performance of the septette—and we do not say "under these circumstances"—was sadly negative. The place had much to do with this result; but the faulty ensemble, the frequent listlessness, and questionable intonation of the group cannot all be excused under this head. It seemed a most unfortunate thing, and to conjure up a reason for choosing it is to defend an exhibition of poor taste. To come to pleasanter things: the orchestral performances of the evening were all excellent. The Oberon overture was notably well done; in the wood-winds there was single and concerted action of especial delicacy. The only novelty of the programme was Liszt's Orpheus. It is decidedly less theatric, more consistent and better told than any of its companions from the same pen. A unison note among the woods, breathed upon by the harp's soft appoggiato, ushers in the prologue. The imagination is quickened and the story is made real at each new orchestral episode. The single climax of the work is arrived at with a quite normal emphasis and by diversions of varied beauty. The violin (solo) tells of the wearied Orpheus journeying; while a restless, almost uncouth figure in the double bass may indicate the passing judgment of some indignant populace upon the guileless player of the lute. A clear, telling theme for the brass, with a strong subsidiary movement amongst the whole band, is the natural outcome of a mission performed, or a journey ended. A fugal return to orchestral quiet precludes the end. The Brahms symphony in D, No. 2, were it not for the mightiness of its closing Allegro con spirito, might be called his pastoral. It has not been heard here since Mr. Henschel's second season with this orchestra. The audience did not show an especially good temper towards its performance, for many left the hall after the first and after the second movements. The symphonies of Brahms represent his culminated thought; for, as a writer for the voice, for the pianoforte and for the string quartet he had achieved renown before even his first symphony—the one in C minor—had been written. As that is the most strongly abstract and scientific of the three, so the latest—in F major—is the most comprehensible, most freely melodic and most interesting. But the D major symphony is by no means a relentless creation of cold genius; there is a vein of warmth in the Allegretto grazioso which is the more enhanced because from so erudite and distinguished a pen. Though the grand hand of a master works in fashions subtle and oftentimes too intellectual in its first and in its closing movements, yet the greatness of mind is so apparent (and is it not welcome, too, to all musical learners who would go forward always?) that this work and its fellows—an earlier and a later opus—must necessarily offer the worthiest possible lesson. At the next concert Miss Fannie Bloomfield will play Hensel's concerto for pianoforte in F minor, and Mr. Gericke further establishes German art—which is always noble—by proposing Mendelssohn's overture to "Son and Stranger;" Weber's "Invitation to the Dance;" Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding."

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The late Mr. Levi Thaxter won deserved repute for accomplishing with the poetry of Robert Browning what a vast majority of plain people, and bookish folk, at that,—would have thought impossible. Reading that poetry aloud, he made it almost all intelligible to his audience. What Mr. Thaxter was to Browning, Mr. Gericke is—and more—to Brahms. The two authors have much in common, in spite of their different vehicles of expression. Each has great, clear, new and valuable thoughts, each has control of various and potent means of utterance, and each is at times so direct and effective that the wonder is how he can content himself ever to be else or less than that. But each loves periphrasis, digression, parenthesis within parenthesis, and sudden interruptions of the half-finished phrase by intercalations which to the reader are but foreign, forced and misleading, although some subtle connection of thought in the writer's mind may have made their intrusion appear to him most relevant. Some considerable part of Browning's work will always be to any but delving students of his mental equipment and processes, bewildering, confused, pedantic, affected and wearisome; and it seems probable that parts of almost everything which Brahms has hitherto written must always be to the general body of good musical listeners and lovers, far-fetched, perplexing, unmeaning and fatiguing. It is difficult to imagine that even Brahms himself, with a hand of his own choosing, could give a better interpretation of his see-symphony than did Mr. Gericke and his orchestra at the concert of Saturday evening last; yon that occasion (as also at the Friday afternoon rehearsal) great numbers of people left the hall after the second movement, thereby losing the best, sweetest and most lucid part of all the work; while, that not merely popular taste was not pleased and popular understanding not reached, was proved by the confession of a professional musician—a person of authoritative opinion and almost an extremist in his admiration for Brahms—that he had been very often unable to find the thread of the thought.

Either the programme of last week misrepresented Mr. Gericke's intentions, or—what seems more likely—he wisely, upon reflection, altered his plans in regard to the Beethoven septette, opus 20, for it was performed in its proper form and proportion by Messrs. Listemann, Heindl, Hackebarth, Strasser, Bernhardt, Giese and Goldstein, respectively, playing the violin, viola, horn, clarinet, bassoon, cello and double bass. Of the six movements, two—the minuet and the air with variations—were omitted, and the others were played exceedingly well. Something of of even so large and full a piece of chamber music must be lost in a great hall; but the balance of the parts was so good, the basses not dominating even in their vigorous passages in the march movement, and the wind instruments sustaining so smoothly, that the performance gave more pleasure than could have been anticipated, and the adagio cantabile found especial favor with the audience.

The concert began with a masterly performance of Weber's "Oberon" overture, and its only number not yet mentioned was Liszt's "Orpheus," a work now given for the first time in these concerts,—although we believe it has been played before in Boston in one of Mr. Thomas's,—and which bears the rather too pretentious title of a symphonic poem, when its single movement might better be classed with romances or fantasias. The playing of it was beautiful, and as the pleasant, plaintive, and at last almost pleading melodies passed from one instrument to another, there was feeling as well as grace in the several obbligati. The programme of the previous week omitted the text of Mr. Winch's songs, and that of this concert, with graver neglect, failed to include with its nomination of this piece the explanatory paragraph which Liszt considered essential to a proper understanding of his score. There is too wide a scope for the imagination when only so vague a hint as "Orpheus" is given; author and audience should both have the advantage to be derived from a common understanding of what episode in the fabled musician's life is meant, and therefore such an oversight is not easily excusable.

At the next concert a Chicago pianist of excellent local repute, Miss Fannie Bloomfield, will make her first appearance, courageously choosing Hensel's tremendously difficult concerto in F minor. The overture will be Mendelssohn's "Son and Stranger," the place of a symphony will be taken by Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," and the programme will be completed by the "Invitation to the Dance," to be played, of course, according to Berlioz, although the advantage announcements attribute it at once (as if it were the pianoforte original) to Weber.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

The programme given at the fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, at Music Hall on Saturday night was:

Overture (Oberon).....Weber
Septette for violin, viola, horn, clarinet, bassoon, violoncello and double bass (op. 20)....Beethoven
Symphonic Poem (Orpheus).....Liszt
Symphony in D major, No. 2 (op. 73).....Brahms

Both in itself and in the admirable rendering of it this programme enlisted the evident interest of the audience, and the attention with which the performance of each number and movement was followed was as marked as the heartiness of the applause which followed it. The Oberon overture was a thoroughly acceptable opening and was given with graceful effect, the delicacy of the opening measures finding full expression and the poetical spirit of the entire work being interpreted with exquisite taste. Messrs. Listemann, Heindl, Hackebarth, Strasser, Bernhardt, Giese and Goldstein were the artists selected for the performance of Beethoven's Septette, and the selection could scarcely have been better. Under Mr. Listemann's lead the several movements were given in a manner which did not appear to offer any occasion for criticism, the second movement, adagio cantabile, being especially good, not only in ensemble, but in the perfect expression and finish of the solos occurring in it. The scherzo was given with much spirit, and the final movement was in character with the rest of the performance. Liszt's Symphonic Poem was marked in the programme as given for the first time. It is a very dramatic composition, and possessed throughout a character to command the most interested attention. With an impressive opening, it develops in descriptive power throughout, recalling vividly the story of the bard of Thrace. It was heard to the best advantage, Mr. Gericke having his forces completely at command, and giving to the work, which is thoroughly grand in its orchestration, a majestic interpretation. The Brahms Symphony was also finely given. The allegro with which it opens though rather long, was relieved of tediousness by the smooth and graceful way in which it was given, and the third movement, allegretto grazioso, was one of the most pleasing performances of the evening.

The Symphony Concert Last Evening.

The lack of a soloist at the symphony concert last evening did not decrease in any perceptible degree the enjoyment of the large audience. The programme contained much fine music, but as it worked up in a graduated scale, from a Weber overture to a Brahms symphony, its arrangement cannot be said to have been particularly happy. The strings did very excellent work in the Beethoven septet, as, of course, everybody knew they would, and no fault could be found with the conduct or execution of any of the several numbers. The programme for next week is announced as follows:

Overture (Son and Stranger).....Mendelssohn
Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, op. 16....Hensel
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber
Rustic Wedding, op. 26.....Goldmark
Soloist, Miss Fannie Bloomfield.

SOLOIST:

MISS AGNES HUNTINGTON.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Fourteenth Programme of the Present Season.

The symphony concert at Music Hall last evening was given without the aid of any solo talent, the programme being as follows:

Overture, "Oberon".....Wagner
Septet for violin, viola, horn, clarinet, bassoon, violoncello and double bass, op. 20...Beethoven
Symphonic poem, "Orpheus".....Liszt
Symphony, in D major, No. 2, op. 73.....Brahms

There is much difficulty in appreciating the musical taste which leads to a desire to hear Brahms' symphony, like the op. 73, a second time. There is so little in the work that displays the genius of a composer and so much that indicates the hand of the trained musician, only that it gives but a small return for the time demanded in its study and the annoyance consequent upon listening to its several movements. When this work was first performed two seasons ago, the audiences at its public rehearsal and following concert presentation sat as if spellbound, and applauded each movement with commendable impartiality. On Friday afternoon, there was a general uprising and leavetaking on the part of the audience after each of the first two movements, and last evening a similar disposition was shown to take the symphony on trust. This is an encouraging sign. Possibly in another season the small claim of this composer to his present prominent position will be more generally acknowledged. It is but justice to say that Herr Gericke gave an admirable presentation of the symphony, and that the remarkable working out of the last movement was played in such a masterly fashion as to demand applause for the musicians. The Beethoven septet, played by Messrs. Listemann, Heindl, Hackebarth, Strasser, Bernhardi, Giese and Goldstein, proved a delightful number, the several players being so well chosen that the ensemble was well nigh perfect. There was an evident lack of appreciation of the first movement by the audience, but the merits of the work done were so apparent, subsequently, that the musicians were generously rewarded at the end of the composition, and the commendation was most worthily bestowed. The symphonic poem "Orpheus" was heard for the first time here, and proved to be one of the most enjoyable of this class of Liszt's compositions, and as the presentation of the selection was in exact accord with its poetic character the number added much to the pleasures of the evening, which, however, had as their chief feature the thoroughly charming performance of the "Oberon" overture.

Miss Fannie Bloomfield

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.30 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE FOURTH MOVEMENT OF THE LAST NUMBER.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 24TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MENDELSSOHN,	OVERTURE, (Son and Stranger.)
HENSELT,	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in F minor, op. 16. Allegro.—Larghetto.—Allegro vivace.—
WEBER,	INVITATION TO THE DANCE.
GOLDMARK,	RUSTIC WEDDING, op. 26. WEDDING MARCH, (Variations.) BRIDAL SONG, (Intermezzo.) SERENADE, (Scherzo.) IN THE GARDEN, (Andante.) DANCE, (Finale.)

SOLOIST:

MISS FANNIE BLOOMFIELD.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Overture, "Son and Stranger," by Mendelssohn, is a pleasing piece of orchestral writing, which was played by Mr. Gericke's orchestra in a very fine manner at the fifteenth concert. It elicited much deserved applause. Concerto, F minor, by Adolph Henselt, for piano and orchestra, was the second piece on the programme. Fanny Bloomfield, of Chicago, was the young lady who essayed the pianoforte part of this extremely difficult composition. The concerto is full of melodious phrases, which cannot be said of every technically difficult piece. To play this concerto in such a way, then, as to make it successful or a perfect whole, requires great technical skill, combined with power of much endurance, beside a fine degree of intelligence and musical feeling. To say Miss Bloomfield possessed all these requisites would be awarding her merits not belonging to her. It is apparent she has studied long, faithfully, and well, the technical difficulties of Henselt's concerto, and, so far as these are concerned, is entitled to great praise, though in these she is by no means perfect. For so young and fragile-looking a lady, she displayed a wonderfully hard, wiry, unmusical touch. This can only be accounted for through a bad method of instruction, which was made evident by her general stiffness at the piano. These defects can be easily remedied by careful attention to practice in flexibility of wrist movement, when she may hope to rank very high as a pianist. The ever-beautiful "Invitation to the Dance," by Weber, as performed by the orchestra, did not possess that easy musical swing which naturally belongs to it. Somehow Mr. Gericke failed to catch the spirit of this exquisite gem in both the introduction and in the hard, stiff accompaniment to the charming melody. The "Tone-picture" of Goldmark proved highly musical throughout. This concert, all in all, proved one of the most interesting of the present season, inasmuch as the pleasing modern writers were alone represented. The audience seemed highly delighted. Folio

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The audience at the symphony concert of last Saturday evening was (so far, at least, as the floor of the house is concerned) an unusually small one, which is a pity, for the concert was all very enjoyable, and had one number of particular interest—the Henselt pianoforte concerto in F minor, opus 16, as played by Miss Fannie Bloomfield of Chicago. This concerto is anything but deep or touching; its demands are upon the intellectual, not the emotional, nature of the player, and even its larghetto does not pass beyond a petty sentimentalism; it is the writing of one virtuoso for other virtuosos, and its three movements might almost be looked upon as gigantic études. It contains within its scope technical difficulties and displays of all sorts, from the calm, sustained, orderly cantabile, to rushing octaves, massive chords, flying leaps from point to point of the keyboard, fluent scales, rough syncopations and dancing arpeggios. The mere execution of the notes in measure and time, without much thought of shapely phrasing, is a task from which any but bold and well-equipped players must shrink, and to carry it through without faltering or blundering is a triumph of technique. So much, certainly, Miss Bloomfield accomplished; she was "armed at all points exactly" to meet the test, and finger, wrist and arm were adequate to a clear, strong execution of the music. We do not remember any woman whom we have heard of late who drew so strong and full a tone without harshness or extravagance; who, at the same time, could be so light, delicate and definite. She played with great correctness and with a determination which sometimes made her reading—not her tone—too heavy or too hot, and, as is frequently the case even with elder players, apparently forgot now and then that the piano was for the time the secondary instrument, and played her arpeggio accompaniment as though it were the chief theme; this fault was principally noticeable in the opening allegro, and the solo bits in the larghetto were properly seconded. And if Miss Bloomfield was occasionally over load on her support, the orchestra were sometimes over soft in theirs, and were scarcely audible on the pianists' side of the hall.

The orchestra played Mendelssohn's light and pleasant "Son and Stranger" overture; Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," which not even the instrumentation of Berlioz, nor the dashing pace to which Mr. Gericke finally brought it, could make anything else than an old, hackneyed story; and, in place of a symphony, the five pastoral pieces which constitute Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." This last number evidently gave much pleasure, and worthy pleasure, too, for the music—albeit somewhat cloying in flavor and restricted in scope of ideas—is unaffected, easy, current, picturesque and odd, without eccentricity. The first movement, the wedding march, grows a trifle tedious by reason of its redundancy of variation, and one cannot help feeling a lack of logic—of common sense, might almost be said—in that shifting of rhythms and times which would make it the veriest tangle-foot that anybody ever undertook to keep step to. The performance was excellent, as usual, and it was a satisfaction to see that Signor Campanari seemed to be regularly settled among the first violins, and that Mr. Fries was playing at the first 'cello desk, although possibly only as a substitute for Mr. Giese.

At the concert of Saturday evening next, the overture will be Spohr's "Jessarda," the symphony Beethoven's fifth, the novelty an arrangement for orchestra by Mr. Gericke, of three sonata movements of Bach, and the soloist Miss Gertrude Franklin.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fifteenth Programme of the Present Season's Series.

The 15th concert of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Fannie Bloomfield, pianist, of Chicago, as soloist, and the following programme:

Overture, "Son and Stranger".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, op. 16....Henselt
"Invitation to the Dance".....Weber, Berlioz
"Rustic Wedding," op. 26.....Goldmark

The best work of the orchestra during the evening was done in the Goldmark composition, the scherzo and andante of which were played in an almost faultless style, and the skill of the players, as well as that of the conductor, was also strikingly shown in the finale. In the overture there was an absence of that indefinable something which makes the difference between a strictly accurate and an enjoyable interpretation of any work; the melodious measures were faultlessly played, and yet there was but little effect produced upon the listener. The same lack of vitality, or whatever else it may be called, was noticeable in the Berlioz arrangement of the Weber "Invitation to the Dance," the introduction being given in an unsatisfactory fashion, and the waltz movement lacking the swing which it would be expected would have been given under the baton of such a conductor. In the concerto there was such an absence of sympathy between the soloist and the conductor that the result was not altogether gratifying. The soloist of the evening, Miss Bloomfield, has a far larger share of talent than many pianists who come more pretentiously before the public, and it is only to be regretted that she set herself so severe a task as that of a performance of the Henselt concerto named, which is a work demanding abilities of a far more mature nature than can be expected in one so young in years as this artist appears to be. Her playing shows much genuine musical instinct, intelligence, and a great mastery of the technique of her instrument. Her limited physical power is, however, a serious hinderance to a satisfactory performance of such a composition, and this was most plainly shown in the opening allegro, in which the constant effort by the player for broad effects caused a forcing of the tone of the instrument and a consequent lack of clearness in many passages. The larghetto was played in a delightful fashion, and displayed the abilities of the artist at their best; but the final movement was given with more mechanical accuracy than artistic feeling, its demands upon the performer being clearly beyond her present attainments. Miss Bloomfield was kindly received and enthusiastically applauded.

Conin my.

Music in Boston.

Boston, January 25.

The fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening at Music Hall.

PROGRAM:

Overture, "Son and Stranger".....	Mendelssohn
Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, op. 16.....	Henselt
Allegro. Larghetto. Allegro vivace.
"Invitation to the Dance".....	Weber
"Rustic Wedding," op. 26.....	Goldmark
Wedding March (variations).	Bridal Song (intermezzo).
Serenade (scherzo).	In the Garden (andante).
Dance (finale).

The soloist was Miss Bloomfield. Mendelssohn's overture is seldom heard, which is not to be regretted, since it certainly is a very weak work, especially if compared to his other overtures. It lacks all originality, the ideas being very superficial, and I do not see that much is gained by any one in listening to the weakest works of even a Mendelssohn when there is yet so much that is better to perform.

In Miss Bloomfield we made the acquaintance of an artist of the true stamp, and I will say right here that her performance of the Henselt concerto was masterly in every respect. Some misgivings had been manifested as to the advisability of the choice of this concerto for her Boston debut, since the massive cord and octave passage of the work seem to call for a man's power; but those who heard her last night must certainly say that if there is a lady artist who can make one forget this, it is Miss Bloomfield. Her finger technique is splendidly developed; also her wrist action, which she showed in her octave playing, and the rhythmic precision which she maintains even in the most rapid figures, is astonishing. There is no undue hurrying, nor misplaced retarding. Everything comes out clear and distinct and in a musicianly manner. It is seldom one has the pleasure of listening to so clean-cut a performance, and that Miss Bloomfield's efforts were duly appreciated by the audience was amply shown by the hearty applause and repeated recalls bestowed upon her. The young lady hails from Chicago, and has recently returned to this country from her studies in Vienna. If I am correctly informed, she is to play at one of Van der Stucken's novelty concerts in your city, so that you will have an opportunity shortly of hearing her also. Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," with Berlioz's instrumentation, was excellently played and much enjoyed by the audience. The next number, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," is quite an interesting work in the form of a suite, the scoring being especially good. The first and fourth numbers seem to me the most important. The last number reminds one very much of the dance in F major from Rubinstein's ballet music from "Feramors."

Next week Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will be performed, and Miss Gertrude Franklin will sing an aria of Mozart and some songs, with piano.

LOUIS MAAS.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The first impression from the playing of the orchestra at the Saturday evening concert was that the cellos were in especially good unison, and that their tone was very pliant, elastic, and sonorous. Now this may not have been because Wulf Fries led them (at his old-time desk); for the cipher of the Traveller representative, who now and again takes notes of such things as he would recall to aid in furnishing a criticism of the performance, which shall be something more than a report, had indicated its appreciation of the cellos, before the absence of Mr. Giese was known. At any rate, to see Mr. Fries again (and it is to be hoped that, with Mr. Giese, he returns for good to the orchestra) indicates the good will existing between him and our present symphony conductor, which many people regret did not exist during past seasons, under Mr. Henschel. Now, if Mr. Allen could be brought back, the orchestra would be absolutely complete. It is not, however, every band of 70 players that can count at its first six violin desks such men as are found in ours,—Listemann, Loeffler, Adamowski, Campanari, Lichtenberg, De Seve. The programme for this, the fifteenth concert of the course, was:

Mendelssohn,	Overture (Son and Stranger).
Henselt,	Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, op. 16.
Weber,	Invitation to the Dance.
Goldmark,	Rustic Wedding, op. 26.
	Wedding March (variations).
	Bridal Song (intermezzo).
	Serenade (scherzo).
	In the Garden (andante).
	Dance (finale).

Miss Fannie Bloomfield was the soloist. While this programme is—in its orchestral portions—less serious than many of this season's scheme, it must not be thought to indicate any change in policy; for even the least familiar names thereon, Henselt and Goldmark, are closely allied to the school of composition from which Mr. Gericke draws so exclusively. The Mendelssohn overture is from a boyish pen; exuberant with fanciful ideas, which are a tribute to those in his family for whose home celebration the operetta "Son and Stranger" was composed. The freedom and charm of Mendelssohn are here in their happiest setting; what do the few measures of choral writing mean, which immediately precede the end, save to breathe of a sudden into this whirl of gaiety, color and dance, the sincere spirit of a dutiful son? We think the Berlioz arrangement was used in the "Invitation to the Dance" selection, which was played as Strauss or Julien might have suggested. "The Rustic Wedding" music of Goldmark is sometimes dignified by the title "symphony," but this seems wide of the mark for a work so little restricted as to musical form. It is a suite, and abounds in ingenious points of construction, expression and finesse. "The Wedding March" variations are a bit tedious, though in themselves brief and only a trifle reminiscent. The first ushering in of the theme by the low strings—cellos and double bass—in unison is picturesque; the variation where the wood-winds carry the theme in jerky, pulsing measures, aided by the strings' pizzicato; that where, finally, the joyous brasses with the irreverent bass drum and triangle disclose it as being so much like the "Joy Chorus" from the Ninth Symphony or "The Portuguese Hymn," are the easiest remembered of all. Of the following portions of the work the greatest beauty lies in "In the Garden," which, with its abundance of soft, wood tone, was played in exquisite style. "The Dance"

absorbs all the latent force of the orchestra and, although interrupted by frequent thunder showers, is not long quelled; an immense maze of force, beauty, color, sense and sound—with just the daintiest suggestion of the "Garden" theme for the clarinet, and the suite is ended. The performance was very vital at all points. Of Miss Fannie Bloomfield it is not possible to judge from hearing her only in the eccentric and difficult Henselt concerto. That she has been a hard worker is evident at once, for her technique is highly developed, her touch accurate and strong, and she plays the bravura passages—the double thirds, the sixths, the skips and all the abnormal combinations of this concerto, with immense grasp and at the same time with a clear legato. She used the score at the Saturday evening performance, and in many ways gave the impression of being an earnest student. As an interpreter, the immaturity of the artist was apparent in a lack of reserve power in the climaxes; a too great concentration of mind upon the notes as they came instead of upon the whole context; and in generally absorbing herself in the performance rather than in what was being performed. Her use of the pedal is not always to be commended, and the inability of her left hand to amply assert a theme when the right has to perform some brilliant and difficult subsidiary work is at present slightly apparent. Her playing in the Larghetto was unaffected and not without warmth. There were no grave disturbances of the ensemble during any movement, and Mr. Gericke gave her every aid in his power; and towards a pianist his orchestra is always a helpful, sustaining force. It must be said that Miss Bloomfield's playing is, as a whole, a source of much interest to the cultivated listener. She received two recalls at the close of the concerto. Miss Bloomfield comes from Chicago and was educated in Europe. At the next concert will be played the Jessonda overture, Spohr; Beethoven's fifth symphony, and three sonata movements from J. S. Bach, arranged by Mr. Gericke; Miss Gertrude Franklin will sing the aria of Mozart's "Bella mia fiama addio," and songs yet to be announced.

Last Night's Symphony Concert.

Miss Fannie Bloomfield was the soloist at the symphony concert in Music Hall last evening. Her only performance was Henselt's difficult pianoforte concerto in F minor (op. 16). This she played with a force and understanding and a perfect mastery of technique rare indeed in one of her sex and age. She was warmly applauded after each number, and scored an instant success. The other number of note on the programme of the evening was Goldmark's melodious and characteristic "Rustic Wedding," which was presented with all the perfection of detail to which the orchestra has attained.

The programme for next week is announced as follows:

Overture (Jessonda).....	Spohr
Aria (Bella mia fiama, addio).....	Mozart
Three sonata movements, arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke.....	Joh. Seb. Bach
(First time.)
Songs with piano.
Symphony in C minor. No. 5, op. 67.....	Beethoven
Soloist—Miss Gertrude Franklin.

"Yes," said Mrs. Rural, after listening to last week's orchestral programme, "I liked the Oh-beer-on overture because it seemed spirited; but Orpheus seemed in awful pain, and Abraham's sympathy in D was all Greek to me."

Conin my.

Music in Boston.

BOSTON, January 25.

THE fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening at Music Hall.

PROGRAM:

Overture, "Son and Stranger".....	Mendelssohn
Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor, op. 16.....	Henselt
Allegro. Larghetto. Allegro vivace.
"Invitation to the Dance".....	Weber
"Rustic Wedding," op. 26.....	Goldmark
Wedding March (variations).	Bridal Song (intermezzo).
Serenade (scherzo).	In the Garden (andante).
Dance (finale).

The soloist was Miss Bloomfield. Mendelssohn's overture is seldom heard, which is not to be regretted, since it certainly is a very weak work, especially if compared to his other overtures. It lacks all originality, the ideas being very superficial, and I do not see that much is gained by any one in listening to the weakest works of even a Mendelssohn when there is yet so much that is better to perform.

In Miss Bloomfield we made the acquaintance of an artist of the true stamp, and I will say right here that her performance of the Henselt concerto was masterly in every respect. Some misgivings had been manifested as to the advisability of the choice of this concerto for her Boston debut, since the massive cord and octave passage of the work seem to call for a man's power; but those who heard her last night must certainly say that if there is a lady artist who can make one forget this, it is Miss Bloomfield. Her finger technique is splendidly developed; also her wrist action, which she showed in her octave playing, and the rhythmic precision which she maintains even in the most rapid figures, is astonishing. There is no undue hurrying, nor misplaced retarding. Everything comes out clear and distinct and in a musicianly manner. It is seldom one has the pleasure of listening to so clean-cut a performance, and that Miss Bloomfield's efforts were duly appreciated by the audience was amply shown by the hearty applause and repeated recalls bestowed upon her. The young lady hails from Chicago, and has recently returned to this country from her studies in Vienna. If I am correctly informed, she is to play at one of Van der Stucken's novelty concerts in your city, so that you will have an opportunity shortly of hearing her also. Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," with Berlioz's instrumentation, was excellently played and much enjoyed by the audience. The next number, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," is quite an interesting work in the form of a suite, the scoring being especially good. The first and fourth numbers seem to me the most important. The last number reminds one very much of the dance in F major from Rubinstein's ballet music from "Feramors."

Next week Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will be performed, and Miss Gertrude Franklin will sing an aria of Mozart and some songs, with piano.

LOUIS MAAS.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The first impression from the playing of the orchestra at the Saturday evening concert was that the cellos were in especially good unison, and that their tone was very pliant, elastic, and sonorous. Now this may not have been because Wulf Fries led them (at his old-time desk); for the cipher of the Traveller representative, who now and again takes notes of such things as he would recall to aid in furnishing a criticism of the performance, which shall be something more than a report, had indicated its appreciation of the cellos, before the absence of Mr. Giese was known. At any rate, to see Mr. Fries again (and it is to be hoped that, with Mr. Giese, he returns for good to the orchestra) indicates the good will existing between him and our present symphony conductor, which many people regret did not exist during past seasons, under Mr. Henschel. Now, if Mr. Allen could be brought back, the orchestra would be absolutely complete. It is not, however, every band of 70 players that can count at its first six violin desks such men as are found in ours,—Listemann, Loeffler, Adamowski, Campanari, Lichtenberg, De Sève. The programme for this, the fifteenth concert of the course, was:

Mendelssohn,	Overture (Son and Stranger).
Henselt,	Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, op. 16. Allegro—Larghetto—Allegro vivace.
Weber,	Invitation to the Dance.
Goldmark,	Rustic Wedding, op. 26.
	Wedding March (variations).
	Bridal Song (intermezzo).
	Serenade (scherzo).
	In the Garden (andante).
	Dance (finale).

Miss Fannie Bloomfield was the soloist. While this programme is—in its orchestral portions—less serious than many of this season's scheme, it must not be thought to indicate any change in policy; for even the least familiar names thereon, Henselt and Goldmark, are closely allied to the school of composition from which Mr. Gericke draws so exclusively. The Mendelssohn overture is from a boyish pen; exuberant with fanciful ideas, which are a tribute to those in his family for whose home celebration the operetta "Son and Stranger" was composed. The freedom and charm of Mendelssohn are here in their happiest setting; what do the few measures of choral writing mean, which immediately precede the end, save to breathe of a sudden into this whirl of gaiety, color and dance, the sincere spirit of a dutiful son? We think the Berlioz arrangement was used in the "Invitation to the Dance" selection, which was played as Strauss or Julien might have suggested. "The Rustic Wedding" music of Goldmark is sometimes disguised by the title "symphony," but this seems wide of the mark for a work so little restricted as to musical form. It is a suite, and abounds in ingenious points of construction, expression and finesse. "The Wedding March" variations are a bit tedious, though in themselves brief and only a trifle reminiscent. The first ushering in of the theme by the low strings—cellos and double bass—in unison is picturesque; the variation where the wood-winds carry the theme in jerky, pulsing measures, aided by the strings' pizzicato; that where, finally, the joyous brasses with the irreverent bass drum and triangle disclose it as being so much like the "Joy Chorus" from the Ninth Symphony or "The Portuguese Hymn," are the easiest remembered of all. Of the following portions of the work the greatest beauty lies in "In the Garden," which, with its abundance of soft, wood tone, was played in exquisite style. "The Dance" absorbs all the latent force of the orchestra and, although interrupted by frequent thunder showers, is not long quelled; an immense maze of force, beauty, color, sense and sound—with just the faintest suggestion of the "Garden" theme for the clarinet, and the suite is ended. The performance was very vital at all points. Of Miss Fannie Bloomfield it is not possible to judge from hearing her only in the eccentric and difficult Henselt concerto. That she has been a hard worker is evident at once, for her technique is highly developed, her touch accurate and strong, and she plays the bravura passages—the double thirds, the sixths, the skips and all the abnormal combinations of this concerto, with immense grasp and at the same time with a clear legato. She used the score at the Saturday evening performance, and in many ways gave the impression of being an earnest student. As an interpreter, the immaturity of the artist was apparent in a lack of reserve power in the climaxes; a too great concentration of mind upon the notes as they came instead of upon the whole context; and in generally absorbing herself in the performance rather than in what was being performed. Her use of the pedal is not always to be commended, and the inability of her left hand to amply assert a theme when the right has to perform some brilliant and difficult subsidiary work is at present slightly apparent. Her playing in the Larghetto was unaffected and not without warmth. There were no grave disturbances of the ensemble during any movement, and Mr. Gericke gave her every aid in his power; and towards a pianist his orchestra is always a helpful, sustaining force. It must be said that Miss Bloomfield's playing is, as a whole, a source of much interest to the cultivated listener. She received two recalls at the close of the concerto. Miss Bloomfield comes from Chicago and was educated in Europe. At the next concert will be played the Jessonda overture, Spohr; Beethoven's fifth symphony, and three sonata movements from J. S. Bach, arranged by Mr. Gericke; Miss Gertrude Franklin will sing the aria of Mozart's "Bella mia fiamma addio," and songs yet to be announced.

Last Night's Symphony Concert.

Miss Fannie Bloomfield was the soloist at the symphony concert in Music Hall last evening. Her only performance was Henselt's difficult pianoforte concerto in F minor (op. 16). This she played with a force and understanding and a perfect mastery of technique rare indeed in one of her sex and age. She was warmly applauded after each number, and scored an instant success. The other number of note on the programme of the evening was Goldmark's melodious and characteristic "Rustic Wedding," which was presented with all the perfection of detail to which the orchestra has attained.

The programme for next week is announced as follows:

Overture (Jessonda).....	Spohr
Aria (Bella mia fiamma, addio!).....	Mozart
Three sonata movements, arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke.....	Joh. Seb. Bach
Songs with piano.	(First time.)
Symphony in C minor. No. 5, op. 67.....	Beethoven
Soloist—Miss Gertrude Franklin.

"Yes," said Mrs. Rural, after listening to last week's orchestral programme, "I liked the Oh-beer-on overture because it seemed spirited; but Orpheus seemed in awful pain, and Abraham's sympathy in D was all Greek to me."

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifteenth of these concerts presented a programme as light and melodious as its predecessor was solid and abstruse. The list consisted of:—

Overture (Son and Stranger).....	Mendelssohn
Concerto for piano-forte, in F minor, op. 16.....	Henselt
Allegro.—Larghetto.—Allegro vivace.
Miss Fannie Bloomfield.
Invitation to the dance.....	Weber
Rustic wedding, op. 26.....	Goldmark
Wedding march, (variations.)
Bridal song, (intermezzo.)
Serenade, (scherzo.)
In the Garden, (andante.)
Dance, (finale.)

A light overture, a tuneful concerto, a waltz rhythm and a musical joviality. Every portion was finely rendered. The overture went with that unity and taste which has characterized all Mr. Gericke's overture readings since he has been here—with one exception. I feared for the young and, to me, unknown pianiste, when she sat down to play the difficult Henselt concerto. But a few moments convinced me that fears were needless. A degree of blurring at the end of the first and third movements, and a slight overuse of the damper pedal, were the chief faults, but these were counterbalanced by many and decided merits. Miss Bloomfield has fire, spirit and bravura, and also had a clear perception of the style of the work which she was playing. The ensemble was faultless, and her power in the second movement, where the chords rang through the force of the tutti of the orchestra was surprising. Miss Bloomfield awakened great enthusiasm and received a double recall.

The Imitation a la Valse was given with all the richness of effect which Berlioz's instrumentation demands. Especially were the flute runs and harp passages striking. Of course the audience made the usual mistake at the false cadence, and burst into applause before the work was finished, but anyone who is not acquainted with the work would fall into this error, as the coda comes after an authentic cadence, and almost seems a premeditated trick upon a confiding public.

Goldmark's symphony is rather a suite than a symphony, and is one of the daintiest and prettiest works in the repertoire. Its beginning reminds strongly of a theme in Beethoven's ninth symphony, but the variations show how differently a theme will come out when spun through the web of two dissimilar minds. The variations were given with all possible contrast, and the shading and the unity in difficult syncopated passages were excellent. The ineffable tenderness of the scene in the garden, contrasted with the wild hurly-burly of the dance, was finely brought out. The wood wind again was brought prominently in the foreground in this work, where it contributes most of the tone color, and did its work well.

Next week Beethoven's fifth symphony will be the piece de resistance.
L. C. E.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Lack of space forces us to give the symphony concert short shrift this week. The programme was as bright as its predecessor was solid. A light Mendelssohn overture, a very melodious concerto, a swingy waltz arrangement, a suite of jolly, yet beautiful, peasant's music. Who could fail to be at least pleased with such a pretty feast, especially when so finely performed throughout? The interest centered in Miss Bloomfield, a young pianist from Chicago, who certainly exhibited a fire, bravura and spirit which is unusual in debutantes. Her endurance also was remarkable, for few artists could respond to the difficulties of such a trying work without showing fatigue. There was an occasional blur at the end of the first and third movements and a tendency to overuse the damper-pedal, but the ensemble was kept perfectly, and the pianist evidently was equal to the ambitious task she had undertaken. She aroused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm, and won a double recall—and deserved it too.

The "Rustic Wedding" Symphony (rather a suite than a symphony) was given with all the spirit it demanded, and the wood wind especially deserve credit for the smoothness of their execution in a work where they contributed so much of the tone color. Next week the ever-beautiful fifth symphony and Miss Gertude Franklin are the chief attractions.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night, and despite the bad weather, before a fine audience. The programme was an interesting one, and the work of the orchestra was, as a whole, the best of the season thus far, in steadiness, clearness, ease and variety of color and precision. The performance opened with Mendelssohn's "Son and Stranger" Overture, which was read with a simple grace and an easy flow that were charming. Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," as scored by Berlioz, was also beautifully interpreted, save that it was hurried along at a tremendous pace after the first subject of the waltz appears for the last time. Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," passing the tiresomeness of the variations in the opening march, was read with the spirit in its more animated movements; and with much firm, warm and delicacy in the others. The soloist was Miss Fannie Bloomfield, who played Henselt's concerto in F minor, op. 16. It has grown old fashioned; and whatever dignity may have pertained to it in its day has disappeared, and it now seems a mere piece for virtuoso display, a species of salon concerto. It was played by Miss Bloomfield with much fire and surprising endurance. This modest young artist executes with a strength rather remarkable for a woman. She has an excellent wrist, and her technique is fluent and free. She plays with ease and self-possession, but her style, though abundant in vitality, is heavy and somewhat coarse, and is, moreover, lacking in repose, finish and expressiveness generally. However, she is still young, and has ample time to improve in these qualities, as her experience and her sentiment mature. She was enthusiastically applauded, and twice recalled with great fervor. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Jessonda," Spohr; aria "Bella mia fiamma, addio," Mozart; three sonata movements by Bach, arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke; Songs, with piano; and Beethoven's C minor Symphony. Miss Gertude Franklin will be the soloist.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Fifteenth concert. A very large audience attended the concert on Saturday evening, and listened to the following selections: Mendelssohn, Overture (Son and Stranger); Henselt, Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, op. 16, allegro, larghetto, allegro vivace; Weber, Invitation to the Dance; Goldmark, Rustic Wedding, op. 26—Wedding March (variations), Bridal Song (intermezzo), Serenade (scherzo), In the Garden (andante), Dance (finale). The soloist was Miss Fannie Bloomfield. Her achievements upon the piano were a complete and pleasant surprise to those who expected from a performer young in age little approach to the masterly renderings of pianists whose years had given long experience and practice. Although not powerful in comparison with many other artists, yet this failing was to be anticipated, and was nearly atoned for by the excellent expression with which each movement was tempered. In the dash and vivacity of the allegro finis every opportunity for display—legitimate display—was grasped with keen perception to effect, and the passage was marked by brilliancy of execution throughout. The orchestra could scarcely have had a more agreeable series of selections to present, and under these circumstances it was to be expected that, as a whole, the concert would be thoroughly enjoyable. Only in the closing number did the attention flag, and that was due in part to the nondescriptive power of portions of the musical poem, rendering it impossible for the performers to bring out what was not there. So far as could be every variety of the descriptive music was given its appropriate toning, and breadth was often infused by the skill of the leader and his associates into passages which, but for this admirable realization, would have seemed lifeless. The fine touches of expression by the violins in each swell was particularly noticeable. Perfectly, too, the musicians drowned their notes into a unison of subdued chords when, as in the Serenade, the solo should, and here did, stand prominent and distinct, yet not alone without desirable force in accompaniment. In spite of the lapses now and then in the rendering of this final number there was a generally good performance. In no selection more than in the third number was the magnificent discipline of the orchestra manifested when the power of the full, grand concerted movement contrasted suddenly yet evenly with the surrounding gentle strains. The presentation by the stringed instruments was not always vivacious enough to meet the wants of the piece, but it was enjoyable for all that.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, JANUARY 26, 1885.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fifteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was: Mendelssohn, Overture to "Son and Stranger." Henselt, Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, op. 16. Weber, Invitation to the Dance. Scored by Berlioz. Goldmark, Rustic Wedding, op. 26. Wedding March (Variations). Bridal Song (Intermezzo). Serenade (Scherzo). In the Garden (Andante). Dance (Finale).

Miss Fannie Bloomfield was the pianist. Mendelssohn's delightful little overture was charmingly played. It is not uninteresting to note, concerning this overture, how different Mendelssohn was, when working in a congenial element, from what he was when he attempted to write for the stage. In listen-

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifteenth of these concerts presented a programme as light and melodious as its predecessor was solid and abstruse. The list consisted of:—

Overture (Son and Stranger).....	Mendelssohn
Concerto for piano-forte, in F minor, op. 16	Henselt
Allegro.—Larghetto.—Allegro vivace.
Miss Fannie Bloomfield.
Invitation to the dance.....	Weber
Rustic wedding, op. 26.....	Goldmark
Wedding march, (variations.)
Bridal song, (intermezzo.)
Serenade, (scherzo.)
In the Garden, (andante.)
Dance, (finale.)

A light overture, a tuneful concerto, a waltz rhythm and a musical joviality. Every portion was finely rendered. The overture went with that unity and taste which has characterized all Mr. Gericke's overture readings since he has been here—with one exception. I feared for the young and, to me, unknown pianiste, when she sat down to play the difficult Henselt concerto. But a few moments convinced me that fears were needless. A degree of blurring at the end of the first and third movements, and a slight overuse of the damper pedal, were the chief faults, but these were counterbalanced by many and decided merits. Miss Bloomfield has fire, spirit and bravura, and also had a clear perception of the style of the work which she was playing. The ensemble was faultless, and her power in the second movement, where the chords rang through the force of the tutti of the orchestra was surprising. Miss Bloomfield awakened great enthusiasm and received a double recall.

The Imitation a la Valse was given with all the richness of effect which Berlioz's instrumentation demands. Especially were the flute runs and harp passages striking. Of course the audience made the usual mistake at the false cadence, and burst into applause before the work was finished, but anyone who is not acquainted with the work would fall into this error, as the coda comes after an authentic cadence, and almost seems a premeditated trick upon a confiding public.

Goldmark's symphony is rather a suite than a symphony, and is one of the daintiest and prettiest works in the repertoire. Its beginning reminds strongly of a theme in Beethoven's ninth symphony, but the variations show how differently a theme will come out when spun through the web of two dissimilar minds. The variations were given with all possible contrast, and the shading and the unity in difficult syncopated passages were excellent. The ineffable tenderness of the scene in the garden, contrasted with the wild hurly-burly of the dance, was finely brought out. The wood wind again was brought prominently in the foreground in this work, where it contributes most of the tone color, and did its work well.

Next week Beethoven's fifth symphony will be the piece de resistance.
L. C. E.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Lack of space forces us to give the symphony concert short shrift this week. The programme was as bright as its predecessor was solid. A light Mendelssohn overture, a very melodious concerto, a swiny waltz arrangement, a suite of jolly, yet beautiful, peasant's music. Who could fail to be at least pleased with such a pretty feast, especially when so finely performed throughout? The interest centered in Miss Bloomfield, a young pianist from Chicago, who certainly exhibited a fire, bravura and spirit which is unusual in debutantes. Her endurance also was remarkable, for few artists could respond to the difficulties of such a trying work without showing fatigue. There was an occasional blur at the end of the first and third movements and a tendency to overuse the damper-pedal, but the ensemble was kept perfectly, and the pianist evidently was equal to the ambitious task she had undertaken. She aroused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm, and won a double recall—and deserved it too.

The "Rustic Wedding" Symphony (rather a suite than a symphony) was given with all the spirit it demanded, and the wood wind especially deserve credit for the smoothness of their execution in a work where they contributed so much of the tone color. Next week the ever-beautiful fifth symphony and Miss Gertrude Franklin are the chief attractions.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night, and despite the bad weather, before a fine audience. The programme was an interesting one, and the work of the orchestra was, as a whole, the best of the season thus far, in readiness, clearness, ease and variety of color and precision. The performance opened with Mendelssohn's "Son and Stranger" Overture, which was read with a simple grace and an easy flow that were charming. Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," as scored by Berlioz, was also beautifully interpreted, save that it was hurried along at a tremendous pace after the first subject of the waltz appears for the last time. Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," passing the tiresomeness of the variations in the opening march, was read with the spirit in its more animated movements, and with much firm, warm and delicacy in the others. The soloist was Miss Fannie Bloomfield, who played Henselt's concerto in F minor, op. 16. It has grown old-fashioned; and whatever dignity may have pertained to it in its day has disappeared, and it now seems a mere piece for virtuoso display, a species of saign concerto. It was played by Miss Bloomfield with much fire and engaging endurance. This modest young artist executes with a strength rather remarkable for a woman. She has an excellent wrist, and her technique is fluent and free. She plays with ease and self-possession, but her style, though abundant in vitality, is heavy and somewhat coarse, and is, moreover, lacking in repose, finish and expressiveness generally. However, she is still young, and has ample time to improve in these qualities, as her experience and her sentiment mature. She was enthusiastically applauded, and twice recalled with great fervor. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Jessonda," Spohr; aria "Bella mia fiamma, addio," Mozart; three sonata movements by Bach, arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke; Songs, with piano; and Beethoven's C minor Symphony. Miss Gertrude Franklin will be the soloist.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Fifteenth concert. A very large audience attended the concert on Saturday evening, and listened to the following selections: Mendelssohn, Overture (Son and Stranger); Henselt, Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, op. 16, allegro, larghetto, allegro vivace; Weber, Invitation to the Dance; Goldmark, Rustic Wedding, op. 26—Wedding March (variations), Bridal Song (intermezzo), Serenade (scherzo), In the Garden (andante), Dance (finale). The soloist was Miss Fannie Bloomfield. Her achievements upon the piano were a complete and pleasant surprise to those who expected from a performer young in age little approach to the masterly renderings of pianists whose years had given long experience and practice. Although not powerful in comparison with many other artists, yet this failing was to be anticipated, and was nearly atoned for by the excellent expression with which each movement was tempered. In the dash and vivacity of the allegro finis every opportunity for display—legitimate display—was grasped with keen perception to effect, and the passage was marked by brilliancy of execution throughout. The orchestra could scarcely have had a more agreeable series of selections to present, and under these circumstances it was to be expected that, as a whole, the concert would be thoroughly enjoyable. Only in the closing number did the attention flag, and that was due in part to the nondescriptive power of portions of the musical poem, rendering it impossible for the performers to bring out what was not there. So far as could be every variety of the descriptive music was given its appropriate toning, and breadth was often infused by the skill of the leader and his associates into passages which, but for this admirable realization, would have seemed lifeless. The fine touches of expression by the violins in each swell was particularly noticeable. Perfectly, too, the musicians drowned their notes into a unison of subdued chords when, as in the Serenade, the solo should, and here did, stand prominent and distinct, yet not alone without desirable force in accompaniment. In spite of the lapses now and then in the rendering of this final number there was a generally good performance. In no selection more than in the third number was the magnificent discipline of the orchestra manifested when the power of the full, grand concerted movement contrasted suddenly yet evenly with the surrounding gentle strains. The presentation by the stringed instruments was not always vivacious enough to meet the wants of the piece, but it was enjoyable for all that.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, JANUARY 26, 1885.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fifteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was: Mendelssohn, Overture to "Son and Stranger." Henselt, Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, op. 16. Weber, Invitation to the Dance. Scored by Berlioz. Goldmark, Rustic Wedding, op. 26. Wedding March (Variations). Bridal Song (Intermezzo). Serenade (Scherzo). In the Garden (Andante). Dance (Finale).

Miss Fannie Bloomfield was the pianist. Mendelssohn's delightful little overture was charmingly played. It is not uninteresting to note, concerning this overture, how different Mendelssohn was, when working in a congenial element, from what he was when he attempted to write for the stage. In listening to this bright, genial, sunny overture, one can hardly help contrasting it with the equally well-written, but wholly depressing music of the opera to which it belongs. Berlioz's incomparable orchestral arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was played with infinitely brilliant effect. The piece was very favorably placed in the programme, coming, as it did, immediately after the Henselt concerto. Among all pianoforte writers Henselt was probably the one who founded himself most immediately upon Weber. He was the one very great pianist who made the playing of Weber's music almost a specialty, and his intimacy with Weber's style had a strong influence upon his own compositions. But there is a good deal besides Weber in Henselt's work; or rather, there was a good deal that was essentially un-Weberish. What in Weber was the most spontaneous warmth of sentiment, genuine romanticism, and sprightly gracefulness, became in Henselt a sort of languishing sentimentalism and super-refined salon elegance. Add to this that Henselt was second only to Chopin in his instinct for all that was most rich and fascinating to the sensual ear in the matter of pianoforte effects, and that all his compositions had perforce to afford him an opportunity for the display of a phenomenal and quite unique pianoforte technique, and the dilution of the original Weber essence in his writings is easily enough accounted for. So, after listening to his long and somewhat cloying concerto, it was not unwelcome to hear a bit of the real Weber, with all his innate magnetism and artless fascination.

It may possibly be urged that Mr. Gericke, in his reading of the "Invitation to the Dance," rather effaced the distinction between it and the more modern Strauss waltz. A little more moderation in speed would have been more in harmony with the characteristic flavor of the music. As it was, it sounded very Viennese indeed. Still, the performance was immensely brilliant and effective, and did ample justice to the inimitable delicacy and sparkle of Berlioz's instrumentation. Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" has been given here before, but surely never better than now. With the best will in the world, we can find the composition neither edifying nor enjoyable. The music sounds artificial and made-up, and lacks the peculiar charm which Frenchmen like Bizet or Massenet know how to impart to this sort of picturesque writing. Miss Bloomfield made a very strong impression with her playing of the Henselt concerto. The work is no joke for any pianist, but this young girl seemed to make light of both its terrible technical difficulty and the demands it makes upon the physical strength and endurance of the player. A finer technique than hers we cannot remember. The fire and brilliancy of her playing quite equalled its clearness and facility. From a deeper musical point of view there was also almost everything to praise, save that we hardly think that a more mature artist would have ventured upon so furious a tempo in the finale. The next programme is:

Spohr. Overture to "Jessonda."
Mozart. Aria (Bella mia fiamma, addio!)
Joh. Seb. Bach. Three Sonata Movements, arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke.
(First time.)

(Sings with Piano.)

Beethoven. Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.

Miss Gertrude Franklin will be the singer.

How to Listen to Music.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS. — The fifteenth symphony concert was one of untiring interest throughout. It began with Mendelssohn's pleasing and melodious little overture to "Son and Stranger," the performance of which by the orchestra was all that could be desired. The most brilliant episode of the concert was the Boston debut of Miss Fannie Bloomfield, who performed Henselt's pianoforte concerto, a work that has long been noted for its extreme difficulty, not to mention its musical value which has caused it to be favorably compared with the concertos of Chopin. Miss Bloomfield's performance was as impressive by the justice it did the concerto, or as regards its musical interpretation, as it was extraordinary in other ways. In technique she not only shows her possession of great power, but she controls and makes use of it in a manner that is not only artistic but marvellous. Performing a master piece, the exacting demands of which have become proverbial among virtuosi, she was yet enabled to conceal her own impression as to its difficulty, and to become so absorbed in her interpretation that while the eye was gratified by the virtuosity she displayed, the ear was none the less charmed. It was the performance of a young artist, and its traits were so identical with what one might expect from a virtuoso of extensive experience on the stage, that the accomplishment may justly be referred to as phenomenal. In the concerto Henselt seemed to have aimed at accumulating all intricate and skilful devices of complex and brilliant passage writing. Passages in sixths and thirds intermixed and alternated, and other features of the bravura style characterize the concerto with a continuity demanding rare sustaining power and daring execution. It seemed all the more incredible how so young a pianist as Miss Bloomfield could display all these qualities in her performance when Conductor Gericke had rendered her task all the more trying by tempi that were undeniably too fast. The Berlioz arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," with all its brilliant orchestration, was presented in fine style, as was also Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." At the concert to-night Miss Gertrude Franklin will be the soloist.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.30 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE SECOND MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 31ST, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- | | |
|-----------------|---|
| SPOHR, | OVERTURE. (Jessonda.) |
| MOZART, | ARIA. (Bella mia fiamma, addio!) |
| JOH. SEB. BACH, | THREE SONATA MOVEMENTS, arranged for Orchestra by W. Gericke.
(First time.) |
| SCHUMANN, | a) MOONLIGHT. |
| MENDELSSOHN, | b) SPRING SONG.
(Songs with Piano.) |
| BEETHOVEN, | SYMPHONY in C minor. No. 5, op. 67.
Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.—
Allegro. Allegro; Presto,— |

SOLOIST:

MISS GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

SWEET SIXTEEN.

THE 16th Symphony Concert Beethoven's Fifth was magnificently played, from the mounting chords of the Andante to the unison and vastness of the closing Allegri. Spohr's Jessonda Overture was exquisitely treated in the opening passages. We had a chance to see what Gericke could do by way of orchestration, in three Sonata movements of J. S. Bach (whether from one or more sonatas, did not appear in the meagre program), of which the last is a fine specimen of spirited work, and the first monotonous.

Gertrude Franklin was the soloist, and wielded her voice excellently in Mozart's Bella mia fiamma, addio, producing fine effects in union with the orchestra. She sang also, and neatly, Schumann's Moonlight and Mendelssohn's Spring Song.

B. J. Lang's lesson-lecture that week of course dwelt on the main features of this concert, and in it he had the assistance of John A. Preston.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SIXTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

We imagine that there were few in the large audience at the Boston Orchestra's concert of Saturday evening last who would not gladly have continued in their seats to hear an immediate repetition of the last number of the programme—Beethoven's fifth symphony. The objection is sometimes raised against giving the symphony the last place in an evening, that the listeners are then somewhat dulled and wearied by what they have already heard; but even had they been so on this occasion—something which seems hardly possible, so fine and fresh had been the preceding numbers—a reading so instinct with life and ardor could not have failed to arouse them and invigorate them. We have remarked at other times upon the poetical character of many of Mr. Gericke's interpretations, and this element was especially apparent on Saturday evening. The symphony is one which is very easy to make heavy and indistinct, with its large, sudden chords in the first movement, and its delicate, sensitive melodies and its rapid and difficult counterpoint in the succeeding ones, as the regular attendant upon these concerts may readily recall. Under Mr. Gericke's direction this present performance was technically perfect; everything was sure, clear and neat, and the double basses were wonderfully successful in attaining a soft, swift sweep, which was never weak or ineffective. Above all, there was a beautiful elasticity in the whole work which only full artistic sympathy between leader and players can give—not a fluctuating fantasy of tempo, but an almost imperceptible yielding here and enforcement there, for an instant only, which gave relief to the formal severity of absolute regularity. Many of the details by which this delightful and noble result was accomplished we should like to chronicle, but we can only pause to cite the gracious shadings of the andante, and the gradual growth through the thrill of the strings from the scherzo into the final allegro.

The smaller works were, for the opening number, Spohr's gentle and graceful "Jessonda" overture, and three movements, derived from as many different sonatas of Sebastian Bach, and arranged for orchestra by Mr. Gericke. Seeing these announced, many had feared that again an infelicitous choice had been made and that some arrangement, unsuitable to the style of the original composition and to the concert itself, might take the place of something more worthy. But such doubtful anticipation was happily not to be realized. The movements—not derived from the organ sonatas, but from those for solo instruments—sounded as though their present form might well be their original one. They differed widely from each other in rhythm and in force of character, one being a delicate fancy played with the muted strings, one of moderate strength and of great polyphonic distinctness, and the third a full, vigorous, animated one, of a figure and swing so thoroughly waltz-like that one might easily have imagined stately dancers moving in great graceful circles to its marked and suggestive melody. The arrangement of these all was, as we have said, harmonious with their spirit, both in figuration and in voicing, and Mr. Gericke was long and enthusiastically applauded.

Miss Gertrude Franklin sang, to orchestral accompaniment, one of Mozart's great "introduced" airs, "Bella mia fiamma, addio," and, to the pianoforte, Schumann's "Moonlight" and Mendelssohn's "Spring Song." These were admirable and fitting selections; and Miss Franklin sang them worthily, with exquisite exactness of intonation, smooth, fine phrasing, and an appreciative sentiment, which last only the native quality of her voice, as pure and scarcely less cold than the snow that falls as we write, precluded her from conveying according to her evident estimate. She gave an appropriate variety of manner to the several songs, and the recitative of the aria was declaimed with dignity and with a coloring which was more nearly warm than anything which we remember to have heard from her before. We would not insist too much upon a single point, and yet we must again regret that Miss Franklin does not give its proportionate value to her verbal text. In a great scène or air elaborated with ornament or broken by difficult intervals, the mood of the music may reasonably be allowed to exceed in value the repetition of the words; but songs—lieder, canzoni, couplets, what you will—exist primarily for the words to which they are set, and therefore, to vocalize them merely, even as clearly and elegantly as Miss Franklin did these, will always seem insufficient. And when, as was again the case on Saturday evening, the programme fails to give the words, it is also for a singer's own interest to keep the listener to a knowledge of what the music is intended to convey or to develop.

At the concert of Saturday evening next, Dr. Louis Maas will play Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto in D minor, opus 70, and the symphony will be Mozart in C major, number 4, known as the "Jupiter." Volkmann's serenade for strings, with violoncello solo by Mr. Giese, and Wagner's "Mars" overture will also be played.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, SIXTEENTH CONCERT. The concert on Saturday evening included the following selections: Spohr, Overture (Jessonda); Mozart, Aria (Bella mia fiamma, addio); Joh. Seb. Bach, Three Sonata Movements, arranged for Orchestra by W. Gericke; Schumann, (a) Moonlight; Mendelssohn, (b) Spring Song (Songs with Piano); Beethoven, Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67. The soloist was Miss Gertrude Franklin, and she, as the programme shows, added two songs with piano to the single selection which had originally been arranged. Miss Franklin was pleasing in tone, so far as the middle register was concerned, rendering each note with pure, round melody, but on her upper notes there was apparent a forced, cutting tone, which detracted much from the quality of the music. Her expression, too, though artificially excellent, was, in the Aria, lacking in true, appealing warmth; it seemed like head, not heart. The selection of Bach, arranged for the orchestra by Mr. Gericke, was given for the first time, and it testifies well to the musical spirit of the orchestra's new conductor. Beginning in the favorite way it develops here and there bright touches of novel combinations, always flowing in beautiful harmony, without a single harsh break

SWEET SIXTEEN.

THE 16th Symphony Concert Beethoven's Fifth was magnificently played, from the mounting chords of the Andante to the unison and vastness of the closing Allegri. Spohr's Jessonda Overture was exquisitely treated in the opening passages. We had a chance to see what Gericke could do by way of orchestration, in three Sonata movements of J. S. Bach (whether from one or more sonatas, did not appear in the meagre program), of which the last is a fine specimen of spirited work, and the first monotonous.

Gertrude Franklin was the soloist, and wielded her voice excellently in Mozart's Bella mia fiamma, addio, producing fine effects in union with the orchestra. She sang also, and neatly, Schumann's Moonlight and Mendelssohn's Spring Song.

B. J. Lang's lesson-lecture that week of course dwelt on the main features of this concert, and in it he had the assistance of John A. Preston.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SIXTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

We imagine that there were few in the large audience at the Boston Orchestra's concert of Saturday evening last who would not gladly have continued in their seats to hear an immediate repetition of the last number of the programme—Beethoven's fifth symphony. The objection is sometimes raised against giving the symphony the last place in an evening, that the listeners are then somewhat dulled and wearied by what they have already heard; but even had they been so on this occasion—something which seems hardly possible, so fine and fresh had been the preceding numbers—a reading so instinct with life and ardor could not have failed to arouse them and invigorate them. We have remarked at other times upon the poetical character of many of Mr. Gericke's interpretations, and this element was especially apparent on Saturday evening. The symphony is one which is very easy to make heavy and indistinct, with its large, sudden chords in the first movement, and its delicate, sensitive melodies and its rapid and difficult counterpoint in the succeeding ones, as the regular attendant upon these concerts may readily recall. Under Mr. Gericke's direction this present performance was technically perfect; everything was sure, clear and neat, and the double basses were wonderfully successful in attaining a soft, swift sweep, which was never weak or ineffective. Above all, there was a beautiful elasticity in the whole work which only full artistic sympathy between leader and players can give—not a fluctuating fantasy of tempo, but an almost imperceptible yielding here and enforcement there, for an instant only, which gave relief to the formal severity of absolute regularity. Many of the details by which this delightful and noble result was accomplished we should like to chronicle, but we can only pause to cite the gracious shadings of the andante, and the gradual growth through the thrill of the strings from the scherzo into the final allegro.

The smaller works were, for the opening number, Spohr's gentle and graceful "Jessonda" overture, and three movements, derived from as many different sonatas of Sebastian Bach, and arranged for orchestra by Mr. Gericke. Seeing these announced, many had feared that again an infelicitous choice had been made and that some arrangement, unsuitable to the style of the original composition and to the concert itself, might take the place of something more worthy. But such doubtful anticipation was happily not to be realized. The movements—not derived from the organ sonatas, but from those for solo instruments—sounded as though their present form might well be their original one. They differed widely from each other in rhythm and in force of character, one being a delicate fancy played with the muted strings, one of moderate strength and of great polyphonic distinctness, and the third a full, vigorous, animated one, of a figure and swing so thoroughly waltz-like that one might easily have imagined stately dancers moving in great graceful circles to its marked and suggestive melody. The arrangement of these all was, as we have said, harmonious with their spirit, both in figuration and in voicing, and Mr. Gericke was long and enthusiastically applauded.

Miss Gertrude Franklin sang, to orchestral accompaniment, one of Mozart's great "introduced" airs, "Bella mia fiamma, addio," and, to the pianoforte, Schumann's "Moonlight" and Mendelssohn's "Spring Song." These were admirable and fitting selections, and Miss Franklin sang them worthily, with exquisite exactness of intonation, smooth, fine phrasing, and an appreciative sentiment, which last only the native quality of her voice, as pure and scarcely less cold than the snow that falls as we write, precluded her from conveying according to her evident estimate. She gave an appropriate variety of manner to the several songs, and the recitative of the aria was declaimed with dignity and with a coloring which was more nearly warm than anything which we remember to have heard from her before. We would not insist too much upon a single point, and yet we must again regret that Miss Franklin does not give its proportionate value to her verbal text. In a great song or air elaborated with ornament or broken by difficult intervals, the mood of the music may reasonably be allowed to exceed in value the repetition of the words; but songs—lieder, canzoni, couplets, what you will—exist primarily for the words to which they are set, and therefore, to vocalize them merely, even as clearly and elegantly as Miss Franklin did these, will always seem insufficient. And when, as was again the case on Saturday evening, the programme fails to give the words, it is also for a singer's own interest to keep the listener to a knowledge of what the music is intended to convey or to develop.

At the concert of Saturday evening next, Dr. Louis Maas will play Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto in D minor, opus 70, and the symphony will be Mozart in C major, number 4, known as the "Jupiter." Volkmann's serenade for strings, with violoncello solo by Mr. Giese, and Wagner's "Masque Singers" overture will also be played.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, SIXTEENTH CONCERT. The concert on Saturday evening included the following selections: Spohr, Overture (Jessonda); Mozart, Aria (Bella mia fiamma, addio); Joh. Seb. Bach, Three Sonata Movements, arranged for Orchestra by W. Gericke; Schumann, (a) Moonlight; Mendelssohn, (b) Spring Song (Songs with Piano); Beethoven, Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67. The soloist was Miss Gertrude Franklin, and she, as the programme shows, added two songs with piano to the single selection which had originally been arranged. Miss Franklin was pleasing in tone, so far as the middle register was concerned, rendering each note with pure, round melody, but on her upper notes there was apparent a forced, cutting tone, which detracted much from the quality of the music. Her expression, too, though artificially excellent, was, in the Aria, lacking in true, appealing warmth; it seemed like head, not heart. The selection of Bach, arranged for the orchestra by Mr. Gericke, was given for the first time, and it testifies well to the musical spirit of the orchestra's new conductor. Beginning in the favorite way it develops here and there bright touches of novel combinations, always flowing in beautiful harmony, without a single harsh break to mar the general accord. The accelerated time of the third movement, together with the wafting of the air from instrument to instrument required the most rigid adherence to the direction and spirit of the conductor, and the unceasing devotion of the orchestra was well manifested by the expression and beauty which could come from their combined strains only by faithful following of the baton. The different gradations of time and expression in the opening overture were also admirable, although there was at times a lack of smoothness in the tones of the horns. The famous Fifth Symphony can never be anything but pleasing if rendered even fairly well. It served Saturday night to display to perfection a notable characteristic of the orchestra, their power, which, however strongly manifested, yet never offends by any unbalanced or out of tune intonation.

Music in Boston.

BOSTON, February 1.

THE sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Music Hall, when the following program was rendered:

Overture, "Jessonda".....Spohr
Aria, "Bella mia fiamma, addio!".....Mozart
Three sonata movements.....John Seb. Bach
(Arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke.)
Song, "Moonlight".....Schumann
Song, "Spring Song".....Mendelssohn
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven

Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, was the soloist of the occasion. Spohr's overture is seldom heard, although it is good music and deserves a more frequent hearing.

It is strange that a composer of such real merit like Spohr, and once so fêted, should be almost entirely lost sight of. Neither his operas nor his symphonies, quartets, trios, &c., are given, and only once in a while one hears one of his beautiful violin concertos, although these latter are decidedly preferable to the greater number of modern concertos for this instrument. The reason seems to be that Spohr's music is a go-between, so to say, between Mozart, Weber and Mendelssohn, without containing, however, any very marked individuality of its own. A composer nowadays without such individuality, must of necessity, however, be soon forgotten over the works of such writers as do possess it.

Miss Franklin has a pleasing voice, but her singing is unsatisfactory and almost amateurish. It leaves the impression as if her voice had had no proper schooling. I had the same feeling on hearing her sing in the Christmas performance of the "Messiah" by the Händel and Haydn Society. The audience, however, seemed very friendly disposed toward her efforts, and honored her by several recalls. The Bach arrangements by Gericke showed him to be a musician well versed in his craft, although Bach dressed up in nineteenth century style always makes a grotesque impression upon me.

The Symphony of Beethoven was well rendered and calls for no further comment, since it is here, at least, the best known of the nine. The program of the seventeenth concert, which is to take place February 7, will be: Jupiter Symphony, Mozart; Concerto D minor, op. 70, Rubinstein; Serenade, for strings, Volkman; Vorspiel, "Meistersinger," Wagner; the pianist being Mr. Louis Maas.

LOUIS MAAS.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night, before a fine audience. Taken altogether, it was the most brilliant success of the season. The programme was a remarkably fine one, Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, Schumann and Mendelssohn being represented. The concert opened with an exceptionally graceful and brilliant performance of Spohr's beautiful "Jessonda" overture. A novelty was three sonata movements by Bach arranged for orchestra by Mr. Gericke: the first a broad flowing and interesting movement from one of the master's flute sonatas; the second movement a minuet exquisitely delicate in its plaintive melody and all too short, also from a flute sonata; the third movement a spirited and brilliant allegro from a violin sonata, full of character and with many delightfully melodious moments. These selections showed Bach in a mood more genial and less persistently learned than he is often heard in on our concert stage. Mr. Gericke's instrumentation proved both a surprise and a delight in its refinement, its purity of taste, its judgment and its knowledge of refined orchestral effect. More than this, it is in perfect sympathy with the character of the music, is fluent, and has a charming effect of freshness and spontaneity, and is finely varied in color. The wood wind is used in an exquisite manner throughout, and the whole is masterly in its artistic musicianship. The audience manifested the most marked interest in the work and expressed the pleasure afforded them in applause equally hearty and appreciative. It is to be hoped that it may be heard again before the season is over. The concert ended with Beethoven's ever wonderful Symphony in C-minor, which received on this occasion one of the noblest interpretations we have ever heard of the work. From beginning to end the reading was without a flaw. The color throughout was magnificent; not a point was missed, and many points were made that we have never heard made before. It was a brilliant triumph for Mr. Gericke, and the performance excited the audience to a demonstrative admiration we have but rarely seen bestowed upon the performance of a symphony. The opening movement was given with splendid precision and effect, and with beautiful variety of light and shade. Nothing could have been more masterly than the reading of the andante, which was for once given without a trace of affectation in sentiment; and for once, also, the fanfare was given with the force and brilliancy that brought out its manifestly intended effect. The Scherzo was interpreted no less finely, the passages for the basses in the trio being taken at the same tempo as the preceding portion of the movement and with brilliant results. The finale was read gloriously and the break into the maestoso was as noble as it was impressive and stirring. The applause at the end of each movement was prolonged, enthusiastic and fully deserved. The soloist was Miss Gertrude Franklin, who sang Mozart's fine concert aria "Bella mia fiamma addio" in that delightfully finished style and with that pure musicianly taste we have learned to expect from her as a matter of course. The recitative was declaimed with fine breadth of dramatic expression, and the andante with a beautiful delicacy, refinement and simplicity admirably in keeping with Mozart. The brilliant and difficult allegro was given with rare force and perfect clearness of technique. The artist was well applauded and deservedly recalled. Later in the evening she sang Schumann's "Moonlight" and a Spring Song, "Durch im Wald," by Mendelssohn, in the former of which her pure and beautifully warm voice and her exquisitely true intonation were heard with charming effect, and in the latter of which the more brilliant qualities of her versatile and refined style came prominently forward. She was again cordially applauded and recalled.

At the next concert the programme will be as follows: Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony; Rubinstein's Concerto for piano in D-minor; a Serenade for strings by Volkman, and Wagner's "Meistersinger" Overture. Mr. Louis Maas will be the soloist.

There seems to be something of a spirit of opposition to the new conductor among some of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is a strong probability that Mr. Gericke will maintain the upper hand.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Sixteenth Programme—Miss Gertrude Franklin Soloist.

The 16th programme of the season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, at Music Hall last evening, had as its soloist Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and for a programme:

Overture, "Jessonda".....Spohr
Aria, "Bella mia fiamma, addio!".....Mozart
Three sonata movements, arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke.....John Seb. Bach
Songs: "Moonlight".....Schumann
"Spring Song".....Mendelssohn
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven

The reading given the great fifth symphony by Herr Gericke on this occasion was not as satisfying as his interpretation of the earlier numbers of the Beethoven series, and there was a constant feeling that the grandeur of the work was not fully realized by the conductor. This was notably apparent in the first measures of the opening movement, the full breadth and effect of which were dwarfed in the presentation given them. The beauty of the second movement was, however, brought out in all its perfection, and the quick appreciation of this portion of the symphony by the audience was justly bestowed, the orchestra being handled in a masterly fashion and the striking characteristics of the composer's work being clearly shown. The third and fourth movements were given with much less than their full effect, and, when compared with that ideal performance of this symphony under the direction of Dr. Damrosch a few seasons ago, there was a feeling of disappointment at the manner in which the work was given. In the orchestral setting of the Bach sonata movements, Herr Gericke has shown the skill of a clever musician, but why should these movements be so arranged? The effect was much the same as that of putting a modern frame to an ancient painting; the frame may be as beautiful as the picture, and yet the most unhappy effect be produced by the combination. There is an ample field for orchestral work without such ill advised arrangements. Miss Franklin did not appear to be in her best mood in the Mozart aria, her tones showing the influence of the varied and not altogether enjoyable climatic changes of late, but she gave enjoyment to the audience, and won an enthusiastic recall after each of her appearances.

to mar the general accord. The accelerated time of the third movement, together with the wafting of the air from instrument to instrument required the most rigid adherence to the direction and spirit of the conductor, and the unceasing devotion of the orchestra was well manifested by the expression and beauty which could come from their combined strains only by faithful following of the baton. The different gradations of time and expression in the opening overture were also admirable, although there was at times a lack of smoothness in the tones of the horns. The famous Fifth Symphony can never be anything but pleasing if rendered even fairly well. It served Saturday night to display to perfection a notable characteristic of the orchestra, their power, which, however strongly manifested, yet never offends by any unbalanced or unharmonious intonation.

Music in Boston.

BOSTON, February 1.

THE sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Music Hall, when the following program was rendered:

Overture, "Jessonda".....Spohr
Aria, "Bella mia fiamma, addio!".....Mozart
Three sonata movements.....John Seb. Bach
(Arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke.)

Song, "Moonlight".....Schumann
Song, "Spring Song".....Mendelssohn
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven

Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, was the soloist of the occasion. Spohr's overture is seldom heard, although it is good music and deserves a more frequent hearing.

It is strange that a composer of such real merit like Spohr, and once so fêted, should be almost entirely lost sight of. Neither his operas nor his symphonies, quartets, trios, &c., are given, and only once in a while one hears one of his beautiful violin concertos, although these latter are decidedly preferable to the greater number of modern concertos for this instrument. The reason seems to be that Spohr's music is a go-between, so to say, between Mozart, Weber and Mendelssohn, without containing, however, any very marked individuality of its own. A composer nowadays without such individuality, must of necessity, however, be soon forgotten over the works of such writers as do possess it.

Miss Franklin has a pleasing voice, but her singing is unsatisfactory and almost amateurish. It leaves the impression as if her voice had had no proper schooling. I had the same feeling on hearing her sing in the Christmas performance of the "Messiah" by the Händel and Haydn Society. The audience, however, seemed very friendly disposed toward her efforts, and honored her by several recalls. The Bach arrangements by Gericke showed him to be a musician well versed in his craft, although Bach dressed up in nineteenth century style always makes a grotesque impression upon me.

The Symphony of Beethoven was well rendered and calls for no further comment, since it is here, at least, the best known of the nine. The program of the seventeenth concert, which is to take place February 7, will be: Jupiter Symphony, Mozart; Concerto D minor, op. 70, Rubinstein; Serenade, for strings, Volkmann; Vorspiel, "Meistersinger," Wagner; the pianist being Mr. Louis Maas.

LOUIS MAAS.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night, before a fine audience. Taken altogether, it was the most brilliant success of the season. The programme was a remarkably fine one, Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, Schumann and Mendelssohn being represented. The concert opened with an exceptionally graceful and brilliant performance of Spohr's beautiful "Jessonda" overture. A novelty was three sonata movements by Bach arranged for orchestra by Mr. Gericke: the first a broad flowing and interesting movement from one of the master's flute sonatas; the second movement a minuet exquisitely delicate in its plaintive melody and all too short, also from a flute sonata; the third movement a spirited and brilliant allegro from a violin sonata, full of character and with many delightfully melodious moments. These selections showed Bach in a mood more genial and less persistently learned than he is often heard in on our concert stage. Mr. Gericke's instrumentation proved both a surprise and a delight in its refinement, its purity of taste, its judgment and its knowledge of refined orchestral effect. More than this, it is in perfect sympathy with the character of the music, is fluent, and has a charming effect of freshness and spontaneity, and is finely varied in color. The wood wind is used in an exquisite manner throughout, and the whole is masterly in its artistic musicianship. The audience manifested the most marked interest in the work and expressed the pleasure afforded them in applause equally hearty and appreciative. It is to be hoped that it may be heard again before the season is over. The concert ended with Beethoven's ever wonderful Symphony in C-minor, which received on this occasion one of the noblest interpretations we have ever heard of the work. From beginning to end the reading was without a flaw. The color throughout was magnificent; not a point was missed, and many points were made that we have never heard made before. It was a brilliant triumph for Mr. Gericke, and the performance excited the audience to a demonstrative admiration we have but rarely seen bestowed upon the performance of a symphony. The opening movement was given with splendid precision and effect, and with beautiful variety of light and shade. Nothing could have been more masterly than the reading of the andante, which was for once given without a trace of affectation in sentiment; and for once, also, the fanfare was given with the force and brilliancy that brought out its manifestly intended effect. The Scherzo was interpreted no less finely, the passages for the basses in the trio being taken at the same tempo as the preceding portion of the movement and with brilliant results. The finale was read gloriously and the break into the maestoso was as noble as it was impressive and stirring. The applause at the end of each movement was prolonged, enthusiastic and fully deserved. The soloist was Miss Gertrude Franklin, who sang Mozart's fine concert aria "Bella mia fiamma addio" in that delightfully finished style and with that pure musicianly taste we have learned to expect from her as a matter of course. The recitative was declaimed with fine breadth of dramatic expression, and the andante with a beautiful delicacy, refinement and simplicity admirably in keeping with Mozart. The brilliant and difficult allegro was given with rare force and perfect clearness of technique. The artist was well applauded and deservedly recalled. Later in the evening she sang Schumann's "Moonlight" and a Spring Song, "Durch im Wald," by Mendelssohn, in the former of which her pure and beautifully warm voice and her exquisitely true intonation were heard with charming effect, and in the latter of which the more brilliant qualities of her versatile and refined style came prominently forward. She was again cordially applauded and recalled.

At the next concert the programme will be as follows: Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony; Rubinstein's Concerto for piano in D-minor; a Serenade for strings by Volkmann, and Wagner's "Meistersinger" Overture. Mr. Louis Maas will be the soloist.

There seems to be something of a spirit of opposition to the new conductor among some of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is a strong probability that Mr. Gericke will maintain the upper hand.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Sixteenth Programme—Miss Gertrude Franklin Soloist.

The 16th programme of the season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, at Music Hall last evening, had as its soloist Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano, and for a programme:

Overture, "Jessonda".....Spohr
Aria, "Bella mia fiamma, addio!".....Mozart
Three sonata movements, arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke.....John Seb. Bach
Songs { "Moonlight".....Schumann
"Spring Song".....Mendelssohn
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven

The reading given the great fifth symphony by Herr Gericke on this occasion was not as satisfying as his interpretation of the earlier numbers of the Beethoven series, and there was a constant feeling that the grandeur of the work was not fully realized by the conductor. This was notably apparent in the first measures of the opening movement, the full breadth and effect of which were dwarfed in the presentation given them. The beauty of the second movement was, however, brought out in all its perfection, and the quick appreciation of this portion of the symphony by the audience was justly bestowed, the orchestra being handled in a masterly fashion and the striking characteristics of the composer's work being clearly shown. The third and fourth movements were given with much less than their full effect, and, when compared with that ideal performance of this symphony under the direction of Dr. Damrosch a few seasons ago, there was a feeling of disappointment at the manner in which the work was given. In the orchestral setting of the Bach sonata movements, Herr Gericke has shown the skill of a clever musician, but why should these movements be so arranged? The effect was much the same as that of putting a modern frame to an ancient painting; the frame may be as beautiful as the picture, and yet the most unhappy effect be produced by the combination. There is an ample field for orchestral work without such ill-advised arrangements. Miss Franklin did not appear to be in her best mood in the Mozart aria, her tones showing the influence of the varied and not altogether enjoyable climatic changes of late, but she gave enjoyment to the audience, and won an enthusiastic recall after each of her appearances.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The following was the programme given in this series last Saturday:

- Overture, "Jessonda".....Spohr
Aria, "Bella mia fiamma, addio!".....Mozart
Miss Gertrude Franklin.
Three Sonata movements.....Joh. Seb. Bach
Arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke.
(First time.)
a. "Moonlight".....Schumann
b. Spring Song.....Mendelssohn
(Songs with piano.)
Miss Franklin.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Andante con moto—Allegro. Allegro; Presto.

There is little in this list for me to descant upon, as "Jessonda's" overture is old, and the C minor symphony has become more than a twice told tale to our concert goers; but the works were given so superbly that they seemed almost new. Mr. Gericke's method of training is emphatically synthetical. He will go through each difficult phrase time after time until he has it polished to perfection. In balance of parts also he shows real genius. Many figures that are lost under other conductors are brought to the surface by him and made clear. With all this he never loses sight of the character of the work as a whole, and the result is that the orchestra stands to-day in a higher position than it has heretofore attained. Of course he has his troubles with the orchestra. Sometimes a violinist, a hornist, or a cornetist, after going through a phrase fifty times and not suiting the leader, gets mad and speaks up, but from my knowledge of the man I can assure you that Mr. Gericke will keep the upper hand. Such rehearsing as I have alluded to would bear its best fruit in a symphony like Beethoven's fifth. The opening figure for example, went in a clear cut manner, and so did the terrific phrase of the contrabasses in the trio of the Scherzo. The passages for woodwind I have never heard so well performed as upon this occasion, and the andante had the best performance it has ever received in Boston.

The audience appreciated what had been done, for at every available point enthusiastic applause was showered upon Mr. Gericke. His own arrangement of three Bach movements was an agreeable surprise. Nothing in them was dull or dry, and the orchestration was so finely arranged that one seemed to hear the works as Bach himself would have desired them. Everything was gracefully yet conservatively done, and if one objects to "arrangements," in this case at least, it can be replied that one can only hear the old contrapuntists in the shape of an arrangement of some kind. Mr. Gericke certainly deserves the highest commendation for the manner in which he has carried out this work, and we venture to hope that some of his own orchestral compositions, of which we have heard quite a number, may soon be brought out in these concerts. They are all good, musicianly compositions, and worthy of a place on these programmes.

Miss Gertrude Franklin did not entirely succeed in her first number, her voice seemed hard, and some effort was apparent, but in the two lieder she sang with much sweetness and purity of tone. She was heartily recalled after both appearances, and in the "Spring Song" awakened a good degree of enthusiasm. Next week comes the Jupiter symphony.

L. C. E.

MUSIC.

Conver

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The concert last evening presented no novelties, yet we are sure that no auditor found the programme at all tiresome. The overture to "Jessonda" is one of Spohr's most admirable compositions in this form. The two chief themes—the Hindoo chorus and march—are finely contrasted, yet there are no brusque transitions, no sudden interruptions, but all is imbued with Spohr's suavity and genial flow. The Beethoven symphony—the fifth—is one of the constant favorites in Boston. Time was when this symphony was performed in this city in three sections with violin solos, songs and "light music" between each portion, to break the monotony of the classical music. Our fathers little dreamed then that the time would come when Boston should lead the great cities of the world in the number and quality of its symphony concerts.

The C minor is interesting in a double aspect. It is the beginning of Beethoven's deviations from established form (for the scherzo of the second symphony is scarcely as great an advance as the treatment of the last two movements of this work), and it is the first work where thoroughly modern effects of instrumentation are brought forward. Not only are the double basses and the timpani brought forward in a new manner (for that epoch), but this symphony is the first where trombones or contrabassoons are employed.

Mr. Gericke's excellent habit of attention to details found full scope in this work, and many figures which have been drowned in heavy tutti were well brought out in the concert of last night. Of individual points of excellence there were many. The woodwind in its dialogue with the strings was excellently balanced. The opening figure which so often seems ragged was given with praiseworthy unity; the famous phrase for the double basses went better than we have ever heard it in Boston save under Thomas. It may be urged that Mr. Gericke gives too much attention to detail, but we have as yet only discovered a heightening of the general effect by these means and believe that his synthetical method is the best. He certainly does not lose sight of the coherency of the whole in his attention to the lesser figures and phrases.

In giving the fifth symphony the orchestra awakened a new interest in the audience, that of active criticism, for few regular concert-goers but have heard the work often enough to have some established ideal in the matter of tempi and general reading while they accept many of the other works on faith.

The result of this popular criticism was an absolute triumph for the conductor and orchestra. The light and shade imparted to the work was phenomenal. If we state that the figure in the development of the first movement was unsteady, and the end of the chief theme of the scherzo rather too strong, we have mentioned the only points of criticism possible; the rest must be laudation. The elastic tempo of the andante was entirely commendable, and the woodwind never did better work than in this movement. The contrabass figure of the scherzo was taken very fast, but was clear and perfectly shaded. Especially fine in its contrasts was the close of the scherzo, where a hesitating phrase between major and minor, with a pulsating rhythm of timpani strokes, dashes off into the broad fanfare of the finale in major; a peculiar touch entirely in the vein of the master. Three movements by Bach, instrumentated by Gericke, proved that the latter is a master of orchestration. His scoring was thoroughly effective and conservative enough to be in the vein of Bach. The hearty applause which followed evinced both the pleasure of the audience and the esteem in which the conductor is held; in fact, the tributes of applause were showered upon Mr. Gericke very continuously. Miss Gertrude Franklin was the vocalist. In the Mozart aria there was a trace of effort apparent, and the singer was not in her best voice, but she fully redeemed herself in two lieder which she sung subsequently, and in Mendelssohn's "Spring Song" won a most hearty recall. Next week comes the Jupiter Symphony, and Mr. Louis Maas, as pianist, in a Rubinstein concerto.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The Saturday evening concert was the 16th in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current season. This is the arrangement of the novelties presented:
Spohr, Overture (Jessonda).
Mozart, Aria (Bella mia fiamma, addio!)
Joh. Seb. Bach, Three Sonata movements, arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke. (First time).
Schumann, (a) Moonlight.
Mendelssohn, (b) Spring song.
(Songs with piano).
Beethoven, Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.
Allegro con brio. Andante con moto.
Allegro. Allegro; presto.

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer. Of the performance of the orchestra it is difficult to speak without seeming to exaggerate; but it was notable, and even great. Again did Mr. Gericke assert his pre-eminent qualities as an interpreter, and it is safe to say that his reading of the fifth Beethoven symphony was fraught with surprises to even the sage among those who reverently study the great master, surprises which gladdened and benefited. Throughout the work the players were closely bound to the spirit in which their leader moved; in fact the performance begot so great a tension in the listener that it became a purely physical relief when some over-anxious player broke a string or sounded an improvised note or two out of scena. The first Allegro was taken with great brio and always clearly; but with such elasticity of motion and extreme susceptibility to the passing impression that from out all the familiar sentences came new meanings. In the Andante the beat established a tempo, slower than we often are taught, but never have we heard it more to our

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The following was the programme given in this series last Saturday:

- Overture, "Jessonda".....Spohr
Aria, "Bella mia fiamma, addio!".....Mozart
Miss Gertrude Franklin.
Three Sonata movements.....Joh. Seb. Bach
Arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke.
(First time.)
a. "Moonlight".....Schumann
b. Spring Song.....Mendelssohn
(Songs with piano.)
Miss Franklin.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.....Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Andante con moto—Allegro. Allegro; Presto.

There is little in this list for me to descant upon, as "Jessonda's" overture is old, and the C minor symphony has become more than a twice told tale to our concert goers; but the works were given so superbly that they seemed almost new. Mr. Gericke's method of training is emphatically synthetical. He will go through each difficult phrase time after time until he has it polished to perfection. In balance of parts also he shows real genius. Many figures that are lost under other conductors are brought to the surface by him and made clear. With all this he never loses sight of the character of the work as a whole, and the result is that the orchestra stands to-day in a higher position than it has heretofore attained. Of course he has his troubles with the orchestra. Sometimes a violinist, a hornist, or a cornetist, after going through a phrase fifty times and not suiting the leader, gets mad and speaks up, but from my knowledge of the man I can assure you that Mr. Gericke will keep the upper hand. Such rehearsing as I have alluded to would bear its best fruit in a symphony like Beethoven's fifth. The opening figure for example, went in a clear cut manner, and so did the terrific phrase of the contrabasses in the trio of the Scherzo. The passages for woodwind I have never heard so well performed as upon this occasion, and the andante had the best performance it has ever received in Boston.

The audience appreciated what had been done, for at every available point enthusiastic applause was showered upon Mr. Gericke. His own arrangement of three Bach movements was an agreeable surprise. Nothing in them was dull or dry, and the orchestration was so finely arranged that one seemed to hear the works as Bach himself would have desired them. Everything was gracefully yet conservatively done, and if one objects to "arrangements," in this case at least, it can be replied that one can only hear the old contrapuntists in the shape of an arrangement of some kind. Mr. Gericke certainly deserves the highest commendation for the manner in which he has carried out this work, and we venture to hope that some of his own orchestral compositions, of which we have heard quite a number, may soon be brought out in these concerts. They are all good, musicianly compositions, and worthy of a place on these programmes.

Miss Gertrude Franklin did not entirely succeed in her first number, her voice seemed hard, and some effort was apparent, but in the two lieder she sang with much sweetness and purity of tone. She was heartily recalled after both appearances, and in the "Spring Song" awakened a good degree of enthusiasm. Next week comes the Jupiter symphony.

L. C. E.

MUSIC.

Carver

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The concert last evening presented no novelties, yet we are sure that no auditor found the programme at all tiresome. The overture to "Jessonda" is one of Spohr's most admirable compositions in this form. The two chief themes—the Hindoo chorus and march—are finely contrasted, yet there are no brusque transitions, no sudden interruptions, but all is imbued with Spohr's suavity and genial flow. The Beethoven symphony—the fifth—is one of the constant favorites in Boston. Time was when this symphony was performed in this city in three sections with violin solos, songs and "light music" between each portion, to break the monotony of the classical music. Our fathers little dreamed then that the time would come when Boston should lead the great cities of the world in the number and quality of its symphony concerts.

The C minor is interesting in a double aspect. It is the beginning of Beethoven's deviations from established form (for the scherzo of the second symphony is scarcely as great an advance as the treatment of the last two movements of this work), and it is the first work where thoroughly modern effects of instrumentation are brought forward. Not only are the double basses and the timpani brought forward in a new manner (for that epoch), but this symphony is the first where trombones or contrabassoons are employed.

Mr. Gericke's excellent habit of attention to details found full scope in this work, and many figures which have been drowned in heavy tutti were well brought out in the concert of last night. Of individual points of excellence there were many. The woodwind in its dialogue with the strings was excellently balanced. The opening figure which so often seems ragged was given with praiseworthy unity; the famous phrase for the double basses went better than we have ever heard it in Boston save under Thomas. It may be urged that Mr. Gericke gives too much attention to detail, but we have as yet only discovered a heightening of the general effect by these means and believe that his synthetical method is the best. He certainly does not lose sight of the coherency of the whole in his attention to the lesser figures and phrases.

In giving the fifth symphony the orchestra awakened a new interest in the audience, that of active criticism, for few regular concert-goers but have heard the work often enough to have some established ideal in the matter of tempi and general reading while they accept many of the other works on faith.

The result of this popular criticism was an absolute triumph for the conductor and orchestra. The light and shade imparted to the work was phenomenal. If we state that the figure in the development of the first movement was unsteady, and the end of the chief theme of the scherzo rather too strong, we have mentioned the only points of criticism possible; the rest must be laudation. The elastic tempo of the andante was entirely commendable, and the woodwind never did better work than in this movement. The contrabass figure of the scherzo was taken very fast, but was clear and perfectly shaded. Especially fine in its contrasts was the close of the scherzo, where a hesitating phrase between major and minor, with a pulsating rhythm of timpani strokes, dashes off into the broad fanfare of the finale in major; a peculiar touch entirely in the vein of the master. Three movements by Bach, instrumented by Gericke, proved that the latter is a master of orchestration. His scoring was thoroughly effective and conservative enough to be in the vein of Bach. The hearty applause which followed evinced both the pleasure of the audience and the esteem in which the conductor is held; in fact, the tributes of applause were showered upon Mr. Gericke very continuously. Miss Gertrude Franklin was the vocalist. In the Mozart aria there was a trace of effort apparent, and the singer was not in her best voice, but she fully redeemed herself in two lieder which she sung subsequently, and in Mendelssohn's "Spring Song" won a most hearty recall. Next week comes the Jupiter Symphony, and Mr. Louis Maas, as pianist, in a Rubinstein concerto.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The Saturday evening concert was the 16th in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's current season. This is the arrangement of the novelties presented:

- Spohr, Overture (Jessonda).
Mozart, Aria (Bella mia fiamma, addio!)
Joh. Seb. Bach, Three Sonata movements, arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke. (First time).
Schumann, (a) Moonlight.
Mendelssohn, (b) Spring song.
(Songs with piano).
Beethoven, Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.
Allegro con brio. Andante con moto.
Allegro. Allegro; presto.

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer. Of the performance of the orchestra it is difficult to speak without seeming to exaggerate; but it was notable, and even great. Again did Mr. Gericke assert his pre-eminent qualities as an interpreter, and it is safe to say that his reading of the fifth Beethoven symphony was fraught with surprises to even the sage among those who reverently study the great master, surprises which gladdened and benefited. Throughout the work the players were closely bound to the spirit in which their leader moved; in fact the performance begot so great a tension in the listener that it became a purely physical relief when some over-anxious player broke a string or sounded an improvised note or two out of scena. The first Allegro was taken with great brio and always clearly; but with such elasticity of motion and extreme susceptibility to the passing impression that from out all the familiar sentences came new meanings. In the Andante the beat established a tempo, slower than we often are taught, but never have we heard it more to our liking. To hurry this movement is to deprive one of the loftiest and purest musical thoughts of half its worth. Under Mr. Gericke it was potent with sentiment; the emotional power of music was here carried to its highest flight. In the reactionary movements before the march of the concluding allegro is announced the treatment was faultless; the double basses were superb in their dexterous unison, and the fine crescendo for the strings which their unique play introduces was developed judiciously and admirably carried out. The concluding Allegro presto of this great symphony was in many ways a revelation. To publicly thank our conductor for so fine a performance would be no more than he merits. Mr. Gericke with unflinching devotion to what is apparently a hobby, played another "arrangement," and it would certainly seem that in choosing to play those creations, which do not meet with critical approval, he is upheld to some extent by his audience. Doubtless his exceptional attitude towards the Bach themes was the cause of much of the applause which welcomed their performance; but their inherent beauty and strength of setting acted also favorably on the typical Bostonian, who, not so very long ago, left the Music Hall when Wagner was being played, but who, also, sincerely and fondly enjoys Bach. The two sonata movements first played are quietly scored, while the third is made rugged and strong by the full harmony of its strings with subservient and helpful wood-wind. Each is so characteristic in its flavor that this in itself is the best praise. The Jessonda overture, from Spohr's best opera, was played charmingly. The theme of its allegro is such as can only emanate from the violinist par excellence, writing for his brother players. The Mozart concert aria selected by Miss Franklin was not a good choice. This singer has few vocal vagaries—those of method are meant—for her attentive study has given her an emission which conforms to good models, and she retains well the pure vowel forms, while the consonants are not a disturbing element with her; but no singer can successfully essay a grand aria much of which lies without her best voice and which abounds in thankless and difficult technique. Miss Franklin's style is sometimes discomforting, seldom assuring; the climax of the Mozart aria is conceived in a heroic vein, requiring robust and grand yet sympathetic treatment. How Miss Franklin would have pleased in the lieder by Schumann and Mendelssohn will ever remain in doubt, owing to the stupid way in which her accompaniments were treated. If ever there was a song written requiring delicacy of treatment and repose in its rendering, it is the beautiful "Mödnacht" of Schumann; but why a sight-reader and man of apparent musical utility was allowed, at our symphony concerts, to grieve and strangle a thought as poetic as this is beyond comprehension. The programme failed to quote the words of either aria or songs. We in Boston are already way behind London in not having anything like an analytical programme at our classical concerts. Rearward of New York in not having an orchestra sufficiently learned in the musical alphabet of performing to play anything but German music; but having once, under Mr. Henschel, become accustomed to seeing the words of the singers' selection upon our programmes, may we not be returned to the possession of so much that before we counted as consideration and enterprise? At the next concert Mr. Louis Maas will play Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte in D minor, op. 70, and the orchestral selections are not entirely antique. They are: Mozart symphony in C major; Rob. Volkmann, serenade for strings with solo for Mr. Giese, and the magnificent Meistersinger overture.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the sixteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Spohr. Overture to "Jessonda."
Mozart. Aria, "Bella mia fiamma,"
Bach. Three sonata movements, arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke.
Schumann. "Moonlight."
Mendelssohn. Spring Song.
(Songs with Pianoforte.)
Beethoven. Symphony in C minor, No. 5.

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer.

The "Jessonda" overture is an old friend, whose face one is glad to see now and then; it was excellently played. The three Bach movements were charming, and the hearty reception given them by the audience showed plainly enough how much they were enjoyed. This was but one more example of a rule which the critical observer must have found to be very generally valid, namely, that what the average concert-goer dislikes in Bach is, upon the whole, an element which is merely accidental, and by no means essential in his music. It is not the "learning" (when shall we hear the last of this vile word?) it is not the contrapuntal character, it is not the peculiar melodic constitution of Bach's music which is abhorrent to the average modern ear; it is principally the old-fashioned, quaint-sounding instrumental setting which, to the majority of music-lovers, seems thin and ungrateful. Our modern audiences, accustomed to music of which the rich and varied volume of tone gives the physical ear the requisite nervous fillip, find themselves ill at ease in face of music which clamors less loudly at the gate of their attention. But take almost any Bach piece you please, and give it something of modern tone-color, and the public will prick up its ears readily enough and take infinite pleasure in the feast. It is merely a question of eating beef without mustard or horse-radish, when your palate has long been used to these condiments. We have, in these columns, frequently spoken our mind about "arrangements" with perfect freedom. But here is a case in which the arranging process does real good; not in the way of improving Bach, but in the way of making him acceptable, of popularizing him. And it is eminently useful to have so noble and fruitful a spirit as Bach's popularized in any shape whatever. In considering such arrangements as these of Mr. Gericke's, the first question rationally to be asked is, Do they make the music acceptable, interesting and inspiring to the public? If so, well and good! All questions of whether they are done in the best possible way, of their being in exact harmony with the spirit of the composer, of the perfect purity of the part writing, etc., etc., are of quite secondary importance. Let it be said, also, that to answer any such questions advisedly would require no inconsiderable study on the critic's part; there is probably not a man living who is competent to judge of this after a single hearing. Let us say that Mr. Gericke's arrangements were very effective, and sounded very well indeed. The playing of the Fifth Symphony was masterly, superb almost at every point. We can remember no such performance of this symphony by any orchestra. The chances for doing things in bad taste which

Mr. Gericke did not avail himself of, would make a long list. Miss Franklin sang the Mozart aria with praiseworthy and painstaking sincerity; but this terrible aria is far beyond her powers. Leaving its technical difficulty out of the question, it demands a force of passion, an artistic development and an intellectual power such as one finds united in very, very few singers. Since Rudersdorf is dead, we know of no soprano in the world to whom we would willingly intrust it. To do it full justice is one of the great tasks in the field of dramatic singing. In the other songs Miss Franklin was wholly charming; the purity of her phrasing and intonation, the artistic sentiment of her singing, were perfect.

The next programme is—

Mozart. Symphony in C (Jupiter),
Rubinstein. Concerto in D minor, Op. 70.
Volkmann. Serenade for strings, with cello obbligato.
Wagner. Overture to "Die Meistersinger."

Dr. Louis Maas will be the pianist, and Mr. Fritz Giese the cellist.

Music. Home Journal

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS. — The sixteenth symphony concert in Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was one of unusual merit. The programme contained three selections for orchestra, namely: Spohr's Overture to Jessonda; three sonata movements by Bach, arranged by Herr Gericke, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The overture by Spohr received very worthy and interesting treatment, even to its most cloying effects being presented in all their integrity. Regarding the orchestral arrangement by Herr Gericke of the sonata movements of Bach, the protest entered by an esteemed contemporary seems ill-founded. Many of Bach's works, especially those written for violin and chorichord, are far more effective when elaborated and enlarged for the orchestra; the contrapuntal treatment thereby being presented with more clearness. There are other arguments in favor of such orchestration which have a special application to the music of Bach. Herr Gericke has shown great skill in the arrangement referred to, the simple, quaint and unaffected themes of the great composer being displayed with an effect which in their original form is of necessity more or less obscured. The entire performance was irreproachable and deserved all the enthusiastic applause bestowed upon it. Herr Gericke's reading of the symphony was broad, clear, and masterly. The soloist of the concert was Miss Gertrude Franklin, who rendered Mozart's aria, "Bella mia fiamma addio," and songs by Schumann and Mendelssohn. Her success with the aria was impressive artistic not only in that fidelity to the composer's intent which so few artists appear to regard as of the highest importance, but in beauty of voice, perfectly natural and charming vocalism, and other characteristics, all in all so thorough and artistic as to render it unnecessary that the slightest unfavorable discrimination should be made. In so doing at least one of our esteemed contemporaries has seemed hypercritical and unfair. One rarely has the pleasure of experiencing such a musiliking. To hurry this movement is to deprive one of the loftiest and purest musical thoughts of half its worth. Under Mr. Gericke it was potent with sentiment; the emotional power of music was here carried to its highest flight. In the reactionary movements before the march of the concluding allegro is announced the treatment was faultless; the double basses were superb in their dexterous unison, and the fine crescendo for the strings which their unique play introduces was developed judiciously and admirably carried out. The concluding Allegro presto of this great symphony was in many ways a revelation. To publicly thank our conductor for so fine a performance would be no more than he merits. Mr. Gericke with unflinching devotion to what is apparently a hobby, played another "arrangement," and it would certainly seem that in choosing to play those creations, which do not meet with critical approval, he is upheld to some extent by his audience. Doubtless his exceptional attitude towards the Bach themes was the cause of much of the applause which welcomed their performance; but their inherent beauty and strength of setting acted also favorably on the typical Bostonian, who, not so very long ago, left the Music Hall when Wagner was being played, but who, also, sincerely and fondly enjoys Bach. The two sonata movements first played are quietly scored, while the third is made rugged and strong by the full harmony of its strings with subservient and helpful wood-wind. Each is so characteristic in its flavor that this in itself is the best praise. The Jessonda overture, from Spohr's best opera, was played charmingly. The theme of its allegro is such as can only emanate from the violinist par excellence, writing for his brother players. The Mozart concert aria selected by Miss Franklin was not a good choice. This singer has few vocal vagaries—those of method are meant—for her attentive study has given her an emission which conforms to good models, and she retains well the pure vowel forms, while the consonants are not a disturbing element with her; but no singer can successfully essay a grand aria much of which lies without her best voice and which abounds in thankless and difficult technique. Miss Franklin's style is sometimes discomforting, seldom assuring; the climax of the Mozart aria is conceived in a heroic vein, requiring robust and grand yet sympathetic treatment. How Miss Franklin would have pleased in the lieder by Schumann and Mendelssohn will ever remain in doubt, owing to the stupid way in which her accompaniments were treated. If ever there was a song written requiring delicacy of treatment and repose in its rendering, it is the beautiful "Mödnacht" of Schumann; but why a sight-reader and man of apparent musical utility was allowed, at our symphony concerts, to grieve and strangle a thought as poetic as this is beyond comprehension. The programme failed to quote the words of either aria or songs. We in Boston are already way behind London in not having anything like an analytical programme at our classical concerts. Rearward of New York in not having an orchestra sufficiently learned in the musical alphabet of performing to play anything but German music; but having once, under Mr. Henschel, become accustomed to seeing the words of the singers' selection upon our programmes, may we not be returned to the possession of so much that before we counted as consideration and enterprise? At the next concert Mr. Louis Maas will play Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte in D minor, op. 70, and the orchestral selections are not entirely antique. They are: Mozart symphony in C major; Rob. Volkmann, serenade for strings with solo for Mr. Giese, and the magnificent Meistersinger overture.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the sixteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Spohr. Overture to "Jessonda."
Mozart. Aria, "Bella mia fiamma."
Bach. Three sonata movements, arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke.
Schumann. "Moonlight."
Mendelssohn. Spring Song.
(Songs with piano forte.)
Beethoven. Symphony in C minor, No. 5.

Miss Gertrude Franklin was the singer.

The "Jessonda" overture is an old friend, whose face one is glad to see now and then; it was excellently played. The three Bach movements were charming, and the hearty reception given them by the audience showed plainly enough how much they were enjoyed. This was but one more example of a rule which the careful observer must have found to be very generally valid, namely, that what the average concert-goer dislikes in Bach is, upon the whole, an element which is merely accidental, and by no means essential in his music. It is not the "learning" (when shall we hear the last of this vile word?) it is not the contrapuntal character, it is not the peculiar melodic constitution of Bach's music which is abhorrent to the average modern ear; it is principally the old-fashioned, quaint-sounding instrumental setting which, to the majority of music-lovers, seems thin and ungrateful. Our modern audiences, accustomed to music of which the rich and varied volume of tone gives the physical ear the requisite nervous fillip, find themselves ill at ease in face of music which clamors less loudly at the gate of their attention. But take almost any Bach piece you please, and give it something of modern tone-color, and the public will prick up its ears readily enough and take infinite pleasure in the feast. It is merely a question of eating beef without mustard or horse-radish, when your palate has long been used to these condiments. We have, in these columns, frequently spoken our mind about "arrangements", with perfect freedom. But here is a case in which the arranging process does real good; not in the way of improving Bach, but in the way of making him acceptable, of popularizing him. And it is eminently useful to have so noble and fruitful a spirit as Bach's popularized in any shape whatever. In considering such arrangements as these of Mr. Gericke's, the first question rationally to be asked is, Do they make the music acceptable, interesting and inspiring to the public? If so, well and good! All questions of whether they are done in the best possible way, of their being in exact harmony with the spirit of the composer, of the perfect purity of the part writing, etc., etc., are of quite secondary importance. Let it be said, also, that to answer any such questions advisedly would require no inconsiderable study on the critic's part; there is probably not a man living who is competent to judge of this after a single hearing. Let us say that Mr. Gericke's arrangements were very effective, and sounded very well indeed. The playing of the Fifth Symphony was masterly, superb almost at every point. We can remember no such performance of this symphony by any orchestra. The chances for doing things in bad taste which

Mr. Gericke did not avail himself of, would make a long list. Miss Franklin sang the Mozart aria with praiseworthy and painstaking sincerity; but this terrible aria is far beyond her powers. Leaving its technical difficulty out of the question, it demands a force of passion, an artistic development and an intellectual power such as one finds united in very, very few singers. Since Rudersdorff is dead, we know of no soprano in the world to whom we would willingly intrust it. To do it full justice is one of the great tasks in the field of dramatic singing. In the other songs Miss Franklin was wholly charming; the purity of her phrasing and intonation, the artistic sentiment of her singing, were perfect.

The next programme is—

Mozart. Symphony in C (Jupiter),
Rubinstein. Concerto in D minor, Op. 70.
Volkmann. Serenade for strings with cello obbligato.
Wagner. Overture to "Die Meistersinger."

Dr. Louis Maas will be the pianist, and Mr. Fritz Giese the cellist.

Music. Home Journal

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS. — The sixteenth symphony concert in Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was one of unusual merit. The programme contained three selections for orchestra, namely: Spohr's Overture to Jessonda; three sonata movements by Bach, arranged by Herr Gericke, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The overture by Spohr received very worthy and interesting treatment, even to its most cloying effects being presented in all their integrity. Regarding the orchestral arrangement by Herr Gericke of the sonata movements of Bach, the protest entered by an esteemed contemporary seems ill-founded. Many of Bach's works, especially those written for violin and choricord, are far more effective when elaborated and enlarged for the orchestra; the contrapuntal treatment thereby being presented with more clearness. There are other arguments in favor of such orchestration which have a special application to the music of Bach. Herr Gericke has shown great skill in the arrangement referred to, the simple, quaint and unaffected themes of the great composer being displayed with an effect which in their original form is of necessity more or less obscured. The entire performance was irreproachable and deserved all the enthusiastic applause bestowed upon it. Herr Gericke's reading of the symphony was broad, clear, and masterly. The soloist of the concert was Miss Gertrude Franklin, who rendered Mozart's aria, "Bella mia fiamma addio," and songs by Schumann and Mendelssohn. Her success with the aria was impressive artistic not only in that fidelity to the composer's intent which so few artists appear to regard as of the highest importance, but in beauty of voice, perfectly natural and charming vocalism, and other characteristics, all in all so thorough and artistic as to render it unnecessary that the slightest unfavorable discrimination should be made. In so doing at least one of our esteemed contemporaries has seemed hypercritical and unfair. One rarely has the pleasure of experiencing such a musicially treatment of a difficult aria, and that by Mozart, as was given by Miss Franklin. She was equally fortunate with the "Spring Song" of Mendelssohn, and Schumann's song entitled "Moonlight." The applause she received could not have been more just in recognizing the merit of her effort, and for once the cordiality and enthusiasm of an audience was eminently reliable in the testimony it afforded. The concert ended with a broad, clear and masterly performance of Beethoven's fifth symphony. More conservatism was shown by Herr Gericke in his reading of the work than he has yet manifested here, especially in his treatment of the Beethoven symphonies. It was a reading which musicians could appreciate on account of its integrity to the score.

The sixteenth concert, Jan. 31, presented the overture of "Jessonda," by Spohr. It was well played. This overture is very musical, one of the best extant; and its beauties were fully brought out by Mr. Gericke. Gertrude Franklin sang "Bella mia fiamma, addio," by Mozart. She sang fairly well, being an improvement on recent lady vocalists at these concerts. Later in the evening she sang two songs, — "Moonlight," by Schumann; "Spring Song," by Mendelssohn, — in which she was more successful. The sonata movements from Bach, arranged by Mr. Gericke for orchestra, were finely played. Now let Mr. Gericke compose something original for orchestra, and not spend his valuable time in spinning out threadbare themes. In a word, let well enough alone. The Fifth Symphony, No. 5, in C, of Beethoven, received a notable reading, showing the orchestra to be rapidly improving under their able conductor. Folio BOSTONIANS are altogether too restless under lawful restraint, and it is a good thing to find Herr Gericke requiring strict adherence to rules in the Symphony Orchestra. The members are under contract for their services, and they are not allowed to be away from the regular rehearsals or concerts for the sake of concertizing somewhere else. Only by such regularity can the best work be done; and for the lack of it our playhouses and concerts suffer. Hundreds of performances are insufficiently rehearsed, or given off-hand.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7TH, AT 8. P. M.

PROGRAMME.

W. A. MOZART,	SYMPHONY in C major, (Jupiter,) No. 4. Allegro vivace.—Andante cantabile.— Allegretto.—Allegro molto.
ANT. RUBINSTEIN,	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in D minor, op. 70. Moderato.—Moderato assai.—Allegro assai.—
ROB. VOLKMANN,	SERENADE FOR STRINGS. (CELLO SOLO by Mr Giese.)
RICH. WAGNER,	OVERTURE. (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg.)

SOLOIST:

MR. LOUIS MAAS.

The Piano used is a Henry F. Miller.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.35 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE VOLKMANN SERENADE.

Louis Maas

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme for last Saturday evening's symphony concert was a symmetrical and well arranged one, and in the performance of it there was often much of the highest excellence on the part of both conductor and orchestra. Yet, somehow, the first part of the evening, at least, seemed dull; the music appeared not to inspire fully the players nor to warm thoroughly the audience, so that, while there was attention and interest, there was no enthusiasm and the applause which followed the movements of the symphony was faint. Yet the symphony, which was Mozart's "Jupiter," in C major, No. 4, was beautifully read and full of details which were most creditable to individual instruments. The sylvan andante cantabile, depending as much as it does upon the phrasing and finish of the first violins, was exquisitely given throughout, and the frequent little sudden accents were emphasized with a proportionate force which gave them their prominence without ever pushing them beyond the just dynamic scale of the movement, while in the final allegro there was bright, clear, ready expression of the runs for the bass strings which are so apt to be dull or heavy. Reviewing the symphony, then, and finding it so elegantly and appreciatively given, the explanation of its apparent ineffectiveness must perhaps be sought in its general quietude of thought, and of its phases of feeling, in which gaiety never becomes exuberant, animation eager, nor earnestness assertive. And perhaps, also, that the chief expression was one of tranquil content, may be in itself a high compliment to a performance which added nothing extraneous to the sweet, smooth, rounded spirit of the work.

That the pianoforte concert which followed—Rubinstein in D minor, op. 70—also made less impression than must have been expected, resulted from a different cause. This concerto seems, like most of Rubinstein's writing, to have been composed for his own playing, and the listener who remembers him can feel again and again how he would himself render a passing phrase. It is full of great upward sweeps for the left hand; it rushes down into the bass every now and then almost furiously; it has some sweet bits of sustained selloquy, and it has a deal of what might not unreasonably be called dialogue between pianoforte and orchestra; and yet again there is a great deal, especially in the first movement, which sounds far less like deliberate, written-down composition than like the improvisations with which a master of technique tries a new piano or that indescribable sort of running accompaniment which Gottschalk used to attach to the "William Tell" overture as some patient literalist played it regularly through upon another piano. Played as Rubinstein might play it, with fire, dash, glitter, immense force and perfect cantabile, this concerto would indubitably interest and perhaps delight; but Dr. Maas, who played it on this occasion, could not accomplish by any means so much. His work was faithful and sincere, attentive to all details of figure and of technicality, and intelligent as to the relation of the sole instrument and the orchestra; his tone was not faint in the lighter portions nor over heavy in the severer ones, and his left hand work was fine and strong. But he seemed unable to apprehend and appropriate the peculiar characteristics of which we have spoken, and was often, therefore, cold and unmagnetic in the moderato and allegro; in the second movement, moderato assai, which is almost in character like a romance, he was much more successful, and would, no doubt, have colored it well, had the instrument which he used added sympathy of tone to its clearness.

The other numbers of the programme were Volkmann's Serenade for strings and the prelude to the "Master Singers." The delicious playing by Mr. Giese of the violoncello solo compensated for the prolixity of the work; ardent and poetical as this cello baritone is, no less excellent presentment of his sentiment would sustain any but an absolutely devoted sweetheart through the protracted evolutions of the orchestral environment, which, dying away as at last it does, might as easily suggest the dropping off to slumber of the serenaded as the reluctant retirement of the serenader. The Wagner overture was nobly read upon the whole, although once or twice Mr. Gericke had to give a long pull and a strong pull to get the band handsomely over a crucial spot, and would have been more enjoyed had not the concert been some fifteen minutes longer than usual.

On Saturday evening next two symphonies are to be played—Haydn's twelfth and Beethoven's sixth—one at the beginning and the other at the end of the evening. Saint-Saëns' "Danse Macabre" will be the only other orchestral number, the programme being completed by two part songs for female voices, to be sung by the Philomela Quartette.

Journal
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. The seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given Saturday evening, with Mr. Louis Maas as soloist, included the following selections: W. A. Mozart, Symphony in C major, (Jupiter) No. 4; Ant. Rubinstein, Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, op. 70; Rob. Volkmann, Serenade for strings, (Cello Solo by Mr. Giese); Rich. Wagner, Overture, (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg). The programme was very long, and for that reason the placing of the symphony at the opening was advisable; it could then be thoroughly enjoyed without weariness. Although in the Andante cantabile, the transitions of power were sometimes too blunt and ungraded, yet as a whole the symphony was excellently rendered. But the most delicate shading and beauty of movement were displayed in the serenade. No selection, in recent concerts, has been so admirable as this. Mr. Giese would have carried away the coldest of auditors with his pure, graceful notes upon the cello. Every tone combined within it the smooth firmness of unyielding ice and at the same time the imperceptible yet ever present warmth, without which no artistic effect could have been possible. With such a happy combination his solos were songs without words upon the cello. Mr. Maas, with expression and power, faithfully rendered the concerto, and, if any encore had been allowable, would doubtless have given that favorite waltz of Rubinstein, which, whenever given at his hands, is full of rhythm and grace. The mighty, majestic chords of the Wagner overture were strongly in contrast with the gentle harmony of the preceding Serenade, and the orchestra displayed in this quick change their pre-eminent ability to live for the time being in the music they are playing; under no other circumstances could the performance have been so perfect in detail.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme for last Saturday evening's symphony concert was a symmetrical and well arranged one, and in the performance of it there was often much of the highest excellence on the part of both conductor and orchestra. Yet, somehow, the first part of the evening, at least, seemed dull; the music appeared not to inspire fully the players nor to warm thoroughly the audience, so that, while there was attention and interest, there was no enthusiasm and the applause which followed the movements of the symphony was faint. Yet the symphony, which was Mozart's "Jupiter," in C major, No. 4, was beautifully read and full of details which were most creditable to individual instruments. The sylvan ardante cantabile, depending as much as it does upon the phrasing and finish of the first violins, was exquisitely given throughout, and the frequent little sudden accents were emphasized with a proportionate force which gave them their prominence without ever pushing them beyond the just dynamic scale of the movement, while in the final allegro there was bright, clear, ready expression of the runs for the bass strings which are so apt to be dull or heavy. Reviewing the symphony, then, and finding it so elegantly and appreciatively given, the explanation of its apparent ineffectiveness must perhaps be sought in its general quietude of thought, and of its phases of feeling, in which gayety never becomes exuberant, animation eager, nor earnestness assertive. And perhaps, also, that the chief expression was one of tranquil content, may be in itself a high compliment to a performance which added nothing extraneous to the sweet, smooth, rounded spirit of the work.

That the pianoforte concert which followed—Rubinstein in D minor, op. 70—also made less impression than must have been expected, resulted from a different cause. This concerto seems, like most of Rubinstein's writing, to have been composed for his own playing, and the listener who remembers him can feel again and again how he would himself render a passing phrase. It is full of great upward sweeps for the left hand; it rushes down into the bass every now and then almost furiously; it has some sweet bits of sustained soliloquy, and it has a deal of what might not unreasonably be called dialogue between pianoforte and orchestra; and yet again there is a great deal, especially in the first movement, which sounds far less like deliberate, written-down composition than like the improvisations with which a master of technique tries a new piano or that indescribable sort of running accompaniment which Gottschalk used to attach to the "William Tell" overture as some patient literalist played it regularly through upon another piano. Played as Rubinstein might play it, with fire, dash, glitter, immense force and perfect cantabile, this concerto would indubitably interest and perhaps delight; but Dr. Maas, who played it on this occasion, could not accomplish by any means so much. His work was faithful and sincere, attentive to all details of figure and of technicality, and intelligent as to the relation of the sole instrument and the orchestra; his tone was not faint in the lighter portions nor over heavy in the severer ones, and his left hand work was fine and strong. But he seemed unable to apprehend and appropriate the peculiar characteristics of which we have spoken, and was often, therefore, cold and unmagnetic in the moderato and allegro; in the second movement, moderato assai, which is almost in character like a romance, he was much more successful, and would, no doubt, have colored it well, had the instrument which he used added sympathy of tone to its clearness.

The other numbers of the programme were Volkmann's Serenade for strings and the prelude to the "Master Singers." The delicious playing by Mr. Giese of the violoncello solo compensated for the prolixity of the work; ardent and poetical as this 'cello baritone is, no less excellent presentment of his sentiment would sustain any but an absolutely devoted sweetheart through the protracted evolutions of the orchestral environment, which, dying away as at last it does, might as easily suggest the dropping off to slumber of the serenaded as the reluctant retirement of the serenader. The Wagner overture was nobly read upon the whole, although once or twice Mr. Gericke had to give a long pull and a strong pull to get the band handsomely over a crucial spot, and would have been more enjoyed had not the concert been some fifteen minutes longer than usual.

On Saturday evening next two symphonies are to be played—Haydn's twelfth and Beethoven's sixth—one at the beginning and the other at the end of the evening. Saint-Saëns' "Danse Macabre" will be the only other orchestral number, the programme being completed by two part songs for female voices, to be sung by the Philomela Quartette.

Journal
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. The seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given Saturday evening, with Mr. Louis Maas as soloist, included the following selections: W. A. Mozart, Symphony in C major, (Jupiter) No. 4; Ant. Rubinstein, Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, op. 70; Rob. Volkmann, Serenade for strings, (Cello Solo by Mr. Giese); Rich. Wagner, Overture, (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg). The programme was very long, and for that reason the placing of the symphony at the opening was advisable; it could then be thoroughly enjoyed without weariness. Although in the Andante cantabile, the transitions of power were sometimes too blunt and ungraded, yet as a whole the symphony was excellently rendered. But the most delicate shading and beauty of movement were displayed in the serenade. No selection, in recent concerts, has been so admirable as this. Mr. Giese would have carried away the coldest of auditors with his pure, graceful notes upon the 'cello. Every tone combined within it the smooth firmness of unyielding ice and at the same time the imperceptible yet ever present warmth, without which no artistic effect could have been possible. With such a happy combination his solos were songs without words upon the 'cello. Mr. Maas, with expression and power, faithfully rendered the concerto, and, if any encore had been allowable, would doubtless have given that favorite waltz of Rubinstein, which, whenever given at his hands, is full of rhythm and grace. The mighty, majestic chords of the Wagner overture were strongly in contrast with the gentle harmony of the preceding Serenade, and the orchestra displayed in this quick change their pre-eminent ability to live for the time being in the music they are playing; under no other circumstances could the performance have been so perfect in detail.

MUSIC. Continued

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of last evening afforded contrast enough to satisfy the lover of variety, and was yet classical enough to suit the most severe taste. From Mozart, via Rubinstein to Wagner, was a gradual transition. Yet the "Jupiter" Symphony is not, strictly speaking, in Mozart's vein. It rather shows what the master might have been if his life had not ended so early. This Symphony, the last that the composer gave to the world, does not display the lightness of heart, the pleasant jovialty of Mozart as his other works in this form sometimes do. In the "Jupiter" all is dignity and earnestness, and if the second theme of the first movement has a certain amount of geniality, it is only momentary, and leads back into the majestic vein of the work as soon as its mission of contrast is completed. The fertility of the composer is proved in this work, for it took but little more than a fortnight in its composition, although it is more fully scored and more intricate than any other symphony of its time. Coming so soon after the Eroica symphony, one cannot help comparing the contrapuntal end of that symphony with the fugal finale of this, and in this comparison at least, Mozart comes off with decidedly the greater lustre, for counterpoint was a fetter to Beethoven, and a very easy task (if a task at all) to Mozart. The work was given a reading and performance which brought all its beauties to the surface. The Andante, one of the most perfect movements in the whole realm of symphonic music, was given with ineffable tenderness, and the violins (con sordine) played with most perfect unity. The tempo, at which the minuet was taken, was especially gratifying. Generally this movement is taken rapidly and is spoiled thereby. Mr. Gericke took it with a stateliness which suited its character and that of the whole work excellently. The strings did splendid work in the fugated part of the finale, giving every voice with such clearness that all could follow the different parts. A notable performance of a great work.

Coming directly after this clear and melodious work, the Rubinstein concerto seemed rather too ecstatic, and at times abstruse. It seemed rather to be "musician's music," than a work calculated to arouse the public to enthusiasm. Mr. Maas played it with that wonderful technique which is always so reliable and effective. It is a pleasure to listen to a pianist who is always sure, and always steady enough in tempo not to disturb the ensemble of the orchestra. The first movement of the work loses somewhat by being so constantly in the lower notes of the piano. The octave work at the end of the first movement, and the runs and skips at the close of the finale, both against tutti passages in the orchestra, were given in a most artistic manner, so that few of the audience appreciated their intense difficulty. The "Andante" was given rather an intellectual than an emotional reading, for this conservative pianist never falls into sentimentality or sensationalism.

The "Volkmann Serenade" had two strongly-contrasted divisions, the first being thoroughly oriental in its plaintive and constantly-recurring phrase on the 'cello, and the second having the wild character of a tropical dance. The strong effect of the wailing, chief figure was splendidly brought out by Mr. Geise, who sustained his very high standard throughout the solo part. Another success in overtures was made in the last number of this concert. This time it was the overture to "Die Meistersinger," and Wagner's work was given so that its complexity became almost clear. It was still a most intricate intertwining of melodies, but it was no longer a tangled skein of tunes, as it has been in many of its performances, and this was due to the great care which Mr. Gericke gives to the dynamic force of each phrase, so that every figure shall have its due, and not run the chance of being smothered in a too forcible tutti. The only fault which one could find with any part of the work of the evening were a slip or two in the concerto, a premature attack in the Volkmann Serenade, and a greater length of time being taken than the programme announced for the concert, and only a hypercritic would harp on these.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, which was read by Mr. Gericke in a style scarcely less perfect than was that which so nobly distinguished his interpretation of the C minor symphony of the week before. The andante was given with exquisite delicacy and unity of feeling, and with no less beautiful warmth of expression; and for once the minuet was taken in a tempo that brought out the true and delightful character of the movement. The wonderful finale was clearly, vigorously and perfectly read. The performance was heartily applauded and the conductor won a second great success. A serenade for strings by Volkmann, drawn out to an exasperating length in view of the brevity of its themes, and the monotonous melancholy of its principal subject, was finely performed by the strings. Mr. Geise playing the 'cello solo charmingly and with that expressiveness and artistic finish which always distinguish his efforts. It received the most enthusiastic applause of the evening. Mr. Geise being twice recalled with great fervor. The concert ended with a broad and richly colored interpretation of Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture. The soloist was Mr. Louis Maas, who selected Rubinstein's tryingly-difficult but tedious concerto for the piano in D minor. Mr. Maas gave a technically clean-cut, exact and pains-taking performance of the work, but his reading was cold and unsympathetic. But little fault was to be found with his technique, but his style was almost phenomenally dry, mechanical and imperturbable, and at last we yearned for a relief from his rigid adherence to the baldly literal in interpretation, and for something more of flexible artistic feeling. Of able, conscientious playing there was much, but it was rendered uninteresting except from a merely technical point of view by reason of its strange and persistent lack of variety in expression. At the end of the concerto the artist was recalled. At the next concert will be performed Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 12 (B. & H.); Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony. The Philomela Quartette will sing two quartettes for female voices.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Saturday evening's concert was the 17th, this season, of those subsidized occasions which will sometime be held as marking an epoch in our city's musical history. We hardly realize now, after nearly four consecutive seasons of extraordinary activity—made possible only by our Boston Symphony Orchestra—just what our good fortune consists in, and it may, therefore, be a good thing to remind ourselves that no other city in this country, barely one or two in Europe, has equal opportunities for hearing such fine performances of the noblest orchestral works. The only regret that can exist here is that the organization which controls such a notable undertaking, instead of being mutual with the public, is an outcome of one individual's public spirit. This is a bad basis upon which to be prophetic; but as Mr. Gericke's contract is for five years, we will continue our optimism, rejoicing in the present. Saturday's programme was: Mozart—Symphony in C-major (Jupiter), No. 4; Allegro vivace, Andante cantabile; Allegretto; Allegro molto. Rubinstein—Concerto for pianoforte in D-minor, op. 70; Moderato, Moderato assai, Allegro assai. Volkmann—Serenade for strings (cello solo by Mr. Giese). Wagner—Overture (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg). Mr. Louis Maas was the pianist. Why this programme resembles many another of this season is, that they all have been "technique programme;" selections chosen first for what they offer as a practice field for conductor and orchestra new to each other. This is why (so says Mr. Gericke) we cannot yet applaud our new director's catholicity; by and by when his orchestra is, from his point of view, letter perfect, and the attitude between leader and performer has become mutual enough, we are promised a horizon sufficiently extended to include diverse nationalities. The choice of this symphony of Mozart's, if it is to be taken as an "exercise" piece, amply justified the theory referred to. Its performance showed the great care with which it had been studied; scores of places might be named where just the slightest motion of the master's baton preserved from the commonplace some phrase or subject so easily ignored by careless reading. The strings were a constant rebuke and stronghold, and in the Andante, their work was not only elegant and sympathetic, but expressive beyond anything elsewhere in the work. The great Allegro molto, with its four chief themes, was brilliantly given. The Serenade by Volkmann, opens with a questioning-like theme for the cello (solo); for it seems to be a matter of some concern just where to do the serenading—finally a good choice is made and the full strings conclude the interrogatory. A pretty guitar-like motive then appears, in which, attended by a characteristic rhythmic accompaniment, the cello finds its real serenade theme. This reappears after a bit of contrapuntal glee from all the strings, and again, also, after many interesting episodes, wherein the eight cellos have especially happy speech. It ends in quiet pianissimo. The Serenade was cleverly played, and Mr. Giese was admirably applauded for his exquisite performance. The gorgeous Meistersinger overture was the only vigorous orchestral number of the programme. It was proudly played, and its place at the foot of the evening's selections was most advantageous. The Rubinstein Concerto, played by Mr. Louis Maas, is about as interesting as a work of this kind can be. It has to the general listener striking peculiarities of treatment, particularly in the accompaniment. Oftentimes one is led away from the piano theme by the persistent and unique features within the orchestra; while they are always subordinated and repressed, they are in such utter contrast to the corresponding matter found in more ancient concertos for the pianoforte, that one cannot help being startled and—pleased. The brass and the woods, too, in careful (not as opposed to careless, but conventional) combination are at the fore, to give color and warmth to the general effect. In the middle movement of the Concerto is this new equipment displayed by many delicately-conceived ensemble measures, and also in the closing Allegro assai, with its spurring and inquiry, in short-phrased excitement and suggestiveness, are measures abundant and novel. Mr. Maas plays with so great an amount of sang froid that one tries not to call it indifference. It surely is not that, for his performance was technically clear cut and masterful too; but there was not so much apparent appreciation of the task as one likes to see. There was an air of its being all a matter of no consequence (Mr. Maas plays without notes), and this begot a certain unrest. As could be expected, coming from such a source, the work abounded in astonishing digital flight; it is very brilliant, but the idea is too vexedly clothed to be called great. At the next concert we are vouchsafed an old friend from the orchestra, a French composer of some prominence having successfully entreated our new conductor. The piece referred to is the Danse Macabre of St. Saens. Two symphonies will also be played, the Pastorale of Beethoven and Haydn's in B flat, No. 12. For soloist there are announced two quartets to be sung by the Philomela ladies' quartet.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seventeenth of the Series—Mr. Louis Maas Soloist.

The 17th of the present season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening. Mr. Louis Maas, pianist, was the soloist, and the selections were:

Symphony in C major (Jupiter) No. 4...W. A. Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, op. 70...Ant. Rubinstein
Serenade for strings...Rob. Volkmann
Overture, ("The Mastersingers of Nuremberg")...Rich. Wagner

It would be hypercritical to take exceptions to such a list of selections, and equally unjustifiable to complain in any way of the manner in which the programme of the evening was performed. The soloist made a happy choice in taking the Rubinstein concerto for his contribution, as the character of the work suited most admirably his own abilities, and thus gave a delightful result in its performance. The poetic charm of the second movement was made to be felt by the player, and his clear, intelligent presentation of the entire composition was thoroughly enjoyed. The conductor's rigid care in the details of his work was amply shown in the almost faultless performance of the symphony, and the rare beauty of the work done by the orchestra in the andante gave the movement a marked prominence, even in the remarkable general excellence of the evening's efforts. The playing of the Volkmann serenade again displayed the virtuosity of the strings of the orchestra, and Mr. Giese's rich, mellow and true tones gave the most gratifying results in the cello solo. The Wagner overture made a grand ending to the programme, as its interpretation was admirable in every way.

Music. Home Journal

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The programme for the seventeenth Boston symphony concert, given at the usual time and place, consisted of Mozart's Jupiter symphony; a serenade by Volkmann; Rubinstein's D minor concerto, and Wagner's overture to the Meistersingers from Nuremberg;—a repertoire not lacking variety, and of the worthiest kind. The venerable age of Mozart's last and greatest symphony should not have detracted a whit from the admiration that more than ever seemed its due, performed as it was in just the right spirit and time, and with all the fervency that the most fastidious listener would have demanded for it. The performances of the first and last allegro movements were notably just and accurate,—characteristics that again illustrated Herr Gericke's conservatism in his treatment of works by the old masters. Corresponding merit was noticeable in the rendering of the andante cantabile and allegretto movements; so that all in all the performance was associated with an unusually interesting, effective and scholarly interpretation. Technically the orchestral delivery was now and then marred by a lack of unanimity in the response to the baton. The shortcoming, however, confined itself to the more rapid passage of the allegro movements, and was at no time so perceptible as to absolutely offend. It seemed unfortunate for the Rubinstein concerto that its place on the programme could not have been more remote from that of the symphony. While not the fairest impression of its merit—and it has been played several times before—could thereby be created, no improvement, in this respect, resulted from a subsequent examination of the work. Its chief themes are beautiful, but being widely interspersed with pages of pianistic "padding," the effects anticipated miscarry. The piano part too often puts in its appearance as a mere accompaniment to the orchestration, and with an accoustical effect that is anything but harmonious. As a contribution to musical art judged from standpoints which even Rubinstein has respected in other works, the concerto must be regarded as an excrescence, exception being made in favor of certain portions of the second movement, in which there is some beautiful and coherent writing that stands out in welcome prominence as an oasis in an apparently endless desert. Imagine Rheinberger presenting any such desultory and thoroughly uncontrapuntal style of work as musical composition? but then Rheinberger is a composer, in the sense that Beethoven and Schumann were composers, while the Russian pianist appears most agreeable in composition when he dabbles in plagiarism. One cannot forget, however, that as a writer of sentimental songs he is the superior of Abt. Listening to his concerto on Saturday evening was rendered none the less a trial to the patience by the manner of its performance. The artist who performed it was Mr. Louis Maas, and while ordinarily it is au fait to perform a work in all its integrity, the interpreter's ability so to do in the present instance seemed unwelcome. The work at least contains material for the display of virtuosity, but even this was ignored, and there was substituted instead a mild, tame, passionless order of pianism. Even such an achievement with the finesse that Mr. Maas displayed was difficult enough; but if it had only been impossible a certain amount of wear and tear upon musical sensibility would have been spared. The applause Mr. Maas received may be interpreted as a deserved tribute to the technical mastery he displayed, and to his broad and artistic phrasing; but musical expression was conspicuous by its absence, and only now and then—notably at the conclusion of the second movement—did it appear at all. The serenade by Volkmann followed the performance of the concerto, and then as a worthy finale the orchestra played Wagner's overture to the Meistersingers.

Two Soloists at the Symphony.

Mr. Louis Maas was the soloist at the symphony concert last evening. He played entirely from memory and with great force and brilliancy Anton Rubinstein's wonderful pianoforte concerto in D minor. He was received with favor and after each movement applauded with increasing warmth until the close, when he was heartily re-ecolled. Robert Volkmann's pleasing serenade for strings was the favorite number of the evening and awoke a storm of applause, to which Mr. Giese, who had played the cello solo with exquisite finish, was obliged to respond again and again. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony began and Wagner's "Mastersingers" overture closed the programme, which was one of the best of the season.

The programme for next week is as follows:
Symphony in B flat, No. 12.....Joseph Haydn
Two quartets for female voices.....Philomela quartet
Danse Macabre.....Cam. Saint Saens
Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 8.....L. v. Beethoven

The 17th concert of the season's series was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, with Mr. Louis Maas as soloist, at Music Hall, Saturday evening of last week. The programme was as follows: W. A. Mozart, Symphony in C major, (Jupiter) No. 4; Ant. Rubinstein, Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, op. 70; Rob. Volkmann, Serenade for strings, (Cello Solo by Mr. Giese); Rich. Wagner, Overture, (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg). The programme was a long one, but was very enjoyable. Mr. Maas played with power and expression and was warmly applauded. The concerts are attended by large audiences at every performance. There are equally large audiences at the Friday afternoon rehearsals. A. C.

It is rumored that a large squad of police are to be detailed to occupy the stage whenever the private rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra take place, and Friday morning of each week will be set apart for the receiving of apologies. The latter will be set to music and sung by offending violinists.

An usher in the second gallery of Music Hall, on Friday afternoons would find abundant duties. There are constant exhibitions of greed and ill-temper on the part of many of the fair sex who think that twenty-five cents ought to purchase a whole row of seats in the gallery at the symphony rehearsals.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Saturday evening's concert was the 17th, this season, of those subsidized occasions which will sometime be held as marking an epoch in our city's musical history. We hardly realize now, after nearly four consecutive seasons of extraordinary activity—made possible only by our Boston Symphony Orchestra—just what our good fortune consists in, and it may, therefore, be a good thing to remind ourselves that no other city in his country, barely one or two in Europe, has equal opportunities for hearing such fine performances of the noblest orchestral works. The only regret that can exist here is that the organization which controls such a notable undertaking, instead of being mutual with the public, is an outcome of one individual's public spirit. This is a bad basis upon which to be prophetic; but as Mr. Gericke's contract is for five years, we will continue our optimism, rejoicing in the present. Saturday's programme was: Mozart—Symphony in C-major (Jupiter), No. 4; Allegro vivace, Andante cantabile; Allegretto; Allegro molto. Rubinstein—Concerto for pianoforte in D-minor, op. 70; Moderato, Moderato assai, Allegro assai. Volkmann—Serenade for strings (cello solo by Mr. Giese). Wagner—Overture (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg). Mr. Louis Maas was the pianist. Why this programme resembles many another of this season is, that they all have been "technique programme;" selections chosen first for what they offer as a practice field for conductor and orchestra new to each other. This is why (so says Mr. Gericke) we cannot yet applaud our new director's catholicity; by and by when his orchestra is, from his point of view, letter perfect, and the attitude between leader and performer has become mutual enough, we are promised a horizon sufficiently extended to include diverse nationalities. The choice of this symphony of Mozart's, if it is to be taken as an "exercise" piece, amply justified the theory referred to. Its performance showed the great care with which it had been studied; scores of places might be named where just the slightest motion of the master's baton preserved from the commonplace some phrase or subject so easily ignored by careless reading. The strings were a constant rebuke and stronghold, and in the Andante, their work was not only elegant and sympathetic, but expressive beyond anything elsewhere in the work. The great Allegro molto, with its four chief themes, was brilliantly given. The Serenade by Volkmann, opens with a questioning-like theme for the cello (solo); for it seems to be a matter of some concern just where to do the serenading—finally a good choice is made and the full strings conclude the interrogatory. A pretty guitar-like motive then appears, in which, attended by a characteristic rhythmic accompaniment, the cello finds its real serenade theme. This reappears after a bit of contrapuntal glee from all the strings, and again, also, after many interesting episodes, wherein the eight cellos have especially happy speech. It ends in quiet pianissimo. The Serenade was cleverly played, and Mr. Giese was admirably applauded for his exquisite performance. The gorgeous Meistersinger overture was the only vigorous orchestral number of the programme. It was proudly played, and its place at the foot of the evening's selections was most advantageous. The Rubinstein Concerto, played by Mr. Louis Maas, is about as interesting as a work of this kind can be. It has to the general listener striking peculiarities of treatment, particularly in the accompaniment. Oftentimes one is led away from the piano theme by the persistent and unique features within the orchestra; while they are always subordinated and repressed, they are in such utter contrast to the corresponding matter found in more ancient concertos for the pianoforte, that one cannot help being startled and—pleased. The brass and the woods, too, in careful (not as opposed to careless, but conventional) combination are at the fore, to give color and warmth to the general effect. In the middle movement of the Concerto is this new equipment displayed by many delicately-conceived ensemble measures, and also in the closing Allegro assai, with its spurring and inquiry, in short-phrased excitement and suggestiveness, are measures abundant and novel. Mr. Maas plays with so great an amount of sang froid that one tries not to call it indifference. It surely is not that, for his performance was technically clear cut and masterful too; but there was not so much apparent appreciation of the task as one likes to see. There was an air of its being all a matter of no consequence (Mr. Maas plays without notes), and this begot a certain unrest. As could be expected, coming from such a source, the work abounded in astonishing digital flights; it is very brilliant, but the idea is too vexedly clothed to be called great. At the next concert we are vouchsafed an old friend from the orchestra, a French composer of some prominence having successfully entreated our new conductor. The piece referred to is the Danse Macabre of St. Saens. Two symphonies will also be played, the Pastorale of Beethoven and Haydn's in B flat, No. 12. For soloist there are announced two quartets to be sung by the Philomela ladies' quartet.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seventeenth of the Series—Mr. Louis Maas Soloist.

The 17th of the present season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening. Mr. Louis Maas, pianist, was the soloist, and the selections were:

Symphony in C major (Jupiter) No. 4...W. A. Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, op. 70...Ant. Rubinstein
Serenade for strings...Rob. Volkmann
Overture, ("The Mastersingers of Nuremberg")...Rich. Wagner

It would be hypercritical to take exceptions to such a list of selections, and equally unjustifiable to complain in any way of the manner in which the programme of the evening was performed. The soloist made a happy choice in taking the Rubinstein concerto for his contribution, as the character of the work suited most admirably his own abilities, and thus gave a delightful result in its performance. The poetic charm of the second movement was made to be felt by the player, and his clear, intelligent presentation of the entire composition was thoroughly enjoyed. The conductor's rigid care in the details of his work was amply shown in the almost faultless performance of the symphony, and the rare beauty of the work done by the orchestra in the andante gave the movement a marked prominence, even in the remarkable general excellence of the evening's efforts. The playing of the Volkmann serenade again displayed the virtuosity of the strings of the orchestra, and Mr. Giese's rich, mellow and true tones gave the most gratifying results in the cello solo. The Wagner overture made a grand ending to the programme, as its interpretation was admirable in every way.

Music. Home Journal

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The programme for the seventeenth Boston symphony concert, given at the usual time and place, consisted of Mozart's Jupiter symphony; a serenade by Volkmann; Rubinstein's D minor concerto, and Wagner's overture to the Meistersingers from Neuremburg;—a repertoire not lacking variety, and of the worthiest kind. The venerable age of Mozart's last and greatest symphony should not have detracted a whit from the admiration that more than ever seemed its due, performed as it was in just the right spirit and time, and with all the fervency that the most fastidious listener would have demanded for it. The performances of the first and last allegro movements were notably just and accurate,—characteristics that again illustrated Herr Gericke's conservatism in his treatment of works by the old masters. Corresponding merit was noticeable in the rendering of the andante cantabile and allegretto movements; so that all in all the performance was associated with an unusually interesting, effective and scholarly interpretation. Technically the orchestral delivery was now and then marred by a lack of unanimity in the response to the baton. The shortcoming, however, confined itself to the more rapid passage of the allegro movements, and was at no time so perceptible as to absolutely offend. It seemed unfortunate for the Rubinstein concerto that its place on the programme could not have been more remote from that of the symphony. While not the fairest impression of its merit—and it has been played several times before—could thereby be created, no improvement, in this respect, resulted from a subsequent examination of the work. Its chief themes are beautiful, but being widely interspersed with pages of pianistic "padding," the effects anticipated miscarry. The piano part too often puts in its appearance as a mere accompaniment to the orchestration, and with an accoustical effect that is anything but harmonious. As a contribution to musical art judged from standpoints which even Rubinstein has respected in other works, the concerto must be regarded as an excrescence, exception being made in favor of certain portions of the second movement, in which there is some beautiful and coherent writing that stands out in welcome prominence as an oasis in an apparently endless desere. Imagine Rheinberger presenting any such desultory and thoroughly uncontrapuntal style of work as musical composition? but then Rheinberger is a composer, in the sense that Beethoven and Schumann were composers, while the Russian pianist appears most agreeable in composition when he dabbles in plagiarism. One cannot forget, however, that as a writer of sentimental songs he is the superior of Abt. Listening to his concerto on Saturday evening was rendered none the less a trial to the patience by the manner of its performance. The artist who performed it was Mr. Louis Maas, and while ordinarily it is au fait to perform a work in all its integrity, the interpreter's ability so to do in the present instance seemed unwelcome. The work at least contains material for the display of virtuosity, but even this was ignored, and there was substituted instead a mild, tame, passionless order of pianism. Even such an achievement with the finesse that Mr. Maas displayed was difficult enough; but if it had only been impossible a certain amount of wear and tear upon musical sensibility would have been spared. The applause Mr. Maas received may be interpreted as a deserved tribute to the technical mastery he displayed, and to his broad and artistic phrasing; but musical expression was conspicuous by its absence, and only now and then—notably at the conclusion of the second movement—did it appear at all. The serenade by Volkmann followed the performance of the concerto, and then as a worthy finale the orchestra played Wagner's overture to the Meistersingers.

Two Soloists at the Symphony.

Mr. Louis Maas was the soloist at the symphony concert last evening. He played entirely from memory and with great force and brilliancy Anton Rubinstein's wonderful pianoforte concerto in D minor. He was received with favor and after each movement applauded with increasing warmth until the close, when he was heartily recalled. Robert Volkmann's pleasing serenade for strings was the favorite number of the evening and awoke a storm of applause, to which Mr. Giese, who had played the cello solo with exquisite finish, was obliged to respond again and again. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony began and Wagner's "Mastersingers" overture closed the programme, which was one of the best of the season.

The programme for next week is as follows:
Symphony in B flat, No. 12.....Joseph Haydn
Two quartets for female voices.....Philomela quartet
Danse Macabre.....Cam. Saint-Saens
Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 6.....L. v. Beethoven

The 17th concert of the season's series was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Herr Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, with Mr. Louis Maas as soloist, at Music Hall, Saturday evening of last week. The programme was as follows: W. A. Mozart, Symphony in C major, (Jupiter) No. 4; Ant. Rubinstein, Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, op. 70; Rob. Volkmann, Serenade for strings, (Cello Solo by Mr. Giese); Rich. Wagner, Overture, (The Mastersingers of Nuremberg). The programme was a long one, but was very enjoyable. Mr. Maas played with power and expression and was warmly applauded. The concerts are attended by large audiences at every performance. There are equally large audiences at the Friday afternoon rehearsals. A. C.

It is rumored that a large squad of police are to be detailed to occupy the stage whenever the private rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra take place, and Friday morning of each week will be set apart for the receiving of apologies. The latter will be set to music and sung by offending violinists.

An usher in the second gallery of Music Hall, on Friday afternoons would find abundant duties. There are constant exhibitions of greed and ill-temper on the part of many of the fair sex who think that twenty-five cents ought to purchase a whole row of seats in the gallery at the symphony rehearsals.

My Mus. Critic Music in Boston.

Boston, February 8/88

THE seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening. The program consisted of the following numbers:

Symphony, C major ("Jupiter"), No. 4.....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte, op. 70.....Rubinstein
Serenade for strings.....Volkman
'Cello solo by Mr. Giese.

Vorspiel to "Meistersinger".....Wagner

The soloist of the occasion was Mr. Louis Maas.

The beautiful symphony of the immortal Mozart was given a fine rendering. The first movement was taken somewhat too fast, I think, some of the sustained themes suffering thereby. The andante cantabile was excellently phrased and played with great expression. The best effort, however, was the allegretto, which was delightfully interpreted. Mr. Gericke took this lovely menuetto rather slower than one is accustomed to hear it, but with the most happy effect. The intricacies of the last movement with its fine contrapuntal work were given without a flaw, the woodwind doing excellent work. The older I become the more I enjoy Mozart's music, and the more I come under the ban of his wonderful genius.

Music like the Jupiter symphony is for me the very acme of musical art. Its orchestral fugue has certainly never been equaled in its way, and yet how wonderfully simple and natural it all is. The concerto of Rubinstein is his fourth work of the kind, and the one which has become best known, and is most often played by pianists. It is a rather difficult piece to play, and calls for much power of endurance, especially in the last movement. The slow movement is perhaps the finest in a musical sense.

About my performance, of course, it would not behoove me to say anything. I am naturally not overanxious to give away any points to my brother critics about the bad qualities and deficiencies of my playing, of which I am perfectly conscious myself; and concerning the possible good qualities of my playing, they can be safely left to take care of themselves, and have, in fact, been repeatedly acknowledged far beyond my deserts, at least in my own opinion. Suffice it to say, then, that the audience seemed to enjoy the concert, and more than amply rewarded my efforts by the generous applause bestowed at the end of each movement.

The Serenade by Volkman is a very pretty piece of music, and the 'cello solo was played by Mr. Giese in the masterly manner we are accustomed to from him. An inspiring rendering of the Meistersinger Vorspiel brought the concert to a brilliant ending.

LOUIS MAAS.

At the seventeenth concert, the Jupiter Symphony in C major of Mozart was given with great nicety of phrasing, musical coloring, and interpretation. The first or allegro vivace movement is so decidedly Mozartish that a musician with a knowledge of this master's compositions would be able to recognize it without the aid of a programme. The short theme, so often repeated, was rather too precise, so much so that the effect became tiresome before the movement was completed. The andante was given with great tenderness and expression. The allegro, last movement, was given a vigorous, brilliant presentation, which was truly satisfying in its results. Concerto for pianoforte in D minor, by Rubinstein, was played by Louis Maas, who is a sterling musician and artist, one of the best in our country. The work of Mr. Maas was all that could be expected from so fine a pianist, showing him to the best possible advantage, far better than ever before since his residence in Boston. Mr. Maas possesses great technical skill, which he uses with conscious power and perfect self-possession, points of excellence very few of our pianists really possess. That he should play on an instrument containing so little volume of musical tone, is, to say the least, to his disadvantage and discredit. The descendo, for strings, by Volkman, proved an interesting novelty, and it brought out Mr. Giese in a 'cello solo very effectively. The overture, "Mastersingers," of Wagner's, was clearly and splendidly played, being an improvement on former occasions when it has been heard here. I hope to hear three more of our leading pianists before the season closes, and suggest the names of Lang, Peter-silea, and Perabo. Folio 17th concert

THERE is considerable talk about the retirement of Lichtenberg from the Symphony Orchestra, for he has been greatly admired by the young ladies who flock like doves to the afternoon concerts. This correspondence refrained from giving the gossip about it, which has since been printed, though not with entire accuracy, in a leading society paper. Several musicians have found their way into the story, though the whole affair is a tempest in a teapot.

VOCAL MUSIC AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Boston is full of students of all departments of the art of music. In fact, the greater part of our musical public, whether youthful or adult, is made up of people who attend concerts for the purpose of learning something. They may enjoy, they may criticise; but their main object is development, or, to use a much-abused word, culture.

It is of great importance that an audience so composed should hear the widest range of good music of all schools. It is of special importance that the technical capabilities of all musical instruments should be thoroughly exhibited. This is because a thorough technical training is the foundation of all good musical development. Good general musical knowledge will not enable a person to play the violin unless he has acquired the especial technique of that instrument. A pianist who wrote music for the organ without knowing anything about its special technique would be called a foolish man. In fact, it is self evident that the public should have every opportunity to hear what can be done with all solo instruments.

The management of the Symphony Concerts has recognized this necessity by giving us, during the past three years and a half, many and varied examples of the most difficult instrumental music, performed by virtuosi able to master all technical difficulties.

A similar opportunity has not been afforded us in vocal music. The writer has examined all the Symphony programmes from the first concert in 1881 to January 31, 1885, and finds that the following composers have been represented.

Mozart, ten times; Wagner, eight times; Handel, seven times; Henschel, six times; Weber, Beethoven, Schubert, and Schumann, five times each; Gluck and Rubinstein, four times each; Mendelssohn and Grieg, three times each; Spohr, Max Bruch, Brahms, Liszt, Reinecke, Raff, Jensen, Meyerbeer, Gounod, and Arthur Sullivan, twice each; and J. S. Bach, Hayden, Graun, C. Ph. E. Bach, Franz, Lassen, Gericke, Berlioz, Mehul, Auber, St. Saens, Rossi, Pergolesi, Stradella, Rossini, Ponchielli, Bennett, Purcell, and Buck, once each.

An inspection of the above list will show that, out of a total of one hundred and four times, German vocal music has been represented eighty-seven times, of which fifty times, or almost exactly one-half, belongs to the modern German school. The combined representation of the Italian and French schools, both ancient and modern, amounts to the total of twelve times, or about one-ninth of the whole.

A distinctive characteristic of most modern German composers for the voice, is their disdain for "virtuosity" in singing. They are willing that music for the piano, violin, or any other instrument, should bristle with technical difficulties: in fact, they insist that an instrumentalist should have a complete and perfect technique, but they also insist that the singer should tell a "plain, unvarnished tale." Beyond a necessity for correct enunciation there is little, in the technical effect, to distinguish a German lied from a song without words for violin or piano. The use of the "Cantabile," or of particular vocal effects in certain parts of the voice, is rare in this school, which generally treats the high or low notes of the voice as it would the same notes on the piano. The pitch distinguishes them: that is all. The use of different timbres, execution, staccato notes, ornamentation, the trill, and so forth, is equally rare.

It does not follow, from this, that modern German vocal music is to be neglected. Far from it. In its field it is unapproachable. But it is not a good school for the development of vocal technique. The old German school is better; but the student ought not to be confined to one set of examples.

Italian and French vocal music, both ancient and modern, is a mine of wealth so far as technique is concerned. The peripatetic opera troupes, which vouchsafe to us an occasional fortnight of opera, are more apt to give us new singers than new music. It is very expensive and hazardous to bring out a new opera. It is easy for an artist to sing one aria in a concert. Many operas, which are not worth giving entire, contain isolated gems well worth hearing.

We have a conductor and an orchestra equal to anything. Some of the soloists in these concerts have been particularly successful in the operatic field, and there are more of the same stamp in this country. The same audience which listens to the symphonies attends the opera when given here. Why, then, are we debarred from hearing more of the vocal music of the Italian and French schools? The management has evidently no prejudice against operatic music, for we have had plenty of it, but of only one nationality.

If this city, in the future, is to produce good vocalists, our students must have a better chance than they now have for the study of vocal technique. Will the Symphony management give it to us? or must we look elsewhere?

J. FRANK BOTUME.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

JOS. HAYDN, SYMPHONY in B flat, No. 12.
Largo; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—
Menuetto (Allegro).—Finale (Presto.)

J. RHEINBERGER, a) "GOOD NIGHT."

JOH. BRAHMS, b) "FIDELIN."
PHILOMELA QUARTETTE.

CAM. SAINT-SAËNS, DANSE MACABRE.

L. v. BEETHOVEN, SYMPHONY in F. (Pastorale), No. 6.

AWAKENING OF CHEERFUL FEELINGS ON ARRIVING IN THE COUNTRY.
(Allegro ma non troppo).—SCENE BY THE BROOK. (Andante molto moto).—
MERRY GATHERING OF THE COUNTRY PEOPLE. (Allegro.) STORM.
TEMPEST. (Allegro.) HERDSMAN'S SONG. BLITHE AND THANKFUL
FEELINGS AFTER THE TEMPEST. (Allegretto.)

GOOD NIGHT. (J. RHEINBERGER.)

The shades of eve are falling,
The moon, all silver bright,
Awakes to sing the cloudlets
A sweet good night.
While to the clouds so fleeting,
The stars are low repeating
A sweet good night.
Peacefully sleep!
Departed the day and its cares,
The heavenly Father watch will keep.
God every where.

O'er all is felt the presence
Of the spirit of sweet dreams.
The harps are hushed to silence,
Where the palace light still beams.
The ferryman is nodding,
The shepherd homeward plodding;
Their fire on the mountain gleams.
Peacefully sleep!
Departed the day and its cares.
The heavenly Father watch will keep.
God everywhere.

Good night then, all ye weary,
Ye dear ones near and far.
I too will rest in quiet
Till shines the morning star.
The nightingale still praiseth,
Alone in moonlight clear,
The God whose own we are.
Peacefully sleep!
Departed the day and its cares.
The heavenly Father watch will keep.
God everywhere.

"FIDELIN." (JOH. BRAHMS.)

"O fisher on the water,
Fidelin!
Come fish here by my side."
In his pretty dory rows he
Down the tide.
Fidelin!

"With gold I will reward thee,"
Fidelin!
"A hundred crowns," she cried!
In his pretty dory rows he
Down the tide.
Fidelin!

"What shall I fish for, maiden?"
Fidelin!
"My ring," the maiden cried!
In his pretty dory rows he
Down the tide.
Fidelin!

"A hundred crowns are nothing,"
Fidelin!
The fisher-lad replied.
In his pretty dory rowing
Down the tide.
Fidelin!

"A kiss will be far sweeter,"
Fidelin!
"In memory dear to hide."
And his pretty dory turns he
Up the tide.
Fidelin!

DANSE MACABRE. SAINT-SAËNS.

Zig et Zig, la Mort en cadence,
Frappant une tombe avec son talon,
La Mort à minuit joue un air de danse,
Zig et Zig et Zag, sur son violon.

Zig et Zig et Zag, chacun se trémousse,
On entend claquer les os des danseurs.

Le vent d'hiver souffle, et la nuit est
sombre;
Des gémissements sortent des tilleuls;
Les squelettes blancs vont à travers
l'ombre,
Courant et sautant sous leur grands
linceuls.

Mais psit! tout à coup on quitte la ronde,
On se pousse, on fuit, le coq a chanté.

Henri Cazalis.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

EIGHTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra's concert of Saturday evening last was indisputably a "symphony" one, two out of the three orchestral numbers of the programme being works in that department of composition. The evening began with Haydn's twelfth (in B flat), than which none of his writing is more enjoyable, even its adagio having a light and cheerful character, and ended with Beethoven's sixth—the "pastoral." So far as the performance of these works is concerned, praise may be almost unqualified. In the minuet of the Haydn, the strings were a little rough in some of their strong unisons, to be sure; but, on the other hand, there was great beauty in the wooden wind's share of the same movement, and those same voices and that of the horn were unusually sweet and clear in the latter part of the third movement of the Beethoven. The only debatable matter was to be found in Mr. Gericke's interpretation of portions of the latter symphony, his reading of the former being thoroughly fine, appropriate and effective technically, and fully in consonance with the spirit of the author. But, as he has previously done with some Beethoven movements, he took most of those in this sixth symphony at rates which made a sensible difference of color and character between his reading and those which have served as standards here. That he was wrong because he was different, we are not ready to assert, and it may be that his tempi are more nearly in conformity to accepted continental authorities than are those to which Boston, at least, is accustomed. The opening allegro, marked as non troppo, ("Cheerful Feelings on Arriving in the Country") and that which opens the third movement ("Merry Gathering of the Country People") seemed quite too fast and too excited. But a German out door festivity undoubtedly exceeds in hilarity and vivacity a New England picnic, and what would be amply blithe and cheerful here might be pretty tame over there. Of course, without regard to the human element of the subjects, and the best way of expressing that, the music, considered merely as so many symphonic movements, must appear strange when its customary rate is altered, and if it has been previously heard with satisfaction, a new reading will probably cause some discontent, and only time can show whether this be well founded or not, when the departure from usual standards is not excessive.

The other orchestral number was Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre." This wild, weird, and yet finely imaginative and poetic, fantasy was wonderfully played. The strange, impressive melody with which Death awakens and convokes the shrouded skeletons and sets them whirling in dizzy dance, given as for an obligato to the leading violin, was played by Mr. Listemann with a fulness and intensity which he rarely attains, and which were not the least influential elements of the performance. As the windy time rushed on and the height of the dance approached in the suggestive music, Mr. Gericke accelerated the movement until it almost made one giddy to listen to it, and then with great mastery of himself and his forces, checked it instantly, when at the cock-crow the spectres melt into intangibility, "as when a lamp is blown out by a gust of wind at the casement," and ended all with the faintest and remotest touch upon the few last broken notes that fall as the multitude are scattered. The performance was followed by applause so long and insistent that, for the first time and, we hope, the last, in these concerts, a repetition was accorded.

After the Haydn symphony the Philomela Quartette sang two four-part songs for female voices—Rheinberger's "Good Night" and Brahms's "Fidelin." For the singing of the young ladies we have only praise, the voices being beautiful in quality, admirably balanced, blending exactly, and well governed in point of tune and phrase. But we have only dispraise for the taste which inserted into a symphony programme that which, while admirable in its place, was there thoroughly trivial—lowered and belittled by its environment. If this sort of trifling is to be repeated, it only remains to engage the Spanish Students or some distinguished virtuoso on the concertina or harmonica.

At the concert of next Saturday evening, Mr. B. J. Lang will be the soloist and play Tchaikowsky's pianoforte concerto, op. 23. The orchestra will play one of the "Fidelio" overtures, some dance music by Herbeck (this for the first time), and Schumann's third symphony—in E flat, op. 97.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 12 (B. & H.), one of the most solid of the composer's works in this vein, and one of the most delightful. The first allegro was perhaps taken too fast to bring out its peculiar character with due effect; but the other movements were faultlessly given. The finale received one of the most charming readings we have ever heard given to it. Saint-Saëns bit of clever sensationalism, "Danse Macabre," was performed with great beauty of color and variety in effect, and obtained a rapturous encore at the hands of an audience that would not be content short of a repetition. It was a curious commentary upon the taste of the public that it bestowed more applause upon this work than upon either the Haydn Symphony or Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which brought the concert to a close. This last named work, as interpreted by Mr. Gericke, was so at variance with all previous readings we have heard that we do not know exactly how to speak of it. Certainly the rapid pace at which the first movement was taken, deprived it of that quiet pastoral color and graceful flow which seem most appropriate to it. As read last night it was not an "awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country," but a wide-awake bolerosous jollity from the very outset. The Andante was finely read and performed, and the same may be said of the merrymaking and the storm. The finale lost something of devotional expressiveness by the rather lively time in which it was played. The soloists were the Philomela Quartette, consisting of four rather pure, fresh and tuneful voices. Rheinberger's "Good Night," and Brahms's "Fidelin" were smoothly and prettily sung by them with good intonation and pleasing effect. These artists have evidently studied carefully, and their work may be praised for its generally excellent taste; but they were painfully out of place at a concert of this description. At the next concert will be given Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture; Concerto for piano, Tchaikowsky, op. 23; Dance Movements, by J. Herbeck, and Schumann's Symphony in E-flat, No. 3. Mr. B. J. Lang is to be the soloist.

GOOD NIGHT. (J. RHEINBERGER.)

The shades of eve are falling, The moon, all silver bright, Awakes to sing the cloudlets A sweet good night. While to the clouds so fleeting, The stars are low repeating A sweet good night. Peacefully sleep! Departed the day and its cares, The heavenly Father watch will keep. God every where.	O'er all is felt the presence Of the spirit of sweet dreams. The harps are hushed to silence, Where the palace light still beams. The ferryman is nodding, The shepherd homeward plodding; Their fire on the mountain gleams. Peacefully sleep! Departed the day and its cares. The heavenly Father watch will keep. God everywhere.
---	--

Good night then, all ye weary,
Ye dear ones near and far.
I too will rest in quiet
Till shines the morning star.
The nightingale still praiseth,
Alone in moonlight clear,
The God whose own we are.
Peacefully sleep!
Departed the day and its cares.
The heavenly Father watch will keep.
God everywhere.

"FIDELIN." (JOH. BRAHMS.)

"O fisher on the water, Fidelin! Come fish here by my side." In his pretty dory rows he Down the tide. Fidelin!	"With gold I will reward thee," Fidelin! "A hundred crowns," she cried! In his pretty dory rows he Down the tide. Fidelin!
"What shall I fish for, maiden?" Fidelin! "My ring," the maiden cried! In his pretty dory rows he Down the tide. Fidelin!	"A hundred crowns are nothing," Fidelin! The fisher-lad replied. In his pretty dory rowing Down the tide. Fidelin!

"A kiss will be far sweeter,"
Fidelin!
"In memory dear to hide."
And his pretty dory turns he
Up the tide.
Fidelin!

DANSE MACABRE. SAINT-SAËNS.

Zig et Zig, la Mort en cadence, Frappant une tombe avec son talon, La Mort à minuit joue un air de danse, Zig et Zig et Zag, sur son violon.	Zig et Zig et Zag, chacun se trémousse, On entend claquer les os des danseurs. * * * * * * * * * *
Le vent d'hiver souffle, et la nuit est sombre; Des gémissements sortent des tilleuls; Les squelettes blancs vont à travers l'ombre, Courant et sautant sous leur grands linceuls.	Mais psit! tout à coup on quitte la ronde, On se pousse, on fuit, le coq a chanté. * * * * * * * * * *

Henri Cazalis.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

EIGHTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Orchestra's concert of Saturday evening last was indisputably a "symphony" one, two out of the three orchestral numbers of the programme being works in that department of composition. The evening began with Haydn's twelfth (in B flat), than which none of his writing is more enjoyable, even its adagio having a light and cheerful character, and ended with Beethoven's sixth—the "pastoral." So far as the performance of these works is concerned, praise may be almost unqualified. In the minuet of the Haydn, the strings were a little rough in some of their strong unisons, to be sure; but, on the other hand, there was great beauty in the wooden wind's share of the same movement, and those same voices and that of the horn were unusually sweet and clear in the latter part of the third movement of the Beethoven. The only debatable matter was to be found in Mr. Gericke's interpretation of portions of the latter symphony, his reading of the former being thoroughly fine, appropriate and effective technically, and fully in consonance with the spirit of the author. But, as he has previously done with some Beethoven movements, he took most of those in this sixth symphony at rates which made a sensible difference of color and character between his reading and those which have served as standards here. That he was wrong because he was different, we are not ready to assert, and it may be that his tempi are more nearly in conformity to accepted continental authorities than are those to which Boston, at least, is accustomed. The opening allegro, marked as non troppo, ("Cheerful Feelings on Arriving in the Country") and that which opens the third movement ("Merry Gathering of the Country People") seemed quite too fast and too excited. But a German outdoor festivity undoubtedly exceeds in hilarity and vivacity a New England picnic, and what would be amply blithe and cheerful here might be pretty tame over there. Of course, without regard to the human element of the subjects, and the best way of expressing that, the music, considered merely as so many symphonic movements, must appear strange when its customary rate is altered, and if it has been previously heard with satisfaction, a new reading will probably cause some discontent, and only time can show whether this be well founded or not, when the departure from usual standards is not excessive.

The other orchestral number was Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre." This wild, weird, and yet finely imaginative and poetic, fantasy was wonderfully played. The strange, impressive melody with which Death awakens and convokes the shrouded skeletons and sets them whirling in dizzy dance, given as for an obligato to the leading violin, was played by Mr. Listemann with a fulness and intensity which he rarely attains, and which were not the least influential elements of the performance. As the windy time rushed on and the height of the dance approached in the suggestive music, Mr. Gericke accelerated the movement until it almost made one giddy to listen to it, and then with great mastery of himself and his forces, checked it instantly, when at the cock-crow the spectres melt into intangibility, "as when a lamp is blown out by a gust of wind at the casement," and ended all with the faintest and remotest touch upon the few last broken notes that fall as the multitude are scattered. The performance was followed by applause so long and insistent that, for the first time and, we hope, the last, in these concerts, a repetition was accorded.

After the Haydn symphony the Philomela Quartette sang two four-part songs for female voices—Rheinberger's "Good Night" and Brahms's "Fidelin." For the singing of the young ladies we have only praise, the voices being beautiful in quality, admirably balanced, blending exactly, and well governed in point of tune and phrase. But we have only dispraise for the taste which inserted into a symphony programme that which, while admirable in its place, was there thoroughly trivial—lowered and belittled by its environment. If this sort of trifling is to be repeated, it only remains to engage the Spanish Students or some distinguished virtuoso on the concertina or harmonica.

At the concert of next Saturday evening, Mr. B. J. Lang will be the soloist and play Tschalkowsky's pianoforte concerto, op. 23. The orchestra will play one of the "Fidelio" overtures, some dance music by Herbeck (this for the first time), and Schumann's third symphony—in E flat, op. 97.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with Haydn's Symphony in B flat, No. 12 (B. & H.), one of the most solid of the composer's works in this vein, and one of the most delightful. The first allegro was perhaps taken too fast to bring out its peculiar character with due effect; but the other movements were faultlessly given. The finale received one of the most charming readings we have ever heard given to it. Saint-Saëns bit of clever sensationalism, "Danse Macabre," was performed with great beauty of color and variety in effect, and obtained a rapturous encore at the hands of an audience that would not be content short of a repetition. It was a curious commentary upon the taste of the public that it bestowed more applause upon this work than upon either the Haydn Symphony or Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which brought the concert to a close. This last named work, as interpreted by Mr. Gericke, was so at variance with all previous readings we have heard that we do not know exactly how to speak of it. Certainly the rapid pace at which the first movement was taken, deprived it of that quiet pastoral color and graceful flow which seem most appropriate to it. As read last night it was not an "awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country," but a wide-awake bolsterous jollity from the very outset. The Andante was finely read and performed, and the same may be said of the merrymaking and the storm. The finale lost something of devotional expressiveness by the rather lively time in which it was played. The soloists were the Philomela Quartette, consisting of four rather pure, fresh and tuneful voices. Rheinberger's "Good Night," and Brahms's "Fidelin" were smoothly and prettily sung by them with good intonation and pleasing effect. These artists have evidently studied carefully, and their work may be praised for its generally excellent taste; but they were painfully out of place at a concert of this description. At the next concert will be given Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture; Concerto for piano, Tschalkowsky, op. 23; Dance Movements, by J. Herbeck, and Schumann's Symphony in E-flat, No. 3. Mr. B. J. Lang is to be the soloist.

Music. Home Journal

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—Two symphonies were performed at the eighteenth symphony concert, one by Haydn—in B flat, No. 12—and the other by Beethoven—The Pastorale, No. 6, in F. Sandwiched between these works were songs by Rheinberger and Brahms, sung by the Philomela quartette, and "Danse Macabre," by Saint Saens. A contemporary, after devoting considerable space in praise of the noisy, blatant, sensational, yet thoroughly ingenious music of the Danse Macabre, thus dignifies the only innovation upon the high standard of the programme, and is sapient enough to enter a protest against the introduction of a quartette of ladies' voices into a symphony concert. Possibly he does not bear in mind that the music written for these voices was by Rheinberger and Brahms; that the spirituel of the first selection—Good Night—was as classical as need be; that he must have enjoyed as much as any one else the beautiful "Fidelan" by Brahms; and also that as he has nought but words of praise for the singing of either selection, any impropriety resulting from the engagement of the quartette must exist in the Bunthornian hallucination of our contemporary. Yet in this connection it seems all the more strange that he discovered in the "Danse Macabre" an innovation so thoroughly congenial to his taste that he finds it necessary to commend it at length, yet afterwards to protest against a quartette of ladies' voices heard in a symphony concert with music of an exceptionally chaste and classic type. So æsthetic is his opinion that it seems unfortunate that the authors of "Patience" could not have had an experience with it before the production of their work, as the characteristics of the veritable Bunthorne might thereby have been enhanced. There are two features of the symphony concerts that are of pleasing augury, the most commendable of which is that there is no such pedagogical affectation for the ultra-classical, as our esteemed yet somewhat bilious contemporary has felt impelled to illustrate. Both symphonies were finely played, equally for finish of execution, richness of tone. Not less evident was the artistic feeling with which Herr Gericke's readings were instinct. The introduction of a quartette of ladies in a symphony concert admitted of vocal effects of peculiar charm, and by no means misplaced. Its members are evidently capable of singing difficult music with confidence and precision; the intonation was good, though notably so in the Brahms number, while their attention not only to the marks of expression, but to the spirit of expression—which is quite a different thing—shows that they have profited by training that aims at something beyond superficial excellence. The quartette was warmly applauded and recalled. At the concert to-night Mr. B. J. Lang will be the soloist, and with Tchaikowski's concerto, op. 23.

The eighteenth concert, Feb. 14, proved one of the pleasantest and most enjoyable of the season. It commenced with that melodious symphony in B flat, No. 12, of Haydn's, which proved interesting, especially the last movement (presto), because of its light, joyful character. The whole symphony was carefully and finely played. The two pieces for Philomela Quartette (ladies' voices), while it produced a variety, with its four ladies dressed in white, seemed quite out of place. The singing, even, was good enough in its way; but four men's voices blend together much better than women's, and therefore are more desirable to hear. The real feature of the concert was a most remarkable interpretation of St. Saens' "Danse Macabre." It was given with greater coloring and fuller orchestral effects than I have ever before heard it. The concert closed with a good if not great rendition of Beethoven's Sixth (Pastoral) Symphony in F. This is very familiar to Bostonians, having been given many times; yet, under the skillful baton of Mr. Gericke, it seemed fresh, bright, and more grandly beautiful than ever before. Mr. Gericke demonstrated his great ability, on this occasion, as a successful musical conductor, by the masterly command he exercised over his orchestra. He is a born conductor, by nature, instinct, and education.

Folio

JAMES M. TRACY.

Proposed Changes in Music Hall.

The owners of Music Hall have filed with the inspectors of buildings an application for leave to make extensive changes in the building. The principal features of the proposed alterations have already been described, and the plans filed with the application do not show marked differences in details. A more accurate description of the scheme is, however, obtainable from the study of the plans, as follows:

The new stage built after the great organ was removed will remain, its pitch and construction being suited for theatrical uses. The proscenium arch is 36 feet on the horizontal line by 33 feet high, with space above for ornamental treatment. The present cornice is retained, the design being shown above a series of arched panels over the stage opening. The stage has a depth of 32 feet, with a recess 12x16 opening at the back, where the original organ was placed. The balconies on either side of the stage line are utilized for dressing-rooms. In the auditorium the balcony line is turned to an outward curve near the proscenium. Should the changes be carried out, the reconstruction will be done during the summer.

MUSIC. Continued

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

To give two symphonies in a single evening was a new departure in the history of the Boston Orchestra, but these two symphonies were of such a light and pleasing character that no one could accuse the programme of being overloaded. If Mr. Gericke is to introduce further deviations in this direction we would suggest a repetition of the same symphony twice on a single programme when the work is complex, and when a second hearing might make vague points clear, or when the work is altogether new to America. Von Bulow has done this in Germany, and Mr. Henschel attempted it once with a Wagnerian work with good success. It is difficult to say anything new or of interest to the public in regard to the Pastoral symphony which was given last night. The first great piece of programme music—chronologically speaking—in the world, it yet remains the greatest. The thunderstorm of the fourth movement has not been eclipsed by the hurricanes of Berlioz, of Saint Saens, or of Rubinstein. The playing of the village band, with its inebriated bassoonist using an instrument capable of sounding but two notes, the quarrel of the dancers, the entrance of the peasants in their wooden shoes, all these touches of humor are as effective to-day as when they were written, and there is still the charming "out-of-doors" feeling permeating almost every measure, and the delight of following Beethoven's humor has not become staled by the repetition of the work. Nevertheless we cannot see the absolute necessity of going through each of the Beethoven symphonies annually, especially when so doing practically excludes many symphonies of modern composers, and the sixth could occasionally be omitted. The Pastoral Symphony gives many opportunities to the wood-wind to come in the foreground—which is most natural in a rustic subject—and the great improvement in this department was most prominently noticeable. Clarinet, oboe, and bassoon are the most interesting parts of the wood-wind scoring in the second and third movements, and each did excellently. The storm was especially well performed, excellently shaded, and graphic in all its details. The first movement was taken more rapidly than we have been accustomed to hear it, but it went clearly nevertheless.

The Haydn symphony was given a fine performance. The largo seemed a trifle rough, but all the other movements were thoroughly interpreted. The responses between the first and second violins in the allegro and the dainty string figures of the finale were performed just in the bright manner which the composer indicates. The Philomela female quartette sang two numbers after this symphony. They shaded well, and intoned with purity, but we cannot think that their quartets were called for in a symphony concert. They would be quite appropriate in a lyceum course, but such church-choir singing is not to be placed in juxtaposition with Beethoven or Haydn. The Danse Macabre was given with enormous spirit, and the audience evidently enjoyed the churchyard sociable, for the selection received a very emphatic encore, which was accepted, and the piece repeated. We were glad at least to see all the details of the work carried out. A xylophone gave the home-like clackings, the cock crew in a manner to make the skeleton party break up in a hurry, and the work gave enough ghoul-like pabulum to overcome the gay tendency of the rest of the programme.

* * * He heard Beethoven's Pastoral symphony played last week, and at the end of the first movement objected that the composer had omitted all reference to horse-flies and mosquitos, and that he heard nothing which reminded him of the country landlord's exorbitant charges, unless the length of the movement was intended to deplete the size of the weekly board bill.

The "Danse Macabre" by Saint Saens is so called because a whole grave yard "turns up."

Mr. Lang at his last lecture explained to his audience the use of the horn. How can a temperance man describe all the effects of a horn?

Mr. Lichtenberg has definitely left the Boston symphony orchestra—the more the pity, for such players as he can ill be spared.

F. Giese and Herr Lichtenberg, late of the Boston symphony orchestra, are both engaged with Theodore Thomas' orchestra for next year.

We intercepted two very important valentines yesterday. The first was marked "F. W. G.," and ran as follows:

Great master of orchestral lays,
Your leadership we all must praise,
But rumor says you oft have sat on
The violinist neath your baton,
We trust that you anon may see
Here even orchestras are free,
So in concessions do not lack
To call the banished fiddlers back.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme for last Saturday was as follows:

Symphony in B flat, No. 22.....Jos. Haydn
Largo; Allegro vivace—Adagio—
Menuetto (Allegro)—Finale (Presto.)

a. "Good night.".....J. Rheinberger
b. "Fidelin.".....Joh. Brahms

Philomela Quartette.

Danse Macabre.....Cam. Saint-Saëns
Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 6.....L. von Beethoven

Awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country.
(Allegro ma non troppo)—Scene by the brook. (Andante molto moto.)—Merry gathering of the country people. (Allegro.)—Storm. Tempest. (Allegro.) Herdsman's Song. Blithe and thankful feelings after the tempest. (Allegretto.)

Pretty solid work to give two symphonies in a single programme, but then "they were such little ones," and then the Boston public have come to that pass that they accept anything that is done at these concerts with implicit faith that it is for the best.

The Haydn Symphony went a little roughly in its opening movement, but after that, was very finely performed, especially the dainty finale with its crisp violin figures which had just the life and vivacity which Haydn desired, without the rush and hurry of a modern presto.

The vocal quartette seemed to us entirely out of place. They were clearly sung and well shaded, but were best suited to make a success in a good lyceum course or a church concert. The music sounded thin and uninteresting because of its surroundings. A grand aria with orchestra, a German lied with deep thought, even such selections as have been given by the original Swedish ladies quartette with all the quaint flavor of the Scandinavian folk song, might be in keeping with the programme, but a couple of light, mellifluous selections such as these, were not to be expected in the Boston Symphony course.

The churchyard soirée, called the "Danse Macabre," was played with all the sensational effects. The cock crew in a manner that would have caused Peter to weep afresh, the bones clattered together on the xylophone, and all the ghoulish accessories were so well attended to that the piece won an imperative encore, which was granted. After this taste of programme music, came that great piece of the same school (but less radical in its execution) the "Pastorale Symphony." Of this it is unnecessary to say anything, except that it scarcely seems to be necessary to give it annually to the exclusion of many of the works of Raff, Svendsen and other unfortunate moderns. It was finely played although the first movement was taken very rapidly, as if the party after "arriving in the country" had been chased by a bull (which would, of course, give point to the difficult horn passages), but the "storm" was splendidly given and the woodwind passages which are so important

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Eighteenth Programme of the Present Season's Series.

The audience in attendance upon the concert of the Boston symphony orchestra at Music Hall, last evening, the 18th of the present season's series, had the rare experience of hearing a number of the programme repeated in response to the enthusiastic applause following its first performance. Sad to relate, this departure from the constitutional law of the symphony concert scheme, was not caused by an excessive appreciation of the selection from any of the Wagnerian music dramas, or by an unprecedented demonstration over the performance of a choice bit of Brahms' melodious composition, or even by an overwhelming desire to hear yet again some delightful excerpt from Dvorak's graceful writings. It was, instead, an honest expression of pleasure at the performance of Saint-Saëns' "Danse Macabre," which caused Herr Gericke to ignore the tradition of the past, and the second hearing of the bizarre but tuneful composition gave even more cause for enjoyment than its first playing, as the conductor and musicians appeared to feel the freedom from restraint and the general abandon of law breakers in common life, and gave the brilliant measures of the work with far better effect than in its first presentation. Another innovation in the evening's programme was the introduction of a quartet of female voices, the Philomela by name, to vary the orchestral programme. The ladies of this organization have improved greatly in their work since they appeared in the more miscellaneous concerts of the season, and they now sing these selections with charming effect. Their voices harmonize very perfectly, and each part is so well sustained that the presentation of Rheinberger's "Good Night" and Brahms' "Fidelin," gave great satisfaction, and well merited the generous applause which recalled them after the singing of these selections. Haydn's delightfully old-fashioned symphony in B flat, No. 12, opened the programme, and its ever flowing and gracefully melodious musical ideas, appeared to give as much pleasure to the players as to the listeners, so that the work made a most enjoyable impression. Beethoven's symphony in F, the "Pastorale," ended the programme, and its sharply contrasted character, as compared with its immediate predecessor in the "immortal nine," proved to be much more in accord with Herr Gericke's abilities than the fifth symphony of this composer. The least satisfactory work was done in the andante, in which the "Scenes by the Brook" are portrayed, this portion of the work lacking the poetic grace which should characterize its reading. The "Storm" and "Tempest" portions were given with excellent effect, and, otherwise, as a whole, the symphony was finely presented.

active programme, ry finely, and the a grand piano forte e phrases stood out away Hall attracted greater than ever, Mr. De Lara, who d effect that ought st, but as a musician every critic. al pieces for voice L. C. E. with words taken

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The 18th programme this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given Saturday evening, was:

Jos. Haydn, Symphony in B flat, No. 12.
Largo; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—
Menuetto (Allegro).—Finale (Presto.)
J. Rheinberger, a) "Good Night."
Joh. Brahms, b) "Fidelin."
Philomela Quartet.
Cam. Saint-Saëns, Danse Macabre.

L. v. Beethoven, Symphony in F. (Pastorale), No. 6.
Awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country. (Allegro ma non troppo).—Scene by the brook. (Andante molto moto).—Merry gathering of the country people. (Allegro.)
Storm. Tempest. (Allegro.) Herdsman's Song. Blithe and thankful feelings after the tempest. (Allegretto.)

The fitness of playing two symphonies in the same programme because of the felicitious choice, Saturday evening, may, for the time, pass unchallenged. These two symphonies go well together; in fact one might listen with pleasure to almost any of the genial Haydn's symphonies side by side with Beethoven's Pastorale. Haydn never wearies by elaborate mental process, and Beethoven, in his "Recollection of a Country Life," as he called his sixth symphony, comes nearer the popular heart and comprehension than in any other. It is like being disloyal to one who has always been a cherished friend to confess to the inadequacy of the impressions we now receive from the performance of a Haydn symphony; and while recognizing his great skill, his genius, the limitations of his epoch, and the slight scope permitted him in writing for instruments, it is possible still to grow cold towards this spontaneous and joyful melodist in the presence of the greater minds who have come after him. It was a pleasure to listen to his B flat symphony at the Saturday concert, faithfully played as it was, but it is not the single misgiving of music to please. Beethoven's Pastorale Symphony is one of the two pieces of descriptive music which he wrote. Its descriptions are not imitations; they are rather suggestions, and it will be remembered Beethoven added the guide-book titles to the different movements with great reluctance. The tempo of the first movement was more than suggestive of "cheerful feelings in the country," for it seemed to us almost hilarious. The "Scene by the brook" was played with great delicacy—the wood-wind and the horns were all that could be desired throughout the movement. The humor of the Scherzo was well brought out. In accent, phrasing and expression the Storm was made very vivid and real; the leading up to the mighty crash in the climax being notably strong. One heard real thunder, the falling of rain, and not their mechanical counterparts. Truly "thankful feelings" possessed the audience in the fascinating moods of the closing movement. The strings, particularly the double basses, here outdid themselves, as each division in turn took up the swift and difficult unison which is the motif of the chief variation in the movement. The performance of the clever and popular Danse Macabre was so eminently good that it had to be repeated, the first encore at an evening performance in the history of the orchestra. The Philomela Quartet (Ladies) sang twice. They present an odd feature for a symphony concert, standing so close together, in dresses white and short. They sing well, in good style and with uniformly good intonation. That their voices are not of just the same age or condition of culture, is slightly apparent. The Rheinberger song is very graceful; its theme, when lying in the lowest voice, has particularly effective handling. The "Fidelin," made popular by the Boylston Club, is not effective or interesting, when sung to those who have heard the song from the Boylstons. The ladies were recalled after their songs, and the audience seemed to take kindly to them as a novelty; but it seems to us that their work is not of particular value at the symphony concert. The programme at this concert contained the words of the two songs, and also the French poem of Henri Cazalis, from which Saint-Saëns drew his idea of the death dance. At the next concert this programme will be played: Beethoven, overture (Fidelio); P. Tschaiakowsky, Concerto for pianoforte, Op. 23.; J. Herbeck, Dance Movements (first time); R. Schumann, Symphony in E flat, No. 3. Mr. B. J. Lang will play the concerto.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the eighteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Haydn, Symphony in B-flat, No. 12.
Rheinberger, a) "Good Night."
Brahms, b) "Fidelin."
(Part-songs for female voices.)
Saint-Saëns, Danse Macabre.
Beethoven, Symphony in F (Pastoral), No. 6.

The Philomela Quartet sang. The bitter pill of two whole symphonies was quite sufficiently gilded by the pretty things in the middle of the programme. To those obtuse people whose palate is not delicate enough to perceive the bitterness that lies in fine symphonies, the gilding may have seemed superfluous. We, for one, must own that this bitterness wholly escapes us; we have always held that, if anything can be sweeter than a great symphony, it is two great symphonies. As for the "gilding," nothing can rationally be said against the "Danse Macabre;" this genial piece of cleverness is ever welcome, especially when it is so placed that the brilliancy of its orchestration cannot cast a shadow upon what follows it. And there are few things in classic orchestral music that could suffer so little from coming immediately after the "Danse Macabre" as the Pastoral Symphony. The four-part songs, excellent examples of their class, and charmingly sung by the ladies of the Philomela Quartet, were evidently so hugely enjoyed by the majority of the audience that one can hardly find it in his heart to protest against their intrusion into a symphony programme. Yet one would fain think that a symphony concert should be a refuge where the music lover could be safe from part-songs; especially when the Apollo and Boylston clubs are ever at hand to dish up part-songs in the best style for the benefit of epicures who are fond of this particular dainty. The "Danse Macabre" was not only furiously redemanded, but, mirabile dictu, repeated—the first encore ever granted since the Boston Symphony Orchestra first began its concerts. The delight one naturally feels at finding a genuine, spontaneous cri du cœur coming from a Boston audience is quite enough to silence all pedantic criticism on the unusual proceeding. The piece was superbly played both times, Mr. Listemann giving just the right diabolic coloring to the violin solo. We hardly know whether to praise the first oboe for a stroke of genius or to congratulate him for a lucky accident. He gave the "cock-crow" deliciously out of tune the first time—the effect was admirable—but when the piece was repeated, he played the passage strictly in time, which made it sound

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme for last Saturday was as follows:

- Symphony in B flat, No. 22.....Jos. Haydn
Largo; Allegro vivace—Adagio—
Menuetto (Allegro)—Finale (Presto.)
a. "Good night.".....J. Rheinberger
b. "Fidelin.".....Joh. Brahms
Philomela Quartette.
Danse Macabre.....Cam. Saint-Saëns
Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 6.....L. von Beethoven
Awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country.
(Allegro ma non troppo)—Scene by the brook. (Andante
molto moto.)—Merry gathering of the country people.
(Allegro.)—Storm. Tempest. (Allegro.) Herdsman's Song.
Blithe and thankful feelings after the tempest. (Allegretto.)

Pretty solid work to give two symphonies in a single programme, but then "they were such little ones," and then the Boston public have come to that pass that they accept anything that is done at these concerts with implicit faith that it is for the best.

The Haydn Symphony went a little roughly in its opening movement, but after that, was very finely performed, especially the dainty finale with its crisp violin figures which had just the life and vivacity which Haydn desired, without the rush and hurry of a modern presto.

The vocal quartette seemed to us entirely out of place. They were clearly sung and well shaded, but were best suited to make a success in a good lyceum course or a church concert. The music sounded thin and uninteresting because of its surroundings. A grand aria with orchestra, a German lied with deep thought, even such selections as have been given by the original Swedish ladies quartette with all the quaint flavor of the Scandinavian folk song, might be in keeping with the programme, but a couple of light, mellifluous selections such as these, were not to be expected in the Boston Symphony course.

The churchyard soirée, called the "Danse Macabre," was played with all the sensational effects. The cock crew in a manner that would have caused Peter to weep afresh, the bones clattered together on the xylophone, and all the ghoulish accessories were so well attended to that the piece won an imperative encore, which was granted. After this taste of programme music, came that great piece of the same school (but less radical in its execution) the "Pastorale Symphony." Of this it is unnecessary to say anything, except that it scarcely seems to be necessary to give it annually to the exclusion of many of the Svendsen and other unfortunate modern string parts repressed so that all of these phrases stood out clear and beautiful.

The public interest in these concerts is greater than ever, and the orchestra plays with a unity and effect that ought to be acknowledged and commended by every critic.

L. C. E.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Eighteenth Programme of the Present Season's Series.

The audience in attendance upon the concert of the Boston symphony orchestra at Music Hall, last evening, the 18th of the present season's series, had the rare experience of hearing a number of the programme repeated in response to the enthusiastic applause following its first performance. Sad to relate, this departure from the constitutional law of the symphony concert scheme, was not caused by an excessive appreciation of the selection from any of the Wagnerian music dramas, or by an unprecedented demonstration over the performance of a choice bit of Brahms's melodious composition, or even by an overwhelming desire to hear yet again some delightful excerpt from Dvorak's graceful writings. It was, instead, an honest expression of pleasure at the performance of Saint-Saëns' "Danse Macabre," which caused Herr Gericke to ignore the tradition of the past, and the second hearing of the bizarre but tuneful composition gave even more cause for enjoyment than its first playing, as the conductor and musicians appeared to feel the freedom from restraint and the general abandon of law breakers in common life, and gave the brilliant measures of the work with far better effect than in its first presentation. Another innovation in the evening's programme was the introduction of a quartet of female voices, the Philomela by name, to vary the orchestral programme. The ladies of this organization have improved greatly in their work since they appeared in the more miscellaneous concerts of the season, and they now sing these selections with charming effect. Their voices harmonize very perfectly, and each part is so well sustained that the presentation of Rheinberger's "Good Night" and Brahms's "Fidelin," gave great satisfaction, and well merited the generous applause which recalled them after the singing of these selections. Haydn's delightfully old-fashioned symphony in B flat, No. 12, opened the programme, and its ever flowing and gracefully melodious musical ideas, appeared to give as much pleasure to the players as to the listeners, so that the work made a most enjoyable impression. Beethoven's symphony in F, the "Pastorale," ended the programme, and its sharply contrasted character, as compared with its immediate predecessor in the "immortal nine," proved to be much more in accord with Herr Gericke's abilities than the fifth symphony of this composer. The least satisfactory work was done in the andante, in which the "Scenes by the Brook" are portrayed, this portion of the work lacking the poetic grace which should characterize its reading. The "Storm" and "Tempest" portions were given with excellent effect, and, otherwise, as a whole, the symphony was finely presented.

in the third movement, were given very finely, and the string parts repressed so that all of these phrases stood out clear and beautiful.

The public interest in these concerts is greater than ever, and the orchestra plays with a unity and effect that ought to be acknowledged and commended by every critic.

L. C. E.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The 18th programme this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given Saturday evening, was:

- Jos. Haydn, Symphony in B flat, No. 12.
Largo; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—
Menuetto (Allegro).—Finale (Presto.)
J. Rheinberger, a) "Good Night."
Joh. Brahms, b) "Fidelin."
Philomela Quartet.
Cam. Saint-Saëns, Danse Macabre.
L. v. Beethoven, Symphony in F. (Pastorale), No. 6.
Awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country. (Allegro ma non troppo).—Scene by the brook. (Andante molto moto).—Merry gathering of the country people. (Allegro.)
Storm. Tempest. (Allegro.) Herdsman's Song. Blithe and thankful feelings after the tempest. (Allegretto.)

The fitness of playing two symphonies in the same programme because of the felicitous choice, Saturday evening, may, for the time, pass unchallenged. These two symphonies go well together; in fact one might listen with pleasure to almost any of the genial Haydn's symphonies side by side with Beethoven's Pastorale. Haydn never wearies by elaborate mental process, and Beethoven, in his "Recollection of a Country Life," as he called his sixth symphony, comes nearer the popular heart and comprehension than in any other. It is like being disloyal to one who has always been a cherished friend to confess to the inadequacy of the impressions we now receive from the performance of a Haydn symphony; and while recognizing his great skill, his genius, the limitations of his epoch, and the slight scope permitted him in writing for instruments, it is possible still to grow cold towards this spontaneous and joyful melodist in the presence of the greater minds who have come after him. It was a pleasure to listen to his B flat symphony at the Saturday concert, faultlessly played as it was, but it is not the single mission of music to please. Beethoven's Pastorale Symphony is one of the two pieces of descriptive music which he wrote. Its descriptions are not imitations; they are rather suggestions, and it will be remembered Beethoven added the guide-book titles to the different movements with great reluctance. The tempo of the first movement was more than suggestive of "cheerful feelings in the country," for it seemed to us almost hilarious. The "Scene by the brook" was played with great delicacy—the wood-wind and the horns were all that could be desired throughout the movement. The humor of the Scherzo was well brought out. In accent, phrasing and expression the Storm was made very vivid and real; the leading up to the mighty crash in the climax being notably strong. One heard real thunder, the falling of rain, and not their mechanical counterparts. Truly "thankful feelings" possessed the audience in the fascinating moods of the closing movement. The strings, particularly the double basses, here outdid themselves, as each division in turn took up the swift and difficult unison which is the motif of the chief variation in the movement. The performance of the clever and popular Danse Macabre was so eminently good that it had to be repeated, the first encore at an evening performance in the history of the orchestra. The Philomela Quartet (Ladies) sang twice. They present an odd feature for a symphony concert, standing so close together, in dresses white and short. They sing well, in good style and with uniformly good intonation. That their voices are not of just the same age or condition of culture, is slightly apparent. The Rheinberger song is very graceful; its theme, when lying in the lowest voice, has particularly effective handling. The "Fidelin," made popular by the Boylston Club, is not effective or interesting, when sung to those who have heard the song from the Boylstons. The ladies were recalled after their songs, and the audience seemed to take kindly to them as a novelty; but it seems to us that their work is not of particular value at the symphony concert. The programme at this concert contained the words of the two songs, and also the French poem of Henri Cazalis, from which Saint-Saëns drew his idea of the death dance. At the next concert this programme will be played: Beethoven, overture (Fidelio); P. Tchaikowsky, Concerto for pianoforte, Op. 23.; J. Herbeck, Dance Movements (first time); R. Schumann, Symphony in E flat, No. 3. Mr. B. J. Lang will play the concerto.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the eighteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

- Haydn. Symphony in B-flat, No. 12.
Rheinberger. a) "Good Night."
Brahms. b) "Fidelin."
(Part-songs for female voices.)
Saint-Saëns. Danse Macabre.
Beethoven. Symphony in F (Pastoral), No. 6.

The Philomela Quartet sang. The bitter pill of two whole symphonies was quite sufficiently gilded by the pretty things in the middle of the programme. To those obtuse people whose palate is not delicate enough to perceive the bitterness that lies in fine symphonies, the gilding may have seemed superfluous. We, for one, must own that this bitterness wholly escapes us; we have always held that, if anything can be sweeter than a great symphony, it is two great symphonies. As for the "gilding," nothing can rationally be said against the "Danse Macabre;" this genial piece of cleverness is ever welcome, especially when it is so placed that the brilliancy of its orchestration cannot cast a shadow upon what follows it. And there are few things in classic orchestral music that could suffer so little from coming immediately after the "Danse Macabre" as the Pastoral Symphony. The four-part songs, excellent examples of their class, and charmingly sung by the ladies of the Philomela Quartet, were evidently so hugely enjoyed by the majority of the audience that one can hardly find it in his heart to protest against their intrusion into a symphony programme. Yet one would fain think that a symphony concert should be a refuge where the music lover could be safe from part-songs; especially when the Apollo and Boylston clubs are ever at hand to dish up part-songs in the best style for the benefit of epicures who are fond of this particular dainty. The "Danse Macabre" was not only furiously redemanded, but, mirabile dictu, repeated—the first encore ever granted since the Boston Symphony Orchestra first began its concerts. The delight one naturally feels at finding a genuine, spontaneous cri du cœur coming from a Boston audience is quite enough to silence all pedantic criticism on the unusual proceeding. The piece was superbly played both times, Mr. Listemann giving just the right diabolic coloring to the violin solo. We hardly know whether to praise the first oboe for a stroke of genius or to congratulate him for a lucky accident. He gave the "cock-crow" deliciously out of tune the first time—the effect was admirable—but when the piece was repeated, he played the passage strictly in time, which made it sound

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The programme for last Saturday was as follows:

- Symphony in B flat, No. 22.....Jos. Haydn
Largo; Allegro vivace—Adagio—
Menuetto (Allegro)—Finale (Presto.)
a. "Good night.".....J. Rheinberger
b. "Fidelin.".....Joh. Brahms
Philomela Quartette.
Danse Macabre.....Cam. Saint-Saëns
Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 6.....L. von Beethoven
Awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country.
(Allegro ma non troppo)—Scene by the brook. (Andante
molto moto.)—Merry gathering of the country people.
(Allegro.)—Storm. Tempest. (Allegro.) Herdsman's Song.
Blithe and thankful feelings after the tempest. (Allegretto.)

Pretty solid work to give two symphonies in a single programme, but then "they were such little ones," and then the Boston public have come to that pass that they accept anything that is done at these concerts with implicit faith that it is for the best.

The Haydn Symphony went a little roughly in its opening movement, but after that, was very finely performed, especially the dainty finale with its crisp violin figures which had just the life and vivacity which Haydn desired, without the rush and hurry of a modern presto.

The vocal quartette seemed to us entirely out of place. They were clearly sung and well shaded, but were best suited to make a success in a good lyceum course or a church concert. The music sounded thin and uninteresting because of its surroundings. A grand aria with orchestra, a German lied with deep thought, even such selections as have been given by the original Swedish ladies quartette with all the quaint flavor of the Scandinavian folk song, might be in keeping with the programme, but a couple of light, mellifluous selections such as these, were not to be expected in the Boston Symphony course.

The churchyard soirée, called the "Danse Macabre," was played with all the sensational effects. The cock crew in a manner that would have caused Peter to weep afresh, the bones clattered together on the xylophone, and all the ghoulish accessories were so well attended to that the piece won an imperative encore, which was granted. After this taste of programme music, came that great piece of the same school (but less radical in its execution) the "Pastorale Symphony." Of this it is unnecessary to say anything, except that it scarcely seems to be necessary to give it annually to the exclusion of many of the Svendsen and other unfortunate modern string parts repressed so that all of these phrases stood out clear and beautiful.

The public interest in these concerts is greater than ever, and the orchestra plays with a unity and effect that ought to be acknowledged and commended by every critic.

L. C. E.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Eighteenth Programme of the Present Season's Series.

The audience in attendance upon the concert of the Boston symphony orchestra at Music Hall, last evening, the 18th of the present season's series, had the rare experience of hearing a number of the programme repeated in response to the enthusiastic applause following its first performance. Sad to relate, this departure from the constitutional law of the symphony concert scheme, was not caused by an excessive appreciation of the selection from any of the Wagnerian music dramas, or by an unprecedented demonstration over the performance of a choice bit of Brahms's melodious composition, or even by an overwhelming desire to hear yet again some delightful excerpt from Dvorak's graceful writings. It was, instead, an honest expression of pleasure at the performance of Saint-Saëns' "Danse Macabre," which caused Herr Gericke to ignore the tradition of the past, and the second hearing of the bizarre but tuneful composition gave even more cause for enjoyment than its first playing, as the conductor and musicians appeared to feel the freedom from restraint and the general abandon of law breakers in common life, and gave the brilliant measures of the work with far better effect than in its first presentation. Another innovation in the evening's programme was the introduction of a quartet of female voices, the Philomela by name, to vary the orchestral programme. The ladies of this organization have improved greatly in their work since they appeared in the more miscellaneous concerts of the season, and they now sing these selections with charming effect. Their voices harmonize very perfectly, and each part is so well sustained that the presentation of Rheinberger's "Good Night" and Brahms's "Fidelin," gave great satisfaction, and well merited the generous applause which recalled them after the singing of these selections. Haydn's delightfully old-fashioned symphony in B flat, No. 12, opened the programme, and its ever flowing and gracefully melodious musical ideas, appeared to give as much pleasure to the players as to the listeners, so that the work made a most enjoyable impression. Beethoven's symphony in F, the "Pastorale," ended the programme, and its sharply contrasted character, as compared with its immediate predecessor in the "immortal nine," proved to be much more in accord with Herr Gericke's abilities than the fifth symphony of this composer. The least satisfactory work was done in the andante, in which the "Scenes by the Brook" are portrayed, this portion of the work lacking the poetic grace which should characterize its reading. The "Storm" and "Tempest" portions were given with excellent effect, and, otherwise, as a whole, the symphony was finely presented.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The 18th programme this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given Saturday evening, was:

- Jos. Haydn, Symphony in B flat, No. 12.
Largo; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—
Menuetto (Allegro).—Finale (Presto.)
J. Rheinberger, a) "Good Night."
Joh. Brahms, b) "Fidelin."
Philomela Quartet.
Cam. Saint-Saëns, Danse Macabre.
L. v. Beethoven, Symphony in F. (Pastorale), No. 6.
Awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country. (Allegro ma non troppo).—Scene by the brook. (Andante molto moto).—Merry gathering of the country people. (Allegro.)
Storm. Tempest. (Allegro.) Herdsman's Song. Blithe and thankful feelings after the tempest. (Allegretto.)

The fitness of playing two symphonies in the same programme because of the felicitous choice, Saturday evening, may, for the time, pass unchallenged. These two symphonies go well together; in fact one might listen with pleasure to almost any of the genial Haydn's symphonies side by side with Beethoven's Pastorale. Haydn never wearies by elaborate mental process, and Beethoven, in his "Recollection of a Country Life," as he called his sixth symphony, comes nearer the popular heart and comprehension than in any other. It is like being disloyal to one who has always been a cherished friend to confess to the inadequacy of the impressions we now receive from the performance of a Haydn symphony; and while recognizing his great skill, his genius, the limitations of his epoch, and the slight scope permitted him in writing for instruments, it is possible still to grow cold towards this spontaneous and joyful melodist in the presence of the greater minds who have come after him. It was a pleasure to listen to his B flat symphony at the Saturday concert, faithfully played as it was, but it is not the single mission of music to please. Beethoven's Pastorale Symphony is one of the two pieces of descriptive music which he wrote. Its descriptions are not imitations; they are rather suggestions, and it will be remembered Beethoven added the guide-book titles to the different movements with great reluctance. The tempo of the first movement was more than suggestive of "cheerful feelings in the country," for it seemed to us almost hilarious. The "Scene by the brook" was played with great delicacy—the wood-wind and the horns were all that could be desired throughout the movement. The humor of the Scherzo was well brought out. In accent, phrasing and expression the Storm was made very vivid and real; the leading up to the mighty crash in the climax being notably strong. One heard real thunder, the falling of rain, and not their mechanical counterparts. Truly "thankful feelings" possessed the audience in the fascinating moods of the closing movement. The strings, particularly the double basses, here outdid themselves, as each division in turn took up the swift and difficult unison which is the motif of the chief variation in the movement. The performance of the clever and popular Danse Macabre was so eminently good that it had to be repeated, the first encore at an evening performance in the history of the orchestra. The Philomela Quartet (Ladies) sang twice. They present an odd feature for a symphony concert, standing so close together, in dresses white and short. They sing well, in good style and with uniformly good intonation. That their voices are not of just the same age or condition of culture, is slightly apparent. The Rheinberger song is very graceful; its theme, when lying in the lowest voice, has particularly effective handling. The "Fidelin," made popular by the Boylston Club, is not effective or interesting, when sung to those who have heard the song from the Boylstons. The ladies were recalled after their songs, and the audience seemed to take kindly to them as a novelty; but it seems to us that their work is not of particular value at the symphony concert. The programme at this concert contained the words of the two songs, and also the French poem of Henri Cazalis, from which Saint-Saëns drew his idea of the death dance. At the next concert this programme will be played: Beethoven, overture (Fidelio); P. Tchaikowsky, Concerto for pianoforte, Op. 23.; J. Herbeck, Dance Movements (first time); R. Schumann, Symphony in E flat, No. 3. Mr. B. J. Lang will play the concerto.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the eighteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

- Haydn, Symphony in B flat, No. 12.
Rheinberger, a) "Good Night."
Brahms, b) "Fidelin."
(Part-songs for female voices.)
Saint-Saëns, Danse Macabre.
Beethoven, Symphony in F (Pastorale), No. 6.

The Philomela Quartet sang.

The bitter pill of two whole symphonies was quite sufficiently gilded by the pretty things in the middle of the programme. To those obtuse people whose palate is not delicate enough to perceive the bitterness that lies in fine symphonies, the gilding may have seemed superfluous. We, for one, must own that this bitterness wholly escapes us; we have always held that, if anything can be sweeter than a great symphony, it is two great symphonies. As for the "gilding," nothing can rationally be said against the "Danse Macabre;" this genial piece of cleverness is ever welcome, especially when it is so placed that the brilliancy of its orchestration cannot cast a shadow upon what follows it. And there are few things in classic orchestral music that could suffer so little from coming immediately after the "Danse Macabre" as the Pastoral Symphony. The four-part songs, excellent examples of their class, and charmingly sung by the ladies of the Philomela Quartet, were evidently so hugely enjoyed by the majority of the audience that one can hardly find it in his heart to protest against their intrusion into a symphony programme. Yet one would fain think that a symphony concert should be a refuge where the music lover could be safe from part-songs; especially when the Apollo and Boylston clubs are ever at hand to dish up part-songs in the best style for the benefit of epicures who are fond of this particular dainty. The "Danse Macabre" was not only furiously redemanded, but, mirabile dictu, repeated—the first encore ever granted since the Boston Symphony Orchestra first began its concerts. The delight one naturally feels at finding a genuine, spontaneous cri du cœur coming from a Boston audience is quite enough to silence all pedantic criticism on the unusual proceeding. The piece was superbly played both times, Mr. Listemann giving just the right diabolic coloring to the violin solo. We hardly know whether to praise the first oboe for a stroke of genius or to congratulate him for a lucky accident. He gave the "cock-crow" deliciously out of tune the first time—the effect was admirable—but when the piece was repeated, he played the passage strictly in time, which made it sound rather tame by comparison. The beautiful Haydn symphony, one of the very finest of the master's works in this form, was delightfully played. Beethoven's Pastoral, also, was given in a way that calls for sincere commendation. Mr. Gericke has an excellent way of insisting upon the melodic outline of a passage always being made perfectly clear. We cannot remember to have heard the thread of melody that runs through each movement of this symphony made so clearly patent. As for the rather rapid tempo at which the first and last movements were taken, all we can say is that we do not like it. But this is a matter of opinion. The next programme is:

Beethoven. Overture to "Fidelio."
Tschaiakowsky. Concerto for pianoforte in B-flat minor, op. 23.
Herbeck. Dance movements (first time).
Schumann. Symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97.

Mr. B. J. Lang will be the pianist.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT. The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night included the following programme: Jos. Haydn, Symphony in B flat, No. 12; J. Rheinberger, (a) "Good Night;" Joh. Brahms, (b) "Fidelio;" Philomela Quartette; Cam. Saint-Saens, Danse Macabre; L. V. Beethoven, Symphony in E. (Pastorale), No. 6. Of all the recent concerts, this last one was by far the best. It owed its pre-eminence to the selection, the arrangement and the execution of the music combined, rather than to any one quality. Commencing with the dash and brilliancy of the allegro vivace of Haydn's Symphony—a movement always sure to interest and gain the firm attention of the auditor at any place on the programme—it followed with those succeeding movements which offer the best of opportunities for display in an orchestra. The opportunities were not lost, for the entire selection was rendered with admirable good taste and effect, and especially the beautiful, stately passage in the menuetto an exquisite composition exquisitely interpreted. With sudden change the orchestra next produced the Saint-Saens' danse, with all its eccentricities, its weird chords for the violin, its shrill whistles for the flute, its sharp clangs for the cymbals, its really comical squeaks for the oboe, its chiming tingles for the triangle, its cold, hard notes for the xylophone—each coming so sudden and so prominent that only a thorough understanding of the peculiarities of the piece and of its actual, genuine character could have brought them forth so strictly in accordance with the necessities of the danse. So pleased were the audience with this selection that a repetition was imperatively demanded and had to be given. The final symphony, so well known to all, was performed in strict keeping with its descriptive attributes. A ladies' quartette supplied the place of the soloist and gave two pleasing selections. The voices of the Philomela Quartette blend perfectly and are well trained into proportions a shading of parts, so that the resulting harmony is excellent.

Last Night's Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra presented a very attractive programme at the eighteenth concert last evening. Haydn's symphony in B flat (No. 12) and Beethoven's Pastoral symphony formed the ground work of the concert. They were splendidly played and thoroughly appreciated. The Philomela quartet sang two selections from Brahms and Rheinberger, and were received with enthusiasm, as they deserved. Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre" met with a wonderful reception, and the rule not to repeat a number was, in consequence, broken for once.

Next week the programme will be:

Overture, "Fidelio.".....L. v. Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, op. 23.....P. Tschaiakowsky
Dance movements (first time).....J. Herbeck
Symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97.....Rob. Schumann
Soloist, Mr. B. J. Lang.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21ST, AT 8. P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- | | |
|------------------|---|
| L. v. BEETHOVEN, | OVERTURE. (Fidelio.) |
| P. TSCHAIKOWSKY, | CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE, op. 23.
Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso.—
Andantino.—Allegro con fuoco.— |
| J. HERBECK, | TANZ MOMENTE.
(First time.) |
| ROB. SCHUMANN, | SYMPHONY in E flat, No. 3, op. 97.
in five movements. |

SOLOIST:

MR. B. J. LANG.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9:35 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE FOURTH MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

rather tame by comparison. The beautiful Haydn symphony, one of the very finest of the master's works in this form, was delightfully played. Beethoven's Pastoral, also, was given in a way that calls for sincere commendation. Mr. Gericke has an excellent way of insisting upon the melodic outline of a passage always being made perfectly clear. We cannot remember to have heard the thread of melody that runs through each movement of this symphony made so clearly patent. As for the rather rapid tempo at which the first and last movements were taken, all we can say is that we do not like it. But this is a matter of opinion. The next programme is:

Beethoven. Overture to "Fidelio."
Tschaiakowsky. Concerto for pianoforte in B-flat minor, op. 23.

Herbeck. Dance movements (first time).
Schumann. Symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97.

Mr. B. J. Lang will be the pianist.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT. The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night included the following programme: Jos. Haydn, Symphony in B flat, No. 12; J. Rheinberger, (a) "Good Night;" Joh. Brahms, (b) "Fidelio;" Philomela Quartette; Cam. Saint-Saens, Danse Macabre; L. v. Beethoven, Symphony in E. (Pastorale), No. 6. Of all the recent concerts, this last one was by far the best. It owed its pre-eminence to the selection, the arrangement and the execution of the music combined, rather than to any one quality. Commencing with the dash and brilliancy of the allegro vivace of Haydn's Symphony—a movement always sure to interest and gain the firm attention of the auditor at any place on the programme—it followed with those succeeding movements which offer the best of opportunities for display in an orchestra. The opportunities were not lost, for the entire selection was rendered with admirable good taste and effect, and especially the beautiful, stately passage in the minuet to an exquisite composition exquisitely interpreted. With sudden change the orchestra next produced the Saint-Saens' danse, with all its eccentricities, its weird chords for the violin, its shrill whistles for the flute, its sharp clangs for the cymbals, its really comical squeaks for the oboe, its chiming tingles for the triangle, its cold, hard notes for the xylophone—each coming so sudden and so prominent that only a thorough understanding of the peculiarities of the piece and of its actual, genuine character could have brought them forth so strictly in accordance with the necessities of the danse. So pleased were the audience with this selection that a repetition was imperatively demanded and had to be given. The final symphony, so well known to all, was performed in strict keeping with its descriptive attributes. A ladies' quartette supplied the place of the soloist and gave two pleasing selections. The voices of the Philomela Quartette blend perfectly and are well trained into proportions a shading of parts, so that the resulting harmony is excellent.

Last Night's Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra presented a very attractive programme at the eighteenth concert last evening. Haydn's symphony in B flat (No. 12) and Beethoven's Pastoral symphony formed the ground work of the concert. They were splendidly played and thoroughly appreciated. The Philomela quartet sang two selections from Brahms and Rheinberger, and were received with enthusiasm, as they deserved. Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre" met with a wonderful reception and the rule not to repeat a number was, in consequence, broken for once.

Next week the programme will be:

Overture, "Fidelio," L. v. Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, op. 23, P. Tschaiakowsky
Dance movements (first time), J. Herbeck
Symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97, Rob. Schumann
Soloist, Mr. B. J. Lang. Globe

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21ST, AT 8. P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- | | |
|------------------|--|
| L. v. BEETHOVEN, | OVERTURE. (Fidelio.) |
| P. TSCHAIKOWSKY, | CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE, op. 23.
Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso.—
Andantino.— Allegro con fuoco.— |
| J. HERBECK, | TANZ MOMENTE.
(First time.) |
| ROB. SCHUMANN, | SYMPHONY in E flat, No. 3, op. 97.
in five movements. |

SOLOIST:

MR. B. J. LANG.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.35 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE FOURTH MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

Music.

Home Journal

Owing to the extreme length of the Programme, the "Siegfried Idyll" will be omitted.

NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—That Herr Gericke has some very broad and sensible ideas about music, that he is really inclined to regard it as the people's own art, is apparent from the change that is taking place in the standard of the symphony concert programmes. Two weeks ago the innovation of the "Danse Macabre" created a genuine surprise; but at the concert last Saturday evening the innovations were even broader and more numerous. Possibly the time may come when the doctrine of eternal fitness will be applied to music, but if it does we may expect to see such works as the Tscharkowski concerto, op. 23, and Herbeck's Tanz movement, in all their elegance, consigned to the harem; and yet it were pedagogical to complain of their performance in a series of symphony concerts. Such music is at least human; it meets, too, with the widest appreciation; so that, with all its voluptuous and ear-tickling effects, it is music that a representative Boston audience, despite all professions to the contrary, might be expected keenly to feel and enjoy. The question of respect is irrelevant; for it is music that has an exclusive effect upon the feelings. A second experience with the Tscharkowski concerto was not without profit. Replete with melodies of a sweet and cloying type, at times insipid, it is yet no more extravagant in this respect than either of the Chopin concertos. Were it mingled with more nobility,—were the treatment as a whole more coherent and dignified, a formidable rival might be named to the great E minor concerto of Chopin. Its voluptuary is clothed with many an ingenious and gaudy device. In the first movement, especially, the various periods are arranged with psychological clearness. The changes of key in the first movement, however, are too frequent, and seem to have resulted from a restless desire for a change, which the composer could not resist. No work of its class could have a more auspicious opening; a luxurious theme for violins being accompanied by a harp-like series of broken chords in the pianism, reversed with a pizzicato accompaniment to the same theme taken in the piano part. In the middle of the first movement the thematic treatment of the previous subjects is scholarly, even to the verge of being scholastic. In the second movement, unless our memory is at fault, for we have not seen the score, no particular regard for law and order is manifest, and there is ample evidence of the composer's familiarity with the arts of Labitzky, Gungl and Strauss. Similar effects, after a weird and grotesque introduction, put in their appearance in the finale, and to an extent that succeeds in lowering the standard of the concerto to that of a concertino or concertstuck. In regard to Mr. B. J. Lang's performance of the work, we can see no reason for changing our former opinion as to a method which prevents him from playing with either the clearness or breadth of tone which it would be extremely gratifying to have him bestow, and which he evidently aims at with all the artistic fervor and fidelity that are requisite for an absolutely perfect performance. It is yet our pleasure to acknowledge that we have not yet known him to play in Boston with such excellent taste, and to renew our appreciation of his nice sense of phrasing. It is as a master of accentuation that we find him making effects that naturally count for more than they are worth. During the past two years his technique has beyond all cavil developed in elasticity, which enables him to play runs and octaves with rare freedom; nor are his mannerisms so pronounced; so that all in all the treatment to which he submitted the concerto was eminently just and masterly. Mr. Lang was enthusiastically applauded and recalled. The concert concluded with Robert Schumann's symphony, op. 97, No. 3, the elevated character of which received a clear and masterly portrayal. Beethoven's overture to Fidelio, which opened the concert, was also finely played. At to-night's concert the soloist will be Miss Agnes Huntington.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The 19th symphony programme was played on Saturday night in Music Hall, and was as follows: L. V. Beethoven, overture (Fidelio); P. Tschalkowsky, Concerto for piano-forte, op. 23; J. Herbeck, Tanz Momente (first time); Rob. Schumann, Symphony in E-flat, No. 3, op. 97. Mr. B. J. Lang was the soloist. If we are not to hear either of the greater overtures of Fidelio this season, it is to be regretted that the Leonore No. 2 or No. 3 of opus 72, could not have taken the place of the one in E which was played at this concert. The overture was played in an admirable manner. Johann Herbeck's part songs are well esteemed among us, but his orchestral music is new. A Viennese and predecessor of Herr Gericke at the Gesellschaft concerts, we doubtless owe our opportunity of hearing his dance movements to the same motive that, earlier in the season, discovered to us the serenade of Rob. Fuchs, another countryman of our patriotic conductor. This set of courtly and dignified figures has little that is original, but it is efficient handiwork, having a good bit of humor upon its foundation which assimilates thoroughly with correct theoretic principles; but, as a whole, their color is not imaginative. They are scholarly manuscripts, not improvisations. Mr. Gericke conducted the set with the utmost care, and many refinements in its performance were noticeable. Schumann wrote five symphonies (including opus 52), and we have, this season, heard all but one,—that in C-major. Any lingering doubts which we may have seemed to hold as to an understanding of Schumann, must, so far as concerns his purely symphonic works, be put aside. We heartily thank Mr. Gericke for these Schumann symphonies. Their musical expression is a continuous delight. They are absorbingly interesting from their originality, their subtlety of invention, and their tender, almost womanly, sentiment. That in B flat—his Spring symphony—is all that is gracious and skilful; but in the E-flat symphony we find almost undimmed musical thought expressed with the greatest technical faculty. Space prevents a review of its performance. In the exquisite Scherzo, in the Larghetto with its unexpected horn phrases, and in the last movement so grandiose and exultant, the orchestra was heard at its best. To one not an especial student of the pianoforte, the concerto of Tschalkowsky which Mr. Lang played makes an unsatisfactory effect. It is not absolute music, though doubtless the writer conceived with definite outline the picture he would express. It would seem a good plan if modern writers for the pianoforte, beginning with Rubinstein, would search out a new name for what they are now obliged to call concerto; for their methods, and the point of view from which they write for orchestra and pianoforte, are in effect different from those of Mozart or Beethoven, and, therefore, distracting to the student. But the work is not dull; it is only untransparent. The difficulties of what Mr. Lang is playing can never be established by seeing or hearing him play. The most extraordinary technical demands are met by him with just the same fortified complacency. He is never at fault technically, and his impassioned, nervous manner is indicative of a fine, susceptible temperament, which makes his interpretations uniformly just. Mr. Lang was heard with interest by the large audience, and warmly recalled. At the next concert Miss Agnes B. Huntington, contralto, will sing, and the chief orchestral feature will be Beethoven seventh Symphony.

232

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the nineteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Beethoven: Overture to "Fidelio."

Tschaikowski: Concerto for pianoforte in B-flat minor, op. 23.

Herbeck: Tanz-Momente.

Schumann: Symphony in E-flat, No. 3, op. 97.

Mr. B. J. Lang was the pianist.

The "Fidelio" overture was played superbly, with rare smoothness and finish, with a grand force of accent, and with that admirable clearness in the melodic phrases for which Mr. Gericke is especially noted in his conducting. Herbeck's "Tanz-Momente," a composition in which the Ländler and waltz rhythms are idealized in a manner that threatens at times to efface their distinctness, is a graceful piece of writing, full of elaborate and subtle effects of harmonization, and deliciously instrumented. It strikes one as a work of cleverness rather than of talent or genius, but it is pleasant to listen to, especially when so exquisitely played as it was last evening. But the greatest feat of the orchestra was the playing of Schumann's E-flat symphony, the so-called "Rhenish" or "Cologne" symphony. If one hesitate to call it, as a whole, Schumann's greatest symphony, it seems yet unquestionable that it contains the composer's two greatest symphonic movements—the first and fourth. It is only in terms of the profoundest admiration that we can speak of the manner in which this symphony was played. In smoothness, force of accent, variety and coherence the playing left little, if anything, to be desired. As for the conception, which is purely a matter of opinion, we should have liked to have the first movement go a shade faster and the second movement a trifle slower. But, admitting Mr. Gericke's conception of the work, we can only applaud the vigor, authority and distinctness with which he imposed it upon the orchestra. Of all the things by Tschaikowski that have been played here, we like his B-flat minor concerto by far the best. It has a distinct individuality, the themes have definiteness and vitality, and they are worked out coherently and according to a well-planned scheme. It may fairly be objected that the composer has allowed himself at moments to run into the extravagant, almost the outrageous; some portions of the work are marvels of systematized cacophony. But still this extravagance of style is not ill-suited to the sturdy roughness of much of the subject matter; and if one be tempted, on the one hand, to wonder at the composer's seeming madness, one is also forced to admiration by the very evident method that governs this madness. Mr. Lang played the concerto with evident enthusiasm, and with a finish of detail that was altogether fine. For grace of phrasing, purity of style and general artistic completeness, his playing could only call forth admiration. Nor was anything wanting in force and vigor of accent. The only thing that we felt the want of was a more commanding volume of tone from the pianoforte; in this, as in many of the modern concertos, the pianoforte has literally to vie with the orchestra in power, and it requires almost superhuman strength to make the solo part really dominate over the accompaniment. Yet it was only in a few passages that any weakness was felt in this respect, and this occasional physical shortcoming was as little when compared with the high intellectual and artistic qualities of Mr. Lang's playing.

The next programme is—

Mendelssohn—Overture (Melusine.)

Handel—Aria.

Handel—Grand Concerto for Strings.

(First Time.)

Schumann—(a) O Sunny Beam!

Schubert—(b) Impatience.

(Songs with Piano.)

Beethoven—Symphony in A major, No. 7, op. 92.

Miss Agnes Huntington will be the singer.

LANG AT THE PIANO.

An Acceptable Performance at Last Night's Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra course took place at Music Hall last evening. Mr. B. J. Lang appeared as the soloist. Tschaikowsky's concerto for the pianoforte, opus 23, held the closest attention of the audience. Mr. Lang's clean touch and artistic interpretation gave this well-known concerto new life, the last movement being especially fine. A pleasant surprise was in store for the audience in the shape of a "Tanz Momente," by J. Herbeck, performed at this concert for the first time. This number was original in design, combining in a waltz movement a pleasant variety of substantial and light passages. Schumann's symphony in E-flat received well-merited applause, although it cannot be considered as one of the composer's best symphonies. The adagio movement was rendered with remarkable smoothness and precision, and seemed to be thoroughly appreciated.

The programme for next Saturday evening is as follows:

Overture (Melusine).....F. Mendelssohn

Aria.....G. F. Handel

Grand concerto for strings (first time),

G. F. Handel

"O Sunny Beam!" (a).....Rob. Schumann

"Impatience" (b).....Fr. Schubert

(Songs with Piano.)

Symphony in A major, No. 7, op. 92.

L. v. Beethoven

Soloist, Miss Agnes Huntington.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The piece de resistance of the concert of last night was Schumann's "Cologne" symphony. While one is obliged to concede that this work is not equal to the B-flat or D minor symphonies of the same composer, the musician must also feel that the slurring remarks of many English reviewers regarding it show a fatal lack of appreciation of the dignity and power which it assuredly contains. We were glad that the work came so closely upon the heels of the Pastoral symphony, for the works represent two schools of composition in vivid contrast. Beethoven's work objective, definite and intelligible; Schumann's subjective and vague, yet both inspired by tangible scenes and events. But Schumann preferred not to reveal his inner thoughts to the world, although the second movement pictures the joyous Rhine life, the fourth the lofty ceremony in the cathedral (inspired, it is said, by the installation of Cardinal von Geisgel) the last the hustle and activity of the street life of Cologne on Sunday, yet Schumann himself discarded all descriptive titles, saying: "We must not show our heart to the world; a general impression of a work of art is far better;" and only giving a single clue to his intentions by adding, "I wished national elements to prevail, and I think I have succeeded." That he has succeeded will never be doubted by any musical German. If we could have chosen the solos for this concert we should have added Schumann's song, "Sonntags am Rhein" as a fitting pendant and elucidation of the symphony. The interior movements—the second, third and fourth—are undoubtedly the best portions of the work, although the struggle between two differing subjects in the first movement is a Schumannesque touch. An odd error has crept into many editions of the work, the tempo of the fourth movement, finally marked by Schumann "Sehr feierlich" being mistranslated "Con Fuoco," while "Grandioso" would have given the composer's meaning. The performance of the work was such as we have learned to expect from Mr. Gericke's orchestra.

It received the broadest and noblest interpretation possible. The German dance of the second movement went with a perfection of gemnthlichkeit, and the tumultuous gaiety of the last movement was admirably caught. The brassy of the orchestra deserve especial praise for the manner in which they executed their arduous work in this symphony.

Not far behind the symphony in interest was the Tschaikowsky concerto played by Mr. Lang. The pianist was greeted with the heartiest applause from first to last, and in the last two movements certainly deserved it. The development of the first movement smacked somewhat of the etude order of music, although the first theme, given first in orchestra with piano accompaniment and then in reversed treatment, was finely given. Best of all was the second movement, with its pastoral, musette-like opening, and we can compliment Mr. Lang on the perfection of ensemble in this movement of the work. He was also successful in the finale, where, in spite of the heavy orchestration, he made his part always clear and intelligible. It was rather a musicianly than a fiery performance, but its clearness and steadiness had a decided charm for both critic and audience. Herbeck's "Tanzmomente" was a charming idealization of dance rhythms, and was beautifully performed, with just the right degree of swing and capricious tempo. Especially striking was the cello melody at its close, which was embellished with flute figures, or, as our lady readers might say, had fluted trimmings. The Fidelio overture was perfectly given, and in fact in all recent concerts the critic has only to praise conductor and orchestra, but if Mr. Gericke kept as poor time in leading his orchestra as he does in sending his concerts he would be ten minutes behind his orchestra.

233

ICKE, CONDUCTOR.

CONCERT

GIVEN ON

OCTOBER 17TH.

232

planoforte, beginning with Rubinstein, would search out a new name for what they are now obliged to call concerto; for their methods, and the point of view from which they write for orchestra and pianoforte, are in effect different from those of Mozart or Beethoven, and, therefore, distracting to the student. But the work is not dull; it is only untransparent. The difficulties of what Mr. Lang is playing can never be established by seeing or hearing him play. The most extraordinary technical demands are met by him with just the same fortified complacency. He is never at fault technically, and his impassioned, nervous manner is indicative of a fine, susceptible temperament, which makes his interpretations uniformly just. Mr. Lang was heard with interest by the large audience, and warmly recalled. At the next concert Miss Agnes B. Huntington, contralto, will sing, and the chief orchestral feature will be Beethoven seventh Symphony. Franklin

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the nineteenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Beethoven: Overture to "Fidelio."

Tschaikowski: Concerto for pianoforte in B-flat minor, op. 23.

Herbeck: Tanz-Momente.

Schumann: Symphony in E-flat, No. 3, op. 97.

Mr. B. J. Lang was the pianist.

The "Fidelio" overture was played superbly, with rare smoothness and finish, with a grand vigor of accent, and with that admirable clearness in the melodic phrases for which Mr. Gericke is especially noted in his conducting. Herbeck's "Tanz-Momente," a composition in which the Ländler and waltz rhythms are idealized in a manner that threatens at times to efface their distinctness, is a graceful piece of writing, full of elaborate and subtle effects of harmonization, and deliciously instrumented.

It strikes one as a work of cleverness rather than of talent or genius, but it is pleasant to listen to, especially when so exquisitely played as it was last evening. But the greatest feat of the orchestra was the playing of Schumann's E-flat symphony, the so-called "Rhenish" or "Cologne" symphony. If one hesitates to call it, as a whole, Schumann's greatest symphony, it seems yet unquestionable that it contains the composer's two greatest symphonic movements—the first and fourth. It is only in terms of the profoundest admiration that we can speak of the manner in which this symphony was played. In smoothness, force of accent, variety and coherence the playing left little, if anything, to be desired. As for the conception, which is purely a matter of opinion, we should have liked to have the first movement go a shade faster and the second movement a trifle slower. But, admitting Mr. Gericke's conception of the work, we can only applaud the vigor, authority and distinctness with which he imposed it upon the orchestra. Of all the things by Tschaikowski that have been played here, we like his B-flat minor concerto by far the best. It has a distinct individuality, the themes have definiteness and vitality, and they are worked out coherently and according to a well-planned scheme. It may fairly be objected that the composer has allowed himself at moments to run into the extravagant, almost the outrageous; some portions of the work are marvels of systematized cacophony. But still this extravagance of style is not ill-suited to the sturdy roughness of much of the subject matter; and if one be tempted, on the one hand, to wonder at the composer's seeming madness, one is also forced to admiration by the very evident method that governs this madness. Mr. Lang played the concerto with evident enthusiasm, and with a finish of detail that was altogether fine. For grace of phrasing, purity of style and general artistic completeness, his playing could only call forth admiration. Nor was anything wanting in force and vigor of accent. The only thing that we felt the want of was a more commanding volume of tone from the pianoforte; in this, as in many of the modern concertos, the pianoforte has literally to vie with the orchestra in power, and it requires almost superhuman strength to make the solo part really dominate over the accompaniment. Yet it was only in a few passages that any weakness was felt in this respect, and this occasional physical shortcoming was as little when compared with the high intellectual and artistic qualities of Mr. Lang's playing.

The next programme is—

Mendelssohn—Overture (Melusine.)

Handel—Aria.

Handel—Grand Concerto for Strings.

(First Time.)

Schumann—(a) O Sunny Beam!

Schubert—(b) Impatience.

(Songs with Piano.)

Beethoven—Symphony in A major, No. 7, op. 92.

Miss Agnes Huntington will be the singer.

LANG AT THE PIANO.

An Acceptable Performance at Last Night's Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra course took place at Music Hall last evening. Mr. B. J. Lang appeared as the soloist. Tschaikowsky's concerto for the pianoforte, opus 23, held the closest attention of the audience. Mr. Lang's clean touch and artistic interpretation gave this well-known concerto new life, the last movement being especially fine. A pleasant surprise was in store for the audience in the shape of a "Tanz Momente," by J. Herbeck, performed at this concert for the first time. This number was original in design, combining in a waltz movement a pleasant variety of substantial and light passages. Schumann's symphony in E-flat received well-merited applause, although it cannot be considered as one of the composer's best symphonies. The adagio movement was rendered with remarkable smoothness and precision, and seemed to be thoroughly appreciated.

The programme for next Saturday evening is as follows:

Overture (Melusine).....F. Mendelssohn
Aria.....G. F. Handel
Grand concerto for strings (first time).

G. F. Handel

"O Sunny Beam!" (a).....Rob. Schumann

"Impatience" (b).....Fr. Schubert

(Songs with Piano.)

Symphony in A major, No. 7, op. 92,

L. v. Beethoven

Soloist, Miss Agnes Huntington.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The piece de resistance of the concert of last night was Schumann's "Cologne" symphony. While one is obliged to concede that this work is not equal to the B-flat or D minor symphonies of the same composer, the musician must also feel that the slurring remarks of many English reviewers regarding it show a fatal lack of appreciation of the dignity and power which it assuredly contains. We were glad that the work came so closely upon the heels of the Pastoral symphony, for the works represent two schools of composition in vivid contrast. Beethoven's work objective, definite and intelligible; Schumann's subjective and vague, yet both inspired by tangible scenes and events. But Schumann preferred not to reveal his inner thoughts to the world, although the second movement pictures the joyous Rhine life, the fourth the lofty ceremony in the cathedral (inspired, it is said, by the installation of Cardinal von Geisgel) the last the hustle and activity of the street life of Cologne on Sunday, yet Schumann himself discarded all descriptive titles, saying: "We must not show our heart to the world; a general impression of a work of art is far better;" and only giving a single clue to his intentions by adding, "I wished national elements to prevail, and I think I have succeeded." That he has succeeded will never be doubted by any musical German. If we could have chosen the solos for this concert we should have added Schumann's song, "Sonntags am Rhein" as a fitting pendant and elucidation of the symphony. The interior movements—the second, third and fourth—are undoubtedly the best portions of the work, although the struggle between two differing subjects in the first movement is a Schumannesque touch. An odd error has crept into many editions of the work, the tempo of the fourth movement, finally marked by Schumann "Sehr feierlich" being mistranslated "Con Fuoco," while "Grandioso" would have given the composer's meaning. The performance of the work was such as we have learned to expect from Mr. Gericke's orchestra.

It received the broadest and noblest interpretation possible. The German dance of the second movement went with a perfection of gemnthlichkeit, and the tumultuous gaiety of the last movement was admirably caught. The brasses of the orchestra deserve especial praise for the manner in which they executed their arduous work in this symphony.

Not far behind the symphony in interest was the Tschaikowsky concerto played by Mr. Lang. The pianist was greeted with the heartiest applause from first to last, and in the last two movements certainly deserved it. The development of the first movement smacked somewhat of the etude order of music, although the first theme, given first in orchestra with piano accompaniment and then in reversed treatment, was finely given. Best of all was the second movement, with its pastoral, musette-like opening, and we can compliment Mr. Lang on the perfection of ensemble in this movement of the work. He was also successful in the finale, where, in spite of the heavy orchestration, he made his part always clear and intelligible. It was rather a musicianly than a fiery performance, but its clearness and steadiness had a decided charm for both critic and audience. Herbeck's "Tanzmomente" was a charming idealization of dance rhythms, and was beautifully performed, with just the right degree of swing and capricious tempo. Especially striking was the cello melody at its close, which was embellished with flute figures, or, as our lady readers might say, had fluted trimmings. The Fidelio overture was perfectly given, and in fact in all recent concerts the critic has only to praise conductor and orchestra, but if Mr. Gericke kept as poor time in leading his orchestra as he does in sending his concerts he would be ten minutes behind his orchestra.

ICKE, CONDUCTOR.

IG CONCERT

GIVEN ON

CTOBER 17TH.

THE NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CON- CERT.

Tschaikowsky's pianoforte concerto, op. 23, which was brought to this country by Von Bülow and has been occasionally played since his visit, was the solo number on the programme of last Saturday evening's symphony concert. It is not one of those works which, comparatively unsatisfying at first, grow into appreciation and give ultimate content, but remains just about as it first stood—uneven, contradictory, and far richer in promise than in fulfilment. There are beautiful bits of melody in it, themes given out with grace of form and color, and sudden effects of pomp and glitter—things characteristic of all its author's work. But it diverges, it wanders, and seems to try expressing a hundred conflicting and ill-consorting thoughts, assuming all the while an air of authority and importance which only much greater merit could justify. It is not uninteresting, however, and there are isolated passages in it of fascinating sweetness or of wide suggestiveness. The opening themes of the first and second movements are well worth preserving, and in the third are phrases which have a charming sound of dance and of the clash of bells. The orchestra did excellent work, and Mr. Lang, who was the pianist, was often strong, clear, sure and effective, although at times his natural nervousness seemed to prevent his doing his best, as an occasional inexactitude in the many double octave passages and dispersed harmonies indicated. The full chords of the introductions were sharply and positively struck, and in the andantino he read smoothly and lightly.

One novelty was on the programme—the "Tanz-Momente" of J. Herbeck, a work which, although written in the measure and accent of the waltz, not even they who prefer staid conventionality in programme could animadvert upon, unless formalism rather than a love of music dictated their judgment. The delicate introduction for the strings would not have been out of place in the Handelian epoch, and more than once recalled that author in the pure, cool flow of its melody and the serious happiness of its mood. The music grew warmer and more markedly danceable as it went on, but it always tempered with an elegant reserve, swaying like the boughs of great trees, and moving with the charm of clouds. It was such music as every dancer would nod to, and yet it was such music as only the Spirit of the Dance might follow in real steps. The playing of this number was perfect, as also was that of the wonderfully well read "Fidelio" overture, which began the evening, and of the beautiful, brief, five-movement symphony of Schumann, which ended it, in both of which Mr. Gericke showed his peculiar skill in preserving both the form and the fantasy of his authors.

The concert of next Saturday will have Beethoven's seventh for its symphony. The overture will be Mendelssohn's "Melusine," and the new work will be a grand concerto for strings by Handel. The soloist will be Miss Agnes Huntington, a young lady whom New York holds high, both as a beauty and a contralto vocalist; she is to sing an air from Handel, with orchestra, and a couple of songs with pianoforte, from Schumann and Schubert.

MUSICAL. Gazette

Boston Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The performances began with a very fine reading of Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture. From beginning to end it was given with uncommon nobility of style and beauty of effect. The opening, in particular, was interpreted with a clearness we have rarely heard imparted to this portion of the work. "Dance Moments," by J. Herbek, is the name given to a remarkably graceful and refined series of waltz movements, Styrian in character, that were heard here for the first time. The melodies are very flowing yet free from commonplace, and the harmonies and the instrumentation are delightful throughout. The work is waltz rhythms made classical. It was played with great flexibility and grace of style and with much beauty and warmth of color. The concert ended with Schumann's Symphony in E flat, No. 3, which was interpreted with impressive force, brilliancy and largeness of style. The second movement especially was given with a broad dignity and graceful flow that were charming in effect. The beauties of the slow movement were brought out with great perfection under the artistic and sympathetic treatment it received. The high state of refinement to which Mr. Gericke has brought the orchestra was never more strongly manifested than at this concert. The soloist was Mr. B. J. Lang, who played Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano, op. 23, a work which, the better one becomes acquainted with it, the more pretentious it seems, and the more frivolous and vulgar it is in effect. Of Mr. Lang's playing there is not a great deal to be said. There was much jumping of hands from the keyboard, much that was spasmodic in style and effect, and but little that was clear. In arpeggio runs the first notes and the last notes were heard, while the intervening notes were scarcely audible. It was the same in nearly all the brilliant passages where the hands took in the whole extent of the keyboard. The opening of the phrase was attacked with force, and then but little was distinct until the hand sprang up with a thump from the piano at the last note. This restless dancing up and down of the hands at last became a distracting feature of the performance. As a reading the performance was barren of interest. The artist played with exemplary pedantry, but with no breadth or largeness of style, and with a phlegmatic coldness that was wearily uninspiring. The best effects were achieved in the first half of the opening movement, and in the middle of the andante. For a performer of Mr. Lang's long experience his playing throughout showed an extraordinary lack of repose and of artistic balance. He was received with great heartiness on his first appearance, and at the end of the concert was applauded and recalled with no less enthusiasm. At the next concert will be performed Mendelssohn's Overture to "Melusine," an Aria by Handel, a Grand Concerto for strings by Handel, songs by Schumann and Schubert, and Beethoven's Symphony in A. Miss Agnes Huntington will be the soloist.

It is scarcely possible that the son of Dr. Damrosch can fill the place of conductor of German opera left vacant by the death of his father. The knowledge, experience, and rare musical gifts of the latter were of great value in carrying the enterprise, of which he was the head to a successful culmination. The younger man, though his ambition and his intuitions may be equal to the highest aims, cannot have had the practice of the training to fill the place to the best advantage. It would not be inadvisable to attempt to secure Mr. Gericke's service to lead the German opera season in this city. As an opera conductor he has a fine reputation, and his appearance in the leader's chair at the forthcoming season of German opera here would lend a special interest to it.

It needs no remarkable prophetic vision to foresee a radical change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony orchestra before another season. Whether it will consist of one change or many, time alone will tell.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

For the 19th of the present season's concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra at Music Hall last evening the programme was:

Overture ("Fidelio").....F. v. Beethoven
Conce to for p anoforte.....P. Tschakowsky
Tanz Momente.....J. Herbeck
Symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97.....Robert Schumann

Neither the excellent character of the several selections nor the admirable manner of their presentation, prevented the programme, as a whole, from being a wearisome one. Mr. B. J. Lang was the soloist, and his clear, intelligent and accurate presentation of the piano score of the concerto made this number the leading attraction of the evening. The presentation of the work was a far more satisfying one than that given by the same soloist during the second season of the ill fated Philharmonic Society, in 1882, and Mr. Lang was enthusiastically applauded at its finish. The dance movements by Herbeck were heard for the first time and proved a very pleasing novelty, being full of the peculiar Viennese life with which the composer was so thoroughly identified. Lack of space prevents any more extended comment.

Mr. J. Frank Botume calls attention in the current Folio to the overprominence given German vocal music in the selections chosen for the symphony concert programmes, as follows: "An inspection will show that, during the four seasons, out of a total of 104 times, German vocal music has been represented on the symphony programmes 67 times, of which 50 times, or almost exactly one-half, belong to the modern German school. The combined representation of the Italian and French schools, both ancient and modern, amounts to the total of 12 times, or about one-ninth of the whole." In commenting upon this statement of fact, and the injury done by not affording students more extended opportunities to hear eminent vocal artists more frequently in the music of the Italian and French schools, Mr. Botume very justly says: "The same audience which listens to the symphonies attends the opera when given here. Why, then, are we debarred from hearing more of the vocal music of the Italian and French schools? The management has evidently no prejudice against operatic music, for we have had plenty of it, but of only one nationality. If this city, in the future, is to produce good vocalists, our students must have a better chance than they now have for the study of vocal technique. Will the symphony management give it to us, or must we look elsewhere?"

There are so many different meanings attached to Schumann's "Cologne" symphony (performed last evening) by different "intention-finders," that we are glad to be able to give the readers of the COURIER the true synopsis of the plot. It is as follows: 1st movement—The city of Cologne is pictured; its various smells are given by chromatic passages on the contrabasses. 2d movement—This is a scherzo, and portrays the arrival of Jean Maria Farina in the city; there are a great many of him, and his glee as he thinks of selling diluted alcohol to the tourist at $3 a quart is admirably represented by flute skips. Third movement—An andante; this pictures the deliberate movement of the cab, paid by the hour, as the driver slowly takes the innocent tourist to the cathedral, and leads gently into the fourth movement, which depicts the cathedral itself. A massive theme graphically depicts the colossal charges of the hack man. The seizure of the tourist by a guide who takes him at a trot through the great edifice, is appropriately represented by brass, and the lofty disdain with which this party looks at his two-mark gratuity, is of even a "too marked" character. The closing movement is full of life and bustle, and pictures the unfortunate traveller struggling with a number of guides, who desire to force him to see the church again. With his escape from their hands the movement closes triumphantly. A tremolo of strings pictures him on the other side of the Rhine, shaking the dust of Cologne joyously from his feet.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT. The nineteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening included the following programme: Beethoven, overture (Fidelio); P. Tschakowsky, concerto for pianoforte, op. 23; J. Herbeck, Tanz Momente; Rob. Schumann, symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97. Mr. B. J. Lang appeared as soloist. As a whole the concert was not as pleasant as anticipated. It may be that the very excellent concert of the preceding Saturday had raised expectations so high that only an equal programme could suffice to satisfy, but even without these expectations the selections of Saturday last were not calculated to "enthuse" any but the most ultra-classical audience. The orchestra played magnificently throughout, but the general character of the pieces, with here and there in the various movements an exception, of course, lacked the general popular warmth—if such an expression may be used—which would hold a large audience interested and pleased for nearly two hours. In short, the concert was more of a study than a recreation, a delightful study, to be sure, but not a popular one. The overture, possessing dash and breeziness, gave opportunities for the soloists among the instruments to show now and then by a few brief notes of what fine timbre every department of the orchestra was. The tanz movement, which was given for the first time, may have been chosen to fill the place of the Saint Saens dance at the previous concert, but it could hardly equal it in favor; that the violins, however, on whom lay the burden of the work, interpreted their part with a delicacy and taste which could not be excelled, is undoubted. The final symphony, with its grand harmony, was the most pleasing selection of all, and was finely executed. Mr. Lang gave again the evidence of his true mastery in the art when he bestowed upon the technical concerto of Tschakowsky every atom of beauty and power which the notes would allow. The strong, staccato intonations in the allegro were given with the vividness and grace so peculiar to Mr. Lang, and at each turning point there was the delicate poising on pivotal notes which adds so much to the magnetism of the music.

Journal

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

For the 19th of the present season's concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra at Music Hall last evening the programme was:
Overture ("Fidelio").....L. v. Beethoven
Conce to for p anoforte.....P. Tschaikowsky
Tanz M-mente.....J. Herbeck
Symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97.....Robert Schumann

Neither the excellent character of the several selections nor the admirable manner of their presentation, prevented the programme, as a whole, from being a wearisome one. Mr. B. J. Lang was the soloist, and his clear, intelligent and accurate presentation of the piano score of the concerto made this number the leading attraction of the evening. The presentation of the work was a far more satisfying one than that given by the same soloist during the second season of the ill fated Philharmonic Society, in 1882, and Mr. Lang was enthusiastically applauded at its finish. The dance movements by Herbeck were heard for the first time and proved a very pleasing novelty, being full of the peculiar Viennese life with which the composer was so thoroughly identified. Lack of space prevents any more extended comment.

Mr. J. Frank Botume calls attention in the current Folio to the overprominence given German vocal music in the selections chosen for the symphony concert programmes, as follows: "An inspection will show that, during the four seasons, out of a total of 101 times, German vocal music has been represented on the symphony programmes 87 times, of which 50 times, or almost exactly one-half, belong to the modern German school. The combined representation of the Italian and French schools, both ancient and modern, amounts to the total of 12 times, or about one-ninth of the whole." In commenting upon this statement of fact, and the injury done by not affording students more extended opportunities to hear eminent vocal artists more frequently in the music of the Italian and French schools, Mr. Botume very justly says: "The same audience which listens to the symphonies attends the opera when given here. Why, then, are we debarred from hearing more of the vocal music of the Italian and French schools? The management has evidently no prejudice against operatic music, for we have had plenty of it, but of only one nationality. If this city, in the future, is to produce good vocalists, our students must have a better chance than they now have for the study of vocal technique. Will the symphony management give it to us, or must we look elsewhere?"

There are so many different meanings attached to Schumann's "Cologne" symphony (performed last evening) by different "intention-finders," that we are glad to be able to give the readers of the COURIER the true synopsis of the plot. It is as follows: 1st movement—The city of Cologne is pictured; its various smells are given by chromatic passages on the contrabasses. 2d movement—This is a scherzo, and portrays the arrival of Jean Maria Farina in the city; there are a great many of him, and his glee as he thinks of selling diluted alcohol to the tourist at $3 a quart is admirably represented by flute skips. Third movement—An andante; this pictures the deliberate movement of the cab, paid by the hour, as the driver slowly takes the innocent tourist to the cathedral, and leads gently into the fourth movement, which depicts the cathedral itself. A massive theme graphically depicts the colossal charges of the hack man. The seizure of the tourist by a guide who takes him at a trot through the great edifice, is appropriately represented by brass, and the lofty disdain with which this party looks at his two-mark gratuity, is of even a "too marked" character. The closing movement is full of life and bustle, and pictures the unfortunate traveller struggling with a number of guides, who desire to force him to see the church again. With his escape from their hands the movement closes triumphantly. A tremolo of strings pictures him on the other side of the Rhine, shaking the dust of Cologne joyously from his feet.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT. The nineteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening included the following programme: Beethoven, overture (Fidelio); P. Tschaikowsky, concerto for pianoforte, op. 23; J. Herbeck, Tanz Momente; Rob. Schumann, symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97. Mr. B. J. Lang appeared as soloist. As a whole the concert was not as pleasant as anticipated. It may be that the very excellent concert of the preceding Saturday had raised expectations so high that only an equal programme could suffice to satisfy, but even without these expectations the selections of Saturday last were not calculated to "enthuse" any but the most ultra-classical audience. The orchestra played magnificently throughout, but the general character of the pieces, with here and there in the various movements an exception, of course, lacked the general popular warmth—if such an expression may be used—which would hold a large audience interested and pleased for nearly two hours. In short, the concert was more of a study than a recreation, a delightful study, to be sure, but not a popular one. The overture, possessing dash and breeziness, gave opportunities for the soloists among the instruments to show now and then by a few brief notes of what fine timbre every department of the orchestra was. The tanz movement, which was given for the first time, may have been chosen to fill the place of the Saint Saens dance at the previous concert, but it could hardly equal it in favor; that the violins, however, on whom lay the burden of the work, interpreted their part with a delicacy and taste which could not be excelled, is undoubted. The final symphony, with its grand harmony, was the most pleasing selection of all, and was finely executed. Mr. Lang gave again the evidence of his true mastery in the art when he bestowed upon the technical concerto of Tschaikowsky every atom of beauty and power which the notes would allow. The strong, staccato intonations in the allegro were given with the vividness and grace so peculiar to Mr. Lang, and at each turning point there was the delicate poising on pivotal notes which adds so much to the magnetism of the music.

Journal

Miss Agnes Huntington.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.35 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- | | |
|------------------|---|
| F. MENDELSSOHN, | OVERTURE. (Melusine.) |
| G. F. HÆNDEL, | ARIA. (Lascia ch'io pianga.) |
| G. F. HÆNDEL, | GRAND CONCERTO FOR STRINGS, No. 12.
Largo, Allegro.—Larghetto.—Largo, Allegro.—
(First time.) |
| ROB. SCHUMANN, | a) O SUNNY BEAM! |
| FR. SCHUBERT, | b) IMPATIENCE.
(SONGS with Piano.) |
| L. v. BEETHOVEN, | SYMPHONY in A major, No. 7. op. 92.
Poco sostenuto; Vivace.—Allegretto.—
Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.—
Allegro con brio.— |

SOLOIST:

MISS AGNES HUNTINGTON.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

ARIA. (G. F. HÄNDEL.)

Leave me to languish
Alone with sorrow;
Weeping and yearning
For freedom dear.

Long night of anguish!
Come soon, O morrow,
With hope returning,
This heart to cheer.

O SUNNY BEAM. (ROB. SCHUMANN.)

O sunny beam, O sunny beam,
Deep in my heart now sinks thy gleam;
And with it sinks a welcome guest,
The love dream in my aching breast.
Too narrow is my room, my home,
And in the bow'ry grove I roam,
But there I see amidst its shade
So many a pretty smiling maid.

And mean'st thou, that like thee I'll do?
That I shall ev'ry maiden woo
As thou dost kiss each fragrant flow'r,
Fresh blooming in the light green bow'r.
So long time dost on earth thou shine,
And know'st my deeds are not like thine,
Why then awake love's painful dream?
O sunny beam, O sunny beam!

IMPATIENCE. (FR. SCHUBERT.)

I'd cut it deep on all the trees that grow;
Deep grave it on each stone where'er I go;
I'd sow it thickly in each garden bed,
With seeds of cress that early lifts its head;
Yes, write in words that time can alter never,
Thine is my heart, yes, thine alone forever.

Some starling, young and docile, I would teach
With anxious care to imitate my speech,
Till ev'ry burning word he might impart,
Like those awaken'd in my constant heart,
Beside thy cot he'd sing, as sings thy lover,
Thine is my heart, yes, thine alone forever.

The breeze of morn my ardent tale should bear,
And echoes from the hills its pow'r declare,
In every vernal bud its truth be seen,
And zephyr waft it thro' the branches green,
While wavelets murmur on the gliding river,
Thine is my heart, yes, thine alone forever.

Tho' all too plain my eyes of love must tell,
My glowing cheek reveal the truth too well,
My lips, tho' silent, speak the treasure'd name,
And every tender sigh the spell proclaim.
Alas! the lovely maid hath marked it never.
Thine is my heart, yes, thine alone forever.

MUSIC AND THE RAMA.

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Not long or imposing, but most rich in interest and delight, was the Händel concerto for strings, op. 12, which was the central number of the programme for last Saturday evening's symphony concert, and there played for the first time. The three movements are all brief; the first and last are each subdivided into a large and an allegro, while the second is a larghetto. The themes are all distinctly melodious and individual, and the contrapuntal development and support are full, strong and various, but without pedantry or heaviness; and the general flow of the concerto is as easy and graceful as if Mozart or Haydn had written it, and in the first allegro there is also a suggestion of Bach in his most free and facile movements. One special charm of the composition is the ingenious way in which the new thoughts are made to grow upon the listener's ear and fancy. First presented by a little group of solo voices, even by one instrument alone, or at most by a single part, their exposition is gradually strengthened by reinforcement of the early voices, and then by the gradual addition of the polyphonic harmony and the full forces of the orchestra, until a noble and impressive climax has been reached. Notable illustrations of this delicate initiative and beautiful increase of eloquent effect were to be observed in the first allegro, in the larghetto when the full movement of basses had been attained, and in the long crescent passages which lead to the culmination of the finale. The playing was as good as could be in quality of tone, and in just appreciation of proportion and color, and the concerto was enjoyed accordingly. The same praise is to be accorded to conductor and musicians for their splendid renderings of the overture, Mendelssohn's "Melusine," and of the symphony, Beethoven's seventh, which latter was, to say the least, as fine an interpretation of that master as the season has produced. A new disposition by the orchestra, by which the outer ranks were elevated gradatim above the two inner ones, gave a pleasant amphitheatrical effect to the whole body, and evidently was of much advantage to the wooden wind—as was especially apparent in the overture,—although there was no apparent gain for the double basses, which were, however, about strong enough before.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Agnes Huntington, a contralto of esteem in New York. Until this last week her nearest approach to Boston has been Worcester, where she sang to considerable acceptance in the festival of last September. Miss Huntington has a tall and stately figure, an easy, confident carriage and a face which may almost be called beautiful; these personal charms, heightened by an elegant and becoming toilette, were not without their effect upon the audience, who called and recalled her with a flattering insistence which we can hardly think her singing would have won if it had come from a less self-centred or less prepossessing lady. Miss Huntington has had advantages of study both in this country and abroad, and has sung in concerts of good character both in Germany and England, receiving much praise therefor. Her natural voice has much beauty and richness in it here and there, but it is not even nor of great compass, touching F and the notes above it neither easily nor with roundness of tone, while below the staff it is not rich, deep or voluminous. She has apparently impaired both its range and its equality by forcing the lower notes beyond their proportionate strength, hollowing the cavity of the mouth so much that these tones become hard and inelastic in their loudness, and make the adjacent upper tones appear by contrast thinner and poorer than they really are. She sings with ample self reliance and readiness, but if her method were as good as it should have been, considering what master she has had, she must have allowed it to deteriorate; for the quality and manner of her tone production varied in each of her three numbers, and her style was not always just or musicianly. She first sang Händel's "Lascia ch'io pianga," giving in it the best breadth and smoothness of scale of the evening; many tones were noble and satisfying, but the opening recitative was as imperious as it should have been sad; some too close clasp of her corsage compelled her always to make three breaths of one phrase, as "Eche—sospiri—la liberta"; and again at the close she made a variation in the text which was strangely and rashly discordant with the whole spirit of the air. Subsequently she sang Schumann's "O, Sunny Beam" with easy fluency, and Schubert's "Impatience" with much spirit, no little grace of phrasing, and pleasant sentiment, but with disagreeable contrasts, making the strong words "Dein ist mein Herz" stand out in the dull, big tone we have noted against the quicker phrases in which there was little body or positive timbre. Miss Huntington has so much in her favor—native gifts of person and of voice, joined to advantages of education and travel, that it seems as though she ought to be as fine a vocalist as partial praises have often declared her. And if she will listen to Benedick's spirit to her own detractions and will "put them to the mending," there appears no reason why she should not be so; and as there is no superabundance of contraltos who sing with animation and disposition to be effective, it should certainly be worth her while to try.

On Saturday evening next the symphony will be Mozart's in G minor, the overture, Schubert's "Alphonso and Estrella"; the other orchestral work, Fuch's first serenade; and the solo number, a violin concerto by Saint-Saëns, assigned to Mr. Adamowski for performance.

.... When it is known that the speculators who have persuaded the Music Hall directors to put in a proscenium arch and other theatrical fixings are the Kiralfys, the lament of music lovers will be louder than ever. But it is the fact of the alteration more than its purpose that is lamentable. 7.4.85

Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor of the Boston symphony concerts, sails for England April 28; where he will spend a week with his old friend, Hans Richter, and then will pass several months in Germany and Austria.

ARIA. (G. F. HÄNDEL.)

Leave me to languish
Alone with sorrow;
Weeping and yearning
For freedom dear.

Long night of anguish!
Come soon, O morrow,
With hope returning,
This heart to cheer.

O SUNNY BEAM. (ROB. SCHUMANN.)

O sunny beam, O sunny beam,
Deep in my heart now sinks thy gleam;
And with it sinks a welcome guest,
The love dream in my aching breast.
Too narrow is my room, my home,
And in the bow'ry grove I roam,
But there I see amidst its shade
So many a pretty smiling maid.

And mean'st thou, that like thee I'll do?
That I shall ev'ry maiden woo
As thou dost kiss each fragrant flow'r,
Fresh blooming in the light green bow'r.
So long time dost on earth thou shine,
And know'st my deeds are not like thine,
Why then awake love's painful dream?
O sunny beam, O sunny beam!

IMPATIENCE. (FR. SCHUBERT.)

I'd cut it deep on all the trees that grow;
Deep grave it on each stone where'er I go;
I'd sow it thickly in each garden bed,
With seeds of cress that early lifts its head;
Yes, write in words that time can alter never,
Thine is my heart, yes, thine alone forever.

Some starling, young and docile, I would teach
With anxious care to imitate my speech,
Till ev'ry burning word he might impart,
Like those awaken'd in my constant heart,
Beside thy cot he'd sing, as sings thy lover,
Thine is my heart, yes, thine alone forever.

The breeze of morn my ardent tale should bear,
And echoes from the hills its pow'r declare,
In every vernal bud its truth be seen,
And zephyr waft it thro' the branches green,
While wavelets murmur on the gliding river,
Thine is my heart, yes, thine alone forever.

Tho' all too plain my eyes of love must tell,
My glowing cheek reveal the truth too well,
My lips, tho' silent, speak the treasur'd name,
And every tender sigh the spell proclaim.
Alas! the lovely maid hath marked it never,
Thine is my heart, yes, thine alone forever.

MUSIC AND THE RAMA.

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Not long or imposing, but most rich in interest and delight, was the Händel concerto for strings, op. 12, which was the central number of the programme for last Saturday evening's symphony concert, and there played for the first time. The three movements are all brief; the first and last are each subdivided into a large and an allegro, while the second is a larghetto. The themes are all distinctly melodious and individual, and the contrapuntal development and support are full, strong and various, but without pedantry or heaviness; and the general flow of the concerto is as easy and graceful as if Mozart or Haydn had written it, and in the first allegro there is also a suggestion of Bach in his most free and facile movements. One special charm of the composition is the ingenious way in which the new thoughts are made to grow upon the listener's ear and fancy. First presented by a little group of solo voices, even by one instrument alone, or at most by a single part, their exposition is gradually strengthened by reinforcement of the early voices, and then by the gradual addition of the polyphonic harmony and the full forces of the orchestra, until a noble and impressive climax has been reached. Notable illustrations of this delicate initiative and beautiful increase of eloquent effect were to be observed in the first allegro, in the larghetto when the full movement of basses had been attained, and in the long crescent passages which lead to the culmination of the finale. The playing was as good as could be in quality of tone, and in just appreciation of proportion and color, and the concerto was enjoyed accordingly. The same praise is to be accorded to conductor and musicians for their splendid renderings of the overture, Mendelssohn's "Melusine," and of the symphony, Beethoven's seventh, which latter was, to say the least, as fine an interpretation of that master as the season has produced. A new disposition by the orchestra, by which the outer ranks were elevated gradatim above the two inner ones, gave a pleasant amphitheatrical effect to the whole body, and evidently was of much advantage to the wooden wind—as was especially apparent in the overture,—although there was no apparent gain for the double basses, which were, however, about strong enough before.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Agnes Huntington, a contralto of esteem in New York. Until this last week her nearest approach to Boston has been Worcester, where she sang to considerable acceptance in the festival of last September. Miss Huntington has a tall and stately figure, an easy, confident carriage and a face which may almost be called beautiful; these personal charms, heightened by an elegant and becoming toilette, were not without their effect upon the audience, who called and recalled her with a flattering insistence which we can hardly think her singing would have won if it had come from a less self-centred or less prepossessing lady. Miss Huntington has had advantages of study both in this country and abroad, and has sung in concerts of good character both in Germany and England, receiving much praise therefor. Her natural voice has much beauty and richness in it here and there, but it is not even nor of great compass, touching F and the notes above it neither easily nor with roundness of tone, while below the staff it is not rich, deep or voluminous. She has apparently impaired both its range and its equality by forcing the lower notes beyond their proportionate strength, hollowing the cavity of the mouth so much that these tones become hard and inelastic in their loudness, and make the adjacent upper tones appear by contrast thinner and poorer than they really are. She sings with ample self reliance and readiness, but if her method were as good as it should have been, considering what master she has had, she must have allowed it to deteriorate; for the quality and manner of her tone production varied in each of her three numbers, and her style was not always just or musicianly. She first sang Händel's "Lascia ch'io pianga," giving in it the best breadth and smoothness of scale of the evening; many tones were noble and satisfying, but the opening recitative was as imperious as it should have been sad; some too close clasp of her corsage compelled her always to make three breaths of one phrase, as "Eche—sospiri—la liberta"; and again at the close she made a variation in the text which was strangely and rashly discordant with the whole spirit of the air. Subsequently she sang Schumann's "O, Sunny Beam" with easy fluency, and Schubert's "Impatience" with much spirit, no little grace of phrasing, and pleasant sentiment, but with disagreeable contrasts, making the strong words "Dein ist mein Herz" stand out in the dull, big tone we have noted against the quicker phrases in which there was little body or positive timbre. Miss Huntington has so much in her favor—native gifts of person and of voice, joined to advantages of education and travel, that it seems as though she ought to be as fine a vocalist as partial praise have often declared her. And if she will listen to Benedick's spirit to her own detractors and will "put them to the mending," there appears no reason why she should not be so; and as there is no superabundance of contraltos who sing with animation and disposition to be effective, it should certainly be worth her while to try.

On Saturday evening next the symphony will be Mozart's in G minor, the overture, Schubert's "Alphonso and Estrella"; the other orchestral work, Fuch's first serenade; and the solo number, a violin concerto by Saint-Saëns, assigned to Mr. Adamowski for performance.

.... When it is known that the speculators who have persuaded the Music Hall directors to put in a proscenium arch and other theatrical fixings are the Kiralfys, the lament of music lovers will be louder than ever. But it is the fact of the alteration more than its purpose that is lamentable.

Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor of the Boston symphony concerts, sails for England April 28, where he will spend a week with his old friend, Hans Richter, and then will pass several months in Germany and Austria.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Music Hall. As far as the work of the orchestra is concerned it was the finest concert of the season, as brilliant and as masterly as many have been. The performances opened with Mendelssohn's "Melusine" Overture, to which Mr. Gericke imparted a motion quite at variance with, and also a great improvement upon the lazy-moving pace at which it is the custom to take the work here. Handel's Grand Concerto for strings, No. 12, was the novelty of the programme. It is a strong, vital and impressive work, abundant in fire, grace, power, and dignity. The larghetto is a wonderfully beautiful movement, with a flowing melody of exquisite warmth and tenderness. The largo that precedes the last allegro is full of nobility, and as free from all trace of antiquity as if it had been written to-day. The finale is a gigue in the form of a fugue, and fascinating in effect. The work was spiritedly read by Mr. Gericke, and finely played. The symphony was Beethoven's No. 7, in A, to which Mr. Gericke gave one of the grandest and most brilliant readings the work has ever had here. It was magnificently interpreted throughout. The allegretto was given with a wealth of color, a propriety of expression and a largeness of style that brought out the beauties of the movement with greater clearness than we have ever before experienced in listening to it. The reading of the finale was a revelation. Nothing could have been finer. The tempo was immaculate, the coloring was perfect, and the sturdy breadth and massive largeness that characterized the reading as a whole were as delightful as they were appropriate and satisfying. Mr. Gericke achieved a triumph of the greatest brilliancy, and fairly earned and richly deserved the enthusiastic applause that greeted him after each movement, and the hearty and spontaneous recall with which he was honored at the end of the symphony. The soloist was Miss Agness Huntington, who has a cold, hollow and unmusical contralto voice, throaty in the lower and thin and colorless in the middle notes. Her tone production is not good, her style is crude, and her indulgence in portamento is as excessive as it is tasteless. She has an imposing and attractive stage presence, and is generally pleasant to gaze upon. Her first contributions to the concert was Handel's "Lascia ch'io planga," which was read with exaggerated sentiment, and with which she took liberties in the concluding bars, and took them faultily at that. Her other songs were Schumann's "O! Sunny Beam," and Schubert's "Impatience," in which she was more successful. The artist was rapturously applauded, and recalled again and again with the wildest enthusiasm—a fact, considering the quality of her singing, for which we cannot account upon any artistic grounds. An innovation was made in seating the orchestra at this concert, by arranging the greater number of the players upon two platforms, one rising above the other. The body of tone in the wind instruments was improved to a marked extent by the change. At the next concert will be performed: Schubert's Overture to "Alphonso and Estrella"; Saint-Saens's Concerto for violin; Fuchs's Serenade in D, No. 1; and Mozart's Symphony in G-minor. The soloist is to be Mr. T. Adamowski.

THE

The Boston Symphony orchestra play together well, but there is more discord than harmony in the relations of the musicians with the director, while Mr. H. L. Higginson is not the most suave and popular of "patrons." Probably the symphony enterprise will die a natural death at the close of the present season.

The and i

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The event of last evening's symphony concert at Music Hall, under Mr. Gericke's direction, was the successful appearance of Miss Agnes Huntington, a contralto singer, whose notable work at the Worcester festival first attracted attention to her merits soon after her return to this country from Europe, where she won distinguished favor at concerts in London, Paris and other continental cities. It is always a pleasure to record such a generous recognition of an artist as that gained by Miss Huntington from last evening's audience, and it is doubly gratifying to have such an honor extended to an American singer. Miss Huntington's stage presence is well calculated to win her the attention of any audience, but the genius of the artist, the skill of the vocalist and the good taste of an intelligent musical nature combine to give her a power over such an assemblage of music lovers as that of last evening which is seldom gained by the greatest singers of today. Her voice is one that, once heard, is not easily forgotten, as it is so rich in quality, so absolutely true, so thoroughly schooled to be under complete control, so well developed throughout, and withal of so essentially a dramatic character, that there is a distinct individuality in all her work which fixes it in the mind and leads to its hearing being recalled with unmixed pleasure. Her delivery of the Handel aria, "Lascia ch'io planga," was characterized by such dignity, beauty of phrasing and emotional feeling that it held the strictest attention of the audience throughout, and called forth a great ovation for the singer upon its conclusion, the enthusiastic applause of the audience being well merited by the excellence of the artist's interpretation of the selection. Subsequently, Miss Huntington was heard in the German songs "O Sunny Beam," Schumann, and "Impatience," Schubert, with piano accompaniment. Both numbers were sung with so much expression, with such a charming grace and with so much artistic feeling that the audience was again thoroughly aroused, and persisted in a triple recall of the singer, the arbitrary law against encores alone protecting her from such a demand from the audience. Miss Huntington's success was so pronounced that she will be welcomed with pleasure to local concert halls in the future. The orchestral programme of the evening had as its novelty the concerto for strings, No. 12, by Handel, heard for the first time. The breadth and largeness of the reading of this work, especially in the larghetto movement, made it a notable addition to the season's repertoire, and the whole composition was played in a way befitting its grand characteristics. A delightful presentation of the melodious overture to Mendelssohn's "Melusine" gave a pleasing introduction to the programme, which ended with a performance of the seventh Beethoven symphony, which was well calculated to satisfy the most critical, the reading being characterized by thoroughly good taste throughout, and the work done by the orchestra showing the result of the most conscientious preparation. The audience was one of the largest of the season, and the interest in the programme may be estimated from the fact that nearly 1000 admission tickets were sold above the capacity of the reserved seats for the Friday rehearsal.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Music Hall. As far as the work of the orchestra is concerned it was the finest concert of the season, as brilliant and as masterly as many have been. The performances opened with Mendelssohn's "Melusine" Overture, to which Mr. Gericke imparted a motion quite at variance with, and also a great improvement upon the lazy-moving pace at which it is the custom to take the work here. Handel's Grand Concerto for strings, No. 12, was the novelty of the programme. It is a strong, vital and impressive work, abundant in fire, grace, power, and dignity. The larghetto is a wonderfully beautiful movement, with a flowing melody of exquisite warmth and tenderness. The largo that precedes the last allegro is full of nobility, and as free from all trace of antiquity as if it had been written to-day. The finale is a fugue in the form of a fugue, and fascinating in effect. The work was spiritedly read by Mr. Gericke, and finely played. The symphony was Beethoven's No. 7, in A, to which Mr. Gericke gave one of the grandest and most brilliant readings the work has ever had here. It was magnificently interpreted throughout. The allegretto was given with a wealth of color, a propriety of expression and a largeness of style that brought out the beauties of the movement with greater clearness than we have ever before experienced in listening to it. The reading of the finale was a revelation. Nothing could have been finer. The tempo was immaculate, the coloring was perfect, and the sturdy breadth and massive largeness that characterized the reading as a whole were as delightful as they were appropriate and satisfying. Mr. Gericke achieved a triumph of the greatest brilliancy, and fairly earned and richly deserved the enthusiastic applause that greeted him after each movement, and the hearty and spontaneous recall with which he was honored at the end of the symphony. The soloist was Miss Agness Huntington, who has a cold, hollow and unmusical contralto voice, throaty in the lower and thin and colorless in the middle notes. Her tone production is not good, her style is crude, and her indulgence in portamento is as excessive as it is tasteless. She has an imposing and attractive stage presence, and is generally pleasant to gaze upon. Her first contributions to the concert was Handel's "Lascia ch'io pianga," which was read with exaggerated sentiment, and with which she took liberties in the concluding bars, and took them faultily at that. Her other songs were Schumann's "O! Sunny Beam," and Schubert's "Impatience," in which she was more successful. The artist was rapturously applauded, and recalled again and again with the wildest enthusiasm—a fact, considering the quality of her singing, for which we cannot account upon any artistic grounds. An innovation was made in seating the orchestra at this concert, by arranging the greater number of the players upon two platforms, one rising above the other. The body of tone in the wind instruments was improved to a marked extent by the change. At the next concert will be performed: Schubert's Overture to "Alphonso and Estrella"; Saint-Saens's Concerto for violin; Fuchs's Serenade in D, No. 1; and Mozart's Symphony in G-minor. The soloist is to be Mr. T. Adamowski.

THE

The Boston Symphony orchestra play together well, but there is more discord than harmony in the relations of the musicians with the director, while Mr. H. L. Higginson is not the most suave and popular of "patrons." Probably the symphony enterprise will die a natural death at the close of the present season.

The

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The event of last evening's symphony concert at Music Hall, under Mr. Gericke's direction, was the successful appearance of Miss Agnes Huntington, a contralto singer, whose notable work at the Worcester festival first attracted attention to her merits soon after her return to this country from Europe, where she won distinguished favor at concerts in London, Paris and other continental cities. It is always a pleasure to record such a generous recognition of an artist as that gained by Miss Huntington from last evening's audience, and it is doubly gratifying to have such an honor extended to an American singer. Miss Huntington's stage presence is well calculated to win her the attention of any audience, but the genius of the artist, the skill of the vocalist and the good sense of an intelligent musical nature combine to give her a power over such an assemblage of music lovers as that of last evening which is seldom gained by the great singers of today. Her voice is one that, once heard, is not easily forgotten, as it is so rich in quality, so absolutely true, so thoroughly schooled to be under complete control, so well developed throughout, and withal of so essentially a dramatic character, that there is a distinct individuality in all her work which fixes it in the mind and leads to its hearing being recalled with unalloyed pleasure. Her delivery of the Handel aria, "Lascia ch'io pianga," was characterized by such dignity, beauty of phrasing and emotional feeling that it held the strictest attention of the audience throughout, and called forth a great ovation for the singer upon its conclusion, the enthusiastic applause of the audience being well merited by the excellence of the artist's interpretation of the selection. Subsequently, Miss Huntington was heard in the German songs "O Sunny Beam," Schumann, and "Impatience," Schubert, with piano accompaniment. Both numbers were sung with so much expression, with such a charming grace and with so much artistic feeling that the audience was again thoroughly aroused, and persisted in a triple recall of the singer, the arbitrary law against encores alone protecting her from such a demand from the audience. Miss Huntington's success was so pronounced that she will be welcomed with pleasure to local concert halls in the future. The orchestral programme of the evening had as its novelty the concerto for strings, No. 12, by Handel, heard for the first time. The breadth and largeness of the reading of this work, especially in the larghetto movement, made it a notable addition to the season's repertoire, and the whole composition was played in a way befitting its grand characteristics. A delightful presentation of the melodious overture to Mendelssohn's "Melusine" gave a pleasing introduction to the programme, which ended with a performance of the seventh Beethoven symphony, which was well calculated to satisfy the most critical, the reading being characterized by thoroughly good taste throughout, and the work done by the orchestra showing the result of the most conscientious preparation. The audience was one of the largest of the season, and the interest in the programme may be estimated from the fact that nearly 1000 admission tickets were sold above the capacity of the reserved seats for the Friday rehearsal.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—At the twentieth Saturday evening concert this programme was performed:

F. Mendelssohn, Overture. (Melusine.)
G. F. Handel, Aria. (Lascia ch'io pianga.)
G. F. Handel, Grand Concerto for strings, No. 12.
Largo, Allegro.—Larghetto.—Largo.
Allegro. (First time.)
Rob. Schumann, a) O Sunny Beam!
Fr. Schubert, b) Impatience,
(Songs with piano.)
L. v. Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7, op. 92.
Poco sostenuto; Vivace.—Allegretto.—Presto; Assai meno presto;
Tempo primo.—Allegro con brio.

Miss Agnes Huntington was the singer. It is always a grateful task to give praise. The critic would much rather commend than censure; it begets less trouble. In fact, it is altogether icksome for the conscientious critic to be so often forced to turn from those pleasing generalities of verbal expression which are meant not to offend, and which are calculated to enhance good fellowship. It is perhaps only the most exemplary critic who dares to make a candid statement of just what did transpire; for to expose the ill is said to be fraught with "consequences." But our readers must not think we are to disagree with them concerning the playing of the orchestra at this concert; no, what was the opinion of one listener last Saturday evening, must have been the universal one, that no more perfect work was ever done by any orchestra in our city than that we now record; our seriousness has general application. It is not yet generally realized how excellent is our orchestra and how fine our conductor is, but if Mr. Gericke should go away, the regrets of the public would be commensurate. The Melusine Overture, the last of Mendelssohn's "watery" series, received a sympathetic and charming reading. The disclosure of the chief subject, which is hidden in the musical embroidery suggesting wave motion, was most graceful, the mellow flute leading but not excelling its fellows. The Handel Concerto for strings, heard here for the first time, does not demand a lengthy review. The Largo is of great dignity. Its theme, in minor, is taken early by solo violin and cello in duet, though its form provides a strong filling in by the full string band. The opening chords suggest the vitality and purpose which through all the movements are uppermost. In the Allegro, the solo violin (Mr. Listemann) bears the burden of an effective, though conventional, movement. The theme of the Allegretto is stately and sonorous, moving with a confidence which was enhanced by an expressive rendering. In the concluding Largo two solo violins (Mr. Listemann and Mr. Loeffler) are the important means of expression. The Allegro following is typical of the great master's strongest vein, and in its performance Mr. Gericke and his players made a profound impression. The whole programme made an unusual demand upon the string orchestra, and were it not for the appropriateness of a Handel selection at this time, this Concerto would have been more effective in a programme where the string element was less prominent. The romantic Symphony of Beethoven, the 7th in A major, was played with an appreciation of its changeful spirit and an insight into and knowledge of its characteristics which will still further endear to us our new conductor as an unquestioned interpreter of the great master, while, as an executant, he has unmistakable genius. No symphony is better known among us, and the salient points of this performance occurred where they were most appreciated. The opening Sostenuto was noble. The Larghetto, played not quite in the "Andante con moto" tempo that Beethoven finally wished, was beyond criticism. In expressive playing this orchestra has done nothing finer. Very fast was the Presto, but the players were not unnerved. The whole of this middle movement, with its qualifying "Assai meno," was clearly and exquisitely played. The keynote of the work, the constantly recurring A, the varied use of which serves as its oracle, was, in the particularly trying place for cornets, not overloud or blatant. The Allegro was marked by great refinement of expression; in accent, color, shading and in forcè, its performance brought the Symphony to a noble end. The audience was heartily and sincerely demonstrative, and sought Mr. Gericke twice to bow his acknowledgments. Miss Agnes Huntington of New York, who has successfully sung in many an English drawing-room, and who has been before the public in this country the best of two seasons, made her first appearance before our symphony audience. She has requisites that win success from many an audience; a distinguished bearing, fashionable taste in dress, beautiful methods of acknowledging the goodwill of her audience, and a bad vocal method. In the Handel aria, while exhibiting a voice of colorless character, her style was that of a novice. This song demands of a singer breadth of style and a repose and seriousness unassailable; lacking these, she sings with a choky and forced emission of tone which it is an extreme disappointment to record. Her faults of vocalization and crudities of style were emphasized in the songs, sung to the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Strauss; the Schumann song being unnatural, and the Schubert ill phrased and sung with great affectation. As a matter of record it remains to be said that the audience liked her; she was recalled after the aria, and three times recalled after the songs. Miss Huntington has a beautiful pronunciation of Italian. The orchestra at this concert was seated in a more compact manner than heretofore; the several subdivisions being brought nearer together, it being evident that a better merging of the different tone qualities was sought by the change. The result was not apparent. The coops upon which certain of the players sit are made to fold up and subside in order to facilitate the moving of the pianoforte; a proceeding quite bucolic in effect. At the next concert, Mr. Adamowski will play Saint-Saens's Concerto, op. 20, for violin. The orchestra will prepare Schubert's overture, "Alphonso and Estrella"; Fuchs's Sinfonia for strings; Mozart's Symphony in G major.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert last night had as its chief number the most romantic of all Beethoven's symphonies—the seventh. This was a work which the master prized as one of his "very best," and the world has echoed his judgment by ranking it beside the C minor symphony. The allegretto will always compare with any movement which Beethoven has composed. The finale may be said to be in advance of that of the Eroica symphony, and in sparkle and life, as well as in broad development, the work is one of the most charming of the nine.

The performance was more than a success, it was a triumph. The opening chords of the introduction which are followed in turn by flute, oboe and horn

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—At the twentieth Saturday evening concert this programme was performed:

F. Mendelssohn, Overture. (Melusine.)
G. F. Handel, Aria. (Lascia ch'io pianga.)
G. F. Handel, Grand Concerto for strings, No. 12.
Largo, Allegro.—Larghetto.—Largo.
Allegro. (First time.)
Rob. Schumann, a) O Sunny Beam!
Fr. Schubert, b) Impatience,
(Songs with piano.)
L. v. Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7, op. 92.
Poco sostenuto; Vivace.—Allegretto.—Presto; Assai meno presto;
Tempo primo.—Allegro con brio.

Miss Agnes Huntington was the singer. It is always a grateful task to give praise. The critic would much rather commend than censure; it begets less trouble. In fact, it is altogether icksome for the conscientious critic to be so often forced to turn from those pleasing generalities of verbal expression which are meant not to offend, and which are calculated to enhance good fellowship. It is perhaps only the most exemplary critic who dares to make a candid statement of just what did transpire; for to expose the ill is said to be fraught with "consequences." But our readers must not think we are to disagree with them concerning the playing of the orchestra at this concert; no, what was the opinion of one listener last Saturday evening, must have been the universal one, that no more perfect work was ever done by any orchestra in our city than that we now record; our seriousness has general application. It is not yet generally realized how excellent is our orchestra and how fine our conductor is, but if Mr. Gericke should go away, the regrets of the public would be commensurate. The Melusine Overture, the last of Mendelssohn's "watery" series, received a sympathetic and charming reading. The disclosure of the chief subject, which is hidden in the musical embroidery suggesting wave motion, was most graceful, the melow flute leading but not excelling its fellows. The Handel Concerto for strings, heard here for the first time, does not demand a lengthy review. The Largo is of great dignity. Its theme, in minor, is taken early by solo violin and 'cello in duet, though its form provides a strong filling in by the full string band. The opening chords suggest the vitality and purpose which through all the movements are uppermost. In the Allegro, the solo violin (Mr. Listemann) bears the burden of an effective, though conventional, movement. The theme of the Allegretto is stately and sonorous, moving with a confidence which was enhanced by an expressive rendering. In the concluding Largo two solo violins (Mr. Listemann and Mr. Loeffler) are the important means of expression. The Allegro following is typical of the great master's strongest vein, and in its performance Mr. Gericke and his players made a profound impression. The whole programme made an unusual demand upon the string orchestra, and were it not for the appropriateness of a Handel selection at this time, this Concerto would have been more effective in a programme where the string element was less prominent. The romantic Symphony of Beethoven, the 7th in A major, was played with an appreciation of its changeful spirit and an insight into and knowledge of its characteristics which will still further endear to us our new conductor as an unquestioned interpreter of the great master, while, as an executant, he has unmistakable genius. No symphony is better known among us, and the salient points of this performance occurred where they were most appreciated. The opening Sostenuto was noble. The Larghetto, played not quite in the "Andante con moto" tempo that Beethoven finally wished, was beyond criticism. In expressive playing this orchestra has done nothing finer. Very fast was the Presto, but the players were not unnerved. The whole of this middle movement, with its qualifying "Assai meno," was clearly and exquisitely played. The keynote of the work, the constantly recurring A, the varied use of which serves as its oracle, was, in the particularly trying place for cornets, not overloud or blatant. The Allegro was marked by great refinement of expression; in accent, color, shading and in forcè, its performance brought the Symphony to a noble end. The audience was heartily and sincerely demonstrative, and sought Mr. Gericke twice to bow his acknowledgments. Miss Agnes Huntington of New York, who has successfully sung in many an English drawing-room, and who has been before the public in this country the best of two seasons, made her first appearance before our symphony audience. She has requisites that win success from many an audience: a distinguished bearing, fashionable taste in dress, beautiful methods of acknowledging the goodwill of her audience, and a bad vocal method. In the Handel aria, while exhibiting a voice of colorless character, her style was that of a novice. This song demands of a singer breadth of style and a repose and seriousness unassailable; lacking these, she sings with a choky and forced emission of tone which it is an extreme disappointment to record. Her faults of vocalization and crudities of style were emphasized in the songs, sung to the pianoforte accompaniment of Mr. Strauss; the Schumann song being unnatural, and the Schubert ill phrased and sung with great affectation. As a matter of record it remains to be said that the audience liked her; she was recalled after the aria, and three times recalled after the songs. Miss Huntington has a beautiful pronunciation of Italian. The orchestra at this concert was seated in a more compact manner than heretofore; the several subdivisions being brought nearer together, it being evident that a better merging of the different tone qualities was sought by the change. The result was not apparent. The coops upon which certain of the players sit are made to fold up and subside in order to facilitate the moving of the pianoforte; a proceeding quite bucolic in effect. At the next concert, Mr. Adamowski will play Saint-Saens's Concerto, op. 20, for violin. The orchestra will prepare Schubert's overture, "Alphonso and Estrella"; Faub's Sarcophagus for strings; Mozart's Symphony in G major.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert last night had as its chief number the most romantic of all Beethoven's symphonies—the seventh. This was a work which the master prized as one of his "very best," and the world has echoed his judgment by ranking it beside the C minor symphony. The allegretto will always compare with any movement which Beethoven has composed. The finale may be said to be in advance of that of the Eroica symphony, and in sparkle and life, as well as in broad development, the work is one of the most charming of the nine.

The performance was more than a success, it was a triumph. The opening chords of the introduction which are followed in turn by flute, oboe and horn phrases, were given with perfect unity, although it is difficult to keep an orchestra together in these passages. The broad sweep of the scales which follow was also nobly given. The Vivace with its rustic chief theme, almost reminiscent of the Pastoral Symphony, yet wholly different in the power of its development went well, and the flutes filled their important work in a perfect manner. But the allegretto, as above intimated, is the great movement of the symphony, and it was performed with all possible delicacy of shading, and beauty of expression. The fugue which appears near its end, is probably as fine a bit of contrapuntal treatment as Beethoven ever did, certainly better than the contrapuntal touches in the Eroica. This portion was admirably clear, and could be followed in its various parts even by the non-musician. The clarinet did effective service in the major passage, which comes in such vivid contrast to the surrounding gloom. We only speak a personal preference when we say that we could have wished the tempo a trifle slower. Surely if ever brooding was expressed in music it is in this movement, and while Beethoven did not wish it to be taken as an andante, a full allegretto swing mars it as well. The scherzo, with its divine length of double trio, was given in a manner which aroused the audience to a wild enthusiasm, and the difficult and dashing finale was taken at a splendid tempo, which was finely sustained to the close. We have not yet heard the orchestra sound better, and part of the effect may have been due to the new placing of the orchestra, which now has a platform, as in Henschelian days, although the seating is in conformity with Mr. Gericke's usual plan, and the contrabasses are not made prominent, as in former times.

The programme opened with Mendelssohn's "Melusina" overture. We dare not find, in this, a series of submarine wonders and mermaid frolickings, for Mendelssohn reproved Schumann for doing something of this sort; but for all that the brusque contrasts, the wavy, woodwind figures, mean something more than a "tone picture of a mesalliance" as the composer playfully called his work. The orchestra did excellently in this, and also in the Handel concerto for strings, in which the largo was the finest movement, full of a lofty dignity and serious beauty, and the four-voiced fugue of the finale was clear and dantly rendered in its melodious episodes. Yet to attain the full charm of this school of instrumental composition one should hear it given by a small orchestra, of say eighteen performers, in a hall of about the size of Chickering's. It has always seemed strange, that among our numerous musical affairs, Boston should not have a series of ancient concerts, founded on this plan. Nevertheless Mr. Gericke's large body of strings played with all the unity which a smaller number could have attained.

The soloist of the concert was Miss Agnes Huntington, a contralto from New York. When we say that she aroused the audience to a great pitch of enthusiasm, and that she has a very prepossessing stage presence, we have about exhausted our encomiums. Her voice is throaty in the lower notes, and the middle register is very weak in comparison with the deeper tones. She had good intonation, at least, and a fair amount of expression in "Lascia ch'ia pianga," although we emphatically dissent from the gasps with which she closed her phrases, and the strascinato (or downward wail) with which she replaced the true portamento. In "A Sunny Beam" she sang rather heavily for Schumann's simple, light-hearted subject, but in this, as in Schubert's "Impatience," her German pronunciation was commendably clear, and in the latter she made a most marked success, being twice recalled.

Conno

AT THE SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

[For the Transcript.]

I stood by the door in Music Hall,

On a Friday afternoon,
The fiddlers they were all in their seats,
And the great bass viols in tune.
A hush fell over the mighty throng—
'Twas the hour of half-past two,
And Gericke lifted his baton white,
Just as Henschel used to do;
And the music woke and babbled gay
As a laughing brook in June,
As I stood by the door in Music Hall,
On a Friday afternoon.

My soul was awed with ecstasy
That it never knew before;
My heart grew warm, but my back grew cold
With that horrible draught from the door,
And I thought the friend who stood at my side
Looked not exactly pleased,
For he raised his coat collar over his neck,
Looked up at the light, and sneezed.
"I think the fiddles are grand!" he said,
"And I love that sweet bassoon!"
But is n't it chilly in Music Hall,
On a Friday afternoon!"

Now though we all love Music's name,
And would walk three miles to hark
To the joys of a Huntington's alto clear,
Though wolfish critics may bark,—
Yet sometimes the thought occurs to me
Were it not for some faces there,
Not quite so many would stand that draught
Of cold and wintry air!
By all our love for minstrelsy!
By yon fair lady moon!
There are certain charms in Music Hall
On a Friday afternoon!

But now the music wakes once more,
In tones that quiver low,
Like the tinkle the Cogswell fountain makes
As Cochituate's nectars flow.
The men who play the great bass viols
Are bowing and scraping the strings,
And Gericke lifteth his lordly arms,
Like an angel aspiring wings!
Oh, is n't it grand in Music Hall,
When the fiddles are all in tune!
But the wind it freezes one's neck to his back,
Every Friday afternoon!

ROBERT BLUMEN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twentieth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—
Mendelssohn: Overture, "Die Schöne Melusine."
Handel: Air, "Lascia ch'io pianga."
Handel: Concerto for strings, No. 12.
Schumann: "O Sonnenschein!"
Schubert: "Ungeduld."

(Songs with pianoforte.)
Beethoven: Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92.

Miss Agnes Huntington was the singer.
We got very much the same glimpse of the "Melusine" overture that Count Raymond, in the legend, did of the fair Melusine herself on a certain Saturday; that is, we heard it through the crack of a door, we being among the late ones who were shut out from the hall during the first number.

The Handel concerto, in three movements, is one of those noble works which it is unspeakably good to hear at times; such works are tonic and medicinal to the musical sense, and it is not well for the music lover to be very long without them. That Hellenic cheerfulness and repose has pretty well vanished from music in these strenuous times, and they come as a double delight to the ear which has been drinking in, and with avidity too, the more feverish music of our modern writers. The concerto was grandly played, Messrs. Listemann, Loeffler and Giese taking the solo passages. The impression it made upon the audience was stirring in the extreme. We have lately had not a few examples of the admirable results of Mr. Gericke's rigid drilling of the orchestra, but none finer than the performance of the A-major symphony. Here again the conductor's insisting upon the principle which Wagner upheld with such uncompromising enthusiasm, brought about the best results. This principle, which is no more nor less than always to make the melodic outline of the music perfectly clear, seems so natural that one wonders at the rarity of its application by conductors. How often do we not find the orchestra left wholly to its own devices in this matter? If the important part does not come to the surface of itself, so much the worse for it: it must be drowned in the general surging sea of tone. Mr. Gericke insists upon it that the important part always shall come to the surface. To take one instance out of many, how admirably his slightly moderating the dynamic force of the great accompanying chords on the strings in parts of the Finale allowed the melody on the weaker wooden wind to step into the foreground. Hitherto we had only seen this melody in the score; we had never heard it. Upon the whole it was a wonderfully fine and artistic performance—clear, vigorous and well measured. The playing of the Finale was especially a triumph.

Miss Huntington, whose first appearance in Boston this was, proved herself to be a singer of no mean gifts. She has a contralto voice of commanding power, if not of the greatest evenness throughout its compass, nor of the most thorough cultivation; still, it is a grand voice, capable of doing great things. She has an admirable stage presence, and unusual personal magnetism, a "long-range" magnetism, so to say, for it is not only that the calibre of her voice enables her easily to fill a large space like the Music Hall completely, but she can throw what Berlioz called the musical fluid, in undiminished intensity, to the farthest confines of the hall. Her singing dominates, and she sings with a certain fine authority, as if she were habitually sure of her effect. Such singing cannot fail of being inspiring, and the impression she made upon the audience was unusually strong and brilliant; few singers have been so often recalled at the symphony concerts as she was on Saturday evening. So far good! Yet it must be said, frankly, that the impression she made was by dint of sheer physique and a certain energy of sentiment. Of musical intelligence, in the higher sense, there was hardly a trace; one could detect not a token of her ever having been under a fine musical influence. It did not seem like artistic incompetency, but rather like the sheerest ignorance of the true character of what she was singing. She may be pardoned for not understanding Handel's "Lascia ch'io pianga" in the least, for that song is a perfect snowball, which in rolling through concert-rooms has accumulated the results of the stupidity of generations of ignorant singers. There is hardly a song about the singing of which worse traditions exist. Suffice it to say that Miss Huntington seemed to have assimilated them all. As for the songs by Schumann and Schubert, she fought against a more stubborn unmusicality than vicious tradition. When will people learn that the transposed editions of these songs should only be used for private edification by singers, and that they are utterly out of place in the concert-room? Imagine a tenor singing "Why do the Nations" transposed a fourth higher! For a contralto to fancy that she can sing "Sonnenschein" or "Ungeduld" as those songs ought to be sung, and with proper effect, is to show at once that she does not comprehend their true character. Miss Huntington showed that she did not comprehend them at all. Whether she be capable, or not, of assimilating sound and thorough musical training, whether or not she would be amenable to good musical influences were she once placed under them, we can in no wise determine. But surely her very rare natural gifts induce one to think that such an experiment would be well worth trying. She certainly offers a true and cultivated musician excellent and abundant material to work upon.

The next programme is: Schubert: Overture (Alphonso and Estrella). Saint-Saëns: Concerto for violin, op. 20. Fuchs: Serenade in D major, No. 1 (for strings). Mozart: Symphony in G minor. Mr. Timothée Adamowski will be the violinist.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT. The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night included the following programme: F. Mendelssohn, overture (Melusine.) G. F. Handel, aria (Lascia ch'io pianga.) G. F. Handel, grand concerto for strings, No. 12. (First time.) Rob. Schumann, (a) O Sunny Beam! Fr. Schubert, (b) Impatience. (Songs with piano.) L. v. Beethoven, symphony in A major, No. 7, op. 92. The soloist was Miss Agnes Huntington, and her singing was no minor feature of the entertainment. The lady has a large compass without any apparent strain of voice. Her tones are naturally strong, even to feminine robustness, and yet there is a marked peculiarity which, additionally from its very unexpectedness, is charming to a high degree. On the lower notes her voice rings out with a tendency to hardness which is rather unpleasant, but the moment she touches the upper notes she develops a sweetness and gentleness abounding in emotion. With a contralto voice of such latent power and vigor as hers, this beauty of subdued accent on the phrases, were given with perfect unity, although it is difficult to keep an orchestra together in these passages. The broad sweep of the scales which follow was also nobly given. The Vivace with its rustic chief theme, almost reminiscent of the Pastoral Symphony, yet wholly different in the power of its development went well, and the flutes filled their important work in a perfect manner. But the allegretto, as above intimated, is the great movement of the symphony, and it was performed with all possible delicacy of shading, and beauty of expression. The fugue which appears near its end, is probably as fine a bit of contrapuntal treatment as Beethoven ever did, certainly better than the contrapuntal touches in the Eroica. This portion was admirably clear, and could be followed in its various parts even by the non-musician. The clarinet did effective service in the major passage, which comes in such vivid contrast to the surrounding gloom. We only speak a personal preference when we say that we could have wished the tempo a trifle slower. Surely if ever brooding was expressed in music it is in this movement, and while Beethoven did not wish it to be taken as an andante, a full allegretto swing mars it as well. The scherzo, with its divine length of double trio, was given in a manner which aroused the audience to a wild enthusiasm, and the difficult and dashing finale was taken at a splendid tempo, which was finely sustained to the close. We have not yet heard the orchestra sound better, and part of the effect may have been due to the new placing of the orchestra, which now has a platform, as in Henschelian days, although the seating is in conformity with Mr. Gericke's usual plan, and the contrabasses are not made prominent, as in former times.

The programme opened with Mendelssohn's "Melusina" overture. We dare not find, in this, a series of submarine wonders and mermaid frolickings, for Mendelssohn reproved Schumann for doing something of this sort; but for all that the brusque contrasts, the wavy, woodwind figures, mean something more than a "tone picture of a mesalliance" as the composer playfully called his work. The orchestra did excellently in this, and also in the Handel concerto for strings, in which the largo was the finest movement, full of a lofty dignity and serious beauty, and the four-voiced fugue of the finale was clear and daintily rendered in its melodious episodes. Yet to attain the full charm of this school of instrumental composition one should hear it given by a small orchestra, of say eighteen performers, in a hall of about the size of Chickering's. It has always seemed strange, that among our numerous musical affairs, Boston should not have a series of ancient concerts, founded on this plan. Nevertheless Mr. Gericke's large body of strings played with all the unity which a smaller number could have attained.

The soloist of the concert was Miss Agnes Huntington, a contralto from New York. When we say that she aroused the audience to a great pitch of enthusiasm, and that she has a very prepossessing stage presence, we have about exhausted our encomiums. Her voice is throaty in the lower notes, and the middle register is very weak in comparison with the deeper tones. She had good intonation, at least, and a fair amount of expression in "Lascia ch'io pianga," although we emphatically dissent from the gasps with which she closed her phrases, and the strascionamento (or downward wail) with which she replaced the true portamento. In "A Sunny Beam" she sang rather heavily for Schumann's simple, light-hearted subject, but in this, as in Schubert's "Impatience," her German pronunciation was commendably clear, and in the latter she made a most marked success, being twice recalled.

Concio

AT THE SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

[For the Transcript.]

I stood by the door in Music Hall,
On a Friday afternoon,
The fiddlers they were all in their seats,
And the great bass viols in tune.
A hush fell over the mighty throng—
'T was the hour of half-past two,
And Gericke lifted his baton white,
Just as Henschel used to do;
And the music woke and babbled gay
As a laughing brook in June,
As I stood by the door in Music Hall,
On a Friday afternoon.

My soul was awed with ecstasy
That it never knew before;
My heart grew warm, but my back grew cold
With that horrible draught from the door,
And I thought the friend who stood at my side
Looked not exactly pleased,
For he raised his coat collar over his neck,
Looked up at the light, and sneezed.
"I think the fiddlers are grand!" he said,
"And I love that sweet bassoon!"
But is n't it chilly in Music Hall,
On a Friday afternoon!"

Now though we all love Music's name,
And would walk three miles to hark
To the joys of a Huntington's alto clear,
Though wolfish critics may bark,—
Yet sometimes the thought occurs to me
Were it not for some faces there,
Not quite so many would stand that draught
Of cold and wintry air!
By all our love for minstrelsy!
By yon fair lady moon!
There are certain charms in Music Hall
On a Friday afternoon!

But now the music wakes once more,
In tones that quiver low,
Like the tinkle the Cogswell fountain makes
As Cochituate's nectars flow.
The men who play the great bass viols
Are bowing and scraping the strings,
And Gericke lifteth his lordly arms,
Like an angel aspiring wings!
Oh, is n't it grand in Music Hall,
When the fiddlers are all in tune!
But the wind it freezes one's neck to his back,
Every Friday afternoon!

ROBERT BLUMEN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twentieth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—
Mendelssohn: Overture, "Die Schöne Melusine."
Handel: Air, "Lascia ch'io pianga."
Handel: Concerto for strings, No. 12.
Schumann: "O Sonnenschein!"
Schubert: "Ungeud." (Songs with pianoforte.)

Beethoven: Symphony in A, No. 7, op. 92.

Miss Agnes Huntington was the singer.

We got very much the same glimpse of the "Melusine" overture that Count Raymond, in the legend, did of the fair Melusine herself on a certain Saturday; that is, we heard it through the crack of a door, we being among the late ones who were shut out from the hall during the first number.

The Handel concerto, in three movements, is one of those noble works which it is unspeakably good to hear at times; such works are tonic and medicinal to the musical sense, and it is not well for the music lover to be very long without them. That Hellenic cheerfulness and repose has pretty well vanished from music in these strenuous times, and they come as a double delight to the ear which has been drinking in, and with avidity too, the more feverish music of our modern writers. The concerto was grandly played, Messrs. Listemann, Loeffler and Giese taking the solo passages. The impression it made upon the audience was stirring in the extreme. We have lately had not a few examples of the admirable results of Mr. Gericke's rigid drilling of the orchestra, but none finer than the performance of the A-major symphony. Here again the conductor's insisting upon the principle which Wagner upheld with such uncompromising enthusiasm, brought about the best results. This principle, which is no more nor less than always to make the melodic outline of the music perfectly clear, seems so natural that one wonders at the rarity of its application by conductors. How often do we not find the orchestra left wholly to its own devices in this matter? If the important part does not come to the surface of itself, so much the worse for it: it must be drowned in the general surging sea of tone. Mr. Gericke insists upon it that the important part always shall come to the surface. To take one instance out of many, how admirably his slightly moderating the dynamic force of the great accompanying chords on the strings in parts of the Finale allowed the melody on the weaker wooden wind to step into the foreground. Hitherto we had only seen this melody in the score; we had never heard it. Upon the whole it was a wonderfully fine and artistic performance—clear, vigorous and well measured. The playing of the Finale was especially a triumph.

Miss Huntington, whose first appearance in Boston this was, proved herself to be a singer of no mean gifts. She has a contralto voice of commanding power, if not of the greatest evenness throughout its compass, nor of the most thorough cultivation; still, it is a grand voice, capable of doing great things. She has an admirable stage presence, and unusual personal magnetism, a "long-range" magnetism, so to say, for it is not only that the calibre of her voice enables her easily to fill a large space like the Music Hall completely, but she can throw what Berlioz called the musical fluid, in undiminished intensity, to the farthest confines of the hall. Her singing dominates, and she sings with a certain fine authority, as if she were habitually sure of her effect. Such singing cannot fail of being inspiring, and the impression she made upon the audience was unusually strong and brilliant; few singers have been so often recalled at the symphony concerts as she was on Saturday evening. So far good! Yet it must be said, frankly, that the impression she made was by dint of sheer physique and a certain energy of sentiment. Of musical intelligence, in the higher sense, there was hardly a trace; one could detect not a token of her ever having been under a fine musical influence. It did not seem like artistic incompetency, but rather like the sheerest ignorance of the true character of what she was singing. She may be pardoned for not understanding Handel's "Lascia ch'io pianga" in the least, for that song is a perfect snowball, which in rolling through concert-rooms has accumulated the results of the stupidity of generations of ignorant singers. There is hardly a song about the singing of which worse traditions exist. Suffice it to say that Miss Huntington seemed to have assimilated them all. As for the songs by Schumann and Schubert, she fought against a more stubborn custom, than vicious tradition. When will people learn that the transposed editions of these songs should only be used for private edification by singers, and that they are utterly out of place in the concert-room? Imagine a tenor singing "Why do the Nations" transposed a fourth higher! For a contralto to fancy that she can sing "Sonnenschein" or "Ungeud" as those songs ought to be sung, and with proper effect, is to show at once that she does not comprehend their true character. Miss Huntington showed that she did not comprehend them at all. Whether she be capable, or not, of assimilating sound and thorough musical training, whether or not she would be amenable to good musical influences were she once placed under them, we can in no wise determine. But surely her very rare natural gifts induce one to think that such an experiment would be well worth trying. She certainly offers a true and cultivated musician excellent and abundant material to work upon.

The next programme is: Schubert: Overture (Alphonso and Estrella). Saint-Saëns: Concerto for violin, op. 20. Fuchs: Serenade in D major, No. 1 (for strings). Mozart: Symphony in G minor. Mr. Timothée Adamowski will be the violinist.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT. The twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night included the following programme: F. Mendelssohn, overture (Melusine.) G. F. Handel, aria (Lascia ch'io pianga.) G. F. Handel, grand concerto for strings, No. 12. (First time.) Rob. Schumann, (a) O Sunny Beam! Fr. Schubert, (b) Impatience. (Songs with piano.) L. v. Beethoven, symphony in A major, No. 7, op. 92. The soloist was Miss Agnes Huntington, and her singing was no minor feature of the entertainment. The lady has a large compass without any apparent strain of voice. Her tones are naturally strong, even to feminine robustness, and yet there is a marked peculiarity which, additionally from its very unexpectedness, is charming to a high degree. On the lower notes her voice rings out with a tendency to hardness which is rather unpleasant, but the moment she touches the upper notes she develops a sweetness and gentleness abounding in emotion. With a contralto voice of such latent power and vigor as hers, this beauty of subdued accent on the

The real charm of Miss Huntington's singing lies in her expression; there is no mechanism or strained rendering displayed in that; it is the depth of her nature showing itself spontaneously in the words she utters. No composer could ask for a more appreciative interpretation of his work. Her four simple final notes, "O, Sonnenschein," in the Schumann selection, had a world of meaning in them which would have told the whole drift and idea of the song had not another note been sung before them. The orchestra played with their usual ability, so that the concert, in its entirety, was thoroughly enjoyable. The skill of the conductor was especially noticeable in the overture, in the direction of the exquisite strains which closed the music, dying away, as it did, in a delicate and beautiful airy maze of harmony. The concerto, for strings, of Handel was given for the first time, and the number of violinists was increased for the occasion. The life and spirit of the first movement, prevailing with joyful feelings, was finely contrasted with the pensive, almost melancholy, action of the second movement. The music of the latter is like a deep lake, reflecting all the time the varying lights and shadows which fall upon it, but not allowing its troubled bosom to be changed by any of these surface influences—and the orchestra so interpreted it. Especially commendable was the vigor and firmness of touch of the violins in each movement. Their talent was even more noticeable in this selection than in the Beethoven symphony.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Agnes Huntington, the Contralto,
Makes a Great Success—An Enjoyable Programme. She

Miss Agnes Huntington was soloist at the symphony concert last evening. She attained great and well-deserved success. Her voice is a rich, full contralto, of remarkable power and range, and her singing is characterized by much expression. The lady, whose stage presence and manner preposessed the audience in her favor, was honored with most enthusiastic recalls. She sang Handel's "Lascia ch'ie Pianga" and Schumann's song, "O Sunny Beam," as well as Schubert's "Impatience"—the last two numbers being given to pianoforte accompaniment. Mr. Gericke's good work as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra was never better exemplified than last evening. Beethoven's seventh symphony was interpreted with admirable effect. The Mendelssohn "Melusine" overture and Handel's concerto for strings, No. 12 (for the first time), were both played excellently. The concert was, in truth, one of the most enjoyable of the symphony series.

Next Saturday's programme includes the Schubert overture, "Alphonso and Estrella," Robert Fuchs' serenade in D major, No. 7, for strings; and Mozart's symphony in G minor. Mr. Timothee Adamowski, the violinist, is to be the soloist; and he will perform Saint Saens' concerto for violin, opus 20.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 7TH, AT 8. P. M.

PROGRAMME.

FR. SCHUBERT,	OVERTURE, (Alphonso and Estrella.)
CAM. SAINT-SAËNS,	CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN, op. 20.
ROB. FUCHS,	SERENADE in D Major, No. 1. (For STRINGS.) Andante.—Tempo di menuetto.—Allegro scherzando.— Adagio.—Allegro.—
W. A. MOZART,	SYMPHONY in G minor. Allegro molto.—Andante.—Menuetto (Allegro).— Allegro assai.—

SOLOIST:

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.30 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

high notes in tender passages is wonderful. But the real charm of Miss Huntington's singing lies in her expression; there is no mechanism or trained reading displayed in that; it is the depth of her nature showing itself spontaneously in the words she utters. No composer could ask for a more appreciative interpretation of his work. Her four simple final notes, "O, Sonnenschein," in the Schumann selection, had a world of meaning in them which would have told the whole drift and idea of the song had not another note been sung before them. The orchestra played with their usual ability, so that the concert, in its entirety, was thoroughly enjoyable. The skill of the conductor was especially noticeable in the overture, in the direction of the exquisite strains which closed the music, dying away, as it did, in a delicate and beautiful airy maze of harmony. The concerto, for strings, of Handel was given for the first time, and the number of violinists was increased for the occasion. The life and spirit of the first movement, prevailing with joyful feelings, was finely contrasted with the pensive, almost melancholy, action of the second movement. The music of the latter is like a deep lake, reflecting all the time the varying lights and shadows which fall upon it, but not allowing its unruffled bosom to be changed by any of these surface influences—and the orchestra so interpreted it. Especially commendable was the vigor and firmness of touch of the violins in each movement. Their talent was even more noticeable in this selection than in the Beethoven symphony.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Agnes Huntington, the Contralto,
Makes a Great Success—An Enjoyable Programme.

Miss Agnes Huntington was soloist at the symphony concert last evening. She attained great and well-deserved success. Her voice is a rich, full contralto, of remarkable power and range, and her singing is characterized by much expression. The lady, whose stage presence and manner preposessed the audience in her favor, was honored with most enthusiastic recalls. She sang Handel's "Lascia ch'ie Pianga" and Schumann's song, "O Sunny Beam," as well as Schubert's "Impatience"—the last two numbers being given to pianoforte accompaniment. Mr. Gericke's good work as director of the Boston Symphony orchestra was never better exemplified than last evening. Beethoven's seventh symphony was interpreted with admirable effect. The Mendelssohn "Melusine" overture and Handel's concerto for strings, No. 12 (for the first time), were both played excellently. The concert was, in truth, one of the most enjoyable of the symphony series.

Next Saturday's programme includes the Schubert overture, "Alphonso and Estrella," Robert Fuchs' serenade in D major, No. 7, for strings; and Mozart's symphony in G minor. Mr. Timothee Adamowski, the violinist, is to be the soloist; and he will perform Saint Saens' concerto for violin, opus 20.

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9:30 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 7TH, AT 8. P. M.

PROGRAMME.

FR. SCHUBERT,	OVERTURE, (Alphonso and Estrella.)
CAM. SAINT-SAENS,	CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN, op. 20.
ROB. FUCHS,	SERENADE in D Major, No. 1. (For STRINGS.) Andante.—Tempo di menuetto.—Allegro scherzando.— Adagio.—Allegro.—
W. A. MOZART,	SYMPHONY in G minor. Allegro molto.—Andante.—Menuetto (Allegro).— Allegro assai.—

SOLOIST:

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Twenty-First Programme. ^{Herald} Mr. T. Adamowski Soloist.

The twenty-first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, at Music Hall, last evening, had as its soloist Mr. T. Adamowski, violinist, and for its selections:

Overture, "Alphonso and Estrella".....Fr. Schubert
Concerto for violin, op. 20.....Cam. Saint-Saëns
Serenade in D major, No. 1.....Rob. Fuchs
Symphony in G minor.....W. A. Mozart

While lacking the elements of contrast in a sufficient degree to make the merits of the several selections fully prominent, the programme was of a character to win general favor, and so it was accepted with much pleasure by one of the largest audiences of the season. The soloist, Mr. Adamowski, has won his prominence among resident artists so honestly that it was a pleasure to note the friendly round of applause which greeted him as he stepped forward from his desk in the orchestra to play the Saint-Saëns concerto. The composition is one admirably suited to display the rare refinement of the player's style, and his presentation of the number was thoroughly enjoyable. The beautiful themes of the composition were sung by the instrument under the performer's touch with such grace and expression that the charms of the artist's efforts were plainly shown by the rapt attention of his audience, and the absolute purity of the tone and the faultless technical acquirements of the player were noticeable at all times. Repeated rounds of applause rewarded Mr. Adamowski as he finished the selection, and he was compelled again and again to acknowledge the recognition of his excellent work by the audience. The folly of designating the Fuchs number a serenade must be apparent to all familiar with the composition, and custom cannot justify such an absurd use of this word, which has but one definite and distinct meaning. Any composition not of a sentimental or romantic character is entirely unsuited to be classed under this designation, and therefore the word "suite" is far more appropriate for this number, consisting, as it does, of five most enjoyable movements. It is not surprising that the conductor delights in such compositions, for, with such a body of strong players at his command, there must always be a desire to display their virtuosity, and the audience of the present season has come quite naturally to take especial pleasure in such compositions. The D major suite is far more satisfying than that of the same composer played earlier in the season, and the wealth of cleverly elaborated melodies gave constant pleasure as one after another of the movements was played with faultless taste and precision. The tuneful overture by Schubert gave a very enjoyable beginning to the programme, and the G minor symphony, so full of the best work of Mozart, made the ending of the concert equally pleasant, the reading and presentation of the latter work meriting the highest commendation.

... For the first time since the Symphony Orchestra was established, the season will end without a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. A chorus will be employed, however, on the last night but one—the Bach bi-centennial.

TWENTY-FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT

If Schubert's overture to "Alphonso and Estrella" is to be trusted, the two mythical personages whose names are linked together in its title must have had a good deal of pretty variegated experience, and can only have finally worked their way to beaming raveny through some gloom, a fair share of perplexity and perturbation and some lively tussles—all of which, one can but hope, were not divided between them in mutual disagreement, but were only consequent upon the interference of an envious and jealous world. But, however this may be, one thing is certain—that Mr. Gericke's orchestra gave a delightful shading to all the contrasting nuances of the charming little overture and brought it to a bright and beautiful conclusion. Immediately upon this followed the solo number of the evening, Saint-Saëns's opus 20, a concerto for violin, assigned to Mr. Adamowski. The composition might almost as properly be called a fantasia, for its principal impression derives from the long central cantabile, to which all the rest serves rather as introduction and conclusion than as independent theses. The orchestral score, too, is very light and subordinate, having little more thematic quality than belongs to a good accompaniment, and being fully and constantly developed so as to enhance the effects desired for the sole instrument. Mr. Adamowski's tone was faint for the Music Hall, but it was sweet, however, and refined; his playing was clear, even and tuneful, rather tasteful than enthusiastic, and his demeanor was quiet and easy, making no demonstration of difficulties for the eyes of those whose ears could not be trusted to discover them. Two or three protracted trills were remarkably equable to steady, and his reading of the long andante we have mentioned, excellent in phrasing and technique. After the concerto came the first of Robert Fuch's serenades for a string orchestra, that in D major. The five movements were all exquisitely performed, each part moving like a single instrument, whether its execution or its expression be considered. Were any special account to be taken of individual points in this sequence, we should cite the trio in the minuet, with its bit of 'cello prominence, the peculiar clearness of the allegro scherzando in canon form and the ready brightness of the second violins in the final allegro. The concert ended with a finely proportioned and richly colored performance of Mozart's G minor symphony, in the course of which, among other excellences, one could scarcely help being struck with the perfect fluency and freedom of the double basses in the two allegri, and the dignified fullness of the minuet, brightened in the trio by the purity of the horns. The whole reading was an admirable one, and the andante was greatly applauded.

On Saturday evening next Beethoven's eighth will be the symphony; the overtures will be Volkmann's "Richard III." (to be heard for the first time) and Schumann's "Hermann and Dorothea," and the solo number will be a violin concerto of Vieuxtemps, to be played by Mr. Campanari.

MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1885.

The programme of the twenty-first concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—Schubert—Overture to "Alphonso and Estrella," Saint-Saëns—Concerto for Violin, Op. 20. Fuchs—Serenade in D major, No. 1, for strings. Mozart—Symphony in G minor.

Mr. T. Adamowski was the violinist.

Schubert's "Alphonso and Estrella," although eminently a characteristic work, is not the most inspiring of his overtures. It has neither the depth and tragic intensity of the "Fierabras" nor the charm of the "Rosamunde;" indeed one wonders a little at the strong hold this overture has upon the fancy of concert-givers, for there is no apparent need of playing it on grounds of veneration for the composer, and it has never aroused much enthusiasm in our audiences. It was excellently played. Fuchs's serenade for strings is a composition not devoid of interest and charm; there is perhaps not quite enough intrinsic vigor in it to lift it wholly out of the ranks of Kapellmeister-Musik, but in these ranks it can fairly hold a more than respectable position. It is pleasant to listen to when not heard too often. The orchestra played it admirably. In the G-minor symphony Mr. Gericke and the orchestra added another bay-leaf to their wreath. We all remember the triumphant performance of the "Jupiter" a few weeks ago; it was this performance that inspired us to express a hope that the G-minor might soon be given us also. No one can well have been disappointed in the result. This is saying much, for although it takes a great deal to play the "Jupiter" thoroughly well, it requires a still finer perception to meet all the demands of the G-minor symphony. The work is absolutely unique; it reveals all the depth of Mozart's artistic nature, and never was profound sentiment expressed more poetically, nor in a more finely perfected form. The orchestra played wonderfully, and, at times, made one almost forget the damaging influence of the size of the hall. That the symphony did not make the irresistible impression on the public that the "Jupiter" did was natural enough. Of the two works the G-minor is decidedly the one which has the weaker element of general popularity; a good deal in it is probably destined to remain caviare to the vulgar. But to the true lovers it is a feast like few, one might almost say like none other. The Saint-Saëns concerto is a work which seems to have a good deal of that rather dry brilliancy which the composer often obtains. There is no lack of spice in it in the matter of harmony, instrumentation and rhythm, but the impression it makes as a whole is that of a work of long-headed cleverness, rather than of inspiration. In the middle movement, however, there are moments of unmistakable real beauty. Mr. Adamowski played it with fine finish of style, and if one felt at times that a little more of easy freedom and endurable spirit would have done no harm, his playing of the slower cantabile phrases was perfect in its grace and penetrating expressiveness. Mr. Adamowski's distinctive charm as a player, is his genuine sensibility, and certain passages in the concerto brought this trait of his into fine prominence.

The next programme is: Volkmann—Overture, "King Richard III." (first time). Vieuxtemps—Concerto for Violin. Schumann—Overture, "Her-mann and Dorothea." Beethoven—Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93. Mr. Leandro Campanari will be the violinist.

Twenty-First Symphony Concert.—At the twenty-first symphony concert in Music Hall, on Saturday evening, Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist. The programme consisted of Schubert's overture (Alphonso and Estrella); Saint-Saëns' concerto for violin, op. 20; Serenade by Robert Fuchs; and Mozart's symphony in G. The Saint-Saëns concerto is a clear and melodious work, the tutti and solo parts of which are admirably connected, the entire piece not rising above the dignity of a well-made concertino. That it is a composition of lasting value was not made evident by a single experience with it. It appeared more or less tinted by a species of sweet sentimentality, and the characteristic was by no means subordinated by Mr. Adamowski's performance, which was artistically faithful in intent and clear and correct in delivery. A not unjust simile of the performance would be that which might liken its effect to that of an amalgamation of oil and sugar, the craze for which was more or less illustrated in the applause which the distinguished violinist received. Sandwiched between a graceful and easy-going overture, and a serenade,—the exquisite prettiness of its most conspicuous feature seemed somewhat inopportune. The concert concluded with a fine performance of Mozart's G minor symphony. To-night Signor Campanari will play a concerto for violin by Vieuxtemps, and the symphony will be that in F major, No. 8, by Beethoven.

The ninth symphony will not be performed in the present series of concerts. Heretofore its performance has been deemed essential; but no such blind appreciation of Beethoven's music is commendable which demands an experience with the vocal idiosyncracies of the great composer. When the master wrote without regard to the capacity of certain wood and wind instruments, he could rely upon human ingenuity to supply his demands; but as it requires something more than finite wisdom to create any such resources as are essential for an acceptable performance of the ninth symphony, there can be afforded no justification for the performance of such parts of it as must inevitably render it the bete noir of singers not endowed with phenomenal voices. The patrons of the symphony concerts are to be congratulated that Herr Gericke has found it unnecessary that the great work should be performed this season.

Continued

The chief number of the programme of last night's concert was the G minor symphony by Mozart, a work which falls in the same epoch with the Jupiter symphony, and which is the only instrumental work by this composer which can stand beside it. It has some points of resemblance, also, with that symphony. While the other symphonies of Mozart are genial and full of light-heartedness, these two exhibit little of the playful order, the "Jupiter" being all dignity, and this symphony all passion, longing or sorrow. In the Jupiter we hear Mozart as he might have been, had he been spared to a longer career in art. In this work, however, we find the Mozart whom we know and whose style we can recognize, but now in a sadder mood than usual, and speaking in a more sombre vein.

The work is somewhat distorted by being given to a modern grand orchestra, for it must be remembered that Mozart originally wrote it for an orchestra of smallest dimensions, without drums or trumpets or clarinets, although he afterwards added a few of those instruments in a rescored version. It would be most interesting some time to hear this symphony queen, according to the original slender score, in a hall of small size, that we might learn with what slight means Mozart was able to produce such great effects. In form this work is so clear that it can be followed by any auditor who has acquired even the outlines of symphonic shape. Spite of its simplicity of instrumentation, there are effects of most striking beauty in the work. The very viola figure, at the beginning, although merely an accompaniment, is of peculiar power, and the andante is a marvellous example of simple yet expressive tone color. It is well to hear such works often. The modern tendency is to overgrown effects and constant piquancy; and the public are in danger of losing the ability to distinguish between the true and the false in heavy scores.

The performance of the work was of the finest character. The last movement had a virility which must have convinced every auditor that it is a mistake to refer to Mozart only as "graceful." The development of the first figure was of greatest interest and the minuet was another remarkably fine part of the performance. The first movement seemed somewhat slower than we have been used to, but we recognize the right of the conductor to have a certain amount of judgment in the matter of tempi, (if he does not blur) and do not propose to join the "tempo-police," an organization as baneful to fair criticisms of performance, as the "fifth-hunter's" are to composition.

Lack of space compels brevity in noticing the rest of the concert. The opening overture, full of melody, especially in its second theme, went admirably; and the Fuchs serenade—a sweet and graceful work such as Delibes might own—showed the strings to the best possible advantage.

Saint-Saëns' violin concerto, op. 20, was given for the first time in America. It is finely scored for orchestra, and gives some good opportunities both for bravura and expression to the soloist, who on this occasion was Mr. Adamowski, whose intonation was pure, and whose playing was refined and delicate. The work could have borne a broader tone than M. Adamowski gave to it, but his playing in other respects deserves much commendation and was most heartily applauded by the audience.

The twenty-first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night before a very large audience. The performances began with a bright, animated, and clean-cut reading of Schubert's "Alphonso and Estrella" overture. This was followed by Saint-Saëns' melodious and gracefully-written concerto for violin, op. 20. It is not a masterpiece in its kind, but it is flowing in style, continuous in interest, and never becomes tiresome. It was played by Mr. T. Adamowski prettily and neatly, with ease and good intonation. The slow movement was given with especial breadth and nicety of shading. The performance as a whole, however, was lacking in force and color, and the artist's tone was thin and weak in volume. Mr. Adamowski was applauded with the greatest fervor, and recalled several times. Robert Fuchs's charming serenade in D-major, No. 1, for strings, came next. All of its five movements are full of refined melody and artistic treatment. The writing throughout is delightfully clear, and the contrapuntal work is clean, crisp, and without stiffness. It was beautifully read and played. Mozart's Symphony in G minor, which still remains one of the great masterpieces of symphony, and whose freshness remains unimpaired, received a wonderfully fine interpretation. Nothing better could have been desired in the form of a sympathetic, strong, richly colored and brilliant reading. The minuet was given with a particularly impressive and appropriate stateliness, and the finale with rare fire, clearness and breadth. It was a great delight to listen to from beginning to end. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Richard III.," Volkmann; Concerto for Violin, Vieuxtemps; Overture, "Hermann and Dorothea," Schumann; Symphony No. 8, Beethoven. Mr. Leandro Campanari will be the soloist.

The Beethoven ninth symphony is not to be given this season. While we are sorry to lose this work, we are glad of the precedent it establishes, and hope that it may not be necessary to give us the first and sixth symphonies with such annual regularity hereafter to the exclusion of modern composers.

To the Editors of the Boston Daily Advertiser:—

If a pen could be provided in the Music Hall, completely separated from the rest of the seats, for the convenience of those persons who go there to spend the evening in conversation, it would be a relief to the audience.

One need not then fear that the music must cease and give way to the debate club in the balcony.

There seemed great danger of this during the beautiful concert on Sunday evening in honor of the birthday of Handel.

X.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—At the 21st concert given Saturday evening this programme was played:
Fr. Schubert, Overture (Alphonso and Estrella).
Cam. Saint-Saëns, Concerto for Violin, op. 20.
Rob. Fuchs, Serenade in D major, No. 1.

(For strings.)
Andante—Tempo di menuetto—Allegro scherzando—Adagio—Allegro.
W. A. Mozart, Symphony in G minor.
Allegro molto—Andante—Menuetto (Allegro)—Allegro assai.

In outlining the work for his orchestra in this first season Mr. Gericke is represented as saying that he should play chiefly works of the classic school, because they were best calculated to create a good technique, a factor to him of first importance. That he intentionally slights the newer things which are so essential in the repertory of every well-equipped, progressive orchestra; for they provide new elements in orchestration, show national characteristics in composition, or of thought, and, (as modern orchestral music is largely unconventional and aspiring,) offer to student and player opportunity for comparison, which is ever a necessary feature in a broad, liberal education. Wisely enough for the establishment of "technique," Mr. Gericke has played almost entirely music of the German (classic) school; few of his programmes have been well constructed, because, as it is fair to presume, of the restrictions which we have intimated. Understanding this (but we shall refer to the subject in an article reviewing the season), the monotony of Saturday evening's programme is condoned; though, the work for strings predominating, the entire programme was apt and interesting. Hoping then, that Mr. Gericke is acquainted in other schools, and is a man of broad, catholic taste, and a sympathizer with music denationalized, what visions of fine things connect themselves with his next season, when the elementary work of this shall have been perfected, and present prophecies can be realized. The Schubert overture to "Alphonso and Estrella" was a novelty. How interesting a novelty would be a performance of the opera for which it was written. This work, "Alphonso and Estrella," though written in 1822, reached its first successful performance in 1879, when, generally curtailed and with a re-written libretto, it was given in Vienna, and is now frequently heard. Here is a hint for Mr. Neuendorf. The overture is theatric, but unconventional, in that it is exceedingly well written and is not bizarre. A suggestive military subject alternates with what might be called the "forage motif," in which there is much charm, although the overture as a whole represents greatness relaxed. It was played very deftly. The Fuchs serenade in D major, companion to his No. 2 in C major, played at the second concert of the season, is something more than learned musicianship. Frequently does the cunning hand of the composer deal with his theme and with his instruments in a fashion at once striking and original. The Scherzo in particular makes its effect with only a legato subject; but its jollity is as apparent as if the most elastic and erratic bounds of Scherzo had been sought. In the Allegro, a syncopated subject of strong character is well treated. Each movement of the work is brief, compact and excellent in form. Following an overture more or less light, and a violin concerto, the serenade was by no means skilfully placed. The Mozart symphony in G minor was played with that absolute regard for expression which has become habitual with this orchestra; Mr. Gericke is relentless in all matters pertaining to drill, and to an observer it is apparent that only a hearty esprit du corps existing among the players could bring out such responses. Mr. Adamowski in the St. Saëns concerto made his first appearance before a symphony audience, though he is by no means a stranger to our concert goers. His playing is refined, sensitive and tuneful. He uses a fine instrument, and he played a poetic work. He does not possess great strength of tone, nor does he appear to have any striking mental conception of what he plays; but his technique in this concerto was highly satisfactory, and its trills and other graces of floriture were very elegantly accomplished. At the next concert Mr. Campanari will play a Vieuxtemps concerto for violin, while the orchestra are to give a new overture by Volkmann: Schumann's, Hermann and Dorothea overture; and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first concert of the Boston series took place last Saturday with the following programme.

Overture, (Alphonso and Estrella,)..... Fr. Schubert
Concerto for violin, op. 20..... Cam. Saint Saens
Serenade in D major, No. 1..... Rob. Fuchs
(For strings.)
Andante.—Tempo di menuetto.—Allegro scherzando.—
Adagio.—Allegro.
Symphony in G minor..... W. A. Mozart
Allegro molto.—Andante.—Menuetto (Allegro).—
Allegro assai.

The short overture with its rather bloodcurdling transformations of first theme, and its melodious second theme was given with good light and shade, and may be added to the number of overtures which Mr. Gericke has given in a flawless manner.

How constantly the strings have improved was shown in the Fuchs Serenade, a composition of ballet-like order (of the higher class) somewhat in the manner of graceful composition which Delibes is such a master of. The last movement, however, reminded more of Saint Saens in its odd harmonies and figures. Of course it contains many dainty oboes, bassoons, and strings are used. It would be well if the many musical students who attend these concerts would digest this fact. The love of the sensational is pushing aside the reverence for simplicity in music. In a few weeks we shall hear a great work in a totally different direction—Wagner's "Siegfried Idylle," and it will be well then to remember Mozart's G minor symphony, and give the proper tribute to the qualities which too many are ready to sum up in the words "graceful," "ingenious," or "pleasing." That the composer rose far above these adjectives is abundantly proven by the finale of this work which has a virility and power which scarcely any other could have drawn from so small an orchestra.

There was an occasional tardiness in the 'cellos and basses in the development of the first movement, but this was but slight, and the general performance was of the high order which, this year, we have become accustomed to. Points of especial excellence were the trio of the minuet, and the spirit and power with which the last movement was taken. The development of the latter is most glorious, yet is founded almost entirely upon the first phrase of the chief theme, and was played with just the right balance, the figure standing out clear and strikingly in whatever part it happened to be, and the auditor could easily follow it in its zigzag course through the orchestra. Altogether the concert was of the most enjoyable order, and of just the right length.

L. C. E.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—At the 21st concert given Saturday evening this programme was played:
Fr. Schubert, Overture (Alphonso and Estrella).
Cam. Saint-Saëns, Concerto for Violin, op. 20.
Rob. Fuchs, Serenade in D major, No. 1.
(for strings.)

W. A. Mozart,

Andante—Tempo di minuetto—
Allegro scherzando—Adagio—Al-legro.
Symphony in G minor.
Allegro molto—Andante—Menuetto
(Allegro)—Allegro assai.

In outlining the work for his orchestra in this his first season Mr. Gericke is represented as saying that he should play chiefly works of the classic school, because they were best calculated to create a good technique, a factor to him of first importance. That he intentionally slights the newer things which are so essential in the repertory of every well-equipped, progressive orchestra; for they provide new elements in orchestration, show national characteristics in composition, or of thought, and, (as modern orchestral music is largely unconventional and aspiring,) offer to student and player opportunity for comparison, which is ever a necessary feature in a broad, liberal education. Wisely enough for the establishment of "technique," Mr. Gericke has played almost entirely music of the German (classic) school; few of his programmes have been well constructed, because, as it is fair to presume, of the restrictions which we have intimated. Understanding this (but we shall refer to the subject in an article reviewing the season), the monotony of Saturday evening's programme is condoned; though, the work for strings predominating, the entire programme was apt and interesting. Hoping then, that Mr. Gericke is acquainted in other schools, and is a man of broad, catholic taste, and a sympathizer with music denationalized, what visions of fine things connect themselves with his next season, when the elementary work of this shall have been perfected, and present prophecies can be realized. The Schubert overture to "Alphonso and Estrella" was a novelty. How interesting a novelty would be a performance of the opera for which it was written. This work, "Alphonso and Estrella," though successful performance of classics, "Egmont," tragedy in five acts by Goethe and with a re-

"William Tell," drama in five acts by Frederick Schi-Vienna, and is now
for Mr. Neuenhof unconventional, in and is not bizarre alternates with w motif," in which t
overture as a wh
It was played ver
in D major, com played at the secon thing more than 1
does the cunning
theme and with hi striking and erig
makes its effect w
jollity is as appare bounds of Scherzo
a syncopated sub treated. Each mo pact and excellent
more or less light was by no means phony in G minor
Berger and Berlioz.

ARNO RICHTER

Musical Notes.

HOME.

The fourth concert and reception of the New Choral Union, instituted by Mr. P. S. Gilmore, took place at Lyric Hall last Tuesday evening, March 10th. The concert proved a most enjoyable musical treat, and rehearsal was kept up till a late hour. The musical programme was under the charge of Signor La Villa.

The fifth concert given this season by the Philharmonic Society of New York takes place Saturday evening at the Academy of Music. Friday afternoon the usual rehearsal may be attended. The programme for both days includes compositions by Schumann, Wagner, Liszt, and Berlioz.

The programme of the Fourth Novelty Concert given Tuesday evening, March 31st, will be composed wholly of works by American composers. The names are: D. D. Buck, J. K. Paine, E. MacDowell, G. Whiting, J. Phelps, Templeton Strong, and F. Van der Stucken. Mr. Gericke is by no means a stranger to our concert goers. His playing is refined, sensitive and tuneful. He uses a fine instrument, and he played a poetic work. He does not possess great strength of tone, nor does he appear to have any striking mental conception of what he plays; but his technique in this concerto was highly satisfactory, and its trills and other graces of floriture were very elegantly accomplished. At the next concert Mr. Campanari will play a Vieuxtemps concerto for violin, while the orchestra are to give a new overture by Volkmann: Schumann's, Hermann and Dorothea overture; and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

and playful effects, and the third movement has a very rollicking, gigue-like theme. By the way, in this movement the orchestra gave a crescendo that was the perfection of graded force. The last movement dealt a little in mystery, having a certain amount of agitato and restlessness, and was not so entirely melodic as the rest. Such works as the overture and the suite do much to give lightness to the programmes, without lowering the dignity of the series.

The Saint Saëns number was remarkably short for a concerto, and was given for the first time in America I believe. M. Adamowski played it with intelligence and sweetness, but I should have liked a broader tone in some portions of the movement. Nevertheless his intonation was pure, even in the harmonies, and there was a sympathetic quality to the softer portions which was very effective. The violinist received the heartiest of applause at the close of his number, and certainly deserved it.

The G minor symphony is certainly one of the greatest of Mozart's works, and may even rank with the "Jupiter." Such perfection of form (a child could follow its shape), such light and simple scoring, and yet such an effect attained! Mr. Gericke wisely followed Mozart's first score of this, where only horns, flutes, oboes, bassoons, and strings are used. It would be well if the many musical students who attend these concerts would digest this fact. The love of the sensational is pushing aside the reverence for simplicity in music. In a few weeks we shall hear a great work in a totally different direction—Wagner's "Siegfried Idylle," and it will be well then to remember Mozart's G minor symphony, and give the proper tribute to the qualities which too many are ready to sum up in the words "graceful," "ingenious," or "pleasing." That the composer rose far above these adjectives is abundantly proven by the finale of this work which has a virility and power which scarcely any other could have drawn from so small an orchestra.

There was an occasional tardiness in the 'cellos and basses in the development of the first movement, but this was but slight, and the general performance was of the high order which, this year, we have become accustomed to. Points of especial excellence were the trio of the minuet, and the spirit and power with which the last movement was taken. The development of the latter is most glorious, yet is founded almost entirely upon the first phrase of the chief theme, and was played with just the right balance, the figure standing out clear and strikingly in whatever part it happened to be, and the auditor could easily follow it in its zigzag course through the orchestra. Altogether the concert was of the most enjoyable order, and of just the right length.

L. C. E.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—At the 21st concert given Saturday evening this programme was played:
Fr. Schubert, Overture (Alphonso and Estrella).
Cam. Saint-Saëns, Concerto for Violin, op. 20.
Rob. Fuchs, Serenade in D major, No. 1.

W. A. Mozart,

(For strings.)
Andante—Tempo di menuetto—
Allegro scherzando—Adagio—Allegro.
Symphony in G minor.
Allegro molto—Andante—Menuetto (Allegro)—Allegro assai.

In outlining the work for his orchestra in this his first season Mr. Gericke is represented as saying that he should play chiefly works of the classic school, because they were best calculated to create a good technique, a factor to him of first importance. Thus he intentionally slights the newer things which are so essential in the repertory of every well-equipped, progressive orchestra; for they provide new elements in orchestration, show national characteristics in composition, or of thought, and, (as modern orchestral music is largely unconventional and aspiring,) offer to student and player opportunity for comparison, which is over a necessary feature in a broad, liberal education. Wisely enough for the establishment of "technique," Mr. Gericke has played almost entirely music of the German (classic) school; few of his programmes have been well constructed, because, as it is fair to presume, of the restrictions which we have intimated. Understanding this (but we shall refer to the subject in an article reviewing the season), the monotony of Saturday evening's programme is condoned; though, the work for strings predominating, the entire programme was apt and interesting. Hoping then, that Mr. Gericke is acquainted in other schools, and is a man of broad, catholic taste, and a sympathizer with music denationalized, what visions of fine things connect themselves with his next season, when the elementary work of this shall have been perfected, and present prophecies can be realized. The Schubert overture to "Alphonso and Estrella" was a novelty. How interesting a novelty would be a performance of the opera for which it was written. This work, "Alphonso and Estrella," though written in 1822, reached its first successful performance in 1879, when, generally curtailed and with a re-written libretto, it was given in Vienna, and is now frequently heard. Here is a hint for Mr. Neundorff. The overture is theatric, but unconventional, in that it is exceedingly well written and is not bizarre. A suggestive military subject alternates with what might be called the "forage motif," in which there is much charm, although the overture as a whole represents greatness relaxed. It was played very deftly. The Fuchs serenade in D major, companion to his No. 2 in C major, played at the second concert of the season, is something more than learned musicianship. Frequently does the cunning hand of the composer deal with his theme and with his instruments in a fashion at once striking and original. The Scherzo in particular makes its effect with only a legato subject; but its jollity is as apparent as if the most elastic and erratic bounds of Scherzo had been sought. In the Allegro, a syncopated subject of strong character is well treated. Each movement of the work is brief, compact and excellent in form. Following an overture more or less light, and a violin concerto, the serenade was by no means skilfully placed. The Mozart symphony in G minor was played with that absolute regard for expression which has become habitual with this orchestra; Mr. Gericke is relentless in all matters pertaining to drill, and to an observer it is apparent that only a hearty esprit du corps existing among the players could bring out such responses. Mr. Adamowski in the St. Saëns concerto made his first appearance before a symphony audience, though he is by no means a stranger to our concert goers. His playing is refined, sensitive and tuneful. He uses a fine instrument, and he played a poetic work. He does not possess great strength of tone, nor does he appear to have any striking mental conception of what he plays; but his technique in this concerto was highly satisfactory, and its trills and other graces of floriture were very elegantly accomplished. At the next concert Mr. Campanari will play a Vieuxtemps concerto for violin, while the orchestra are to give a new overture by Volkmann: Schumann's, Hermann and Dorothea overture; and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first concert of the Boston series took place last Saturday with the following programme.

Overture, (Alphonso and Estrella),..... Fr. Schubert
Concerto for violin, op. 20 Cam. Saint Saens
T. Adamowski.
Serenade in D major, No. 1..... Rob. Fuchs
(For strings.)
Andante.—Tempo di menuetto.—Allegro scherzando.—
Adagio.—Allegro.
Symphony in G minor..... W. A. Mozart
Allegro molto.—Andante.—Menuetto (Allegro).—
Allegro assai.

The short overture with its rather bloodcurdling transformations of first theme, and its melodious second theme was given with good light and shade, and may be added to the number of overtures which Mr. Gericke has given in a flawless manner.

How constantly the strings have improved was shown in the Fuchs Serenade, a composition of ballet-like order (of the higher class) somewhat in the manner of graceful composition which Delibes is such a master of. The last movement, however, reminded more of Saint Saens in its odd harmonies and figures. Of course it contains many dainty oboes, bassoons, and strings are used. It would be well if the many musical students who attend these concerts would digest this fact. The love of the sensational is pushing aside the reverence for simplicity in music. In a few weeks we shall hear a great work in a totally different direction—Wagner's "Siegfried Idylle," and it will be well then to remember Mozart's G minor symphony, and give the proper tribute to the qualities which too many are ready to sum up in the words "graceful," "ingenious," or "pleasing." That the composer rose far above these adjectives is abundantly proven by the finale of this work which has a virility and power which scarcely any other could have drawn from so small an orchestra.

There was an occasional tardiness in the 'cellos and basses in the development of the first movement, but this was but slight, and the general performance was of the high order which, this year, we have become accustomed to. Points of especial excellence were the trio of the minuet, and the spirit and power with which the last movement was taken. The development of the latter is most glorious, yet is founded almost entirely upon the first phrase of the chief theme, and was played with just the right balance, the figure standing out clear and strikingly in whatever part it happened to be, and the auditor could easily follow it in its zigzag course through the orchestra. Altogether the concert was of the most enjoyable order, and of just the right length.

L. C. E.

movement has a very ie way, in this move-that was the perfection
t dealt a little in mys-
itato and restlessness, the rest. Such works
h to give lightness to g the dignity of the markably short for a time in America I be-with intelligence and a broader tone in some rtheless his intonation and there was a sym-tions which was very heartiest of applause

inly deserved it.

ly one of the greatest nk with the "Jupiter."
ould follow its shape), d yet such an effect
ved Mozart's first score

THOSE UNABLE TO REMAIN UNTIL THE CLOSE OF THE CONCERT AT 9.25 WILL CONFER A FAVOR BY LEAVING THE HALL AFTER THE THIRD MOVEMENT OF THE SYMPHONY.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 14TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- | | |
|------------------|---|
| R. VOLKMANN, | OVERTURE, (King Richard III.)
(First time.) |
| H. VIEUXTEMPS, | CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN, in D minor, op. 31.
Introduction.—Adagio religioso.—Allegro.— |
| ROB. SCHUMANN, | OVERTURE, (Hermann and Dorothea.) |
| L. v. BEETHOVEN, | SYMPHONY in F, No. 8, op. 93.
Allegro vivace e con brio.—Allegretto scherzando.—
Tempo di Menuetto.—Allegro vivace. |

SOLOIST:

MR. LEANDRO CAMPANARI.

NOTICE.

It being impossible to secure the assistance of the Chorus, the "CHRISTMAS ORATORIO" will not be performed on FRIDAY AFTERNOON. The following Programme will be given.

PROGRAMME.

JOH. SEB. BACH,	TOCCATA. (arranged for Orchestra by H. ESSER.)
JOH. SEB. BACH,	ARIA, "SLUMBER BELOVED." from the Christmas Oratorio.
JOH. SEB. BACH,	CIACONNA FOR VIOLIN. (Piano accompaniment by F. MENDELSSOHN.)
JOH. SEB. BACH,	ANDANTE AND GAVOTTE. (For STRINGS.)
L. v. BEETHOVEN,	SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5. op. 67. Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.— Allegro. Allegro; Presto.—

SOLOISTS:

MISS EMILY WINANT.

MR. M. LOEFFLER.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

To call the composition of Volkmann which began the symphony concert of last Saturday evening an overture is to give it an insufficient title: it is as richly worthy to be called a poem as any of the otherwise unclassified works which are graced with that name. Its author entitled it "King Richard the Third"; but it is no mere prelude to such a tragedy as Shakspeare wrote about that monarch, although his earlier genius must have inspired this later one. It is rather a retrospect than a prospect—a presentation, a dozen minutes long, of some of the great moods and characteristics which the play has in its turn selected and compacted from the history of years. It begins sombrely with a short phrase in which the gloomy voice of the bassoon is emphasized by heavy, cloudy chords, and which passes on for brief repetition in accordant fashion by the strings; but though all is sombre, there is nothing morose, bitter, savage or ponderous here, and every now and then there is a sudden upshooting, like a swift evil inspiration, that then slowly fades in a semi-tonic descent. Again and again a sweeter voice of flutes tries to dissipate the prevailing tone, but without permanent influence, and all the while a certain busy stir keeps growing in the under-orchestration until it rises and dominates in a short, strong climax. After this the tenderer voice returns, but is soon succeeded by a deep, funereal strain, into which falls now and then a faint stroke of the kettledrum—a passage all of grief, mystery and supernatural suggestion. Suddenly the sharp rattle of the drum breaks in, and there is heard, shrill and clear, the martial melody of "The Campbells are coming," followed by a tremendously vigorous episode in which the very spirit of battle speaks, and which is closed abruptly by a crash, as of one mighty deadly blow, that, striking down the chief, rendered all further conflict futile. A blast of victorious trumpets peals out, and a calm beautiful cantabile, like the harmonious hymns of concord and peace, closes the whole. The overture is, as we have implied, a long one, and may seem over long to those who do not find themselves in sympathy with what Volkmann, as it seems to us, evidently meant to convey; but while the enjoyment of it, aesthetically, must depend upon temperament and fancy, no one can fail to see the splendor of invention, the richness of tone color, the originality and the orchestral genius which stamp every page of the score, and which make it a work of wonderful interest and value—one of the noblest, most impressive and most beautiful compositions of the present time. The irrelevancy of choosing the old Scotch tune for its signal to battle and for the dash of the onset, may easily be pardoned, not only because the moment passes so quickly, but chiefly because it brings the desired result surely and powerfully. The performance was magnificent in all respects, and the poetic quality of each separate phase was so fully and yet so easily and unaffectedly maintained, that many in the audience (which was most attentive and evidently much impressed) must have failed in their absorption to realize how great and rare was the music that thus held them.

Excellent orchestral work was also done in Schumann's "Hermann and Dorothea" overture, and in the symphony, which was Beethoven's Eighth, and the scherzo and minuet of which were read with remarkable clearness, grace and effectiveness.

The soloist was Signor Leandro Campanari, who played Vieuxtemps's violin concerto in D minor, opus 31. Not always felicitous in tone,—especially in the allegro, where a certain incisiveness and inequality were unpleasantly manifest,—and now and then a trifle ajar in intonation,—Signor Campanari yet played admirably well, and was three times called forward at the close of the concerto. He read with invariable intelligence, phrased justly, and displayed in the introduction and adagio a broad, equable and tranquil style, which was enlivened and strengthened into animated, but not excessive, spirit in the finale.

This week the bicentennial of Bach's birth is to be celebrated, and two separate programmes have been prepared. That for Saturday evening will include the first and second parts of the "Christmas Oratorio," in which Miss Juch, Miss Winant, Mr. W. J. Winch and Mr. Remmertz will take the solo parts, and the choruses will be sung by a body of voices drawn from the Bach choir, which Mr. Dresel has had in hand during the winter, and from the Cecilia. Before the oratorio the orchestra will play a toccata, arranged from the organ score by Esser, Miss Juch will sing "My heart ever faithful," and Mr. Löffler will play a chaconne. On Friday afternoon, when the chorus cannot attend, Beethoven's fifth symphony will take the place of the oratorio music, and some little change will be made in the first part of the programme, Miss Winant singing instead of Miss Juch, and an andante and gavotte for strings being added. It goes without saying that all the numbers of both programmes are taken from the master in whose honor they are given.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, MARCH 16, 1885.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-second concert was—
Volkmann. Overture to "King Richard III." (first time).
Vieuxtemps. Violin concerto in D-minor, Op. 31.
Schumann. Overture to "Hermann und Dorothea," Op. 136 (first time).
Beethoven. Symphony No. 8, in F, Op. 93.
Mr. Leandro Campanari was the violinist.

Two new overtures, and both of them introducing popular melodies! Volkmann's "King Richard III." is a long composition of so descriptive a character and in so vague a form that one wonders a little that the composer did not call it a symphonic poem, or a char-

NOTICE.

It being impossible to secure the assistance of the Chorus, the "CHRISTMAS ORATORIO" will not be performed on FRIDAY AFTERNOON. The following Programme will be given.

PROGRAMME.

JOH. SEB. BACH,	TOCCATA. (arranged for Orchestra by H. ESSER.)
JOH. SEB. BACH,	ARIA, "SLUMBER BELOVED." from the Christmas Oratorio.
JOH. SEB. BACH,	CIACONNA FOR VIOLIN. (Piano accompaniment by F. MENDELSSOHN.)
JOH. SEB. BACH,	ANDANTE AND GAVOTTE. (For STRINGS.)
L. v. BEETHOVEN,	SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 5. op. 67. Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.— Allegro. Allegro; Presto.—

SOLOISTS:

MISS EMILY WINANT.

MR. M. LOEFFLER.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA. TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CON- CERT.

To call the composition of Volkmann which began the symphony concert of last Saturday evening an overture is to give it an insufficient title: it is as richly worthy to be called a poem as any of the otherwise unclassified works which are graced with that name. Its author entitled it "King Richard the Third"; but it is no mere prelude to such a tragedy as Shakspeare wrote about that monarch, although his earlier genius must have inspired this later one. It is rather a retrospect than a prospect—a presentation, a dozen minutes long, of some of the great moods and characteristics which the play has in its turn selected and compacted from the history of years. It begins sombrely with a short phrase in which the gloomy voice of the bassoon is emphasized by heavy, cloudy chords, and which passes on for brief repetition in accordant fashion by the strings; but though all is sombre, there is nothing morose, bitter, savage or ponderous here, and every now and then there is a sudden upshooting, like a swift evil inspiration, that then slowly fades in a semi-tonic descent. Again and again a sweeter voice of flutes tries to dissipate the prevailing tone, but without permanent influence, and all the while a certain busy stir keeps growing in the under orchestration until it rises and dominates in a short, strong climax. After this the tenderer voice returns, but is soon succeeded by a deep, funereal strain, into which falls now and then a faint stroke of the kettledrum—a passage all of grief, mystery and supernatural suggestion. Suddenly the sharp rattle of the drum breaks in, and there is heard, shrill and clear, the martial melody of "The Campbells are coming," followed by a tremendously vigorous episode in which the very spirit of battle speaks, and which is closed abruptly by a crash, as of one mighty deadly blow, that, striking down the chief, rendered all further conflict futile. A blast of victorious trumpets peals out, and a calm beautiful cantabile, like the harmonious hymns of concord and peace, closes the whole. The overture is, as we have implied, a long one, and may seem over long to those who do not find themselves in sympathy with what Volkmann, as it seems to us, evidently meant to convey; but while the enjoyment of it, aesthetically, must depend upon temperament and fancy, no one can fail to see the splendor of invention, the richness of tone color, the originality and the orchestral genius which stamp every page of the score, and which make it a work of wonderful interest and value—one of the noblest, most impressive and most beautiful compositions of the present time. The irrelevancy of choosing the old Scotch tune for its signal to battle and for the dash of the onset, may easily be pardoned, not only because the moment passes so quickly, but chiefly because it brings the desired result surely and powerfully. The performance was magnificent in all respects, and the poetic quality of each separate phase was so fully and yet so easily and unaffectedly maintained, that many in the audience (which was most attentive and evidently much impressed) must have failed in their absorption to realize how great and rare was the music that thus held them.

Excellent orchestral work was also done in Schumann's "Hermann and Dorothea" overture, and in the symphony, which was Beethoven's Eighth, and the scherzo and minuet of which were read with remarkable clearness, grace and effectiveness.

The soloist was Signor Leandro Campanari, who played Vieuxtemps's violin concerto in D minor, opus 31. Not always felicitous in tone,—especially in the allegro, where a certain incisiveness and inequality were unpleasantly manifest,—and now and then a trifle ajar in intonation,—Signor Campanari yet played admirably well, and was three times called forward at the close of the concerto. He read with invariable intelligence, phrased justly, and displayed in the introduction and adagio a broad, equable and tranquil style, which was enlivened and strengthened into animated, but not excessive, spirit in the finale.

This week the bicentennial of Bach's birth is to be celebrated, and two separate programmes have been prepared. That for Saturday evening will include the first and second parts of the "Christmas Oratorio," in which Miss Juch, Miss Winant, Mr. W. J. Winch and Mr. Remmertz will take the solo parts, and the choruses will be sung by a body of voices drawn from the Bach choir, which Mr. Dresel has had in hand during the winter, and from the Cecilia. Before the oratorio the orchestra will play a toccata, arranged from the organ score by Esser, Miss Juch will sing "My heart ever faithful," and Mr. Löffler will play a chaconne. On Friday afternoon, when the chorus cannot attend, Beethoven's fifth symphony will take the place of the oratorio music, and some little change will be made in the first part of the programme, Miss Winant singing instead of Miss Juch, and an andante and gavotte for strings being added. It goes without saying that all the numbers of both programmes are taken from the master in whose honor they are given.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, MARCH 16, 1885.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-second concert was—

Volkmann. Overture to "King Richard III." (first time).
Vieuxtemps. Violin concerto in D-minor, Op. 31.
Schumann. Overture to "Hermann und Dorothea," Op. 136 (first time).
Beethoven. Symphony No. 8, in F, Op. 93.

Mr. Leandro Campanari was the violinist.

Two new overtures, and both of them introducing popular melodies! Volkmann's "King Richard III." is a long composition of so descriptive a character and in so vague a form that one wonders a little that the composer did not call it a symphonic poem, or a character-picture, or by some other transcendental name. There is much in it that is brilliant, especially in the way of instrumentation; in this particular it seems almost as if Volkmann had set himself to work to mass together in a single composition all the most extraordinary orchestral effects mentioned in Berlioz's "Treatise." But in spite of some violent strokes of effectiveness, there is a good deal in the overture that sounds tedious, and what is not tedious sounds singularly turgid, melodramatic, even trivial. Why "The Campbells Are Coming" should be introduced in the part evidently descriptive of the battle of Bosworth Field is not easy to see. It is curious to note, however, that Volkmann has got this melody quite as wrong as Max Bruch has in his "Fair Ellen." German composers, by the way, from Beethoven down, have rather a knack at getting English and Scotch popular melodies wrong. It is a little sad that Schumann's "Hermann and Dorothea" overture should be given in public. There is possibly nothing valid to urge against the occasional performance of a great master's weaker works. We, for one, should be very glad to hear Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria." But when the weak composition by a great and revered master is not merely an instance of that nodding to which all Homers are subject at moments, but is evidently the outcome of ill health and actual mental alienation, then it does seem something akin to sacrilege to push it forward into the critical glare of publicity. Both overtures were admirably played by the orchestra. The performance of Beethoven's eighth symphony calls for more than usual comment. The first movement went with superb dash and decision of accent, and the rollicking Finale was given fairly well, if not always with that perfect clearness of outline to which Mr. Gericke has accustomed us of late. But the way in which the two intervening movements were played must give us pause. The Allegretto scherzando sounded curiously uneasy and lacking in graceful charm. It was taken unusually fast, but although we do not like so rapid a tempo, this was not the whole matter. For once Mr. Gericke did not seem to succeed in forcing the orchestra to do his entire will; there was a lack of sympathy between conductor and players. The next movement, too, sounded rather scrambling and ineffective. Here also the tempo was unwontedly fast. True, there is much to be said on both sides about the proper tempo in this movement; it is rather a famous bone of contention between excellent authorities, and there does not seem to be much chance of the discussion ever being fairly closed. One thing is certain, that there is no fixed minuet tempo; there is no standard minuet which can be established as a rule for all others. Whenever the music of the minuet was intended as an accompaniment to actual dancing there was undeniably a fixed standard of tempo. The well-known minuet in "Don Giovanni" is an example of the slow dancing minuet. But when composers introduced the minuet into concert compositions, they merely preserved its characteristic rhythm, and very often departed from the slow, measured tempo of the dance. Even Haydn and Mozart marked some of their minuets allegro, and some of them allegretto. Beethoven, very likely, meant some of his minuets to go even faster. When Beethoven invented the term scherzo for a very quick movement in 3-4 time, history tells us that he did so because he felt that the term minuet would no longer be applicable. But here an important distinction should be made: the term minuet was not inapplicable because the tempo was much faster than that of the dance, but because the very rhythm of the minuet was lost by the movement being in alla breve time—one beat to a measure instead of three. In fact, the scherzo in three-quarters time bears the same relation to the minuet that the modern waltz does to the older Ländler. Therefore the mere fact that Beethoven did not mark the third movement of the eighth symphony as a Scherzo, is not of itself sufficient to indicate that the tempo should be especially slow, for there exist countless decidedly fast minuets. But the "slow" party have a pretty good argument in the fact that Beethoven did not mark this movement "Menuetto," as was habitual with him, but "Tempo di Menuetto," i. e., "in the tempo of a minuet." Wagner, for one, takes this to mean clearly, "at the rate of the dancing minuet;" that is, decidedly slow, like the minuet in "Don Giovanni." He is of the opinion that this movement plays really the part of the slow movement in the symphony, the lively scherzo being represented by the preceding Allegretto scherzando. Mendelssohn thought otherwise, and took the movement quite fast. In face of such conflicting authority one can only fall back upon his personal feelings in the matter. To our thinking Mr. Gericke takes this movement quite too fast; just as Mr. Zerrahn used to take it over-slow. Mr. Campanari played the brilliant Vieuxtemps concerto in excellent style, rising to a high pitch of power in the later part of the slow movement. The composition itself sounds singularly modern in spirit for Vieuxtemps; the composer evidently laid himself out to do something heroic. But Vieuxtemps, good, graceful salon-man that he was, had not much of heroic stuff in him.

The next programme is:

Toccata (arranged for Orchestra by H. Esser). Aria, "My heart ever faithful," from the Cantata "God so loved the world," (with 'cello and piano accompaniment), Miss Juch, Mr. Giese and Mr. Tucker. Ciaccona for violin (piano accompaniment by Mendelssohn), Mr. Loeffler. First and second parts of the Christmas Oratorio; all by Bach.

The solos will be sung by Miss Emily Winant, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. William J. Winch, Mr. Franz Remmert. As the chorus cannot be had for the Friday-afternoon rehearsal, the following programme will be given then:

Bach: Toccata (arranged for Orchestra by H. Esser); aria, "Slumber Beloved," from the Christmas Oratorio; Ciaccona for Violin (piano accompaniment by F. Mendelssohn); Andante and Gavotte (for strings). Beethoven: Symphony in C minor, No. 5 op. 67.

Herr Gericke has declined to allow two members of the Boston symphony orchestra, who are also members of the Campanari quartet, to absent themselves from a concert engagement in Portland in order to play for the Euterpe Club concert in this city, and so the opening concert of the club's season is indefinitely postponed.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT—The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given Saturday evening last, consisted of the following selections:

R. Volkmann—Overture (King Richard III.), first time.
H. Vieuxtemps—Concerto for violin, in D minor, op. 31; introduction—adagio religioso—allegro.
Rob. Schumann—Overture (Hermann and Dorothea).
L. V. Beethoven—Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93; allegro vivace e con brio—allegretto scherzando—tempo di menuetto—allegro vivace.

Mr. Leandro Campanari was the soloist. The Volkmann overture, "King Richard III.," was given for the first time in Boston, and is a very effective, dramatic, and delightful composition. It has many stirring, vivid movements in it; still it leaves one sad and heavy, as if its burden was unhappiness. The bit of Scotch air so gracefully introduced seemed a trifle out of place in the midst of such highly-wrought orchestration; but as indicating an episode in Richard's life it must be admitted to be quite in place. The orchestration throughout is masterly. It was given with great clearness, and a positively thrilling climax was made under Mr. Gericke's baton. Mr. Campanari played the Vieuxtemps concerto with a strong, clear tone, in a straightforward manner, making light of the difficulties in the last movement, and giving an artistic rendering to the beautiful adagio. Mr. Campanari's playing is always vigorous, intelligent, and facile, and he well deserved the hearty applause which the audience bestowed upon him. Schumann's "Hermann and Dorothea" is a most tantalizingly mixed, although clever, bit of writing, founded upon the Marseillaise Hymn. The theme is repeatedly broken, and there is but little else suggestive of Goethe's exquisite poem. Mr. Gericke won for himself another success in Beethoven's eighth symphony, which was given a remarkably fine, piquant reading. Every beauty was enhanced by the exactness in producing the light and shade, the diminuendo and crescendo and the almost imperceptible accelerando in many places. The allegretto was charmingly played, and the horns and clarinets in the trio of the minuet gave to it an exquisite bit of color. The allegro vivace had by far the finest interpretation we ever heard given it. The whole symphony is bright and vivacious; it was written in one of Beethoven's happiest moods, care and trouble are lost sight of, and with such a performance as was given Saturday evening one finds it keenest enjoyment.

At the next concert there is to be a particularly noteworthy programme commemorative of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Johann Sebastian Bach.

The following selections from his works will be given: Toccata (arranged for orchestra by H. Esser); Aria, "My heart ever faithful," from the cantata "God so loved the world" (with 'cello and piano accompaniment), Miss Juch, Mr. Giese and Mr. Tucker; Ciaccona for violin. (piano accompaniment by F. Mendelssohn.) Mr. Loeffler; first and second parts of the Christmas Oratorio, with Miss Emily Winant, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Franz Remmert as soloists. At the Friday afternoon rehearsal, in place of the aria "My heart ever faithful," Miss Winant will sing the aria "Slumber beloved," from the Christmas Oratorio, and instead of parts 1 and 2 of the Christmas Oratorio, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will be played, it being impossible to have the assistance of the chorus in the afternoon.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night, and proved in some respects one of the most delightful of the series. It opened with the Overture to "Richard III.," by Volkmann, which was given for the first time. It is very long, occupying fifteen minutes in performance, and despite its many fiery and brilliant moments, is on the whole dull and heavy in effect. The introduction of the Scotch air, "The Campbells Are Coming," towards the end of the work, was somewhat startling, especially as it was difficult to see what relation it had to the subject. In its technical aspects the overture is very fine, the orchestration being particularly rich, massive and varied in effect. It was broadly and impressively played. Then came the concerto in D minor for violin by Vieuxtemps, the solo part of which was played by Mr. Leandro Campanari with great breadth and purity of style and with magnificent power. The introduction was read with remarkably fine dramatic expression and the adagio with large and manly feeling and admirable warmth and grace of sentiment. The difficult finale also was beautifully played. In fact, the performance, as a whole, was masterly and solid to an eminent degree. The artist was recalled three times with an enthusiasm that was well earned and well deserved. Schumann's "Hermann and Dorothea" overture followed. It is one of the composer's weaker and less interesting works, and even the clean-cut and forcible interpretation accorded it by Mr. Gericke could not make it any the more attractive. The prominence given to the Marseillaise Hymn in this overture is as inexplicable as the introduction of the Scotch air in the Volkmann overture. The concert ended with Beethoven's eighth symphony, which was delightfully read by Mr. Gericke from beginning to end. The allegretto was given with charming grace and piquancy. The minuet, too, had a perfect interpretation, and in the trio the exceedingly difficult passages for horns and clarinet came out without a flaw; and we have rarely heard the finale given with such crispness, brilliancy and precision. It proved another triumph for Mr. Gericke. The next concert will commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of the birthday of Bach. The first and second parts of the "Christmas Oratorio" will be performed, together with other selections from the master's works. The soloists will be Miss Emily Winant, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. W. J. Winch, Mr. F. Remmert and Mr. M. Loeffler.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night served up slices of tunes in two different overtures. The "Hermann and Dorothea Overture" mangled the Marseillaise, and the "Richard III" overture distorted "The Campbells are coming." Why the latter tune should have appeared at all in the work of Volkmann, is something of a mystery. It appears in a very weak manner, with some absurd attempts at thematic treatment. What the thematic possibilities of this tune are Max Bruch has shown the world in "Fair Ellen." The overture to "Richard III" was as sombre as the bottom of a coal mine at midnight, and as spasmodic as a musical St. Vitus' Dance. It had a tone picture of the battle of Bosworth, and the wicked monarch was duly slaughtered by the brasses. The Schumann overture was even less contrasted, and shows the composer in his decadence. It is almost wholly founded on the "Marseillaise." Both works were well performed.

acter-picture, or by some other transcendental name. There is much in it that is brilliant, especially in the way of instrumentation; in this particular it seems almost as if Volkmann had set himself to work to mass together in a single composition all the most extraordinary orchestral effects mentioned in Berlioz's "Treatise." But in spite of some violent strokes of effectiveness, there is a good deal in the overture that sounds tedious, and what is not tedious sounds singularly turgid, melodramatic, even trivial. Why "The Campbells Are Coming" should be introduced in the part evidently descriptive of the battle of Bosworth Field is not easy to see. It is curious to note, however, that Volkmann has got this melody quite as wrong as Max Bruch has in his "Fair Ellen." German composers, by the way, from Beethoven down, have rather a knack at getting English and Scotch popular melodies wrong. It is a little sad that Schumann's "Hermann und Dorothea" overture should be given in public. There is possibly nothing valid to urge against the occasional performance of a great master's weaker works. We, for one, should be very glad to hear Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria." But when the weak composition by a great and revered master is not merely an instance of that nodding to which all Homers are subject at moments, but is evidently the outcome of ill health and actual mental alienation, then it does seem something akin to sacrilege to push it forward into the critical glare of publicity. Both overtures were admirably played by the orchestra. The performance of Beethoven's eighth symphony calls for more than usual comment. The first movement went with superb dash and decision of accent, and the rollicking Finale was given fairly well, if not always with that perfect clearness of outline to which Mr. Gericke has accustomed us of late. But the way in which the two intervening movements were played must give us pause. The Allegretto scherzando sounded curiously uneasy and lacking in graceful charm. It was taken unusually fast, but although we do not like so rapid a tempo, this was not the whole matter. For once Mr. Gericke did not seem to succeed in forcing the orchestra to do his entire will; there was a lack of sympathy between conductor and players. The next movement, too, sounded rather scrambling and ineffective. Here also the tempo was unwontedly fast. True, there is much to be said on both sides about the proper tempo in this movement; it is rather a famous bone of contention between excellent authorities, and there does not seem to be much chance of the discussion ever being fairly closed. One thing is certain that there is no fixed minuet tempo; there is no standard minuet which can be established as a rule for all others. Whenever the music of the minuet was intended as an accompaniment to actual dancing there was undeniably a fixed standard of tempo. The well-known minuet in "Don Giovanni" is an example of the slow dancing minuet. But when composers introduced the minuet into concert compositions, they merely preserved its characteristic rhythm, and very often departed from the slow, measured tempo of the dance. Even Haydn and Mozart marked some of their minuets allegro, and some of them allegretto. Beethoven, very likely, meant some of his minuets to go even faster. When Beethoven invented the term scherzo for a very quick movement in 3-4 time, history tells us that he did so because he felt that the term minuet would no longer be applicable. But here an important distinction should be made: the term minuet was not inapplicable because the tempo was much faster than that of the dance, but because the very rhythm of the minuet was lost by the movement being in alla breve time—one beat to a measure instead of three. In fact, the scherzo in three-quarters time bears the same relation to the minuet that the modern waltz does to the older Ländler. Therefore the mere fact that Beethoven did not mark the third movement of the eighth symphony as a Scherzo, is not of itself sufficient to indicate that the tempo should be especially slow, for there exist countless decidedly fast minuets. But the "slow" party have a pretty good argument in the fact that Beethoven did not mark this movement "Menuetto," as was habitual with him, but "Tempo di Menuetto," i. e., "in the tempo of a minuet." Wagner, for one, takes this to mean clearly, "at the rate of the dancing minuet;" that is, decidedly slow, like the minuet in "Don Giovanni." He is of the opinion that this movement plays really the part of the slow movement in the symphony, the lively scherzo being represented by the preceding Allegretto scherzando. Mendelssohn thought otherwise, and took the movement quite fast. In face of such conflicting authority one can only fall back upon his personal feelings in the matter. To our thinking Mr. Gericke takes this movement quite too fast; just as Mr. Zerrahn used to take it over-slow. Mr. Campanari played the brilliant Vieuxtemps concerto in excellent style, rising to a high pitch of power in the later part of the slow movement. The composition itself sounds singularly modern in spirit for Vieuxtemps; the composer evidently laid himself out to do something heroic. But Vieuxtemps, good, graceful solo-man that he was, had not much of heroic stuff in him.

The next programme is:

Toccata (arranged for Orchestra by H. Esser). Aria, "My heart ever faithful," from the Cantata "God so loved the world," (with 'cello and piano accompaniment), Miss Juch, Mr. Giese and Mr. Tucker. Ciaccona for violin (piano accompaniment by Mendelssohn), Mr. Loeffler. First and second parts of the Christmas Oratorio; all by Bach.

The solos will be sung by Miss Emily Winant, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. William J. Winch, Mr. Franz Remmert. As the chorus cannot be had for the Friday-afternoon rehearsal, the following programme will be given then:

Bach: Toccata (arranged for Orchestra by H. Esser); aria, "Slumber Beloved," from the Christmas Oratorio; Ciaccona for Violin (piano accompaniment by F. Mendelssohn); Andante and Gavotte (for strings). Beethoven: Symphony in C minor, No. 5 op. 67.

Herr Gericke has declined to allow two members of the Boston symphony orchestra, who are also members of the Campanari quartet, to absent themselves from a concert engagement in Portland in order to play for the Euterpe Club concert in this city, and so the opening concert of the club's season is indefinitely postponed.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT—The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given Saturday evening last, consisted of the following selections:

1. Volkmann—Overture (King Richard III.), first time.
2. Vieuxtemps—Concerto for violin, in D minor, op. 31; introduction—adagio religioso—allegro.
3. Rob. Schumann—Overture (Hermann and Dorothea).
4. L. V. Beethoven—Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93; allegro vivace e con brio—allegretto scherzando—tempo di minueto—allegro vivace.

Mr. Leandro Campanari was the soloist. The Volkmann overture, "King Richard III.," was given for the first time in Boston, and is a very effective, dramatic, and delightful composition. It has many stirring, vivid movements in it; still it leaves one sad and heavy, as if its burden was unhappiness. The bit of Scotch air so gracefully introduced seemed a trifle out of place in the midst of such highly-wrought orchestration; but as indicating an episode in Richard's life it must be admitted to be quite in place. The orchestration throughout is masterly. It was given with great clearness, and a positively thrilling climax was made under Mr. Gericke's baton. Mr. Campanari played the Vieuxtemps concerto with a strong, clear tone, in a straightforward manner, making light of the difficulties in the last movement, and giving an artistic rendering to the beautiful adagio. Mr. Campanari's playing is always vigorous, intelligent, and facile, and he well deserved the hearty applause which the audience bestowed upon him. Schumann's "Hermann and Dorothea" is a most tantalizingly mixed, although clever, bit of writing, founded upon the Marseillaise Hymn. The theme is repeatedly broken, and there is but little else suggestive of Goethe's exquisite poem. Mr. Gericke won for himself another success in Beethoven's eighth symphony, which was given a remarkably fine, piquant reading. Every beauty was enhanced by the exactness in producing the light and shade, the diminuendo and crescendo and the almost imperceptible accelerando in many places. The allegretto was charmingly played, and the horns and clarinets in the trio of the minuet gave to it an exquisite bit of color. The allegro vivace had by far the finest interpretation we ever heard given it. The whole symphony is bright and vivacious; it was written in one of Beethoven's happiest moods, care and trouble are lost sight of, and with such a performance as was given Saturday evening one finds it keenest enjoyment.

At the next concert there is to be a particularly noteworthy programme commemorative of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Johann Sebastian Bach.

The following selections from his works will be given: Toccata (arranged for orchestra by H. Esser); Aria, "My heart ever faithful," from the cantata "God so loved the world" (with 'cello and piano accompaniment), Miss Juch, Mr. Giese and Mr. Tucker; Ciaccona for violin, (piano accompaniment by F. Mendelssohn), Mr. Loeffler; first and second parts of the Christmas Oratorio, with Miss Emily Winant, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Franz Remmert as soloists. At the Friday afternoon rehearsal, in place of the aria "My heart ever faithful," Miss Winant will sing the aria "Slumber beloved," from the Christmas Oratorio, and instead of parts 1 and 2 of the Christmas Oratorio, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will be played, it being impossible to have the assistance of the chorus in the afternoon.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night, and proved in some respects one of the most delightful of the series. It opened with the Overture to "Richard III.," by Volkmann, which was given for the first time. It is very long, occupying fifteen minutes in performance, and despite its many fiery and brilliant moments, is on the whole dull and heavy in effect. The introduction of the Scotch air, "The Campbells are Coming," towards the end of the work, was somewhat startling, especially as it was difficult to see what relation it had to the subject. In its technical aspects the overture is very fine, the orchestration being particularly rich, massive and varied in effect. It was broadly and impressively played. Then came the concerto in D minor for violin by Vieuxtemps, the solo part of which was played by Mr. Leandro Campanari with great breadth and purity of style and with magnificent power. The introduction was read with remarkably fine dramatic expression and the adagio with large and manly feeling and admirable warmth and grace of sentiment. The difficult finale also was beautifully played. In fact, the performance, as a whole, was masterly and solid to an eminent degree. The artist was recalled three times with an enthusiasm that was well earned and well deserved. Schumann's "Hermann and Dorothea" overture followed. It is one of the composer's weaker and less interesting works, and even the clean-cut and forcible interpretation accorded it by Mr. Gericke could not make it any the more attractive. The prominence given to the Marseillaise Hymn in this overture is as inexplicable as the introduction of the Scotch air in the Volkmann overture. The concert ended with Beethoven's eighth symphony, which was delightfully read by Mr. Gericke from beginning to end. The allegretto was given with charming grace and piquancy. The minuet, too, had a perfect interpretation, and in the trio the exceedingly difficult passages for horns and clarinet came out without a flaw; and we have rarely heard the finale given with such crispness, brilliancy and precision. It proved another triumph for Mr. Gericke. The next concert will commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of the birthday of Bach. The first and second parts of the "Christmas Oratorio" will be performed, together with other selections from the master's works. The soloists will be Miss Emily Winant, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. W. J. Winch, Mr. F. Remmert and Mr. M. Loeffler.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night served up slices of tunes in two different overtures. The "Hermann and Dorothea Overture" mangled the Marseillaise, and the "Richard III" overture distorted "The Campbell's are coming." Why the latter tune should have appeared at all in the work of Volkmann, is something of a mystery. It appears in a very weak manner, with some absurd attempts at thematic treatment. What the thematic possibilities of this tune are Max Bruch has shown the world in "Fair Ellen." The overture to "Richard III" was as sombre as the bottom of a coal mine at midnight, and as spasmodic as a musical St. Vitus' Dance. It had a tone picture of the battle of Bosworth, and the wicked monarch was duly slaughtered by the brasses. The Schumann overture was even less contrasted, and shows the composer in his decadence. It is almost wholly founded on the "Marseillaise." Both works were well performed.

Vieuxtemps' violin concerto in D minor gave Signor Campanari an opportunity to show how thorough an artist he is, and what a fine school of work the composition represents. The floriture of the introduction were a little uneven, and the intonation wavered a little, especially in the long and difficult harmonic at the close of the adagio movement, but these were absolutely the only faults in a long and difficult performance. On the other hand, his breadth of tone was admirable, his legato superb, and the finale went with much verve and brilliancy. Beethoven's eighth symphony, most light hearted of the nine, was finely given. The plunge into the first theme was well done, and in the ritenuto of the second theme the orchestra kept well together. On the return of the chief theme after the development, the contrabasses and cellos could have emphasized the subject to advantage, and the sudden C sharp which interrupts the theme of the finale could have been given more forcibly, but at least every portion was clear, the tempo of the minuet (a much disputed point) well taken, the horn and clarinet passages of the Trio finely played, the dialogues between the upper and lower strings, in the allegretto clearly brought out, and the finale made very effective in its hilarious coda. The concert was shorter than usual, which was not a fault. Next week comes the Bach celebration, and our public will then have an opportunity of judging our conductor in a new field, that of choral leadership, in which he is said to attain his greatest success.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT. The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening included the following programme: R. Volkmann, overture (King Richard III.); H. Vieuxtemps, concerto for violin in D minor, op. 31; Rob. Schumann, overture (Hermann and Dorothea); L. v. Beethoven, symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93. Mr. Leandro Campanari was the soloist. The Volkmann overture was given for the first time and was, of all selections yet given, the best adapted to display the two chief qualities of the orchestra. It is essentially in the highest type of the romantic school, portraying not only outward sights, but inward feelings, and depending more upon its vividness in this respect than upon any intrinsic merit of form. The instruments are made to do more than express mere beauty of combination; they even do more than picture mind-scenes; they seem to speak to the listener in a language of their own which, however, different from vocalized language, is yet almost as distinct and expressive. To interpret such a piece requires not only the talent of a virtuoso, but the genius of an artist; there must be not only the perfect technical triumph in the management of the instruments, but the true understanding of the emotions embodied in the strains—that is, if the selection is to be given its full significance. Infinitely more difficult is it for a large combination of players to display, in unison, this double power than for a soloist, and for that reason the greatest credit is due to the Symphony Orchestra for their single interpretation. The story, as told by them, was weird, thrilling and intensely interesting. So, too, in the second overture (Hermann and Dorothea), the musicians had to deal with romantic music, and the little bits of patriotic melody, exquisitely introduced at intervals, brought up clearly the picture of the long line of weary exiles fleeing from their home beyond the Rhine. The symphony of the evening was entirely in character with the preceding selections, for it is one of those which give unmistakable signs of the change which was then creeping over the musical world in relation to the character of the music and foreshadowing the departure from the strict lines of classic form. Mr. Campanari possesses good vigor of tone, as manifested in his violin solo, but his higher notes are not always so round and pure as could be desired. His playing in this respect is strongly in contrast with that of Mr. Adamowski, who appeared at the former concert.

The programme for the commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of John Sebastian Bach next Saturday will be made up entirely of selections from Bach's works, as follows: Toccata (arranged for orchestra by H. Esser); aria, "My heart ever faithful," from the cantata "God so loved the world" (with cello and piano accompaniment), Miss Juch, Mr. Glese and Mr. Tucker; claconna for violin (piano accompaniment by F. Mendelssohn), Mr. Loeffler; first and second parts of the Christmas Oratorio. Soloists, Miss Emily Winant, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. Wm. J. Winch, Mr. Franz Remmert. A large chorus will assist. It being impossible to secure the assistance of the chorus on Friday afternoon the Christmas Oratorio will not then be performed. Instead of the aria "My heart ever faithful" the aria "Slumber beloved" from the Christmas Oratorio will be given, and instead of the oratorio the fifth symphony of Beethoven, as well as an andante and gavotte of Bach for strings.

Adamowski and the Symphony.

Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist at the symphony concert last evening. He played Saint-Saens' concerto for violin (op. 20) and was warmly applauded. Mozart's symphony in G minor, R. Fuchs' serenade (in D major) for strings, and Schubert's Alphonso and Estrell's overture were presented by the orchestra in a faultless manner.

Next week the programme will be:

Overture, King Richard III. (first time) R. Volkmann
Concerto for violin, H. Vieuxtemps
Overture, Hermann and Dorothea Rob. Schumann
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, L. v. Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. Leandro Campanari

Last evening, at Music Hall, the twenty-second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, was given before a large and appreciative audience. The programme included an Overture, (King Richard III) by R. Volkmann which was heard for the first time and proved to be a very dramatic and effective work, in fact, one of the best overtures we have heard this season. The other numbers were: concerto for violin, in D-minor, op. 31, H. Vieuxtemps; Overture, Rob. Schumann; and Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, L. v. Beethoven; but lack of space forbids any criticism on the general programme, beyond saying that it was executed in the manner characteristic of this grand orchestra. The soloist of the evening was Sig. Leandro Campanari, who has not been heard with this orchestra since its first season; and as so many violinists of high order have appeared since, it is but natural that the interest of this concert was centered on the soloist. His selection was Vieuxtemps' Concerto in D-minor, op. 31, which at once displayed this gifted artist at his best. Sig. Campanari has never been heard to such entire advantage in Boston as on last evening. The pure quality of his genius, his perfect mastery of the instrument, the noble simplicity and strong intelligence of his style must have met the satisfaction of every intelligent auditor; and it is safe to say that, since Mr. Lichtenberg appeared at the first concert of the season, we have heard no such artist. Sig. Campanari is very unassuming, although he has played in quartets with Wilhelmj and is praised in the highest terms by him. His fame in Italy is one to be proud of; and his many friends and admirers here rank him among the first of violin virtuosos. Sig. Campanari played, last evening, on his celebrated Amati violin, which is one of the finest in this country.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 22d concert of the present season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening with Mr. Leandro Campanari, violinist, as the soloist. The selections were as follows:

Overture ("King Richard III.").....R. Volkmann
Concerto for violin, in D minor, op. 31, H. Vieuxtemps
Overture ("Hermann and Dorothea").....Rob. Schumann
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93.....L. v. Beethoven

Mr. Campanari's contribution to the programme was one of the leading features of the evening, and his reception and the quick applause which rewarded his efforts proved that his excellent abilities were fully appreciated by the audience. His performance of the Vieuxtemps concerto well merited the favor with which it was received, and the singularly interesting character of the composition gave added pleasure to the listener. The introduction was admirably presented by the player, and the broad, noble treatment of the beautiful theme of the adagio commanded the keenest appreciation, while the technical skill displayed in the allegro proved the performer to be an artist of the first rank. His

Music.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The programme for the twenty-second symphony concert included Volkmann's overture to King Richard III.; Vieuxtemps' violin concerto, op. 31; Schumann's overture—Hermann and Dorothea; and Beethoven's symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93. The Volkmann overture was finely played. It is a highly imaginative work, replete with sensational and startling effects, orchestrated with a rare degree of ingenuity. Signor Campanari scored a brilliant success by his performance of the Vieuxtemps concerto. The breadth and intensity of his interpretation, his clear, facile and accurate delivery and well considered phrasing were effective in holding the attention of the audience and creating unbounded enthusiasm. In short, the performance showed brilliant virtuosity in the mastery of difficulties, and as regards conception was in a conspicuous degree poetic and refined. It was associated with none of the sentimentality which Italian artists are wont to display, but was eminently broad, manly and straightforward. The Schumann overture does not hold rank with the great composer's best works, but its performance was yet welcome. The concert concluded with an exceedingly good delivery of Beethoven's eighth symphony. Tonight the bi-centenary of the birth of Johann Sebastian Bach will be celebrated with a programme that includes the F major toccata, arranged by Esser; an aria, "My heart ever faithful," and Claconna for violin. The soloists will be Miss Emily Winant, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. Wm. J. Winch, and Mr. Franz Remmert.

tone is large and true, his bowing graceful and clean, and his playing is characterized at all times by good taste and rare musical intelligence. The novelty of the evening, the "King Richard III" overture, by Volkmann, proved one of the most notable additions to the season's repertoire, and it is difficult to recall an overture of more dramatic strength. The skill of the composer is displayed in the most masterly fashion in the series of strongly colored scenes which the composition depicts and the marvellous use which Volkmann has made of the orchestra throughout the work makes well worthy the study demanded to insure such a faultless presentation as was given it on this occasion. Schumann's overture to Goethe's poem of "Hermann and Dorothea," with its echoes of the "Marsellaise," so suggestive of the incidents of the story, has few of the composer's usual characteristics, but is a very enjoyable composition, and was played in a most charming way. The presentation of the eighth symphony was an eminently pleasing one, the beauties of the work, particularly those of the allegretto, being given with the excellent taste and faultless precision which has been so generally notable in the presentation of this series of symphonies during the present season.

Vieuxtemps' violin concerto in D minor gave Signor Campanari an opportunity to show how thorough an artist he is, and what a fine school of work the composition represents. The floriture of the introduction were a little uneven, and the intonation wavered a little, especially in the long and difficult harmonic at the close of the adagio movement, but these were absolutely the only faults in a long and difficult performance. On the other hand, his breadth of tone was admirable, his legato superb, and the finale went with much verve and brilliancy. Beethoven's eighth symphony, most light hearted of the nine, was finely given. The plunge into the first theme was well done, and in the ritenuto of the second theme the orchestra kept well together. On the return of the chief theme after the development, the contrabasses and cellos could have emphasized the subject to advantage, and the sudden C sharp which interrupts the theme of the finale could have been given more forcibly, but at least every portion was clear, the tempo of the minuet (a much disputed point) well taken, the horn and clarinet passages of the Trio finely played, the dialogues between the upper and lower strings in the allegretto clearly brought out, and the finale made very effective in its hilarious coda. The concert was shorter than usual, which was not a fault. Next week comes the Bach celebration, and our public will then have an opportunity of judging our conductor in a new field, that of choral leadership, in which he is said to attain his greatest success.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT. The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening included the following programme: R. Volkmann, overture (King Richard III.); H. Vieuxtemps, concerto for violin in D minor, op. 31; Rob. Schumann, overture (Hermann and Dorothea); L. v. Beethoven, symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93. Mr. Leandro Campanari was the soloist. The Volkmann overture was given for the first time and was, of all selections yet given, the best adapted to display the two chief qualities of the orchestra. It is essentially in the highest type of the romantic school, portraying not only outward sights, but inward feelings, and depending more upon its vividness in this respect than upon any intrinsic merit of form. The instruments are made to do more than express mere beauty of combination; they even do more than picture mind-scenes; they seem to speak to the listener in a language of their own which, however, different from vocalized language, is yet almost as distinct and expressive. To interpret such a piece requires not only the talent of a virtuoso, but the genius of an artist; there must be not only the perfect technical triumph in the management of the instruments, but the true understanding of the emotions embodied in the strains—that is, if the selection is to be given its full significance. Infinitely more difficult is it for a large combination of players to display, in unison, this double power than for a soloist, and for that reason the greatest credit is due to the Symphony Orchestra for their single interpretation. The story, as told by them, was weird, thrilling and intensely interesting. So, too, in the second overture (Hermann and Dorothea), the musicians had to deal with romantic music, and the little bits of patriotic melody, exquisitely introduced at intervals, brought up clearly the picture of the long line of weary exiles fleeing from their home beyond the Rhine. The symphony of the evening was entirely in character with the preceding selections, for it is one of those which give unmistakable signs of the change which was then creeping over the musical world in relation to the character of the music and foreshadowing the departure from the strict lines of classic form. Mr. Campanari possesses good vigor of tone, as manifested in his violin solo, but his higher notes are not always so round and pure as could be desired. His playing in this respect is strongly in contrast with that of Mr. Adamowski, who appeared at the former concert.

The programme for the commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of John Sebastian Bach next Saturday will be made up entirely of selections from Bach's works, as follows: Toccata (arranged for orchestra by H. Esser); aria, "My heart ever faithful," from the cantata "God so loved the world" (with cello and piano accompaniment), Miss Juch, Mr. Glese and Mr. Tucker; claconna for violin (piano accompaniment by F. Mendelssohn), Mr. Loeffler; first and second parts of the Christmas Oratorio. Soloists, Miss Emily Winant, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. Wm. J. Winch, Mr. Franz Remmert. A large chorus will assist. It being impossible to secure the assistance of the chorus on Friday afternoon the Christmas Oratorio will not then be performed. Instead of the aria "My heart ever faithful" the aria "Slumber beloved" from the Christmas Oratorio will be given, and instead of the oratorio the fifth symphony of Beethoven, as well as an andante and gavotte of Bach for strings.

Adamowski and the Symphony.

Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist at the symphony concert last evening. He played Saint-Saens' concerto for violin (op. 20) and was warmly applauded. Mozart's symphony in G minor, R. Fuchs' serenade (in D major) for strings, and Schubert's Alphonso and Estrell's overture were presented by the orchestra in a faultless manner.

Next week the programme will be:

Overture, King Richard III. (first time)	R. Volkmann
Concerto for violin	H. Vieuxtemps
Overture, Hermann and Dorothea	Rob. Schumann
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93	L. v. Beethoven
Soloist	Mr. Leandro Campanari

Last evening, at Music Hall, the twenty-second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, was given before a large and appreciative audience. The programme included an Overture, (King Richard III) by R. Volkmann which was heard for the first time and proved to be a very dramatic and effective work, in fact, one of the best overtures we have heard this season. The other numbers were: concerto, for violin, in D-minor, op. 31, H. Vieux temps; Overture, Rob. Schumann; and Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, L. V. Beethoven; but lack of space forbids any criticism on the general programme, beyond saying that it was executed in the manner characteristic of this grand orchestra. The soloist of the evening was Sig. Leandro Campanari, who has not been heard with this orchestra since its first season; and as so many violinists of high order have appeared since, it is but natural that the interest of this concert was centered on the soloist. His selection was Vieuxtemps' Concerto in D-minor, op. 31, which at once displayed this gifted artist at his best. Sig. Campanari has never been heard to such entire advantage in Boston as on last evening. The pure quality of his genius, his perfect mastery of the instrument, the noble simplicity and strong intelligence of his style must have met the satisfaction of every intelligent auditor; and it is safe to say that, since Mr. Lichtenberg appeared at the first concert of the season, we have heard no such artist. Sig. Campanari is very unassuming, although he has played in quartets with Wilhelmj and is praised in the highest terms by him. His fame in Italy is one to be proud of; and his many friends and admirers here rank him among the first of violin virtuosos. Sig. Campanari played, last evening, on his celebrated Amati violin, which is one of the finest in this country.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 22d concert of the present season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening with Mr. Leandro Campanari, violinist, as the soloist. The selections were as follows:

Overture ("King Richard III.")	R. Volkmann
Concerto for violin, in D minor, op. 31	H. Vieuxtemps
Overture ("Hermann and Dorothea")	Rob. Schumann
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93	L. v. Beethoven

Mr. Campanari's contribution to the programme was one of the leading features of the evening, and his reception and the quick applause which rewarded his efforts proved that his excellent abilities were fully appreciated by the audience. His performance of the Vieuxtemps concerto well merited the favor with which it was received, and the singularly interesting character of the composition gave added pleasure to the listener. The introduction was admirably presented by the player, and the broad, noble treatment of the beautiful theme of the adagio commanded the keenest appreciation, while the technical skill displayed in the allegro proved the performer to be an artist of the first rank. His

Music.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The programme for the twenty-second symphony concert included Volkmann's overture to King Richard III.; Vieuxtemps' violin concerto, op. 31; Schumann's overture—Hermann and Dorothea; and Beethoven's symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93. The Volkmann overture was finely played. It is a highly imaginative work, replete with sensational and startling effects, orchestrated with a rare degree of ingenuity. Signor Campanari scored a brilliant success by his performance of the Vieuxtemps concerto. The breadth and intensity of his interpretation, his clear, facile and accurate delivery and well considered phrasing were effective in holding the attention of the audience and creating unbounded enthusiasm. In short, the performance showed brilliant virtuosity in the mastery of difficulties, and as regards conception was in a conspicuous degree poetic and refined. It was associated with none of the sentimentality which Italian artists are wont to display, but was eminently broad, manly and straightforward. The Schumann overture does not hold rank with the great composer's best works, but its performance was yet welcome. The concert concluded with an exceedingly good delivery of Beethoven's eighth symphony. Tonight the bi-centenary of the birth of Johann Sebastian Bach will be celebrated with a programme that includes the F major toccata, arranged by Esser; an aria, "My heart ever faithful," and Claconna for violin. The soloists will be Miss Emily Winant, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. Wm. J. Winch, and Mr. Franz Remmert.

tone is large and true, his bowing graceful and clean, and his playing is characterized at all times by good taste and rare musical intelligence. The novelty of the evening, the "King Richard III" overture, by Volkmann, proved one of the most notable additions to the season's repertoire, and it is difficult to recall an overture of more dramatic strength. The skill of the composer is displayed in the most masterly fashion in the series of strongly colored scenes which the composition depicts and the marvellous use which Volkmann has made of the orchestra throughout the work makes well worthy the study demanded to insure such a faultless presentation as was given it on this occasion. Schumann's overture to Goethe's poem of "Hermann and Dorothea," with its echoes of the "Marsellaise," so suggestive of the incidents of the story, has few of the composer's usual characteristics, but is a very enjoyable composition, and was played in a most charming way. The presentation of the eighth symphony was an eminently pleasing one, the beauties of the work, particularly those of the allegretto, being given with the excellent taste and faultless precision which has been so generally notable in the presentation of this series of symphonies during the present season.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-second concert of this course took place last Saturday, and gave the following programme:

- Overture, "King Richard III," R. Volkmann
(First time.)
- Concerto for Violin, in D minor, op. 31 H. Vieuxtemps
Introduction.—Adagio religioso.—Allegro.
Mr. L. Campanari.
- Overture, "Hermann and Dorothea," Rob. Schumann
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93 L. v. Beethoven
Allegro vivace e con brio.—Allegretto scherzando.—
Tempo di Menuetto.—Allegro vivace.

The overture to "Richard III." is about as gloomy as music can be made in the nineteenth century. The contrabasses growl, the horns moan, the oboe wails, and the trombones give ghostly shudders. There are many sudden interruptions (possibly picturing the nightmare of the wicked monarch, or Buckingham being interrupted about the region of the neck), and finally Bosworth field is represented by a snare drum and "The Campbells are coming." I do not like the introduction of the tune into this subject, and still less do I like the manner of its treatment. Max Bruch has given it a thousand fold nobler thematic development in "Fair Ellen." The work was well played however, and the sudden sforzando of brasses and percussion which killed poor Richard went off with dramatic effect.

Equally well played was the "Herman and Dorothea" overture, which served up the Marseillaise in small slices. It is not one of Schumann's successes, but shows the master in his decadence when he no longer possessed the spontaneity of the B flat Symphony.

Mr. Campanari made a great success. He is a broad and brilliant player, and in the Adagio was at his very best. The floriture of the introduction were not quite smooth, and there were one or two lapses from true intonation, but after the Adagio all the great difficulties were overcome in a masterly manner. The double-stopped chromatic passages of the finale were most effectively rendered.

The eighth Symphony is by all odds the sunniest symphony I know of. Spite of its brevity it contains passages which try the discipline of an orchestra greatly. It was very successfully performed. The brusque plunge into the chief theme of the first movement being given with unity, and the ensemble in the ritenuto of the second theme being faultless. The dialogue between the upper and lower strings in the Allegretto was well balanced, and the tempo of the minuet was admirable, as also was the difficult horn and clarinet passage of the trio. I should have liked more power in the contrabasses in the reprise of the chief theme in the first movement after the development, and also more abruptness in the wonderful C sharp which interrupts the melody in the finale, but these were only faults of omission, and there were absolutely no faults of commission to

MUSIC NOTES.

So Mr. Gericke is to give us a Bach celebration. How one "old Bach" does take to another!

The care taken in the vocal work of the Bach celebration is proved by the fact that Mr. Gericke caused breathing marks to be placed on each chorister's music. Mr. Gericke is at his greatest in conducting choral works, it is said.

chronicle.

The Beethoven ninth Symphony is to be omitted this season, for the first time in several years; but as the Schubert Symphony in C major is to take its place it will be an exchange of masterpieces only, and we fear that the Ninth could not have been adequately sung unless some society like the Handel and Haydn had volunteered to undertake the choral part.

L. C. E.

SYMPHONY SOUNDS.

Last Night's Attractive Concert at Music Hall—The Bach Anniversary.

A tone-picture, vividly drawn and thoroughly effective in its own way, was given for the first time at the Symphony concert last night. The work was Robert Volkmann's overture, "Richard III." As the orchestra interpreted the score, the attentive Shakespearean-minded patron might easily imagine the rising ambition of the "crook-back duke," his schemes and crimes, the rising against the tyrant, the din of battle, the crash which marked his overthrow and the reign of peace which the trumpets of triumphant Richmond heralded to England. Precisely the motive which induced the composer to introduce that familiar Scottish air, "The Campbells are coming," in the course of the overture may be matter of discussion, but the effect was enjoyable; and the whole work, with its elaborate orchestration, made a very favorable impression. Following this novelty came a performance of the Vieuxtemps concerto for violin in D minor, by Mr. Leandro Campanari, whose skillful playing, thoroughly artistic methods and sympathetic style were exemplified most pleasantly. The young violinist was recalled amid hearty applause. The Schumann overture, "Hermann and Dorothea," with its recurring "Marseillaise" theme was delightfully performed; and the symphony (Beethoven's eighth) was interpreted by the orchestra in its best manner. The audience was large.

To Johann Sebastian Bach, whose 200th anniversary is soon to be celebrated, will the programme for the next symphony concert be devoted. The toccata, arranged for orchestra by H. Esser; the aria, "My Heart Ever Faithful," sung by Miss Emma Juch, with cello accompaniment by Fritz Giese, and piano accompaniment by H. G. Tucker, and the ciaccona for violin, performed by Mr. Loeffler, constitutes the first portion of the programme. "The Christmas Oratorio" (first and second parts) is then to be sung, with a select chorus, and Miss Emily Winant, Miss Emma Juch, William J. Winch and Franz Remmert as soloists. At the Friday recital the oratorio selections will be omitted, as the service of the chorus cannot be obtained; and the programme, besides the toccata and ciaccona, will include the aria "Slumber, Beloved," by Miss Winant, the Bach andante and gavot for strings and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

VOLKMANN'S KING RICHARD III.

This overture was given for the first time in Boston at a recent Symphony Concert, and Mr. Lang therefore spoke of it at the preceding lesson. Volkmann was born in Saxony in 1815, and took up his residence in Vienna. His private fortune enabled him to lead the life of a composer. Many an opus has he given the world, a couple of symphonies, quartets, trios, cello and piano concertos, masses. All his music is serious. This overture precedes, like Schumann's Manfred, a non-existent opera. It is not brilliant but sedate, the introduction seeming purposeless. Then there are little subjects variously treated with fine wood-wind effects pianissimo. Suddenly he breaks forth with what he calls an old English air—more appropriate to Bruce or Wallace than to Richard and Bosworth Field, "The Campbells are coming," employed with curious wanderings from the original melody.

The overture ends with two Andantes, for Volkmann had the courage to shade the overture as he desired, rather than as custom dictated. At the close the lecturer called attention to Volkmann's compositions for four hands.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-second concert of this course took place last Saturday, and gave the following programme :

- Overture, "King Richard III," R. Volkmann
(First time.)
- Concerto for Violin, in D minor, op. 31. H. Vieuxtemps
Introduction.—Adagio religioso.—Allegro.
Mr. L. Campanari.
- Overture, "Hermann and Dorothea," Rob. Schumann
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93. L. v. Beethoven
Allegro vivace e con brio.—Allegretto scherzando.—
Tempo di Menuetto.—Allegro vivace.

The overture to "Richard III." is about as gloomy as music can be made in the nineteenth century. The contrabasses growl, the horns moan, the oboe wails, and the trombones give ghostly shudders. There are many sudden interruptions (possibly picturing the nightmare of the wicked monarch, or Buckingham being interrupted about the region of the neck), and finally Bosworth field is represented by a snare drum and "The Campbells are coming." I do not like the introduction of the tune into this subject, and still less do I like the manner of its treatment. Max Bruch has given it a thousand fold nobler thematic development in "Fair Ellen." The work was well played however, and the sudden sforzando of brasses and percussion which killed poor Richard went off with dramatic effect.

Equally well played was the "Herman and Dorothea" overture, which served up the Marseillaise in small slices. It is not one of Schumann's successes, but shows the master in his decadence when he no longer possessed the spontaneity of the B flat Symphony.

Mr. Campanari made a great success. He is a broad and brilliant player, and in the Adagio was at his very best. The floriture of the introduction were not quite smooth, and there were one or two lapses from true intonation, but after the Adagio all the great difficulties were overcome in a masterly manner. The double-stopped chromatic passages of the finale were most effectively rendered.

The eighth Symphony is by all odds the sunniest symphony I know of. Spite of its brevity it contains passages which try the discipline of an orchestra greatly. It was very successfully performed. The brusque plunge into the chief theme of the first movement being given with unity, and the ensemble in the ritenuto of the second theme being faultless. The dialogue between the upper and lower strings in the Allegretto was well balanced, and the tempo of the minuet was admirable, as also was the difficult horn and clarinet passage of the trio. I should have liked more power in the contrabasses in the reprise of the chief theme in the first movement after the development, and also more abruptness in the wonderful C sharp which interrupts the melody in the finale, but these were only faults of omission, and there were absolutely no faults of commission to

MUSIC NOTES.

So Mr. Gericke is to give us a Bach celebration. How one "old Bach" does take to another!

The care taken in the vocal work of the Bach celebration is proved by the fact that Mr. Gericke caused breathing marks to be placed on each chorister's music. Mr. Gericke is at his greatest in conducting choral works, it is said.

chronicle.
The Beethoven ninth Symphony is to be omitted this season, for the first time in several years; but as the Schubert Symphony in C major is to take its place it will be an exchange of masterpieces only, and we fear that the Ninth could not have been adequately sung unless some society like the Handel and Haydn had volunteered to undertake the choral part.
L. C. E.

SYMPHONY SOUNDS.

Last Night's Attractive Concert at Music Hall—The Bach Anniversary.

A tone-picture, vividly drawn and thoroughly effective in its own way, was given for the first time at the Symphony concert last night. The work was Robert Volkmann's overture, "Richard III." As the orchestra interpreted the score, the attentive Shakespearean-minded patron might easily imagine the rising ambition of the "crook-back duke," his schemes and crimes, the rising against the tyrant, the din of battle, the crash which marked his overthrow and the reign of peace which the trumpets of triumphant Richmond heralded to England. Precisely the motive which induced the composer to introduce that familiar Scottish air, "The Campbells are coming," in the course of the overture may be matter of discussion, but the effect was enjoyable; and the whole work, with its elaborate orchestration, made a very favorable impression. Following this novelty came a performance of the Vieuxtemps concerto for violin in D minor, by Mr. Leandro Campanari, whose skilful playing, thoroughly artistic methods and sympathetic style were exemplified most pleasantly. The young violinist was recalled amid hearty applause. The Schumann overture, "Hermann and Dorothea," with its recurring "Marseillaise" theme was delightfully performed; and the symphony (Beethoven's eighth) was interpreted by the orchestra in its best manner. The audience was large. To Johann Sebastian Bach, whose 200th anniversary is soon to be celebrated, will the programme for the next symphony concert be devoted. The toccata, arranged for orchestra by H. Esser; the aria, "My Heart Ever Faithful," sung by Miss Emma Juch, with cello accompaniment by Fritz Giese, and piano accompaniment by H. G. Tucker, and the ciaccona for violin, performed by Mr. Loeffler, constitutes the first portion of the programme. "The Christmas Oratorio" (first and second parts) is then to be sung, with a select chorus, and Miss Emily Winant, Miss Emma Juch, William J. Winch and Franz Remmert as soloists. At the Friday recital the oratorio selections will be omitted, as the service of the chorus cannot be obtained; and the programme, besides the toccata and ciaccona, will include the aria "Slumber, Beloved," by Miss Winant, the Bach andante and gavot for strings and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

VOLKMANN'S KING RICHARD III.

THIS overture was given for the first time in Boston at a recent Symphony Concert, and Mr. Lang therefore spoke of it at the preceding lesson. Volkmann was born in Saxony in 1815, and took up his residence in Vienna. His private fortune enabled him to lead the life of a composer. Many an opus has he given the world, a couple of symphonies, quartets, trios, cello and piano concertos, masses. All his music is serious. This overture precedes, like Schumann's Manfred, a non-existent opera. It is not brilliant but sedate, the introduction seeming purposeless. Then there are little subjects variously treated with fine wood-wind effects pianissimo. Suddenly he breaks forth with what he calls an old English air—more appropriate to Bruce or Wallace than to Richard and Bosworth Field, "The Campbells are coming," employed with curious wanderings from the original melody.

The overture ends with two Andantes, for Volkmann had the courage to shade the overture as he desired, rather than as custom dictated. At the close the lecturer called attention to Volkmann's compositions for four hands.

264

The bi-centennial of the birth of John Sebastian Bach is to be duly observed in this city during the present week, and the programme arranged promises much that is interesting. The management of the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra have planned for a presentation of the first and second parts of the Christmas oratorio, under Mr. Gericke's direction, as the leading feature of the concert falling on the 21st inst., but the impossibility of securing the services of the members of the chorus for the public rehearsal has necessitated the arrangement of a different programme for the afternoon audience. This gives practically a double observance of the event, and affords an opportunity for a more widely varied programme of Bach's works than could be given at a single performance. At the afternoon "rehearsal," or more properly, on this occasion, concert, the soloists will be Miss Emily Winant, contralto, and Mr. M. Loessler, violinist. The selections will be: Toccata (arranged for orchestra by H. Esser), Bach; aria, "Slumber Beloved," from the Christmas oratorio, Bach; ciaccona for violin, Bach; and ante and gavotte (for strings), Bach; and the symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67, L. von Beethoven.

On Saturday evening the first and second parts of the Christmas oratorio by Bach will be performed, with a chorus and the following solo artists: Miss Emily Winant, contralto; Miss Emma Juch, soprano; Mr. William J. Winch, tenor; Mr. Franz Remmert, bass. This will be preceded by the Bach toccata, arranged for orchestra by H. Esser; the Bach aria, "My heart ever faithful," from the cantata "God so loved the world" (with cello and piano accompaniment), Miss Juch, Mr. Giese and Mr. Tucker, and the Bach ciaccona for violin, played by Mr. Loessler.

265

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 21ST, AT 8, P. M.

IN COMMEMORATION

OF THE

TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH-DAY

OF

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH.

BORN AT EISENACH, MARCH 21, 1685.

DIED AT LEIPSIC, JULY 28, 1750.

2 266

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

TOCCATA, (arranged for Orchestra by H. ESSER.)

ARIA, "MY HEART EVER FAITHFUL."

from the CANTATA "GOD SO LOVED THE WORLD."

(With 'Cello and Piano accompaniment.)

MISS JUCH, MR. GIESE AND MR. TUCKER.

My heart ever faithful,
Sing praises, be joyful,
My Jesus is near.
Away with complaining,
Faith ever maintaining,
My Jesus is here.

CIACONNA FOR VIOLIN.

MR. LOEFFLER.

267

PART II.

FIRST AND SECOND PARTS

OF THE

CHRISTMAS ORATORIO,

FOR

SOLOISTS, CHORUS, ORCHESTRA AND ORGAN.

MISS EMMA JUCH,

MISS EMILY WINANT,

MR. WM. J. WINCH,

MR. FRANZ REMMERTZ.

CHORUS OF THREE HUNDRED.

MR. B. J. LANG, Organ.

MR. H. G. TUCKER, Piano.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

CHRISTMAS ORATORIO.—PARTS I AND II.

(COMPOSED 1734.)

Part I.

ON THE FIRST DAY OF THE FESTIVAL OF CHRISTMAS.

CHORUS.

Christians, be joyful, and praise your salvation,
Sing, for to-day your Redeemer is born.
Cease to be fearful, forget lamentation,
Haste with thanksgiving to greet this glad morn!
Come, let us worship, and fall down before Him,
Let us with voices united adore Him.

RECITATIVE.—Tenor.

Now it came to pass in those days that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus that all the world should be enrolled. And all went to enroll themselves, every one to his own city. And there also went up Joseph from Galilee, out of the city of Nazareth, into Judea, to the city of David, which is called Bethlehem, for he was of the house and family of David, to enroll himself, with Mary his betrothed wife, being great with child. And when they were there, the days were fulfilled that she should be delivered.

RECITATIVE.—Alto.

See now the bridegroom, full of grace,
The hero of King David's race,
To save and heal the earth,
Doth stoop to mortal birth.

See now the Star of Jacob shining,
Its beams delight our eyes;
Up, Zion, and forget thy sad repining,
For high thy bliss doth rise.

AIR.

Prepare thyself, Zion, with tender affection.
The purest, the fairest, this day to receive.

Thou must meet Him with a heart with love o'erflowing;
Haste, then, with ardor the Bridegroom to welcome.

CHORAL.

How shall I fitly meet Thee,
And give Thee welcome due?
The nations long to greet Thee,
And I would greet Thee too.
O Fount of Light, shine brightly
Upon my darkened heart,
That I may serve Thee rightly,
And know Thee as Thou art.

RECITATIVE.—Tenor.

And she brought forth her first-born Son, and she wrapped Him in swaddling clothes, and laid Him in a manger, because there was no room for them in the inn.

CHORAL AND RECITATIVE.—Bass.

For us to earth He cometh poor,
Our redemption to secure,
And rich in Heaven to make us stand,
All numbered with His angel-band.
Lord, have mercy!

Who rightly can the love declare
That fills our tender Saviour's breast?
Yea, who can understand, or share
His grief for man by sin oppressed?
Himself the Son of God will give,
That we may be redeem'd and live;
So now for this as Man behold Him born.

ARIA.—Bass.

Mighty Lord and King all glorious,
Saviour, for mankind victorious,
Earthly state Thou dost disdain.
He who all things doth sustain,
Who all state and pomp supplieth,
In a lowly manger lieth.

CHORAL.

Ah! dearest Jesus, Holy Child,
Make Thee a bed, soft, undefiled,
Within my heart, and there recline,
And keep that chamber ever Thine.

Part II.

ON THE SECOND DAY OF THE FESTIVAL OF CHRISTMAS.

PASTORAL.

RECITATIVE.—Tenor.

And there were shepherds in the same country, abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flocks by night. And lo! an angel of the Lord stood by them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them, and they were sore afraid.

CHORAL.

Break forth, O beauteous, heavenly light,
And usher in the morning!
Ye Shepherds, shrink not with affright,
But hear the angel's warning.

This Child, now weak in infancy,
Our confidence and joy shall be,
The power of Satan breaking,
Our peace eternal making.

RECITATIVE.—Tenor and Soprano.

(The Angel.)

And the angel said to them: Be not afraid; behold! I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all the people. For to-day is born to you in the City of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.

RECITATIVE.—Bass.

What God to Abraham revealed
He to the shepherds doth accord to see fulfilled.
To shepherds, lo! our gracious Lord
His purposes unfoldeth.
That blessing which, in days of old,
He to a shepherd first foretold,
A shepherd first beholdeth.

ARIA.—Tenor.

Haste, ye shepherds, haste to meet Him;
Why should ye delay to greet Him?
Haste this gracious Child to see.
Glad and joyful ye should be,
Of His wondrous love partaking.
Him your hope and comfort making.

RECITATIVE.—Tenor.

And this is the sign to you. Ye shall find a babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, and lying in a manger.

CHORAL.

Within yon gloomy manger lies
The Lord who reigns above the skies;
Within the stall where beasts have fed,
The Virgin-born doth lay his head.

RECITATIVE.—Bass.

O haste ye, then! ye shepherds, go,
Since you this wonder know,
And seek for God's Almighty Son,
Within a manger lying lowly;
And there, beside that cradle holy,
In sweet harmonious tone,
Sing all with one accord
To soothe your infant Lord.

ARIA.—Alto.

Slumber, beloved, and take thy repose,
Soon wilt thou waken, our joy and salvation.
Oh! may Thy breast find gladness and rest,
In our heartfelt exultation.

RECITATIVE.—Tenor.

And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and saying:—

CHORUS.

Glory to God in the highest, and peace on the earth unto men in whom he is well pleased.

RECITATIVE.—Bass.

'Tis right that angels thus should sing,
To us this day such joy doth bring.
Come, then, our voices let us raise,
And join with them in songs of praise.

CHORAL.

With all Thy hosts, O Lord, we sing,
And thanks and praise to Thee we bring;
For Thou, O long expected guest,
Hast come at length to make us blest.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

If we do not err, something of the credit for the form taken by the symphony concert of last Saturday evening is due to the Harvard Musical Association, which prepared an outline sketch of a Bach celebration a good while ago and appointed a committee to arrange details, but ultimately thought that the commemoration would better fall within the scope of the symphony concerts. To the management of these concerts the general scheme and the smaller suggestions were presented, and subsequently took the shape embodied in the programme of the last concert but one of the present series, the date of which exactly coincided with the two hundredth anniversary of Bach's birthday. In pursuance of the original idea the principal choral societies were invited to participate in the vocal music of the occasion, the "Christmas Oratorio," although not exactly what might be called a "seasonable" or "timely" selection, being chosen as one already familiar to the Handel and Hayden Society, from which most help was expected. By far the largest contingent—some three quarters of the whole force, and nearly all the male voices—came from that body, the Cecilia, the Beyleston and the Bach choir supplying each a few singers, the Apollo sending none who were not also members of one of the other organizations. Altogether a body of about three hundred singers was gathered, and some excellent work was done, although it was often impossible for Mr. Gericke's strongest beat to lift them as promptly and to keep them as vividly moving as it was plainly his purpose and desire to do. But for a first concert under a new conductor who had only been able to make himself imperfectly understood in insufficient English or with the help of an interpreter, it was greatly to be commended, while some points were taken with remarkable nicety—such as the delicate diminuendo toward the soft ending of the first chorale, the soprano chorus lines interwoven in the bass air, "Who rightly can the love declare," the second part of the chorale "Break forth" (in which the tenors were particularly good), and the well developed crescendo in the difficult "Glory to God," in which, also, the elaborate contrapuntal motion was quite clearly traceable. Among the solo singers Miss Winant deserved the first place; she sang with care and interest, as well as with more warmth than she often allows herself to show, and in "See now the Star of Jacob" and "Slumber, beloved," she touched a high point of excellence. The soprano has only to sing the two or three phrases of the herald angel, and these Miss Juch gave sweetly and purely in tone, and with easy distinctness of articulation. Mr. Remmert was in rather bad voice, and the bass music suffered accordingly; his lower register was at his command, but the upper was uncertain and hoarse, and often played him false. Mr. W. J. Winch sang the tenor music rather unequally, at times with much grace and smoothness, as in the couplet beginning "Glad and Joyful," taking some awkward notes in the recitatives with no little skill, but giving some other phrases with apparent effort and a hard, forced, excessive tone. The orchestral work was beautifully done throughout, and the wooden wind coloring was often very sympathetic.

The first part of the programme consisted of the toccata which Esser arranged for orchestra; "My heart ever faithful," which never sounds as one thinks it ought to sound or believes it might, so ungracious is often its coupling of words and intervals, but in which Miss Juch made as good a success as it is reasonable to expect of anybody but a phenomenon, nicely accompanied on the piano and cello by Messrs. Tucker and Giese and the great violin daconna which Mr. Löffler performed exceptionally well, with more tranquillity than some violinists give it, but with clearness, fulness, self-reliance and dignity.

The last concert, on Saturday evening next, will have for its orchestral numbers Weber's; "Euryantne" overture, Wagner's "Siegfried-Idyll," and Schubert's C major symphony. Miss Amy Marcy Cheney will be the soloist, and play Chopin's F minor pianoforte concerto.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night before an enormous audience. The occasion was devoted to music by Bach, in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of his birthday. The concert opened with a fine arrangement by H. Esser of the famous Toccata, which was admirably played. It was followed by the air "My Heart Ever Faithful," with cello and piano accompaniments, Miss Emma Juch singing the solo, and Mr. F. Giese and Mr. H. G. Tucker playing the accompaniments. It was scarcely worth while to have sent to New York for Miss Juch to sing this air, as we have a number of singers here who could have sung it as poorly as she did, and several who could have sung it much better. It was given without color or fervor, in a thin nasal voice, and with a distressing portamento to and explosion upon the high notes. However, Miss Juch was hospitably recalled. Mr. M. Loeffler played the Chaconne for violin in an artistic, earnest, and refined manner, and with that clean-cut technique and purity of taste that are always such pleasing essentials in his playing. Then came the great feature of the programme, the first and second parts of the Christmas Oratorio, in which a chorus of three hundred, Miss Juch, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. W. J. Winch, and Mr. Franz Remmert assisted. The Christmas Oratorio was a somewhat malapropos selection for the last week but one in Lent. A much better choice would have been found in the great B-minor mass. In regard to the music of the work it must be acknowledged that sweeter, sincerer melody Bach never wrote. It is less elaborate and more genial than many of his larger works; and the choruses and arias flow on in a full, rich, even stream most welcome to hear. Music so simple, so free from modern trickiness, had to be listened to with the closest attention; and judging by appearances, this was generally bestowed. The choruses could not have been given with better effect, not only as regards purity and fullness of tone, but in point of precision, unity of attack and just attention to tone shading and expression. Every member of the chorus and orchestra seemed to feel the influence of the anniversary, and the entire ensemble performance was notably sincere, faithful, and effective. Of the soloists, Miss Winant sang with musician-like feeling and devotional expressiveness. Mr. Franz Remmert was in poor voice, and his singing was rendered dismal, well-nigh painful in its effect which seemed not only to result from a severe cold, but to an unfamiliarity with his music and a careless disregard of its noble significance. Mr. Winch's singing was marred by throatiness, his intonation was by no means accurate and his performance, as a whole, scarcely did justice to the music. Miss Juch had but little to do, but her performance was of a character that excited no sincere regret in critical minds regarding this brevity.

Symphony Orchestra Bach Commemoration.

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night was devoted entirely to selections composed by John Sebastian Bach, in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of that master musician's birthday. The programme: Toccata (arranged for orchestra by H. Esser); Aria, "My heart ever faithful," from the cantata "God so loved the world," with cello and piano accompaniment, Miss Juch, Mr. Giese and Mr. Tucker; Chaconne for violin, Mr. Loeffler; First and Second Parts of the Christmas Oratorio, for soloists, chorus, orchestra and organ, Miss Emma Juch, Miss Emily Wiant, Mr. Wm. J. Winch, Mr. Franz Kemmeritz and a chorus of 300; organist, Mr. B. J. Lang; pianist, Mr. H. G. Tucker. It is scarcely possible to say that a larger audience than usual attended this commemoration, for each concert by the Symphony Orchestra attracts a full house, but Saturday night every available place was occupied. Probably some of the new attendants were drawn more by the fact that it was a bi-centenary commemoration than by the fact that it was a commemoration of John Sebastian Bach, desiring to hear extra grand music from the orchestra rather than a special tribute of honor to the composer. But certain it is that all such must have enjoyed to a full degree the three selections comprising the first part of the programme. The oratorio was less pleasing in a popular sense, for although the harmony was majestic, yet there were few arias to relieve the choruses and recitatives. It was a study for the intellect rather than a recreation for the mind. The choruses, strong and heavy, were like tremendous avalanches of music, rolling massive chord after chord with awe-inspiring force, and giving every evidence of power and combined might. They were well rendered at the concert, the only fault lying in the separation of the parts when the tenors, especially, failed to meet the requirements of power. The toccata, which opened the programme, was a religious fantasia of inspiring vigor. It was what might be called a "solid" fantasia, containing, as it did, none of the light embellishments of modern schools, but yet displaying an easy, brilliant movement approaching almost in tendency toward the later romantic style. One beautiful strain was ever resounding throughout. Beginning uniquely with steady, pulling notes by the violin, which were soon taken up by the cellos and basses and carried on by them alone, the toccata developed into a repetition of this order, and the sharp, decided tones were heard now first by the brighter, higher-toned instruments and then by the deeper-toned strings. So it continued to the finale, when there issued from the orchestra, in its entirety, such a magnificent burst of harmony, in full, round, beautiful chords, that this strain alone would have won admiration for the whole piece. Miss Juch rendered purely and evenly the aria which followed, although her voice was hardly broad enough for the selection; the excellence of her singing lies especially in the sweetness and clearness of her voice. The next selection, as first arranged, included piano accompaniment for the violin. The accompaniment had been arranged by Mendelssohn, and it may be assured that the master of the "gentlemanly music" did his best in this respect. It was Mendelssohn who, in March, 1829, revived the memory of the great Bach, after its rest in obscurity for many decades, by bringing before the public the wonderful "Passion Music according to St. Matthew" for the first time since the death of its author. Such an admirer of Bach would give his whole heart to embellishing a selection of his noted predecessor when it fell to his duty so to do. But at Mr. Loeffler's request the piano accompaniment was abandoned, and he stood forth alone with his violin before the audience. To render without notes on such an occasion so difficult a selection would in itself appear a praiseworthy feat, but the ability and artistic feeling manifested in the interpretation of the music were marked to a still higher degree. Mr. Loeffler plays with a finish the most excellent, not in the minutest of his touch is there any lack of power. The chaconne and the toccata were the gems of the evening.

John Sebastian Bach was born at Eisenach March 21, 1685. Before he reached ten years of age he had lost both parents and became dependent on his older brother, John Christopher Bach. Then he began his active work in music, and in spite of the extraordinary action of his brother in repressing the boy's genius he made wonderful progress. In the choir at Lüneburg and as organist at Arnstadt he extended his knowledge and laid the foundation for future reputation. Other positions were afterward held with honor. Soon after his notable visit to Frederick the Great in 1747 he became blind, and remained thus afflicted until his death, which occurred at Leipzig July 28, 1750. The value of Bach's works as scientific, technical studies and intellectual exercises is far above that of the works of any other composer, however less pleasing in composition may be in a popular sense. The number of Bach's works seems unlimited; over two hundred complete cantatas, nearly fifty preludes and fugues, fifteen symphonies in three parts, a dozen sonatas for strings, seven overtures for instruments and scores of other works, among which, most notable of all, are the five settings of the Passion of Our Lord, as given in the Gospels, and the great mass in B minor.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-third concert was devoted wholly to Bach, as was natural. It was—Toccata in F, (arranged for orchestra by H. Esser.) Aria, "My Heart ever Faithful," from the Cantata "God so Loved the World." (With cello and piano accompaniment.) Chaconne, for violin. First and second parts of the Christmas Oratorio, for solos, chorus, orchestra and organ.

Esser's transcription of the great organ toccata was grandly played. Yet, in spite of the skill with which Esser has done his work, and the advantages which have been claimed for this orchestral arrangement over the original organ version, we cannot wholly like it. The advantages claimed are, greater clearness of effect for the polyphonic writing, and greater variety in dynamic shading and orchestral color. The first-named advantage seems to us purely imaginary; there is no earthly reason why a good organist should not make the toccata sound perfectly clear on a well-registered, full organ. As for the second advantage, we must own, heretical as it is to say so, that it seems to us no advantage at all, but wholly the reverse. To our ear all these crescendos and diminuendos, all these contrasts of clang-tint, sound simply impertinent. We far prefer to hear the toccata go on from beginning to end in the grand, unflagging roar of the full organ. These little modern coquetties interrupt the continuity of impression which the music should produce. Then what can the orchestra offer in exchange for the organ pedal, and for the grand, steadfast immobility of tone of the organ? Absolutely nothing that is adequate! Miss Juch (accompanied by Mr. Giese and Mr. Tucker) sang the aria "My heart ever faithful" in her freest and most beautiful voice, with great finish of style and much expression. Yet we mistake greatly if she does not take this air wholly wrong. She sings it too slow, in too sentimental a spirit; one finds in her rendering none of that free, frank ebullition of artless joyfulness which characterizes the song. Bach was a man, like David, to "dance before the Lord;" Miss Juch gives the music a tinge of Puritan sanctimoniousness. Well, most others singers do. Mr. Loeffler played the chaconne (in its original shape, without accom-

Symphony Orchestra Bach Commemoration.

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night was devoted entirely to selections composed by John Sebastian Bach, in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of that master musician's birthday. The programme: Toccata (arranged for orchestra by H. Esser); Aria, "My heart ever faithful," from the cantata "God so loved the world," with 'cello and piano accompaniment, Miss Juch, Mr. Giese and Mr. Tucker; Chaconne for violin, Mr. Loeffler; First and Second Parts of the Christmas Oratorio, for soloists, chorus, orchestra and organ, Miss Emma Juch, Miss Emily Wiant, Mr. Wm. J. Winch, Mr. Franz Kemmertz and a chorus of 300; organist, Mr. B. J. Lang; pianist, Mr. H. G. Tucker. It is scarcely possible to say that a larger audience than usual attended this commemoration, for each concert by the Symphony Orchestra attracts a full house, but Saturday night every available place was occupied. Probably some of the new attendants were drawn more by the fact that it was a bi-centenary commemoration than by the fact that it was a commemoration of John Sebastian Bach, desiring to hear extra grand music from the orchestra rather than a special tribute of honor to the composer. But certain it is that all such must have enjoyed to a full degree the three selections comprising the first part of the programme. The oratorio was less pleasing in a popular sense, for although the harmony was majestic, yet there were too many arias to relieve the choruses and recitatives. It was a study for the intellect rather than a recreation for the mind. The choruses, strong and heavy, were like tremendous avalanches of music, rolling massive chords after chord with awe-inspiring force, and giving every evidence of power and combined might. They were well rendered at the concert, the only fault lying in the separation of the parts when the tenors, especially, failed to meet the requirements of power. The toccata, which opened the programme, was a religious fantasia of inspiring vigor. It was what might be called a "solid" fantasia, containing, as it did, none of the light embellishments of modern schools, but yet displaying an easy, brilliant movement approaching almost in tendency toward the later romantic style. One beautiful strain was ever resounding throughout. Beginning uniquely with steady, pulsing notes by the violin, which were soon taken up by the 'cellos and basses and carried on by them alone, the toccata developed into a repetition of this order, and the sharp, decided tones were heard now first by the brighter, higher-toned instruments and then by the deeper-toned strings. So it continued to the finale, when there issued from the orchestra, in its entirety, such a magnificent burst of harmony, in full, round, beautiful chords, that this strain alone would have won admiration for the whole piece. Miss Juch rendered purely and evenly the aria which followed, although her voice was hardly broad enough for the selection; the excellence of her singing lies especially in the sweetness and clearness of her voice. The next selection, as first arranged, included piano accompaniment for the violin. The accompaniment had been arranged by Mendelssohn, and it may be assured that the master of the "gentlemanly music" did his best in this respect. It was Mendelssohn who, in March, 1829, revived the memory of the great Bach, after its rest in obscurity for many decades, by bringing before the public the wonderful "Passion Music according to St. Matthew" for the first time since the death of its author. Such an admirer of Bach would give his whole heart to embellishing a selection of his noted predecessor when it fell to his duty so to do. But at Mr. Loeffler's request the piano accompaniment was abandoned, and he stood forth alone with his violin before the audience. To render without notes on such an occasion so difficult a selection would in itself appear a praiseworthy feat, but the ability and artistic feeling manifested in the interpretation of the music were marked to a still higher degree. Mr. Loeffler plays with a finish and grace most excellent, nor in the refinement of his touch is there any lack of power. The chaconne and the toccata were the gems of the evening.

John Sebastian Bach was born at Eisenach March 21, 1685. Before he reached ten years of age he had lost both parents and became dependent on his older brother, John Christopher Bach. Then he began his active work in music, and in spite of the extraordinary action of his brother in repressing the boy's genius he made wonderful progress. In the choir at Lunenburg and as organist at Arnstadt he extended his knowledge and laid the foundation for future reputation. Other positions were afterward held with honor. Soon after his notable visit to Frederick the Great in 1747 he became blind, and remained thus afflicted until his death, which occurred at Leipzig July 28, 1750. The value of Bach's works as scientific, technical studies and intellectual exercises is far above that of the works of any other composer, however less pleasing. His compositions may be in a popular sense. The number of Bach's works seems unlimited; over two hundred complete cantatas, nearly fifty preludes and fugues, fifteen symphonies in three parts, a dozen sonatas for strings, seven overtures for instruments and scores of other works, among which, most notable of all, are the five settings of the Passion of Our Lord, as given in the Gospels, and the great mass in B minor.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-third concert was devoted wholly to Bach, as was natural. It was—Toccata in F, (arranged for orchestra by H. Esser.) Aria, "My Heart ever Faithful," from the Cantata "God so Loved the World." (With 'cello and piano accompaniment.) Chaconne, for violin. First and second parts of the Christmas Oratorio, for solos, chorus, orchestra and organ.

Esser's transcription of the great organ toccata was grandly played. Yet, in spite of the skill with which Esser has done his work, and the advantages which have been claimed for this orchestral arrangement over the original organ version, we cannot wholly like it. The advantages claimed are, greater clearness of effect for the polyphonic writing, and greater variety in dynamic shading and orchestral color. The first-named advantage seems to us purely imaginary; there is no earthly reason why a good organist should not make the toccata sound perfectly clear on a well-registered, full organ. As for the second advantage, we must own, heretical as it is to say so, that it seems to us no advantage at all, but wholly the reverse. To our ear all these crescendos and diminuendos, all these contrasts of clang-tint, sound simply impertinent. We far prefer to hear the toccata go on from beginning to end in the grand, unflagging roar of the full organ. These little modern coquetties interrupt the continuity of impression which the music should produce. Then what can the orchestra offer in exchange for the organ pedal, and for the grand, steadfast immobility of tone of the organ? Absolutely nothing that is adequate! Miss Juch (accompanied by Mr. Giese and Mr. Tucker) sang the aria "My heart ever faithful" in her freshest and most beautiful voice, with great finish of style and much expression. Yet we mistake greatly if she does not take this air wholly wrong. She sings it too slow, in too sentimental a spirit; one finds in her rendering none of that free, frank ebullition of artless joyfulness which characterizes the song. Bach was a man, like David, to "dance before the Lord;" Miss Juch gives the music a tinge of Puritan sanctimoniousness. Well, most others singers do. Mr. Loeffler played the chaconne (in its original shape, without accom-pariment, although it is by no means quite clear that Bach did not use an improvised harpsichord accompaniment with the violin and 'cello pieces he published as solos) utterly superbly. We have always felt that this talented young violinist would show himself at his best in the greatest music, and now he has proved it. The first two cantatas of the "Christmas Oratorio" were given with far finer effect than ever before in Boston. The orchestra showed that the Franz additional accompaniments are not only intrinsically and polyphonically fine, but that by intelligent and excellent playing they can be made to blend with the original parts in producing an admirable orchestral effect. The chorus (picked from the Handel and Haydn Society, the Cecilia and the Bach Club) sang grandly. This was the first time that Mr. Gericke has shown himself here as a choral conductor, and he is highly to be complimented upon the result he obtained. If there be one thing more difficult than conducting an orchestra, it is conducting a chorus. Orchestral players are professionals, and, for the most part, know their business; chorus singers are amateurs, and often know next to nothing. Of the solo singers we liked Miss Juch best; she sang, for the most part, excellently. Miss Winant sang the slumber song with much feeling and considerable good taste, albeit she still will fall into the contralto trick of forcing her low notes at times. Mr. W. J. Winch had the hard task, that almost all tenors find in Bach's music, of singing things that lie too high for his voice. In the recitatives he assumes a tone which we cannot find in harmony with the spirit of the music. One asks the question, When will our singers learn how to sing narrative recitative without trying to make it dramatic? Why cannot Mr. Winch, for instance, sing such a passage as this, "And this is the sign to you: Ye shall find a babe wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger," simply and directly, as the announcement of a fact, instead of throwing a whole Weltschmerz of sentimental bathos into the last line. Mr. Winch is not peculiar in this; most of our singers do the same sort of thing, only that Mr. Winch does it perhaps a little more intensely than they. Many of the recitatives in the "Christmas Oratorio" (a work of distinctly joyous character), were sung as if at a funeral, and by the chief mourners, too. One asks where all this superfluous melancholy comes from? Possibly it is a remnant of Puritan Calvinism which still taints our American blood. By the way, we have heard some curious criticisms on giving the "Christmas Oratorio" in Lent! What under the sun has Bach to do with Lent, or Lent with Bach?

274

The programme for the next concert (the last of the season) is—Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Chopin, Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor; Wagner, Siegfried-Idyll; Schubert, Symphony in C major. Miss Amy Marcy Cheney will be the pianist.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night showed plainly that however great Mr. Gericke is as a conductor of symphony, he is fully as thorough in leading choral works. He is evidently a great lover of Bach, as he has frequently shown during the past season, and he brought out the beauties of Robert Franz's new orchestration of Bach in a very secure and well-shaded manner. In giving two parts only from Bach's Christmas oratorio there was no violation of the intention of the composer, nor was the work at all mutilated thereby. It was originally intended by Bach that each of the six parts should be given on separate days, and therefore each division of the work is given a completeness in itself, both as regards style of composition, and relationship of key. The first part represents Bach in a mostly different character from that shown in the Passion music. All is triumphant and bold, and the passages for drums and weird instruments at the beginning sound very modern indeed. The old Aria form, however, which often appears in the work, is in the antique vein. It is a pity that this form interferes with a perfect enjoyment of the works of both Bach and Handel, for, given entire, there is too much repetition, and given with a close on the second part, an omission of the reprise (as is frequently done nowadays, even in the concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society) an important contrast is lost, and the composer's intention violated. In no part of music has the world changed so much as in this matter of repetitions. The last century composer loved them, the modern dislikes them cordially. The habit, which Bach had, of using a favorite melody in any of his works whether used elsewhere or not, was shown in this work by the chorale "How Shall I Fitly Praise Thee," which had been made prominent by the composer in the passion music, as "Commit Thy Ways, oh pilgrim" and had also been set to other words by him. Mr. Gericke deserves credit for shortening the repetitions mentioned above by which a judicious compromise was made between the old and the new style. He gave the reprise to each number, but never allowed the first part to reappear in its entirety.

The chorus did excellently. Of course it would be wrong to demand the steadiness of a Handel and Haydn society from a temporary chorus, but they came dangerously near it. The first number went with such boldness and spirit the chorals were shaded with superb effect, and the fearfully intricate "Glory to God" went surprisingly well, as also did the two chorals with orchestral interludes between each phrase in the old style. The pastoral symphony (as charming as that of Handel) went with the former precision, and the orchestra was, save in the first part, up to its high standard. Miss Juch sang with her commendable conscientiousness, never blurring a phrase or making a mistake. Her solo "My heart ever Faithful" was perfect. Miss Winant had the most effective solo in the oratorio—"Slumber Beloved," and sang its melodious measures with great sweetness. Mr. Winch was clear and powerful in his aria "Haste Ye Shepherds," but often too saccharine in his recitatives. Mr. Remmertz was a failure. His voice broke every time that he tried to sing E, and he seemed not to know his part, and spite of Mr. Tucker's timely hints from the piano, he often went astray in the recitatives.

Mr. Loeffler's performance of the terribly difficult Chaconne, deserves more eulogy than we have space to give it. It was a most masterly performance with not a slipped note or a flaw of intonation, and, since it was so excellent, we are glad that the Mendelssohn accompaniment was omitted, as it only obscures the power of the work.

The concert drew out the largest audience of the season, and many of the public were disappointed in not being able to obtain seats.

THE BACH BI-CENTENNIAL.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—"In commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the birthday of Johann Sebastian Bach," read the programme of the 23d symphony concert of the season, given Saturday evening, and these selections commemorated it:

Toccata (arranged for orchestra by H. Esser).
Aria. "My heart ever faithful," from the cantata, "God so loved the world." (With 'cello and piano accompaniment.)

Miss Emma Juch.
Chaconne for Violin. (Piano accompaniment by F. Mendelssohn.)

Mr. Loeffler.
First and Second Parts of the Christmas Oratorio.
Soloists: Miss Emily Winant, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. William J. Winch, Mr. Franz Remmertz.

A very large audience was called out by this announcement, all the available standing room on the floor and in the galleries being occupied, while very few seat-owners were absent. The Esser arrangement of a Toccata was fitly chosen to head the list of the evening's selections, for in introducing a programme consisting wholly of the works of Bach, the greater strength and fulness of instrumentation shown in the modernized Bach made a more fitting salutatory than anything that could have been drawn from the plain and thinly orchestrated scores of the master of two hundred years ago. The Toccata had a fine performance, though the adapter's reverence for the repeat makes its entire performance tedious, and the work as a whole suffers by it. It is so full and rich that at times its rhythmic force is even majestic. Many times is the full, strong power of the combined 'cellos and basses used in unison with startling effect. Its moments of greatest sonority and volume were heightened by Mr. Lang's judicious use of the organ. Miss Juch sang the beautiful aria, "My heart ever Faithful," with some disregard for its musical text and with a concert rather than an oratorio manner. The tempo taken was slow and in the large hall the 'cello and piano accompaniment was ineffective, though given beyond reproach by Mr. Giese and Mr. Tucker. Mr. Loeffler played the Chaconne. It was evident that the player was nerved to do his best, and within our recollection he has done nothing so well, and if he felt short of reaching an ideal interpretation, possible only with a Wilhelmj or a Joachim, he gave a reading which was reverent, earnest, and uplifting. The chief interest of the evening was in the Christmas Oratorio, parliament, although it is by no means quite clear that Bach did not use an improvised harpsichord accompaniment with the violin and 'cello pieces he published as solos) utterly superbly. We have always felt that this talented young violinist would show himself at his best in the greatest music, and now he has proved it. The first two cantatas of the "Christmas Oratorio" were given with far finer effect than ever before in Boston. The orchestra showed that the Franz additional accompaniments are not only intrinsically and polyphonically fine, but that by intelligent and excellent playing they can be made to blend with the original parts in producing an admirable orchestral effect. The chorus (picked from the Handel and Haydn Society, the Cecilia and the Bach Club) sang grandly. This was the first time that Mr. Gericke has shown himself here as a choral conductor, and he is highly to be complimented upon the result he obtained. If there be one thing more difficult than conducting an orchestra, it is conducting a chorus. Orchestral players are professionals, and, for the most part, know their business; chorus singers are amateurs, and often know next to nothing. Of the solo singers we liked Miss Juch best; she sang, for the most part, excellently. Miss Winant sang the slumber song with much feeling and considerable good taste, albeit she still will fall into the contralto trick of forcing her low notes at times. Mr. W. J. Winch had the hard task, that almost all tenors find in Bach's music, of singing things that lie too high for his voice. In the recitatives he assumes a tone which we cannot find in harmony with the spirit of the music. One asks the question, When will our singers learn how to sing narrative recitative without trying to make it dramatic? Why cannot Mr. Winch, for instance, sing such a passage as this, "And this is the sign to you: Ye shall find a babe wrapped in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger," simply and directly, as the announcement of a fact, instead of throwing a whole Weltschmerz of sentimental bathos into the last line. Mr. Winch is not peculiar in this; most of our singers do the same sort of thing, only that Mr. Winch does it perhaps a little more intensely than they. Many of the recitatives in the "Christmas Oratorio" (a work of distinctly joyous character), were sung as if at a funeral, and by the chief mourners, too. One asks where all this superfluous melancholy comes from? Possibly it is a remnant of Puritan Calvinism which still taints our American blood. By the way, we have heard some curious criticisms on giving the "Christmas Oratorio" in Lent! What under the sun has Bach to do with Lent, or Lent with Bach?

The programme for the next concert (the last of the season) is—Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Chopin, Concerto for Pianoforte in F minor; Wagner, Siegfried-Idyll; Schubert, Symphony in C major. Miss Amy Marcy Cheney will be the pianist.

MUSIC.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night showed plainly that however great Mr. Gericke is as a conductor of symphony, he is fully as thorough in leading choral works. He is evidently a great lover of Bach, as he has frequently shown during the past season, and he brought out the beauties of Robert Franz's new orchestration of Bach in a very secure and well-shaded manner. In giving two parts only from Bach's Christmas oratorio there was no violation of the intention of the composer, nor was the work at all mutilated thereby. It was originally intended by Bach that each of the six parts should be given on separate days, and therefore each division of the work is given a completeness in itself, both as regards style of composition, and relationship of key. The first part represents Bach in a mostly different character from that shown in the Passion music. All is triumphant and bold, and the passages for drums and weird instruments at the beginning sound very modern indeed. The old Aria form, however, which often appears in the work, is in the antique vein. It is a pity that this form interferes with a perfect enjoyment of the works of both Bach and Handel, for, given entire, there is too much repetition, and given with a close on the second part, an omission of the reprise (as is frequently done nowadays, even in the concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society) an important contrast is lost, and the composer's intention violated. In no part of music has the world changed so much as in this matter of repetitions. The last century composer loved them, the modern dislikes them cordially. The habit, which Bach had, of using a favorite melody in any of his works whether used elsewhere or not, was shown in this work by the chorale "How Shall I Fiftly Praise Thee," which had been made prominent by the composer in the passion music, as "Commit Thy Ways, oh pilgrim" and had also been set to other words by him. Mr. Gericke deserves credit for shortening the repetitions mentioned above by which a judicious compromise was made between the old and the new style. He gave the reprise to each number, but never allowed the first part to reappear in its entirety.

The chorus did excellently. Of course it would be wrong to demand the steadiness of a Handel and Haydn society from a temporary chorus, but they came dangerously near it. The first number went with such boldness and spirit the chorals were shaded with superb effect, and the fearfully intricate "Glory to God" went surprisingly well, as also did the two chorals with orchestral interludes between each phrase in the old style. The pastoral symphony (as charming as that of Handel) went with the former precision, and the orchestra was, save in the first part, up to its high standard. Miss Juch sang with her commendable conscientiousness, never blur-

ring a phrase or making a mistake. Her solo "My heart ever Faithful" was perfect. Miss Winant had the most effective solo in the oratorio—"Slumber Beloved," and sang its melodious measures with great sweetness. Mr. Winch was clear and powerful in his aria "Haste Ye Shepherds," but often too saccharine in his recitatives. Mr. Remmertz was a failure. His voice broke every time that he tried to sing E, and he seemed not to know his part, and spite of Mr. Tucker's timely hints from the piano, he often went astray in the recitatives.

Mr. Loeffler's performance of the terribly difficult Chaconne, deserves more eulogy than we have space to give it. It was a most masterly performance with not a slipped note or a flaw of intonation, and, since it was so excellent, we are glad that the Mendelssohn accompaniment was omitted, as it only obscures the power of the work.

The concert drew out the largest audience of the season, and many of the public were disappointed in not being able to obtain seats.

THE BACH BI-CENTENNIAL.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—In commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the birthday of Johann Sebastian Bach, read the programme of the 23d symphony concert of the season, given Saturday evening, and these selections commemorated it:

Toccata (arranged for orchestra by H. Esser).
Aria, "My heart ever faithful," from the cantata, "God so loved the world." (With 'cello and piano accompaniment.)
Miss Emma Juch.
Chaconne for Violin. (Piano accompaniment by I. Mendelssohn.)

Mr. Loeffler.
First and Second Parts of the Christmas Oratorio.
Soloists: Miss Emily Winant, Miss Emma Juch, Mr. William J. Winch, Mr. Franz Remmertz.

A very large audience was called out by this announcement, all the available standing room on the floor and in the galleries being occupied, while very few seat-owners were absent. The Esser arrangement of a Toccata was fitly chosen to head the list of the evening's selections, for in introducing a programme consisting wholly of the works of Bach, the greater strength and fulness of instrumentation shown in the modernized Bach made a more fitting salutatory than anything that could have been drawn from the plain and thinly orchestrated scores of the master of two hundred years ago. The Toccata had a fine performance, though the adapter's reverence for the repeat makes its entire performance tedious, and the work as a whole suffers by it. It is so full and rich that at times its rhythmic force is even majestic. Many times is the full, strong power of the combined 'cellos and basses used in unison with startling effect. Its moments of greatest sonority and volume were heightened by Mr. Lang's judicious use of the organ. Miss Juch sang the beautiful aria, "My heart ever Faithful," with some disregard for its musical text and with a concert rather than an oratorio manner. The tempo taken was slow and in the large hall the 'cello and piano accompaniment was ineffective, though given beyond reproach by Mr. Giese and Mr. Tucker. Mr. Loeffler played the Chaconne. It was evident that the player was nerved to do his best, and within our recollection he has done nothing so well, and if he felt short of reaching an ideal interpretation, possible only with a Wilhelmj or a Joachim, he gave a reading which was reverent, earnest, and uplifting. The chief interest of the evening was in the Christmas Oratorio, which constituted the second part of the programme. It was Mr. Gericke's first attempt with a chorus since coming among us, and his known abilities with choral bodies (for his work with the Gesellschaft of Vienna is no secret here) gave to this performance more than usual interest. No self-evident reason appears why he should have chosen Bach's Christmas Oratorio for his first work with chorus. It would have been no less appropriate to Easter tide to have chosen the Magnificat or certain of the Cantatas which we did not know, rather than something we have frequently heard under local conductors. Altogether, the fact that these selections from the Christmas Oratorio were well known to all of his singers before they came together under him, and that these singers were gathered together without much inquiry as to their individual capacity, causes a restriction of criticism on the event taken as a whole. But as new wine can come from old bottles, so Mr. Gericke did enough with his chorus (before whom at rehearsal he was at great disadvantage in not being able to express himself plainly in English) to justify the hope that another season he may have a strong band of choristers with whom to perfect many an important work for its place in the far-reaching plan of our Symphony concerts. The chorus work of the evening was very fine. Mr. Gericke's manner with them differs only in emphasis from that which is habitual with him when conducting; he has the most intense interest and concern for the forces under him; in every new lead is he at hand, a prompt and efficient leader; singers under him have an unerring guide, a reliance worthy their best attention. At this performance the attack was always sure; there was no wavering in any part and in the chorals the chorus sang with great expression. The superb opening chorus, "Christians be joyful" was grandly done, and in the "Glory to God" the florid work was, if not altogether clear, yet well outlined and certain. The orchestra played faultlessly, except a single slip among the woods. In the accompaniments of the alto song, "Slumber, beloved," and "Haste, ye shepherds," for tenor, its work was singularly sympathetic, while the Pastoral Symphony was made an almost reverent tribute. Excepting Mr. Winch none of the soloists showed possession of what may be called the traditions of oratorio singing. Miss Winant, always painstaking and earnest, is more nearly satisfactory, and her two arias were good examples of serious, high-minded work. The little Miss Juch had to do in the oratorio—a single recitative, but an important one—was not ineffectual, though it did not bear the stamp of much thought. Mr. Remmertz in the opening recitative which alternates with the soprano's in several detached phrases, sang false notes, and in the following aria showed an unfamiliarity with his music and a general heaviness which was the one sorry feature of the evening. He sang the remaining recitatives more carefully and with an improved enunciation of English, but this will hardly excuse the iniquity of his earlier proceeding. Mr. Winch sang the recitatives with all the excellences of taste and expression which have given him renown in Bach's music. In the aria, "Haste, ye shepherds," his voice met every demand upon it, and as we have before mentioned, his idea of how this music should be sung is both fitting and noble. Mr. Tucker played the accompaniment to the recitatives upon a pianoforte, and the work was well done. The season will close with next Saturday's concert. In place of the Choral Symphony of Beethoven usually given at the closing concert of a series by this orchestra, Schubert's symphony in C will be played. Other orchestral selections are the Euryanthe overture, and the Siegfried-Idyll. Miss Amy Marcy Cheney will be the soloist. She will play the Chopin concerto for pianoforte in F minor.

The Bach Bi-Centennial—Its Local Observance.

The "Ideals" Boston Season—Its Novelties.

German Opera and Opera in German—Notes.

Yesterday was the 200th anniversary of the birth of Johann Sebastian Bach, and celebrations in honor of that event were in order. There is probably no name in the entire musical world so worthy of homage as that of the great master, "to whom," in Schumann's words, "music owes almost as great a debt as religion owes its founder." A genius so great, magnificent and luxuriant that it needed the perspective of nearly four decades after his death to begin to be properly appreciated, Bach was taken at his full value neither by his contemporaries nor his immediate followers. His versatility and facility of creation were, it is true, apparent to them, but his majesty, his sublime grandeur, were to them as the brink of an overhanging precipice to persons who stand at its base and cannot see the top. But since the interest in his works that reawakened with the end of the 18th and beginning of the 19th centuries, and was nurtured by such master minds as Franz and Mendelssohn, their influence on modern tonalism has acquired a momentum that culminated in a hold which it seems nothing terrestrial can loosen, and which stands forth serene, grand and unconcerned amid the discordant strife and the clash of arms of contemporary factions. Not the least wonderful among the outcomes of Bach's sovereign power is the reverential allegiance evidenced by many composers of romantic tendencies to this exponent of a classic period. Gounod sits humbly at his feet, the iconoclastic Wagner respectfully worshipped at his shrine, and even the jocund Sullivan has drunk deeply at the pure spring of Bach's melody.

It was therefore meet that the day should be commemorated by public presentations of the master's works, and programmes specially prepared with that view were performed under the direction of Mr. B. J. Lang at Chickering Hall during the afternoon, by the Symphony orchestra, assisted by soloists and chorus under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke in the evening.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Bach Bi-Centennial Fifty Commemorated.

The commemorative programme in honor of the Bach bi-centennial, prepared by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, proved one of the most attractive of the season, judging from the immense audience in attendance at Music Hall last evening, and its presentation was very largely of a highly meritorious character. The most notable feature of the evening consisted of the portions of Bach's Christmas oratorio which have not been heard since the performance given them by the Handel and Haydn Society in 1877. The appearance of Mr. Gericke as a choral leader, for the first time on this occasion, gave the event additional importance, and not a little interest was shown in his direction of the body of singers who, to the number of about 300, have been studying the work under his baton during the last few weeks. No doubt Mr. Gericke's unfamiliarity with the vernacular has made his work with the chorus less satisfactory than it would have been otherwise, but it appeared difficult for the singers to understand his beat at times, and much unsteadiness was shown in many of the chorus numbers. The choral, "Break forth, oh beauteous heavenly light," was about the only number in which the chorus sang with entire confidence, and this number made a marked impression upon the audience. The soloists were Miss Emma Juch, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Franz Remmertz, a quartet well chosen for the work of the evening. Miss Juch's bright fresh tuneful voice gave the short solo of the angel, "Be not afraid," great prominence in the second part, and the limited opportunity given this artist could but be regretted. Miss Winant sang the contralto music with admirable taste and good effect, her presentation of the beautiful aria, "Slumber, beloved," making it one of the most enjoyable of the evening's selections. Mr. W. J. Winch had his best local opportunity since his return home in the tenor rôle, and the thoroughly artistic fashion in which his recitatives were delivered again proved his great value in this line of vocal effort. His singing of the aria, "Haste, ye shepherds," was also a very meritorious piece of work, and gained him well-deserved applause. Mr. Remmertz has seldom appeared to so little advantage as in the bass rôle of this work, his voice being apparently in poor condition, and his singing showing few evidences of a familiarity with his numbers. It goes without saying that the orchestral score of the oratorio was played in an almost faultless fashion, the gem of a pastoral which introduces the second part being especially notable in this portion of the evening's work. The interest in the programme of selections which preceded the oratorio was most largely in the presentation of the delightfully simple aria, "My heart ever faithful," from Bach's cantata, "God so loved the world," which was sung by Miss Juch to an accompaniment of piano and cello played by Messrs. Tucker and Giese. A toccata, arranged by H. Esser for orchestra, again proved the great technical abilities of the musicians led by Mr. Gericke, as an organization, though, aside from a study in orchestral work, such an arrangement can have little interest. Mr. Loeffler illustrated Bach's violin compositions by a skilful and artistic performance of a ciaccona for that instrument, and this made up the very characteristic list of selections chosen for the evening.

IN MEMORY OF BACH.

The Commemoration Concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra Series Last Night.

Every seat was occupied in Music Hall yesterday evening. Many were glad to find standing-room only at the commemoration of the 200th birthday of Johann Sebastian Bach, by the Boston Symphony orchestra directorship. It was the last concert but one of the season's series, under Gericke's charge, and this fact may have had something to do with the unusually large attendance; but of course the occasion was exceptionally interesting. Bach, and Bach only, found representation in the programme. The orchestra gave, at the outset, the toccata, as arranged by Esser. Then Miss Emma Juch sang the aria, "My Heart Ever Faithful," with cello accompaniment by Fritz Giese, and piano accompaniment by H. G. Tucker. With rare skill and much sympathetic expression, Mr. Loeffler interpreted the ciaccona for violin. The chief feature of the evening was the performance of the first and second parts of the Christmas oratorio. Mr. B. J. Lang was at his post in the organ loft, and Mr. Tucker was the pianist, and there was a chorus of 300 voices, which had evidently been well trained. The soloists were Miss Juch, Miss Winant, Mr. W. J. Winch and Mr. Franz Remmertz. The basso was not in his best condition vocally; Mr. Winch, however, sang excellently, and Miss Winant as well as Miss Juch were heard to advantage. The choruses and chorals could hardly have been given to better effect.

The final concert in the series, which Mr. Gericke has directed, on the whole, so well, is to be given next Saturday night. Miss Amy Marcy Cheney, the brilliant young artiste, will perform Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in F minor. The orchestral selections include Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and Schubert's symphony in C major.

Music.

Home Journal
TWENTY-THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.—It is pleasant to think that the tribute paid the memory of John Sebastian Bach last Saturday was well-nigh universal, extending as it did throughout the leading cities of Germany, France, England and America, and taking the form of a performance of his works. It is not easy to estimate Bach's value to the world, for the claim in his behalf, is at least plausible, that he not only created great works, but that he also inspired most of them. Some will regard the acknowledgment as extravagant, yet it cannot be forgotten that were we to take out of modern music all that owes its existence to the influence of Bach, there would remain a fragmentary mass that would barely hint at its former glory. Never did a composer live whose life was so pure and noble as Bach's, nor whose dedication to his works was so complete in the pursuit and crea-

which constituted the second part of the programme. It was Mr. Gericke's first attempt with a chorus since coming among us, and his known abilities with choral bodies (for his work with the Gesellschaft of Vienna is no secret here) gave to this performance more than usual interest. No self-evident reason appears why he should have chosen Bach's Christmas Oratorio for his first work with chorus. It would have been no less appropriate to Easter tide to have chosen the Magnificat or certain of the Cantatas which we did not know, rather than something we have frequently heard under local conductors. Altogether, the fact that these selections from the Christmas Oratorio were well known to all of his singers before they came together under him, and that these singers were gathered together without much inquiry as to their individual capacity, causes a restriction of criticism on the event taken as a whole. But as new wine can come from old bottles, so Mr. Gericke did enough with his chorus (before whom at rehearsal he was at great disadvantage in not being able to express himself plainly in English) to justify the hope that another season he may have a strong band of choristers with whom to perfect many an important work for its place in the far-reaching plan of our Symphony concerts. The chorus work of the evening was very fine. Mr. Gericke's manner with them differs only in emphasis from that which is habitual with him when conducting; he has the most intense interest and concern for the forces under him; in every new lead is he at hand, a prompt and efficient leader; singers under him have an unerring guide, a reliance worthy their best attention. At this performance the attack was always sure; there was no wavering in any part and in the chorals the chorus sang with great expression. The superb opening chorus, "Christians be joyful" was grandly done, and in the "Glory to God" the florid work was, if not altogether clear, yet well outlined and certain. The orchestra played faultlessly, except a single slip among the woods. In the accompaniments of the alto song, "Slumber, beloved," and "Haste, ye shepherds," for tenor, its work was singularly sympathetic, while the Pastoral Symphony was made an almost reverent tribute. Excepting Mr. Winch none of the soloists showed possession of what may be called the traditions of oratorio singing. Miss Winant, always painstaking and earnest, is more nearly satisfactory, and her two arias were good examples of serious, high-minded work. The little Miss Juch had to do in the oratorio—a single recitative, but an important one—was not ineffectual, though it did not bear the stamp of much thought. Mr. Remmertz in the opening recitative which alternates with the soprano's in several detached phrases, sang false notes, and in the following aria showed an unfamiliarity with his music and a general heaviness which was the one sorry feature of the evening. He sang the remaining recitatives more carefully and with an improved enunciation of English, but this will hardly excuse the iniquity of his earlier proceeding. Mr. Winch sang the recitatives with all the excellences of taste and expression which have given him renown in Bach's music. In the aria, "Haste, ye shepherds," his voice met every demand upon it, and as we have before mentioned, his idea of how this music should be sung is both fitting and noble. Mr. Tucker played the accompaniment to the recitatives upon a pianoforte, and the work was well done. The season will close with next Saturday's concert. In place of the Choral Symphony of Beethoven usually given at the closing concert of a series by this orchestra, Schubert's symphony in C will be played. Other orchestral selections are the Euryanthe overture, and the Siegfried-Idyll. Miss Amy Marcy Cheney will be the soloist. She will play the Chopin concerto for pianoforte in F minor.

The Bach Bi-Centennial—Its Local Observance.

The "Ideals" Boston Season—Its Novelties.

German Opera and Opera in German—Notes.

Yesterday was the 200th anniversary of the birth of Johann Sebastian Bach, and celebrations in honor of that event were in order. There is probably no name in the entire musical world so worthy of homage as that of the great master, "to whom," in Schumann's words, "music owes almost as great a debt as religion owes its founder." A genius so great, magnificent and luxuriant that it needed the perspective of nearly four decades after his death to begin to be properly appreciated, Bach was taken at his full value neither by his contemporaries nor his immediate followers. His versatility and facility of creation were, it is true, apparent to them, but his majesty, his sublime grandeur, were to them as the brink of an overhanging precipice to persons who stand at its base and cannot see the top. But since the interest in his works that reawakened with the end of the 18th and beginning of the 19th centuries, and was nurtured by such master minds as Franz and Mendelssohn, their influence on modern tonalism has acquired a momentum that culminated in a hold which it seems nothing terrestrial can loosen, and which stands forth serene, grand and unconcerned amid the discordant strife and the clash of arms of contemporary factions. Not the least wonderful among the outcomes of Bach's sovereign power is the reverential allegiance evidenced by many composers of romantic tendencies to this exponent of a classic period. Gounod sits humbly at his feet, the iconoclastic Wagner respectfully worshipped at his shrine, and even the jocund Sullivan has drunk deeply at the pure spring of Bach's melody.

It was therefore meet that the day should be commemorated by public presentations of the master's works, and programmes specially prepared with that view were performed under the direction of Mr. B. J. Lang at Chickering Hall during the afternoon, by the Symphony orchestra, assisted by soloists and chorus under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke in the evening.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Bach Bi-Centennial Fifty Commemorated.

The commemorative programme in honor of the Bach bi-centennial, prepared by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, proved one of the most attractive of the season, judging from the immense audience in attendance at Music Hall last evening, and its presentation was very largely of a highly meritorious character. The most notable feature of the evening consisted of the portions of Bach's Christmas oratorio which have not been heard since the performance given them by the Handel and Haydn Society in 1877. The appearance of Mr. Gericke as a choral leader, for the first time on this occasion, gave the event additional importance, and not a little interest was shown in his direction of the body of singers who, to the number of about 300, have been studying the work under his baton during the last few weeks. No doubt Mr. Gericke's unfamiliarity with the vernacular has made his work with the chorus less satisfactory than it would have been otherwise, but it appeared difficult for the singers to understand his beat at times, and much unsteadiness was shown in many of the chorus numbers. The choral, "Break forth, oh beautiful heavenly light," was about the only number in which the chorus sang with entire confidence, and this number made a marked impression upon the audience. The soloists were Miss Emma Juch, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Franz Remmertz, a quartet well chosen for the work of the evening. Miss Juch's bright fresh tuneful voice gave the short solo of the angel, "Be not afraid," great prominence in the second part, and the limited opportunity given this artist could but be regretted. Miss Winant sang the contralto music with admirable taste and good effect, her presentation of the beautiful aria, "Slumber, beloved," making it one of the most enjoyable of the evening's selections. Mr. W. J. Winch had his best local opportunity since his return home in the tenor rôle, and the thoroughly artistic fashion in which his recitatives were delivered again proved his great value in this line of vocal effort. His singing of the aria, "Haste, ye shepherds," was also a very meritorious piece of work, and gained him well-deserved applause. Mr. Remmertz has seldom appeared to so little advantage as in the bass rôle of this work, his voice being apparently in poor condition, and his singing showing few evidences of a familiarity with his numbers. It goes without saying that the orchestral score of the oratorio was played in an almost faultless fashion, the gem of a pastoral which introduces the second part being especially notable in this portion of the evening's work. The interest in the programme of selections which preceded the oratorio was most largely in the presentation of the delightfully simple aria, "My heart ever faithful," from Bach's cantata, "God so loved the world," which was sung by Miss Juch to an accompaniment of piano and cello played by Messrs. Tucker and Giese. A toccata, arranged by H. Esser for orchestra, again proved the great technical abilities of the musicians led by Mr. Gericke, as an organization, though, aside from a study in orchestral work, such an arrangement can have little interest. Mr. Loeffler illustrated Bach's violin compositions by a skilful and artistic performance of a clacanna for that instrument, and this made up the very characteristic list of selections chosen for the evening.

IN MEMORY OF BACH.

The Commemoration Concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra Series Last Night.

Every seat was occupied in Music Hall yesterday evening. Many were glad to find standing-room only at the commemoration of the 200th birthday of Johann Sebastian Bach, by the Boston Symphony orchestra directorship. It was the last concert but one of the season's series, under Gericke's charge, and this fact may have had something to do with the unusually large attendance; but of course the occasion was exceptionally interesting. Bach, and Bach only, found representation in the programme. The orchestra gave, at the outset, the toccata, as arranged by Esser. Then Miss Emma Juch sang the aria, "My Heart Ever Faithful," with cello accompaniment by Fritz Giese, and piano accompaniment by H. G. Tucker. With rare skill and much sympathetic expression, Mr. Loeffler interpreted the clacanna for violin. The chief feature of the evening was the performance of the first and second parts of the Christmas oratorio. Mr. B. J. Lang was at his post in the organ loft, and Mr. Tucker was the pianist, and there was a chorus of 300 voices, which had evidently been well trained. The soloists were Miss Juch, Miss Winant, Mr. W. J. Winch and Mr. Franz Remmertz. The basso was not in his best condition vocally; Mr. Winch, however, sang excellently, and Miss Winant as well as Miss Juch were heard to advantage. The choruses and chorals could hardly have been given to better effect.

The final concert in the series, which Mr. Gericke has directed, on the whole, so well, is to be given next Saturday night. Miss Amy Marcy Cheney, the brilliant young artiste, will perform Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in F minor. The orchestral selections include Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and Schubert's symphony in C major.

Music.

Home Journal

TWENTY-THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.—It is pleasant to think that the tribute paid the memory of John Sebastian Bach last Saturday was well-nigh universal, extending as it did throughout the leading cities of Germany, France, England and America, and taking the form of a performance of his works. It is not easy to estimate Bach's value to the world, for the claim in his behalf, is at least plausible, that he not only created great works, but that he also inspired most of them. Some will regard the acknowledgment as extravagant, yet it cannot be forgotten that were we to take out of modern music all that owes its existence to the influence of Bach, there would remain a fragmentary mass that would barely hint at its former glory. Never did a composer live whose life was so pure and noble as Bach's, nor whose dedication to his works was so complete in the pursuit and creation of art, and this of the highest and most chaste type. He was not the mere scholastic and purest that flippant musical opinion has frequently accredited him with being, but in all the counterpoint and polyphony are interlocked to a rare degree the dramatic, epic and lyric element which Beethoven and Wagner were enabled to develop with more force and effect simply because of their devotion to the scholarship of Bach. Think of the great Toccata that opened the concert on Saturday evening. Is there any work composed previous to Beethoven's time that sounds more modern, that so smacks of the whole-heartedness of genius, that is of such plastic clearness and harmonic fullness? And how noble, rich and full, how superior in this respect to all compositions for the violin, was the Ciaconna that Mr. Loeffler played; how inexhaustible indeed in anticipating all modern violin effects. Following as it did that tender, sweet, heartfelt and pious old melody, "My heart ever faithful," more convincing testimony could not have been offered of the versatility of Bach's genius. A crowded and enthusiastic assemblage attended the concert, yet a deeper and more significant recognition of the master's genius, and of the bi-centenary of his birth was in the enthusiasm of the performers, the vocal ensemble in their praiseworthy success with the choruses of "My heart ever faithful," and the orchestra throughout the concert; the strings telling with more sonorousness and precision than ever before, and what has seemed a lingering chronic infirmity on the part of the wind instruments disappearing in a good healthy pitch and just intonation. "The Christmas Oratorio" would have seemed more appropriate if it had not been given during the Lenten season, and at an expense of ignoring selections from the "Passion music," not to mention the great Mass in B minor. The oratorio was written for a special occasion, as was the case with many works of its time which have only enjoyed an ephemeral existence. Bach has written more elaborately than in the Christmas Oratorio, yet with no more evidence of his sincere devotion to a cause from which he, like Handel, derived some of his noblest inspirations. The charm of the work is in the wonderfully beautiful harmonization of its many chorales, the canti firmi of which Bach has ornamented with some of the smoothest and most singable devices of counterpoint that can anywhere be named. Not only Herr Gericke, but the orchestra and chorus, seemed to feel the influence of the anniversary, and the performance, so far as chorus and orchestra were concerned, left nothing to be desired. Of the soloists it is impossible to speak in such complimentary terms. Herr Remmertz's performance was notably weak and discreditable. It is a cause for regret that the artist should have been so unmindful of his former success here, not to mention his deserved reputation, as to sing with an utter disregard for the spirit of his lines and with an inaccuracy and nonchalance which rendered none the less conspicuous the inefficacy of the powerful remedies he must have taken for his severe cold. In short, the performance was suspiciously uncharacteristic of the artist's capabilities, and his stage demeanor corresponded. Mr. Winch's interpretation was notably refined and artistic, but his vocal effort was more or less disagreeable in its effect. Miss Winant sang with heartfelt zeal and simplicity of expression, notwithstanding she competed at a disadvantage with the cheaper and more external qualities displayed so conspicuously by Miss Juch, and which so invariably catch but do not edify the crowd. One of the most gratifying and artistic events of the concert was Mr. Loeffler's performance of the Ciaconna for violin. It was a wonderfully smooth, even, clear and accurate delivery of one of the most difficult compositions ever written for the instrument, and elicited, as it deserved, the hearty enthusiasm of the audience. Mr. Tucker and Mr. Giese played the accompaniments for Miss Juch, and Mr. B. J. Lang presided at the organ.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1884-85.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

XXIV. CONCERT.

(THE LAST OF THE FOURTH SEASON.)

SATURDAY, MARCH 28TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

C. M. v. WEBER,

OVERTURE, (Euryanthe.)

F. CHOPIN,

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE in F minor. op. 21.
Maestoso.—Larghetto.—Allegro vivace.—

RICH. WAGNER,

SIEGFRIED-IDYLL.

FR. SCHUBERT,

SYMPHONY in C major.
Andante; Allegro ma non troppo.—Andante con moto.—
Scherzo (Allegro vivace).—Finale (Allegro vivace).—

SOLOIST:

MISS AMY MARCY CHENEY.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

TWENTY-FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT. adv.

Where in this country could there be found a pianist capable of performing Chopin's great F minor concerto, op. 21, better than Miss Amy Marcy Cheney, who played it at the last of the present series of symphony concerts, on Saturday evening,—except her master and counsellor, Professor Baermann? She is still but a girl, not yet entered even into young womanhood, and it would be foolish to pretend that there are not artists who can surpass her in some element of force or fire, of dash or of endurance; but there is none, so far as we know (still with the exception already made), who can unite so many of the requisites for a true rendering of the best literature of the piano. Within even a few months her technique has acquired that inexplicable something which distinguishes the artist from the accomplished amateur, from the proficient student, and from even the virtuoso, while her spirit has grown in perception and sympathy and emotional resource. She has now almost in full that command of the instrument which is so remarkable in Professor Baermann, which artfully brings out all the reserved power of the strings, but stops just short of their harsh protest upon being forced, and which can yet touch them so delicately that, with a shade less pressure, their airy sounds would cease to be audible. Thus there were passages, on Saturday evening the fulness of which was completely equal to the volume of the noble Chickering and others, of a fineness which not Joseffy, with all his devices of a specially adjusted action, could excel. But this excellence of mechanism and touch, so nearly approaching perfection, was not so gratifying as the evidence given by every page of a definite understanding of the rhetorical form, the purpose, the meaning and the sentiment of the author; the correct apprehension of the relations between pianoforte and orchestra, and between the phrases essential to the thought and those which are only its adjuncts and ornaments. For tenderness of mood, never sinking into the vagueness of rhapsody, and never chilled by too precise statement, the larghetto was preëminent, and ought to be memorable as a standard of comparison hereafter. The change of temperament when the final allegro succeeds, with its sympathetic suggestion of its author's grander waltzes, was exactly indicated from the very first phrase; and as the opening maestoso had also entered in its own dignity and firmness, the presentation of the concerto might not unreasonably be considered as complete, both in respect of its technical exterior and its poetic interior qualities.

The purely orchestral works were only two, the "Siegfried Idyll" of Wagner, played at the rehearsal, having been withdrawn from the programme, which was even then somewhat longer than usual. These works were Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and Schubert's grand C major symphony, and both were magnificently played, conductor and musicians seeming to vie with each other in making every fancy of the authors clear and their every feeling influential. The mysterious pianissimo in the middle of the overture and the crescendo which grows out of the solo entrance of the double basses, were remarkably fine points; and so in the symphony were the very opening, the transition between the two tempi, the cross accents and the prominent phrases of the brasses in the first movement, and in the second the solo work of the oboe, and the swell and crash which precede the sudden silence of an instant after which the violoncello enters so peacefully.

The audience was very large and there was a great deal of warm feeling shown for all the participants in the performance. Mr. Gericke was enthusiastically received and several times called forward at the end of the concert, the public being evidently desirous that he should thoroughly understand the satisfaction with which they had read the announcement of the programme that the next series of concerts would begin on Saturday, October 17, and that he would be the conductor.

THE MUSIC HALL. adv.

The danger which has been threatening the Music Hall for more than a year, and which it recently seemed impossible to conjure away, has been averted. The directors, after a further canvass of all their plans, projects and possibilities, have decided not to make the proposed conversion of the building into a theatre, until at least one season more shall have shown what can be done to make the property reasonably remunerative. This decision will give satisfaction to more lovers of music than even the extended Boston circle includes, and if judicious management and proper coöperation can confirm it, there will spring from it such encouragement as will help other cities to the possession of real music halls.

The arguments in favor of the devised alterations, drawn from the facts that in other cities orchestral and choral concerts are given to apparent public and professional content in theatres, with the performers placed upon the stage in a "boxed scene," amount to nothing in reality, for those cities have no other rooms, and they have no means of knowing how much is lost of the effect due to music and audience. But in London, where something is known of all kinds of music, given in many ways, there is a growing demand for just such an auditorium as Boston Music Hall, only of somewhat larger size, as suits a public which has outgrown St. James's Hall, but is not content to wander in the Covent Garden Floral Hall, except when promenade concerts are in season, nor to be engulfed in the Royal 284 - Albert Hall, unless when some festival occasion collects a huge body of performers and a multitude of auditors.

In our resistance to the virtual demolition of the Music Hall, we have never meant to ignore the fact that it is private property, and that its owners cannot be expected to stand in relation to it as Mr. Higginson does to the Symphony Orchestra,—ready to meet a personal loss for a public good. But it certainly seems as if a conciliatory and elastic spirit in dealing with the public might considerably increase the revenues of the house during the regular season, and that some scheme of cheap, decent, pleasant and popular use of the building for the summer season might also be arranged. Perhaps, as has been suggested by a Sunday paper, some system of inexpensive promenade concerts might be adopted, a little pains being taken to give all the freedom possible to fresh air, and the sale of such simple refreshments as are allowed at fairs being permitted on the premises, so that people would not be provoked to go out in search of the beer which, our contemporary says, is easily to be had in the immediate neighborhood.

But be this as it may, whoever has occasion to use a large hall for any desirable purpose ought now to give this building his fair consideration, and so help to keep it for the credit of the city, the comfort of art and the advantage of its owners. And, by way of further inducement, perhaps the directors may find it in their hearts to spend a little money on the becoming completion of the stage end of the building, which is now so unpleasant a sight.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON, adv.

The twenty-four concerts, making up the fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have all been given, and some words of retrospect and suggestion may now appropriately be spoken, since not even the most captious can object to them as embarrassing either the management or the conductor. And, at the outset, let us once more repeat our sense of the obligation which is due from the community to "the founder of the feast" which is spread out weekly during nearly half the year, and our recognition of the intrinsic merit of the programmes, considered as a series, as well as of the faithful, artistic work of the players, and the absolutely triumphant success of the conductor, who came here a stranger, to face the positively unknown, ignorant of the language and tastes, the acquirements and the expectations of the public, and certain to meet opposition and difficulty in adapting to his views of interpretation and discipline a body of players many of whom have a high estimate of their own value and a strong American sense of personal independence. It is no matter for wonder that the critic from without, and the musician from within, should have sometimes differed from him; the only wonder is that this should have happened so seldom and that the questions involved should have been so slight.

With any disagreement between Mr. Gericke and some member of his orchestra, neither critic nor public has anything to do, even though that involve on occasion the retirement of a good player. A position in the Boston Orchestra is now something to be proud of, even if the man who holds it sits at the last desk of all, out of the sight of the audience; and it is worth keeping for its remuneration also. Suppose that the discipline be unusually exact for this country, the end and the credit to be attained justify it; while, on the other hand, it is to the conductor's advantage to keep always by him men who play well and who have learned to understand him. It is therefore reasonable to conclude that the error is not all on one side when a withdrawal or dismissal occurs, and that the general good gains thereby.

The only important question, then, now that the competency of conductor and orchestra for the very best work is unreservedly conceded, is whether the choice of music which has obtained during the present season ought to continue unqualified during the next. Our view is that it should not, but should be so modified as to represent the whole musical field, not according to any partial prejudice, but according to such a system as corresponds fairly to the average attitude taken by the great European concert givers, excluding, of course, the professedly popular programmes, on the one hand, and the professedly classical on the other. Let us say frankly that, in reviewing these twenty-four programmes, we can find nothing, with the exception of two or three injudicious arrangements of chamber music, which does not intrinsically deserve a place, and which we have not heard with pleasure. We are the last who would urge or desire—although some hasty readers have misunderstood us on this point—the omission from the Music Hall programmes of the eternal masters of composition, in order that the scarcely tried men of today may take their places. But we do insist that a place might be found on every programme for something which shall show Bostonians, as Europeans are constantly shown, what these men of the time are doing, that Boston may judge whether they are, or are to be, great. If Gambati or MacKenzie or Saint Saëns writes a new work of importance, it is not necessary to exclude Beethoven or Mozart for him, but a Boccherini minuet, an often heard dance of Berlioz or Weber or Brahms, or a small overture of Schubert or Schumann might profitably be omitted to let at least a characteristic movement from such a work be heard. Mere numerical statements are worth little in matters of art; but that only about a dozen new things have been performed during the season, of which several were only arrangements and some were selected by soloists, is certainly food for thought.

Yet a word more as to the solo numbers. These, regarded as a whole, have probably given less satisfaction than any other feature of the programmes, to which they have often brought only an apparent variety. It may be assumed that in fundamentally orchestral concerts the solos should offer strong contrast and give refreshing relief. The violin concertos, while they give fine advantages to single members of the orchestra, bring but little change in tone color; that the principal part passes from a mass of leading strings to a single instrument, is the main thing that can be said, as far as effect goes. There is not much suitable music for wind instruments or harp, and the pianist is therefore left almost alone as a solo player. But he is still an instrumentalist, and we are of opinion that the greater portion of the solo music should be vocal. The concerts can command the attendance of the best singers in the country, and no effort to engage these should be spared. The management should not be satisfied with merely good vocalists and common chamber songs, but should insist that singers and music should be equal in their way to the band and its repertory. Then the solo numbers would have a dignity and value of their own and would supply an inspiring variety to each evening's programme. adv: apr. 85

MUSIC NOTES.

Jones, after listening to the Idylle of Siegfried last night, said it would have been better boiled. It is rather tough.

Herr Gericke, the leader of the Symphony Orchestra, thinks he is progressing in his acquirement of the English language. He now knows fifty words, and intends to be master of conversation before the end of the summer.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, MARCH 30, 1885.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-fourth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Weber.....Overture to "Euryanthe"
Chopin.....Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, op. 21
Schubert.....Symphony in C major, No. 9
Miss Amy Marcy Cheney was the pianist.

The orchestra rushed upon the opening phrases of the "Euryanthe" overture with an impetuosity that carried everything before it. Such a furious attack might well have made the listener giddy, had not the players, in spite of the whirling rapidity of the tempo, kept their head and heels remarkably well, so that not an accent nor an effect of light and shade was lost. One only wondered what would become of the fugato passage near the middle of the overture if this break-neck pace was to be kept up. But all fears on this score were soon quieted, for after the muted violins had got through their wonderful pianissimo episode, the basses announced the fugued subject with all due moderation, and the original lightning tempo came back only at the return of the first theme. The performance was electric in its effectiveness, only it may be doubted whether the extremely rapid tempo were really worth while. With all its brilliancy it seemed a little trivial and circus-like. The great Schubert symphony was grandly given. Mr. Gericke made just the right omission of repeats. This symphony is too long for mortal endurance if all the repeats are made (especially as the instrumentation, although brilliant in color, is somewhat monotonous); but the repeat in the first movement never ought to be omitted, such an omission being a direct blow at the symphonic form itself. Mr. Gericke did not fall into this error in his aiming at all possible brevity. That the work is a severe tax upon an orchestra need hardly be said; it might be called the wind-instrument symphony par excellence. Although the writing for the strings is exceedingly brilliant and quite unique in style (some of the string effects being distinctively characteristic of the composition), the strings form, for the most part, little more than a sparkling setting for the wind instruments which carry the main burden of the melodic material of the work. The general character of the instrumentation is quite Italian in this respect, only that it shows the hand of a man who refused to have to do with vulgarity. In no performance of the symphony here have we heard the wind players bear themselves so well. The brass was duly vigorous without being over-prominent (remember that the three trombones are in unison in many of the strong passages), and the phrasing of the flutes and reeds was in general very artistic. One felt that the players did not take breath merely to suit their own convenience, but that they had a proper regard for the flow of the phrase. One could have wished a little more sharply biting acclaccatura on the

284 -
Albert Hall, unless when some festival occasion collects a huge body of performers and a multitude of auditors.

In our resistance to the virtual demolition of the Music Hall, we have never meant to ignore the fact that it is private property, and that its owners cannot be expected to stand in relation to it as Mr. Higginson does to the Symphony Orchestra, — ready to meet a personal loss for a public good. But it certainly seems as if a conciliatory and elastic spirit in dealing with the public might considerably increase the revenues of the house during the regular season, and that some scheme of cheap, decent, pleasant and popular use of the building for the summer season might also be arranged. Perhaps, as has been suggested by a Sunday paper, some system of inexpensive promenade concerts might be adopted, a little pains being taken to give all the freedom possible to fresh air, and the sale of such simple refreshments as are allowed at fairs being permitted on the premises, so that people would not be provoked to go out in search of the beer which, our contemporary says, is easily to be had in the immediate neighborhood.

But be this as it may, whoever has occasion to use a large hall for any desirable purpose ought now to give this building his fair consideration, and so help to keep it for the credit of the city, the comfort of art and the advantage of its owners. And, by way of further inducement, perhaps the directors may find it in their hearts to spend a little money on the becoming completion of the stage end of the building, which is now so unpleasant a sight.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON, adv.

The twenty-four concerts, making up the fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have all been given, and some words of retrospect and suggestion may now appropriately be spoken, since not even the most captious can object to them as embarrassing either the management or the conductor. And, at the outset, let us once more repeat our sense of the obligation which is due from the community to "the founder of the feast" which is spread out weekly during nearly half the year, and our recognition of the intrinsic merit of the programmes, considered as a series, as well as of the faithful, artistic work of the players, and the absolutely triumphant success of the conductor, who came here a stranger, to face the positively unknown, ignorant of the language and tastes, the acquirements and the expectations of the public, and certain to meet opposition and difficulty in adapting to his views of interpretation and discipline a body of players many of whom have a high estimate of their own value and a strong American sense of personal independence. It is no matter for wonder that the critic from without, and the musician from within, should have sometimes differed from him; the only wonder is that this should have happened so seldom and that the questions involved should have been so slight.

With any disagreement between Mr. Gericke and some member of his orchestra, neither critic nor public has anything to do, even though that involve on occasion the retirement of a good player. A position in the Boston Orchestra is now something to be proud of, even if the man who holds it sits at the last desk of all, out of the sight of the audience; and it is worth keeping for its remuneration also. Suppose that the discipline be unusually exact for this country, the end and the credit to be attained justify it; while, on the other hand, it is to the conductor's advantage to keep always by him men who play well and who have learned to understand him. It is therefore reasonable to conclude that the error is not all on one side when a withdrawal or dismissal occurs, and that the general good gains thereby.

The only important question, then, now that the competency of conductor and orchestra for the very best work is unreservedly conceded, is whether the choice of music which has obtained during the present season ought to continue unqualified during the next. Our view is that it should not, but should be so modified as to represent the whole musical field, not according to any partial prejudice, but according to such a system as corresponds fairly to the average attitude taken by the great European concert givers, excluding, of course, the professedly popular programmes, on the one hand, and the professedly classical on the other. Let us say frankly that, in reviewing these twenty-four programmes, we can find nothing, with the exception of two or three injudicious arrangements of chamber music, which does not intrinsically deserve a place, and which we have not heard with pleasure. We are the last who would urge or desire — although some hasty readers have misunderstood us on this point — the omission from the Music Hall programmes of the eternal masters of composition, in order that the scarcely tried men of today may take their places. But we do insist that a place might be found on every programme for something which shall show Bostonians, as Europeans are constantly shown, what these men of the time are doing, that Boston may judge whether they are, or are to be, great. If Scambati or MacKenzie or Saint Saëns writes a new work of importance, it is not necessary to exclude Beethoven or Mozart for him, but a Boccherini minuet, an often heard dance of Berlioz or Weber or Brahms, or a small overture of Schubert or Schumann might profitably be omitted to let at least a characteristic movement from such a work be heard. Mere numerical statements are worth little in matters of art; but that only about a dozen new things have been performed during the season, of which several were only arrangements and some were selected by soloists, is certainly food for thought.

Yet a word more as to the solo numbers. These, regarded as a whole, have probably given less satisfaction than any other feature of the programmes, to which they have often brought only an apparent variety. It may be assumed that in fundamentally orchestral concerts the solos should offer strong contrast and give refreshing relief. The violin concertos, while they give fine advantages to single members of the orchestra, bring but little change in tone color; that the principal part passes from a mass of leading strings to a single instrument, is the main thing that can be said, as far as effect goes. There is not much suitable music for wind instruments or harp, and the pianist is therefore left almost alone as a solo player. But he is still an instrumentalist, and we are of opinion that the greater portion of the solo music should be vocal. The concerts can command the attendance of the best singers in the country, and no effort to engage these should be spared. The management should not be satisfied with merely good vocalists and common chamber songs, but should insist that singers and music should be equal in their way to the band and its repertory. Then the solo numbers would have a dignity and value of their own and would supply an inspiring variety to each evening's programme. adv: apr. 85

MUSIC NOTES.

Jones, after listening to the Idylle of Siegfried last night, said it would have been better boiled. It is rather tough.

Herr Gericke, the leader of the Symphony Orchestra, thinks he is progressing in his acquirement of the English language. He now knows fifty words, and intends to be master of conversation before the end of the summer.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, MARCH 30, 1885.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the twenty-fourth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was —

Weber.....Overture to "Euryanthe"
Chopin.....Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, op. 21
Schubert.....Symphony in C major, No. 9
Miss Amy Marey Cheney was the pianist.

The orchestra rushed upon the opening phrases of the "Euryanthe" overture with an impetuosity that carried everything before it. Such a furious attack might well have made the listener giddy, had not the players, in spite of the whirling rapidity of the tempo, kept their head and heels remarkably well, so that not an accent nor an effect of light and shade was lost. One only wondered what would become of the fugato passage near the middle of the overture if this break-neck pace was to be kept up. But all fears on this score were soon quieted, for after the muted violins had got through their wonderful pianissimo episode, the basses announced the fugged subject with all due moderation, and the original lightning tempo came back only at the return of the first theme. The performance was electric in its effectiveness, only it may be doubted whether the extremely rapid tempo were really worth while. With all its brilliancy it seemed a little trivial and circus-like. The great Schubert symphony was grandly given. Mr. Gericke made just the right omission of repeats. This symphony is too long for mortal endurance if all the repeats are made (especially as the instrumentation, although brilliant in color, is somewhat monotonous); but the repeat in the first movement never ought to be omitted, such an omission being a direct blow at the symphonic form itself. Mr. Gericke did not fall into this error in his aiming at all possible brevity. That the work is a severe tax upon an orchestra need hardly be said; it might be called the wind-instrument symphony par excellence. Although the writing for the strings is exceedingly brilliant and quite unique in style (some of the string effects being distinctively characteristic of the composition), the strings form, for the most part, little more than a sparkling setting for the wind instruments which carry the main burden of the melodic material of the work. The general character of the instrumentation is quite Italian in this respect, only that it shows the hand of a man who refused to have to do with vulgarity. In no performance of the symphony here have we heard the wind players bear themselves so well. The brass was duly vigorous without being over-prominent (remember that the three trombones are in unison in many of the strong passages), and the phrasing of the flutes and reeds was in general very artistic. One felt that the players did not take breath merely to suit their own convenience, but that they had a proper regard for the flow of the phrase. One could have wished a little more sharply biting acciacatura on the principal theme of the second movement, but this is a matter of a certain technical difficulty. The strings were not behindhand in giving life, vivacity and strength to their several parts; upon the whole it was a grand performance of a noble work, and closed the symphony season in a blaze of glory. Of Miss Cheney's playing of the Chopin concerto one could say much. It was a performance to inspire not only sincere and warm admiration, but also respect. It is so easy to go wrong in playing Chopin! His works present so many dangerous pitfalls to inartistic stupidity, and virtuoso pretentiousness! Miss Cheney, possibly because she is neither stupid nor pretentious, avoided them all. This is no mean praise, to begin with, but the young lady did not stop at merely negative virtues. She played with rare delicacy, warmth and purity of sentiment, and, as the Germans say, with a totality of conception that one seldom finds in players of her sex. Pardon the want of gallantry, but this is our hobby! It was a thoroughly artistic, beautiful and brilliant performance of a work which demands very exceptional qualities in the player. We shall soon take occasion to sum up the now finished season at length.

MUSICAL. Saratte

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-fourth and last of this season's concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There was an immense audience. Mr. Gericke upon his first appearance was greeted with exceptional heartiness, evidently by way of recognition of the occasion, and at the end of the concert a similar compliment and an enthusiastic recall were accorded him. The concert opened with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, which was brilliantly, broadly, and effectively read and played. Then came Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in F-minor. The soloist was Miss Amy Marcy Cheney, who by her performance of this trying work achieved one of the great successes of the season. Her interpretation of the concerto was fairly fascinating in its refined grace, its variety of exquisite and appropriate color, its beautiful phrasing, and its pure artistic feeling. In point of technique her playing was delightfully true, polished and delicate, and yet abundant in force and virility. Her touch is perfect, and was heard with charming effect in the trills and pearly runs in the slow movement. The difficulties of the work were overcome without display, and there was a thorough freedom from affectation throughout. In point of style the young artist manifested musicianly taste and judgment of a high order. The piano fairly sang under her hands in the more cantabile passages, and in the more brilliant phrases there was never a lack of the most perfect clearness and precision. No allowance was to be made for her tender years; she fully established her right to be judged as a finished artist. She was applauded, and justly, with unstinted enthusiasm, and recalled twice. Her success is one upon which she may well take pride, for it was well earned and richly deserved. The concert ended with an excitingly brilliant, masterly and impressive reading of Schubert's great symphony in C major, and the season came to a close. We shall review it and Mr. Gericke's services at length in our next. The opening concert of the next season will take place Oct. 17.

MUSIC HALL WILL REMAIN as it is, or without radical change, until further notice, the committee of the directors to whom were referred the offers of the theatrical speculators and the plans of the architects, with full powers, having so decided on Saturday afternoon. This announcement will be received with much satisfaction by every one who knows by experience how unsatisfactory are the effects of concerts by orchestra or chorus in a theatre. Why the project is abandoned is not given out. But there are hints that it was found inadvisable because of the greater cost of making the changes proposed than was at first estimated. Shares in stock of the corporation are not income-earning pieces of property, and it was with the hope of making a dividend possible that the scheme of turning the place into a theatre was considered by the directors. The offers and plans made with a view to the alterations being rejected, some other idea providing for more frequent use of the hall may be brought to the consideration of the directors. Frank.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Close of the Season's Series at Music Hall. Herald

The 24th and last of the season's series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, and an immense audience assisted in making the occasion a notable one. The programme began with the "Euryanthe" overture by Weber, which was played with magnificent effect, and made a marked impression upon the audience. The soloist of the evening, Miss Amy Marcy Cheney, pianist, was then heard in the concerto in F-minor, op. 21, by Chopin, her appearance being the signal for a hearty and friendly greeting. The first measures of the opening movement showed plainly that the little artist had made a marked advance in her playing since her last public appearance, and the success which attended her work on this occasion fully justified even the extravagant enthusiasm of her listeners. She appears to have matured, in a musical sense, in an unusual degree since her own concert some six months ago, and she may now with all fairness claim to be judged as an artist rather than as an amateur. Her touch is beautifully clear and elastic, she has an evident appreciation of the musical value of every phrase, and there is a genuine musician's instinct shown in all her playing. Her most remarkable success was made in the larghetto, in which the theme was sung upon the piano with rare beauty of expression and great artistic finish. She never forces her tones, but gives them out with so clear and true effect that in her playing the piano score has a due prominence at all times. Her technical abilities are really remarkable, and she met the demands of the final movement with notable success, there being only occasional passages in which a lack of clearness was shown by reason of her limited force. Repeated recalls rewarded her at the conclusion of her task, and she met the acknowledgments of her ability with the composure of a veteran performer. The ever favorite symphony in C major, by Schubert, ended the programme, the "Siegfried Idyll," given at the rehearsal being omitted on account of the excessive length of the programme. The great work, so full of the composer's best ideas, which are worked out with such rare skill in the orchestral scoring, was played as it never has been played here before, and the presentation of the symphony gave a grand ending to the season's concerts. Mr. Gericke was applauded to the echo at its termination, and he must surely feel that he will return to an admiring public when he again assumes his stand at the opening concert of the next season on Oct. 17.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS. Herald

The concert at Music Hall last evening, by the Boston symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor (comment upon which will be found elsewhere), ended the fourth season of this organization, which has been maintained so largely at the expense of a single disinterested and public-spirited citizen. It is hardly necessary to make any extended comment upon the programmes presented, except in very general terms, as each has been already considered at more or less length in these columns. It is a matter for regret that a more catholic spirit has not been shown by Mr. Gericke in his selections, and it is still more to be regretted that so large a portion of the season has been given to works which cannot, upon any possible logical reasoning, be considered as within the comprehension of the large majority of those attending. It is not at all discreditable to the musical culture of the city to take this exception to the season's programmes, for only a special study of orchestral scores can give a thorough understanding of the class of German music which has formed such a prominent feature of the season's scheme of programmes. Even if the concerts are given with an educational object in view, the value of so large a proportion of this class of music is problematical, as the single hearing afforded tends rather to confuse than enlighten the student. It is often difficult for those catering for the musical public to realize that their own personal likes and preferences are based upon a much broader educational basis than that of the community from which they desire to draw their support. This appears to be the case with those who have control of these concerts, and it is doubtful if the best results will be gained while this erroneous opinion is held by those in authority in this enterprise. While there may be good reason for a difference of opinion as to the character of the programmes, there can be, with fair-minded persons, but one opinion as to the general results obtained by Mr. Gericke in their presentation. The orchestra under his direction has advanced to a position which makes it equal to the best organizations of the world, and, in its work under Mr. Gericke, it has during the season challenged the criticism of the best judges of both Europe and America. Coming from Vienna with a somewhat limited realization of the characteristics of the free-born and naturalized citizens of this part of America, it is not altogether surprising that many differences arose at first between the new conductor and his musicians, but it is a pleasure to know that the talents of the musician have so much overtopped any peculiarities in the man that Mr. Gericke has at the present time the best wishes and the best work of his players at all times. With the acquaintance he has gained with American ideas, and, more especially, Boston notions, during the season, Mr. Gericke's future career here is sure to be as pleasant for himself as it will surely be profitable for the public. The concerts for the season of 1885-86, will begin Saturday, Oct. 17.

THE FUTURE OF MUSIC HALL.

After several months' negotiations looking to the alteration of Music Hall by the building of a proscenium arch and the fitting up of a complete stage for operatic and theatrical performances, the committee of the directors, intrusted with full powers in the matter, decided yesterday afternoon to abandon the project, and the hall will remain in its present shape for the future. Those who have opposed the proposed change will rejoice in the decision, while the few who feel confident that the public as well as the corporation would gain by the new use of the hall made possible by the contemplated alterations will regret the failure of these negotiations. One matter is quite certain; unless some new use is discovered for the hall, its success as a financial investment will not justify the continuance of its use for its present purpose, and the inexorable laws of finance will cause its demolition. The advocate of any departure from what has been in this city meets but cold comfort in urging a deviation from the well worn ruts of the past, but, as some movement must be made to prevent stagnation, it may be well to once more venture aside from the treadmill of the past in musical matters, and suggest a new field for enterprise. The Music Hall property is an unprofitable investment for the gentlemen holding the largest part of its stock. An orchestra of able musicians can be secured for the summer season at a much less cost than for the winter months. There is now no use for the Music Hall in the summer months. Why not get together the unemployed orchestra, put it into the unused hall, and give every night of the summer season concerts for the enjoyment of the people. Mr. P. S. Gilmore did this many years ago with a brass band as his attraction, and had the hall crowded for weeks at 10 and 15 cents. There are those who think he benefited the musical taste of the city by these concerts. Why not repeat the experiment, Mr. Higginson? No season tickets, but single or strip tickets, none higher than 25 cents. There are ice cream and lager beer saloons near at hand.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL. Journal

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT. Journal The last concert of the Symphony Orchestra's fourth season was given Saturday evening, with the following programme: C. M. v. Weber, overture (Euryanthe); F. Chopin, concerto for pianoforte in F-minor, op. 21, maestoso, larghetto, allegro vivace; Fr. Schubert, symphony in C major. The soloist was Miss Amy Marcy Cheney. On account of the extreme length of the programme, the "Siegfried Idyll," which was to have been given, was omitted. Miss Cheney was very pleasing at the piano, playing with great expression and with clearness and vigor throughout. She was recalled several times and presented with a number of floral tributes. Weber's romantic overture, one of the three works upon which his fame chiefly rests, was rendered in inimitable style by the orchestra, and won especial favor both from this rendition and from the inherent beauty of the music. The symphony, although long, has been called by Schumann "heavenly" in its length, and it certainly was never wearisome as given by the Boston orchestra. Its easy grace of movement and interesting harmony were thoroughly brought out by the skilled musicians under Mr. Gericke's leadership, so that the well-known work received its finest interpretation.

The management announce that the opening concert of next season will be given Saturday, October 17. It is rumored that numerous changes will be made in the personnel of the orchestra, and that Mr. Gericke will supply the places of those who leave with musicians from abroad.

principal theme of the second movement, but this is a matter of a certain technical difficulty. The strings were not behindhand in giving life, vivacity and strength to their several parts; upon the whole it was a grand performance of a noble work, and closed the symphony season in a blaze of glory. Of Miss Cheney's playing of the Chopin concerto one could say much. It was a performance to inspire not only sincere and warm admiration, but also respect. It is so easy to go wrong in playing Chopin! His works present so many dangerous pitfalls to inartistic stupidity, and virtuoso pretentiousness! Miss Cheney, possibly because she is neither stupid nor pretentious, avoided them all. This is no mean praise, to begin with, but the young lady did not stop at merely negative virtues. She played with rare delicacy, warmth and purity of sentiment, and, as the Germans say, with a totality of conception that one seldom finds in players of her sex. Pardon the want of gallantry, but this is our hobby! It was a thoroughly artistic, beautiful and brilliant performance of a work which demands very exceptional qualities in the player. We shall soon take occasion to sum up the now finished season at length.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The twenty-fourth and last of this season's concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. There was an immense audience. Mr. Gericke upon his first appearance was greeted with exceptional heartiness, evidently by way of recognition of the occasion, and at the end of the concert a similar compliment and an enthusiastic recall were accorded him. The concert opened with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, which was brilliantly, broadly, and effectively read and played. Then came Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in F-minor. The soloist was Miss Amy Marcy Cheney, who by her performance of this trying work achieved one of the great successes of the season. Her interpretation of the concerto was fairly fascinating in its refined grace, its variety of exquisite and appropriate color, its beautiful phrasing, and its pure artistic feeling. In point of technique her playing was delightfully true, polished and delicate, and yet abundant in force and virility. Her touch is perfect, and was heard with charming effect in the trills and pearly runs in the slow movement. The difficulties of the work were overcome without display, and there was a thorough freedom from affectation throughout. In point of style the young artist manifested musicianly taste and judgment of a high order. The piano fairly sung under her hands in the more cantabile passages, and in the more brilliant phrases there was never a lack of the most perfect clearness and precision. No allowance was to be made for her tender years; she fully established her right to be judged as a finished artist. She was applauded, and justly, with unstinted enthusiasm, and recalled twice. Her success is one upon which she may well take pride, for it was well earned and richly deserved. The concert ended with an excitingly brilliant, masterly and impressive reading of Schubert's great symphony in C major, and the season came to a close. We shall review it and Mr. Gericke's services at length in our next. The opening concert of the next season will take place Oct. 17.

MUSIC HALL WILL REMAIN as it is, or without radical change, until further notice, the committee of the directors to whom were referred the offers of the theatrical speculators and the plans of the architects, with full powers, having so decided on Saturday afternoon. This announcement will be received with much satisfaction by every one who knows by experience how unsatisfactory are the effects of concerts by orchestra or chorus in a theatre. Why the project is abandoned is not given out. But there are hints that it was found inadvisable because of the greater cost of making the changes proposed than was at first estimated. Shares in stock of the corporation are not income-earning pieces of property, and it was with the hope of making a dividend possible that the scheme of turning the place into a theatre was considered by the directors. The offers and plans made with a view to the alterations being rejected, some other idea providing for more frequent use of the hall may be brought to the consideration of the directors.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Close of the Season's Series at Music Hall.

The 24th and last of the season's series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, and an immense audience assisted in making the occasion a notable one. The programme began with the "Euryanthe" overture by Weber, which was played with magnificent effect, and made a marked impression upon the audience. The soloist of the evening, Miss Amy Marcy Cheney, pianist, was then heard in the concerto in F-minor, op. 21, by Chopin, her appearance being the signal for a hearty and friendly greeting. The first measures of the opening movement showed plainly that the little artist had made a marked advance in her playing since her last public appearance, and the success which attended her work on this occasion fully justified even the extravagant enthusiasm of her listeners. She appears to have matured, in a musical sense, in an unusual degree since her own concert some six months ago, and she may now with all fairness claim to be judged as an artist rather than as an amateur. Her touch is beautifully clear and elastic, she has an evident appreciation of the musical value of every phrase, and there is a genuine musician's instinct shown in all her playing. Her most remarkable success was made in the larghetto, in which the theme was sung upon the piano with rare beauty of expression and great artistic finish. She never forces her tones, but gives them out with so clear and true effect that in her playing the piano score has a due prominence at all times. Her technical abilities are really remarkable, and she met the demands of the final movement with notable success, there being only occasional passages in which a lack of clearness was shown by reason of her limited force. Repeated recalls rewarded her at the conclusion of her task, and she met the acknowledgments of her ability with the composure of a veteran performer. The ever favorite symphony in C major, by Schubert, ended the programme, the "Siegfried Idyll," given at the rehearsal being omitted on account of the excessive length of the programme. The great work, so full of the composer's best ideas, which are worked out with such rare skill in the orchestral scoring, was played as it never has been played here before, and the presentation of the symphony gave a grand ending to the season's concerts. Mr. Gericke was applauded to the echo at its termination, and he must surely feel that he will return to an admiring public when he again assumes his stand at the opening concert of the next season on Oct. 17.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The concert at Music Hall last evening, by the Boston symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor (comment upon which will be found elsewhere), ended the fourth season of this organization, which has been maintained so largely at the expense of a single disinterested and public-spirited citizen. It is hardly necessary to make any extended comment upon the programmes presented, except in very general terms, as each has been already considered at more or less length in these columns. It is a matter for regret that a more catholic spirit has not been shown by Mr. Gericke in his selections, and it is still more to be regretted that so large a portion of the season has been given to works which cannot, upon any possible logical reasoning, be considered as within the comprehension of the large majority of those attending. It is not at all discreditable to the musical culture of the city to take this exception to the season's programmes, for only a special study of orchestral scores can give a thorough understanding of the class of German music which has formed such a prominent feature of the season's scheme of programmes. Even if the concerts are given with an educational object in view, the value of so large a proportion of this class of music is problematical, as the single hearing afforded tends rather to confuse than enlighten the student. It is often difficult for those catering for the musical public to realize that their own personal likes and preferences are based upon a much broader educational basis than that of the community from which they desire to draw their support. This appears to be the case with those who have control of these concerts, and it is doubtful if the best results will be gained while this erroneous opinion is held by those in authority in this enterprise. While there may be good reason for a difference of opinion as to the character of the programmes, there can be, with fair-minded persons, but one opinion as to the general results obtained by Mr. Gericke in their presentation. The orchestra under his direction has advanced to a position which makes it equal to the best organizations of the world, and, in its work under Mr. Gericke, it has during the season challenged the criticism of the best judges of both Europe and America. Coming from Vienna with a somewhat limited realization of the characteristics of the free-born and naturalized citizens of this part of America, it is not altogether surprising that many differences arose at first between the new conductor and his musicians, but it is a pleasure to know that the talents of the musician have so much overtopped any peculiarities in the man that Mr. Gericke has at the present time the best wishes and the best work of his players at all times. With the acquaintance he has gained with American ideas, and, more especially, Boston notions, during the season, Mr. Gericke's future career here is sure to be as pleasant for himself as it will surely be profitable for the public. The concerts for the season of 1885-86, will begin Saturday, Oct. 17.

THE FUTURE OF MUSIC HALL.

After several months' negotiations looking to the alteration of Music Hall by the building of a proscenium arch and the fitting up of a complete stage for operatic and theatrical performances, the committee of the directors, intrusted with full powers in the matter, decided yesterday afternoon to abandon the project, and the hall will remain in its present shape for the future. Those who have opposed the proposed change will rejoice in the decision, while the few who feel confident that the public as well as the corporation would gain by the new use of the hall made possible by the contemplated alterations will regret the failure of these negotiations. One matter is quite certain; unless some new use is discovered for the hall, its success as a financial investment will not justify the continuance of its use for its present purpose, and the inexorable laws of finance will cause its demolition. The advocate of any departure from what has been in this city meets but cold comfort in urging a deviation from the well worn ruts of the past, but, as some movement must be made to prevent stagnation, it may be well to once more venture aside from the treadmill of the past in musical matters, and suggest a new field for enterprise. The Music Hall property is an unprofitable investment for the gentlemen holding the largest part of its stock. An orchestra of able musicians can be secured for the summer season at a much less cost than for the winter months. There is now no use for the Music Hall in the summer months. Why not get together the unemployed orchestra, put it into the unused hall, and give every night of the summer season concerts for the enjoyment of the people. Mr. P. S. Gilmore did this many years ago with a brass band as his attraction, and had the hall crowded for weeks at 10 and 15 cents. There are those who tell he benefited the musical taste of the city by these concerts. Why not repeat the experiment, Mr. Higginson? No season tickets, but single or strip tickets, none higher than 25 cents. There are ice cream and lager beer saloons near at hand.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT. The last concert of the Symphony Orchestra's fourth season was given Saturday evening, with the following programme: C. M. v. Weber, overture ("Euryanthe"); F. Chopin, concerto for pianoforte in F-minor, op. 21, maestoso, larghetto, allegro vivace; Fr. Schubert, symphony in C major. The soloist was Miss Amy Marcy Cheney. On account of the extreme length of the programme, the "Siegfried Idyll," which was to have been given, was omitted. Miss Cheney was very pleasing at the piano, playing with great expression and with clearness and vigor throughout. She was recalled several times and presented with a number of floral tributes. Weber's romantic overture, one of the three works upon which his fame chiefly rests, was rendered in inimitable style by the orchestra, and won especial favor both from this rendition and from the inherent beauty of the music. The symphony, although long, has been called by Schumann "heavenly" in its length, and it certainly was never wearisome as given by the Boston orchestra. Its easy grace of movement and interesting harmony were thoroughly brought out by the skilled musicians under Mr. Gericke's leadership, so that the well-known work received its finest interpretation.

The management announce that the opening concert of next season will be given Saturday, October 17. It is rumored that numerous changes will be made in the personnel of the orchestra, and that Mr. Gericke will supply the places of those who leave with musicians from abroad.

MUSIC. Continued

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At last the series of 1884-5 has passed into the musical history of Boston. In reviewing what has been done the critic can indulge in a very large amount of praise. There has, to be sure, been a noticeable lack of compositions by the French, Swedish, Norwegian, English, Danish and Russian composers, and the native school has not been represented at all. It must be borne in mind that we do not agitate for "novelty concerts" such as Mr. von der Stucken has been giving in New York, for Boston has something yet to learn in new interpretations of old works, nor do we in the least join the cry that Mozart is old-fashioned or that Haydn has had his day. But if Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven are to be the alpha and omega of musical performances, then Rubinstein, Dvorak, Cowen, Tschalkowsky, Meszkowski, Svendsen, Gade, Bruch, Rheinberger, Reinecke, Hiller and others may as well cease their efforts in orchestral work, for they cannot hope to be heard until they are dead, and few will care to work only for posthumous fame. The orchestra has, however, been brought to a perfection this season, which it has never reached before, and some of the performances such as the overtures to "Freischütz," to "Tannhauser" and the "Ossian overture," as well as the fifth and seventh symphonies of Beethoven, and the symphony of last night will be long remembered as models of performance. The programme of last night presented Weber, Chopin and Schubert in good contrast, and that of the preceding afternoon added Wagner. The work by Wagner—the "Siegfried Idylle"—is one of his lightest scores. It calls for an orchestra of only one flute, one oboe, two clarinets, one bassoon, two horns, and two trumpets, but it nevertheless presents the theories of the master in a marked degree. It was composed to celebrate the boyhood of Wagner's son "Siegfried," and also as a surprise to his wife, in Lucerne in 1871. The fact that it was intended for the family circle accounts for the slender orchestration, but it therefore shows Wagner in one of his most spontaneous moods, for it sprang from conjugal and paternal love. Wagner's poem at the head of the work is perhaps its best explanation, and we have therefore made a free translation for our readers. It is addressed to his wife.

Thy sacrifices have shed blessings o'er me,
And to my work have given noble aim,
And in the hour of conflict have upbore me,
Until my labor reached a sturdy frame.
Oft in the land of legends we were dreaming,
Those legends which contain the Teuton's fame,
Until a son upon our lives was beaming,
Siegfried must be our youthful hero's name.
For him and thee I now in tones am praising,
What thanks for deeds of love could better be,
Within our souls the grateful song upraising
Which in this music I have now set free,

And in this cadence I have held united,
Siegfried, our dearly cherished son—and thee,
Thus all the harmonies I now am bringing,
But speak the thought which in my heart is ringing.

It is natural to find the work founded upon motives taken from the opera of "Siegfried." There are three principal motives used. At the very beginning the Friedensmelodie (theme of peace) is used, and this becomes the groundwork of the entire composition. Scarcely less important is the sweet theme, "Siegfried the Rock of the World," which is bandied about among the woodwind instruments in a charming manner. The third motif is "Love's Resolve" (used in the opera when Brunnhilde finally decides to become the bride of Siegfried), and this is given by the horns in a very bright manner, while the flute gives a short, bird-like twittering above. The themes are interwoven in Wagner's usual manner, and continued even to the very end, when each returns in a final pianissimo like a long-drawn sigh. Some New York reviewers have expressed the view that the composition is rubbish. It would be well for such to remember that people who are thoroughly in earnest do not produce rubbish, and if Wagner ever was sincere it was in this work. But that the number was unintelligible to many we can readily believe.

The work was performed at the rehearsal in only a moderately successful manner, but, as already intimated, was omitted from the evening programme. The latter was long enough without it, and the fact that in this instance the Friday afternoon audience had a treat which was denied to the Saturday night symphony audience may have made some compensation for the omission of the Christmas Oratorio from the afternoon rehearsal of last week. The chief work of last night, then, was the great C major symphony by Schubert, the one of the "heavenly length." It was especially interesting under Mr. Gericke's lead, for he is a great admirer of Schubert, and also seems to understand him perfectly. The work was given with a fire and breadth that awakened even the callous critic to enthusiasm. The "repeats" of the work were judiciously cut down, and that of the trio of scherzo and of the exposition of the finale omitted. The work was admirably calculated to throw into relief the perfect unity of the orchestra. There are crescendo and diminuendo passages in both in the first and last movements that are tests of any orchestra. The working up of the finale especially, beginning with a timid tremolo by violas—marked ppp—and passing through every grade of dynamic force until the all-powerful strokes of the strings are reached, was as well executed a climax as has ever been done in Music Hall. Also the rushing triplet figure of the same movement, although taken at frightful speed, was clear, and made stirring effect, although at the close of the development the musicians showed a little fatigue. The trombones had any amount of work last night and did it superbly. In fact all the brasses had much to do, and many of their phrases were the more difficult because they were to be softly played.

MUSIC. Continued

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At last the series of 1884-5 has passed into the musical history of Boston. In reviewing what has been done the critic can indulge in a very large amount of praise. There has, to be sure, been a noticeable lack of compositions by the French, Swedish, Norwegian, English, Danish and Russian composers, and the native school has not been represented at all. It must be borne in mind that we do not agitate for "novelty concerts" such as Mr. von der Stucken has been giving in New York, for Boston has something yet to learn in new interpretations of old works, nor do we in the least join the cry that Mozart is old-fashioned or that Haydn has had his day. But if Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven are to be the alpha and omega of musical performances, then Rubinstein, Dvorak, Cowen, Tchaikowsky, Meszkowski, Svendsen, Gade, Bruch, Rheinberger, Reinecke, Hiller and others may as well cease their efforts in orchestral work, for they cannot hope to be heard until they are dead, and few will care to work only for posthumous fame. The orchestra has, however, been brought to a perfection this season, which it has never reached before, and some of the performances such as the overtures to "Freischütz," to "Tannhäuser" and the "Ossian overture," as well as the fifth and seventh symphonies of Beethoven, and the symphony of last night will be long remembered as models of performance. The programme of last night presented Weber, Chopin and Schubert in good contrast, and that of the preceding afternoon added Wagner. The work by Wagner—the "Siegfried Idylle"—is one of his lightest scores. It calls for an orchestra of only one flute, one oboe, two clarinets, one bassoon, two horns, and two trumpets, but it nevertheless presents the theories of the master in a marked degree. It was composed to celebrate the boyhood of Wagner's son "Siegfried," and also as a surprise to his wife, in Lucerne in 1871. The fact that it was intended for the family circle accounts for the slender orchestration, but it therefore shows Wagner in one of his most spontaneous moods, for it sprang from conjugal and paternal love. Wagner's poem at the head of the work is perhaps its best explanation, and we have therefore made a free translation for our readers. It is addressed to his wife.

Thy sacrifices have shed blessings o'er me,
And to my work have given noble aim,
And in the hour of conflict have upbore me,
Until my labor reached a sturdy frame.
Oft in the land of legends we were dreaming,
Those legends which contain the Teuton's fame,
Until a son upon our lives was beaming,
Siegfried must be our youthful hero's name.

For him and thee I now in tones am praising,
What thanks for deeds of love could better be,
Within our souls the grateful song upraising
Which in this music I have now set free,

And in this cadence I have held united,
Siegfried, our dearly cherished son—and thee,
Thus all the harmonies I now am bringing,
But speak the thought which in my heart is ringing.

It is natural to find the work founded upon motives taken from the opera of "Siegfried." There are three principal motives used. At the very beginning the Friedensmelodie (theme of peace) is used, and this becomes the groundwork of the entire composition. Scarcely less important is the sweet theme, "Siegfried the Rock of the World," which is bandied about among the woodwind instruments in a charming manner. The third motif is "Love's Resolve" (used in the opera when Brunnhilde finally decides to become the bride of Siegfried), and this is given by the horns in a very bright manner, while the flute gives a short, bird-like twittering above. The themes are interwoven in Wagner's usual manner, and continued even to the very end, when each returns in a final pianissimo like a long-drawn sigh. Some New York reviewers have expressed the view that the composition is rubbish. It would be well for such to remember that people who are thoroughly in earnest do not produce rubbish, and if Wagner ever was sincere it was in this work. But that the number was unintelligible to many we can readily believe.

The work was performed at the rehearsal in only a moderately successful manner, but, as already intimated, was omitted from the evening programme. The latter was long enough without it, and the fact that in this instance the Friday afternoon audience had a treat which was denied to the Saturday night symphony audience may have made some compensation for the omission of the Christmas Oratorio from the afternoon rehearsal of last week. The chief work of last night, then, was the great C major symphony by Schubert, the one of the "heavenly length." It was especially interesting under Mr. Gericke's lead, for he is a great admirer of Schubert, and also seems to understand him perfectly. The work was given with a fire and breadth that awakened even the callous critic to enthusiasm. The "repeats" of the work were judiciously cut down, and that of the trio of scherzo and of the exposition of the finale omitted. The work was admirably calculated to throw into relief the perfect unity of the orchestra. There are crescendo and diminuendo passages in both in the first and last movements that are tests of any orchestra. The working up of the finale especially, beginning with a timid tremolo by violas—marked ppp—and passing through every grade of dynamic force until the all-powerful strokes of the strings are reached, was as well executed a climax as has ever been done in Music Hall. Also the rushing triplet figure of the same movement, although taken at frightful speed, was clear, and made stirring effect, although at the close of the development the musicians showed a little fatigue. The trombones had any amount of work last night and did it superbly. In fact all the brasses had much to do, and many of their phrases were the more difficult because they were to be softly played.

290

The delicacy of the trombones in the allegro was remarkable. The woodwind did its chief work in the andante, and was also commendable. This movement is one of the masterpieces in symphonic literature, and is entirely romantic and beautiful. It shows distinctly the influence of the Magyar music upon Schubert, of the spirit of which he imbibed much during his sojourn in Hungary. It might have been well to have made a "cut" in the numerous repeats of this, spite of its melodic grace and sharp contrasts. Of course, it would be possible for the reviewer to pick out a single flaw here or there, a break in a horn tone, or a single anticipation of the leader's beat, but these were lost sight of in the wonderful unity and power of the whole.

The soloist of the concert was Miss Amy Marcy Cheney, who has passed the stage of prodigy and is to be judged as an artist, and can well afford to be. In her performance of the Chopin F minor Concerto, if we say that occasionally we should have liked a little more power, we have made the only criticism possible. The growth of the artist is noticeable at each performance. She gains constantly in expression, and in her refined touch and shading we find reflected the admirable school of her teacher. Her unaffected manner at once won the audience, and her absolute surety surprised all. The ensemble of the work was perfect, and the beauty of its finest movement—the Larghetto—was such as to awaken much enthusiasm. It could not have been performed better.

Mr. Gericke received a hearty ovation both at the beginning and end of the programme, and in common with the rest of the public, we thank him for the great services he has done for Boston's music, in this his first season.

An epidemic of concerts has suddenly broken out in Boston, and the musical season, from all present appearances, will culminate in a glut of these entertainments. As very few have hitherto proved remunerative this year, and as there is but little indication that those to come will meet with any better fortune, it is impossible not to admire the fortitude of the concert givers who are coming to the front in such profusion. But there is another aspect in which to view the subject. The symphony concerts, owing to the cheap prices at which they are given, have made it impossible to give other musical entertainments here with profitable results. Resident artists who do not secure a hearing at these performances must either rest in oblivion or come to the front with concerts of their own in order to let the public know that they are still in existence. The consequence is the profusion of musical entertainments which is distinguishing the close of the present season, and from which those projecting them expect no other profit than the publicity and the advertising thus received. Curiously enough, none of the concert-givers have as yet fallen into the track of the symphony concerts and tried the effect of popular prices. The subject is worthy their consideration. It has been made clearly manifest that the mountain will not come to Mahomet. Would it not be well for Mahomet to go to the Mountain?

Savette

291

SEASON 1885-86.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

THE OPENING CONCERT

WILL BE GIVEN ON SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17TH.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT SEASON.

It seemed strange last Saturday evening to have no symphony concert to go to; for once, even the critic felt a little sorry at having a blank evening stare him in the face. It is not the least noteworthy result of Mr. Higginson's scheme that, whereas one used to thank his stars for every symphony he had a chance of hearing, now one feels rather like complaining when a Saturday evening comes round without its concert. That weekly musical bath has become a fixed habit with many of us. In looking back upon the season that is now over, one finds ample food for reflection. One thing is certain—never before has our orchestra been brought to such a pitch of efficiency as it has this year. That this has been due chiefly to the exertions of Mr. Gericke goes almost without saying: the average individual excellence of the players may, to be sure, be somewhat higher than before, but still their collective efficiency as a body rests upon the conductor. That Mr. Gericke is an orchestral conductor to his finger tips was patent pretty early in the season. Conducting is a special talent, and he has it unmistakably. He commands his forces unerringly, he makes the players do his will, and he has that energy of personal magnetism which is one of the prime factors of the born performer, for a conductor is, after all, a performer after a fashion; he plays upon the orchestra. Apart from and over and above his technical skill as a conductor, Mr. Gericke is a decidedly interesting interpreter of music. He sees very clearly wherein the gist of fine performance lies; not merely in clean, accurate and spirited playing, nor in nicely contrasted effects of light and shade, but more especially in giving the melodic contour of the music its true value, and in natural, artistic phrasing. In our personal experience we have rarely met with a conductor who knew so well how to make a composition sound to the ear just as it looks to the eye in the score. In following orchestral performances, score in hand, how often does it not happen that the ear misses completely some point of interest which the eye sees clearly enough! For instance, in the first movement of the sixth symphony, how often has one not longed really to hear the second theme after it has left the first violins, and got down into the second violins and then into the 'celli! With Mr. Gericke, all such details come to the surface; wherever he finds a scrap of melody, he seizes upon it and drags it to the light. Then again he has the rare virtue of establishing the proper dynamic balance between the different parts in a score. One would think that this were more the business of the composer than of the conductor; possibly it ought to be; but one finds some composers, and some great ones, too, whose scores often sound singularly chaotic unless the conductor has taken great pains in this matter. Scores by Mendelssohn or Berlioz may, upon the whole, require little doctoring of this sort; but Beethoven's later symphonies, in which the composer treated the orchestra in a then unprecedented way, and, being deaf, could not prove to himself the actual effect of his scoring, Schubert's great C major symphony (which the composer never heard) and Schumann's symphonies, all require more or less intelligent and careful labor on the part of the conductor to preserve the proper dynamic balance between all the parts. This is often a work of extreme difficulty, involving an immense amount of irksome detail-work at rehearsals, irksome because the players themselves cannot appreciate its results, as they cannot be guided by their own ears. There is probably no one function of the conductor the necessity and difficulty of which is so unknown to the public, and for the efficient exercise of which he gets so little thanks. Mr. Gericke is fairly a master of this difficult art of balancing an orchestra. Of that higher phase of musical insight which belongs to the musician, and not especially to the conductor, it behooves us to say little in respect to Mr. Gericke. Here we enter upon ground where there should be the greatest latitude allowed for individual opinion. A musician's conception of a composition is perhaps not a very fair theme for criticism, for praise or blame. One agrees with him, or one does not; but who shall say authoritatively that he is right or wrong? Take the single question of tempo. This matter is indeed a bugbear; but one cannot help speaking of it; it is the heart and soul of performance. Musicians have a curiously light way of treating this question; one hears them say time and again, "You have only to enter into the spirit of a composition, and the right tempo comes easily and naturally of itself." Yes; if you put a pinch of salt on his tail, you can catch your pigeon easily enough. And, yet, after all, one's only guide in the matter of tempo is musical feeling and perspicacity. Wagner said that, after "Tannhäuser" he gave up writing metronome marks in his scores, because he found that, in spite of his very copious metronomizing of "Tannhäuser," almost every tempo in that opera was taken persistently wrong by conductors throughout Germany. Thus we can neither praise nor blame Mr. Gericke's tempi; sometimes we disagree, oftener we agree. Yet this much is to be said heartily, that whatever tempo he may take, he lives up to it, so to speak. With him nothing seems to be done at hap-hazard, nor from mere routine; there is plainly an idea at the bottom of every one of his tempi, and he makes the most of this idea with an authority and a clearness of presentation that are incomparable. Mr. Gericke's programmes have been a good deal commented on in several quarters. We have not yet allowed ourselves to touch upon this subject except in a very few special cases. Our reason is this: Mr. Gericke is in a peculiar position; he came from Vienna without a knowledge of the musical taste, predilections or needs of our Boston public. To follow all the advice that was tendered him would have been impossible. Perhaps, in the circumstances, he did the wisest thing he could have done; he made out the programmes to suit himself. We give a tabulated list of the compositions he has given during the winter, omitting the songs with pianoforte accompaniment. Works given for the first time are marked with an asterisk.

SYMPHONIES.

Beethoven: Nos. 1 in C; 2 in D; 3 in E flat (Eroica); 4 in B-flat; 5 in C minor; 6 in F (Pastoral); 7 in A; 8 in F.
Brahms: Nos. 2 in D; 3 in F.
Haydn: Nos. 2 in D; 12 in B-flat.
Mendelssohn: Nos. 3 in A minor (Scotch); 4 in A (Italian).
Mozart: In G minor; in C (Jupiter); No. 5 in D.
Schubert: Nos. 6 in C; 9 in C.

Schumann: Nos. 1 in B-flat; 3 in E-flat (Rhenish); 4 in D minor.
 Volkmann: In D minor.*

SUITES, SERENADES, ETC.

Beethoven: Septet, Op. 20.
 Fuchs: Serenades for strings, Nos. 1 in D; 2 in C.
 Goldmark: "Ländliche Hochzeit."
 Handel: Concerto for strings, No. 12.*
 Lachner: Suite, Op. 113.
 Schumann: Overture, Scherzo and Finale.
 Volkmann: Serenade for strings.

CONCERTOS.

Beethoven: Nos. 4 in G (Mary E. Garlicks); 5 in E-flat (Carl Baermann).
 Bruch: Adagio from No. 2 in D minor for violin (W. Loeffler).
 Chopin: No. 2 in F minor (Amy M. Cheney).
 Henselt: In F (Fannie Bloomfield).
 Lalo: Fantaisie Norvégienne* for violin (W. Loeffler).
 Paganini: Adagio and Rondo from No. 1, in D, for violin (B. Liatemann).
 Rubinstein: In D minor (Louis Maas).
 Saint-Saëns: For violin, op. 20* (T. Adamowski).
 Schubert: Fantasia in C, arranged by Liszt (W. H. Sherwood).
 De Swert: For cello, in D minor* (F. Giese).
 Tschalkowski: No. 1 in B-flat minor (B. J. Lang).
 Vioutemps: For violin, in A minor (L. Lichtenberg); in D minor (L. Campanari).
 Bach: Chaconne for violin (W. Loeffler).

OVERTURES.

Bargiel: "Medea."
 Beethoven: "Leonore," No. 3; "Egmont;" "Fidelio."
 Cherubini: "Anacreon;" "Deux Journées."
 Gade: "Nachklänge von Ossian."
 Goldmark: "Sakuntala."
 Mendelssohn: "Midsummer Night's Dream;" "Ruy Blas;" "Heimkehr aus der Fremde;" "Schöne Melusine."
 Mozart: "Zauberflöte."
 Schubert: "Rosamunde;" "Alphonso und Estrella."
 Schumann: "Hermann und Dorothea."
 Spohr: "Jessonda."
 Volkmann: "König Richard III."
 Wagner: "Tannhäuser;" "Tristan;" "Meistersinger."
 Weber: "Freischütz;" "Oberon;" "Euryanthe."

MISCELLANEOUS.

Bach: Pastoral from "Xmas Oratorio."
 Berlioz: "Un Bal," from "Fantastic Symphony."
 Brahms: Hungarian Dances, Nos. 1, 2, 6; Variations on theme by Haydn.
 Herbiek: Tanz-Momente.*
 Liszt: Symphonic Poem: "Orpheus."
 Mendelssohn: Scherzo, Notturmo and Wedding March from "Midsummer Night's Dream."
 Rubinstein: Three movements from ballet: "La Vigne."
 Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem: "Danse Macabre."
 Wagner: Finale from "Tristan."

TRANSCRIPTIONS.

Bach: Prelude, Andante and Gavotte* arr. for strings by Bachrich; Three sonata-movements, arr. for strings by Gericke;* Toccata in F, arr. by Esser.
 Beethoven: Andante from Trio in B-flat, Op. 97, arr. by Liszt.
 Handel: Largo, arr. by ?
 Schubert: March in B minor, arr. by Liszt.
 Schumann: "Bilder aus Osten."* arr. by Reinecke.
 Weber: "Invitation à la Valse," arr. by Berlioz.

To these may be added the following chamber-music, played by all the strings:

Beethoven: Minuet and Fugue from Quartet in C, op. 59.
 Boccherini: Minuet.
 Haydn: Variations on Austrian Hymn.

FOR VOICE AND ORCHESTRA.

Bach: First two Cantatas from "Xmas Oratorio" (sings by Emma Juch, Emily Winant, W. J. Winch, F. Remmert).
 Gounod: Barcarolle from "Polyeucte" (W. J. Winch).
 Handel: Aria from an anthem* (Louise Rollwagen); Aria, "Lascia ch'io pianga" (Agnes Huntington).
 Meyerbeer: Scene from "Prophet" (Mary H. Howe).
 Mozart: Aria from "Figaro" (Emma Juch); concert aria, "Bella mia fiamma" (Gertrude Franklin).
 Raff: Song, "The Dream King and His Love" (Ita Welsh).

Summing up, we find that composers stand as follows, counting the original compositions for orchestra by which they are severally represented (omitting concertos, songs and transcriptions):

Beethoven 12; Mendelssohn 6; Schumann 5; Brahms, Mozart, Schubert 4 each; Volkmann, Wagner, Weber 3 each; Cherubini, Fuchs, Goldmark, Haydn 2 each; Bach, Bargiel, Berlioz, Gade, Handel, Herbeck, Lachner, Liszt, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Spohr 1 each.

This classification, however, does not give quite a fair impression, as a symphony does not count for more than a simple dance movement. The following list, based, not upon the number of compositions, but upon the number of separate movements by which each composer is represented (counting a symphony, for instance, as four movements) gives a better idea:

Beethoven, 39; Schumann, 17; Mendelssohn, 15; Mozart, 13; Brahms, 12; Fuchs, Schubert, 10 each; Haydn, 8; Goldmark, Volkmann, 6 each; Lachner, 5; Handel, Wagner, 4 each; Rubinstein, Weber, 3 each; Cherubini, 2; Bach, Bargiel, Berlioz, Gade, Herbeck, Liszt, Saint-Saëns, Spohr, 1 each.

The number of original orchestral compositions given for the first time is nine; of these only three were symphonies. The only composers on the list who were not Germans are Berlioz, Cherubini, Gade, Liszt, Rubinstein and Saint-Saëns; these men are represented by a total of seven orchestral compositions; German composers by a total of fifty-six! Now this is not what the Boston public has been accustomed to, and undoubtedly not what it quite likes. That German composers should have the lion's share of attention in concerts of this sort is unquestionably just. There can be no doubt that, taking them from Bach to Brahms, their works present an all-sufficient variety in style and quality to form any number of highly enjoyable programmes. But this is not the point. There exists a great deal of orchestral music of the modern French and English schools—not to mention some excellent works by American composers—which our public, and the best and most musical part of it, too, are exceedingly anxious to hear. A certain amount of novelty is good for everybody; and these schools are novelties now. One may even say that Berlioz's fantastic symphony, although it has been twice given in Boston, is essentially more of a novelty than, say, a new symphony by Schubert.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE

THE SYMPHONY (CONCERT.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended its fourth season with Saturday evening's concert, when this programme was played: C. M. v. Weber, overture (Euryanthe); F. Chopin, concerto for pianoforte in F minor, op. 21, Maestoso, Larghetto, Allegro vivace; Fr. Schubert, symphony in C major. The occasion was less renowned than was naturally expected, but the Bach commemoration, celebrated at the concert of the previous week, may rightly be called the climax of the season, and the concert of last Saturday evening a fitting supplement. The omission of the ninth symphony from the programmes of this season is an evidence of wisdom; for vocally its rendering is never more than a negative success. The great Schubert symphony in C major, No. 10, is the best possible selection in its place. A disappointment awaited the Saturday evening audience, which was not shared by those at the Friday rehearsal—the Siegfried-Idyl was not played! The curfew-following, puritanical necessity of fleeing from the concert hall at half-past nine o'clock, held by so many uneasy suburban and tradition-steeped urbane among our audiences, has a sad enough result when such a beautiful tone-poem as the Siegfried-Idyl has to succumb to it. As Mr. Gericke came forward promptly at 8 o'clock, to begin the overture, he was greeted with hearty and long-continued applause from the very large audience; and again at the close of the symphony it expressed its thanks, good wishes and God-speed, until another season shall begin. The time-worn, but ever welcome, Euryanthe overture had a fine performance. If the programme could have been carried out as intended, for once we should have heard a concert wherein the string tone was not all-prevailing; for the Wagner picture, with its characteristic color, the Euryanthe overture (so Weberish in its use of the middle instruments), and the Schubert (with its predominating element of wood and brass), would have made a strongly-emphasized contrast. As it was, it was delightful to get away for a few moments into the sound of the pastoral oboe, the irreverent clarinet, the jolly flute, and the vital and sonorous horns and trombones. The symphony was never better played. Mr. Gericke's genius as an interpreter has never been more apparent. Fortunately, the immense tension and responsibility which each part of the orchestra must feel, under so magnetic and compelling an influence as Mr. Gericke's, did not result in the slightest inaccuracy of execution. Such a thing should always be forgiven in the generally perfect ensemble our orchestra maintains; but it was, nevertheless, very gratifying not to hear the unlucky entrance or suspicious wavering of any nervous instrumentalist at the most important concert of the season. This symphony is a constant surprise, and at every hearing new beauties arise. It is audacious in its treatment of the strings; for only with great skill could monotony be avoided in a work occupying a full hour in performing, where the wind divisions bear the most important part. The grandiose first movement is wonderfully varied, great in its construction, and impressive and thrilling when performed; Mr. Gericke's handling of the melody as it finds its way from instrument to instrument, his subordination of what should be subordinate, and his ability to make prominent, what for the time being should be prominent in order to rightly present the composer, is a gift which he has brought to bear upon his susceptible and sensitive players with wonderful success, and in this movement it had full expression. The horns here did good work; some of the effects of accent were simply great. In the andante taken in sympathetic tempo, the brasses were particularly smooth, while, in the scherzo with its thickening of all the parts for the wood-winds, the effect was altogether gracious; an equable and fine crescendo was also noticeable. The last movement, though more diffuse than any of the others, was played with faultless technique and with an absorbing earnestness. Miss Amy Marcy Cheney was the soloist, and proved a most delightful surprise. If appearing in a course of concerts where particular attention had been paid to the selection of soloists, her performance would have been notable; but as it was, she came before an audience whose taste during twenty-four concerts had not been successfully met in this direction, and of course had the advantage of its immediate friendliness. We have not heard Miss Cheney before, though she has been a public performer for two seasons. She is quite young, and at the pianoforte is unaffected and maidenly. But in no way is her playing immature, youthful or unequal. Her intelligence and grasp of the elusive and subtle Chopin cannot be gainsaid; we have never heard more satisfactory playing of Chopin. Her touch is exquisite, and her technique highly developed. That she has a finely wrought musical nature was apparent in her interpretation, which was artless yet artistic; full of feeling, yet never lachrymose. The compliment given her in being chosen to play at the last concert of the season was fully deserved. She was recalled three times, and each time departed laden with flowers. The programme made the welcome announcement that the concerts would be continued during the season of 1885-86 under Mr. Gericke. At this time it seems fitting to review briefly the season just ended. The concerts have continued, as in previous seasons, because of the liberality and public spirit of Mr. Higginson, who has borne a pecuniary loss, greater or less, until the present, when, it is said, the deficit may be overcome. It is still a mooted question as to which class of people Mr. Higginson wished to benefit when he established this series of concerts, charging for each a fee of twenty-five or fifty cents; because his method of disposing of his seats by the season, effectual prevents any popular or general patronage. The most important event connected with this season has been the inauguration of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor. As successor to Mr. Henschel, Mr. Gericke's qualifications for the position have received due attention in this column, and we have never withheld the expression of the admiration felt for him as a well-equipped conductor; one of great magnetism and able to bring his orchestra into a direct and absolute sympathy with his every phase of musical intention. He has great positiveness, an ideal for ever, thing his players are to do, and a way of insisting upon it at rehearsal, until their performance fitly and fairly represents him. As an interpreter he has the tradition of the German classic school, modified by a fervid and vigorous musical sense. He has performed the fifth symphony and the Tannhauser overture equally well. In choosing what shall be played (for he is subject to no committee) Mr. Gericke is open to the charge of narrowness. What he has played can be easily summarized; symphonies by Beethoven, eight; Mendelssohn, two, Mozart, three; Haydn, two; Schumann, four; Schubert, two; Brahms, one; Volkmann, one. Of these the Volkmann (D minor), Brahms No. 3, and Schubert No. 6 in C were played for the first time in Boston. The list of overtures records a most conservative authorship: Spohr, Beethoven, Mendelssohn,

294
Schumann: Nos. 1 in B-flat; 3 in E-flat (Rhenish); 4 in D minor.
Volkmann: In D minor.*

SUITES, SERENADES, ETC.

Beethoven: Septet, Op. 20.
Fuchs: Serenades for strings, Nos. 1 in D; 2 in C.
Goldmark: "Ländliche Hochzeit."
Handel: Concerto for strings, No. 12.*
Lachner: Suite, Op. 113.
Schumann: Overture, Scherzo and Finale.
Volkmann: Serenade for strings.

CONCERTOS.

Beethoven: Nos. 4 in G (Mary E. Garlicks); 5 in E-flat (Carl Baermann).
Bruch: Adagio from No. 2 in D minor for violin (W. Loeffler).
Chopin: No. 2 in F minor (Amy M. Cheney).
Henselt: In F (Fannie Bloomfield).
Lalo: Fantaisie Norvégienne* for violin (W. Loeffler).
Paganini: Adagio and Rondo from No. 1, in D, for violin (B. Listemann).
Rubinstein: In B minor (Louis Maas).
Saint-Saëns: For violin, op. 20* (T. Adamowski).
Schubert: Fantasia in C, arranged by Liszt (W. H. Sherwood).
De Swert: For cello, in D minor* (F. Giese).
Tchaikowski: No. 1 in B-flat minor (B. J. Lang).
Vieuxtemps: For violin, in A minor (L. Lichtenberg); in D minor (L. Campanari).
Bach: Chaconne for violin (W. Loeffler).

OVERTURES.

Bargiel: "Medea."
Beethoven: "Leonore," No. 3; "Egmont;" "Fidelio."
Cherubini: "Anacreon;" "Deux Journées."
Gade: "Nachtlänge von Ossian."
Goldmark: "Sakuntala."
Mendelssohn: "Midsummer Night's Dream;" "Ruy Blas;" "Heimkehr aus der Fremde;" "Schöne Melusine."
Mozart: "Zauberflöte."
Schubert: "Rosamunde;" "Alphonse und Estrella."
Schumann: "Hermann und Dorothea."*
Spohr: "Jessonda."
Volkmann: "König Richard III."*
Wagner: "Tannhäuser;" "Tristan;" "Meistersinger."
Weber: "Freischütz;" "Oberon;" "Euryanthe."

MISCELLANEOUS.

Bach: Pastorale from "Xmas Oratorio."
Berlioz: "Un Bal," from "Fantastic Symphony."
Brahms: Hungarian Dances, Nos. 1, 2, 6; Variations on theme by Haydn.
Herbick: Tanz-Momente.*
Liszt: Symphonic Poem: "Orpheus."
Mendelssohn: Scherzo, Notturmo and Wedding March from "Midsummer Night's Dream."
Rubinstein: Three movements from ballet: "La Vigne."
Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem: "Danse Macabre."
Wagner: Finale from "Tristan."

TRANSCRIPTIONS.

Bach: Prelude, Andante and Gavotte* arr. for strings by Bachrich; Three sonata-movements, arr. for strings by Gericke;* Toccata in F, arr. by Esser.
Beethoven: Andante from Trio in B-flat, Op. 97, arr. by Liszt.
Handel: Largo, arr. by ?
Schubert: March in B minor, arr. by Liszt.
Schumann: "Bilder aus Osten."* arr. by Reinecke.
Weber: "Invitation à la Valse," arr. by Berlioz.

To these may be added the following chamber-music, played by all the strings:

Beethoven: Minuet and Fugue from Quartet in C, op. 59.
Boccherini: Minuet.
Haydn: Variations on Austrian Hymn.

FOR VOICE AND ORCHESTRA.

Bach: First two Cantatas from "Xmas Oratorio" (solos by Emma Juch, Emily Winant, W. J. Winch, F. Remmert).
Gounod: Barcarolle from "Polyeucte" (W. J. Winch).
Handel: Aria from an anthem* (Louise Rollwagen); Aria, "Lascia ch'io pianga" (Agnes Huntington).
Meyerbeer: Scena from "Prophet" (Mary H. Howe).
Mozart: Aria from "Figaro" (Emma Juch); concert aria, "Bella mia fiamma" (Gertrude Franklin).
Raff: Song, "The Dream King and His Love" (Ita Welsh).

Summing up, we find that composers stand as follows, counting the original compositions for orchestra by which they are severally represented (omitting concertos, songs and transcriptions):

Beethoven 12; Mendelssohn 6; Schumann 5; Brahms, Mozart, Schubert 4 each; Volkmann, Wagner, Weber 3 each; Cherubini, Fuchs, Goldmark, Haydn 2 each; Bach, Bargiel, Berlioz, Gade, Handel, Herbeck, Lachner, Liszt, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Spohr 1 each.

This classification, however, does not give quite a fair impression, as a symphony does not count for more than a simple dance movement. The following list, based, not upon the number of compositions, but upon the number of separate movements by which each composer is represented (counting a symphony, for instance, as four movements) gives a better idea:

Beethoven, 39; Schumann, 17; Mendelssohn, 15; Mozart, 13; Brahms, 12; Fuchs, Schubert, 10 each; Haydn, 8; Goldmark, Volkmann, 6 each; Lachner, 5; Handel, Wagner, 4 each; Rubinstein, Weber, 3 each; Cherubini, 2; Bach, Bargiel, Berlioz, Gade, Herbeck, Liszt, Saint-Saëns, Spohr, 1 each.

The number of original orchestral compositions given for the first time is nine; of these only three were symphonies. The only composers on the list who were not Germans are Berlioz, Cherubini, Gade, Liszt, Rubinstein and Saint-Saëns; these men are represented by a total of seven orchestral compositions; German composers by a total of fifty-six! Now this is not what the Boston public has been accustomed to, and undoubtedly not what it quite likes. That German composers should have the lion's share of attention in concerts of this sort is unquestionably just. There can be no doubt that, taking them from Bach to Brahms, their works present an all-sufficient variety in style and quality to form any number of highly enjoyable programmes. But this is not the point. There exists a great deal of orchestral music of the modern French and English schools—not to mention some excellent works by American composers—which our public, and the best and most musical part of it, too, are exceedingly anxious to hear. A certain amount of novelty is good for everybody; and these schools are novelties now. One may even say that Berlioz's fantastic symphony, although it has been twice given in Boston, is essentially more of a novelty than, say, a new symphony by Schubert.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE SYMPHONY (CONCERT.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended its fourth season with Saturday evening's concert, when this programme was played: C. M. v. Weber, overture (Euryanthe); F. Chopin, concerto for pianoforte in F minor, op. 21, Maestoso, Larghetto, Allegro vivace; Fr. Schubert, symphony in C major. The occasion was less renowned than was naturally expected, but the Bach commemoration, celebrated at the concert of the previous week, may rightly be called the climax of the season, and the concert of last Saturday evening a fitting supplement. The omission of the ninth symphony from the programmes of this season is an evidence of wisdom; for vocally its rendering is never more than a negative success. The great Schubert symphony in C major, No. 10, is the best possible selection in its place. A disappointment awaited the Saturday evening audience, which was not shared by those at the Friday rehearsal—the Siegfried-Idyl was not played! The curfew-following, puritanical necessity of fleeing from the concert hall at half-past nine o'clock, held by so many uneasy suburban and tradition-steeped urbane among our audiences, has a sad enough result when such a beautiful tone-poem as the Siegfried-Idyl has to succumb to it. As Mr. Gericke came forward promptly at 8 o'clock, to begin the overture, he was greeted with hearty and long-continued applause from the very large audience; and again at the close of the symphony it expressed its thanks, good wishes and God-speed, until another season shall begin. The time-worn, but ever welcome, Euryanthe overture had a fine performance. If the programme could have been carried out as intended, for once we should have heard a concert wherein the string tone was not all-prevailing; for the Wagner picture, with its characteristic color, the Euryanthe overture (so Weberish in its use of the middle instruments), and the Schubert (with its predominating element of wood and brass), would have made a strongly-emphasized contrast. As it was, it was delightful to get away for a few moments into the sound of the pastoral oboe, the irreverent clarinet, the jolly flute, and the vital and sonorous horns and trombones. The symphony was never better played. Mr. Gericke's genius as an interpreter has never been more apparent. Fortunately, the immense tension and responsibility which each part of the orchestra must feel, under so magnetic and compelling an influence as Mr. Gericke's, did not result in the slightest inaccuracy of execution. Such a thing should always be forgiven in the generally perfect ensemble our orchestra maintains; but it was, nevertheless, very gratifying not to hear the unlucky entrance or suspicious wavering of any nervous instrumentalist at the most important concert of the season. This symphony is a constant surprise, and at every hearing new beauties arise. It is audacious in its treatment of the strings; for only with great skill could monotony be avoided in a work occupying a full hour in performing, where the wind divisions bear the most important part. The grandiose first movement is wonderfully varied, great in its construction, and impressive and thrilling when performed; Mr. Gericke's handling of the melody as it finds its way from instrument to instrument, his subordination of what should be subordinate, and his ability to make prominent, what for the time being should be prominent in order to rightly present the composer, is a gift which he has brought to bear upon his susceptible and sensitive players with wonderful success, and in this movement it had full expression. The horns here did good work; some of the effects of accent were simply great. In the andante taken in sympathetic tempo, the brasses were particularly smooth, while, in the scherzo with its thickening of all the parts for the wood-winds, the effect was altogether gracious; an equable and fine crescendo was also noticeable. The last movement, though more diffuse than any of the others, was played with faultless technique and with an absorbing earnestness. Miss Amy Marcy Cheney was the soloist, and proved a most delightful surprise. If appearing in a course of concerts where particular attention had been paid to the selection of soloists, her performance would have been notable; but as it was, she came before an audience whose taste during twenty-four concerts had not been successfully met in this direction, and of course had the advantage of its immediate friendliness. We have not heard Miss Cheney before, though she has been a public performer for two seasons. She is quite young, and at the pianoforte is unaffected and maidenly. But in no way is her playing immature, youthful or unequal. Her intelligence and grasp of the elusive and subtle Chopin cannot be gainsaid; we have never heard more satisfactory playing of Chopin. Her touch is exquisite, and her technique highly developed. That she has a finely wrought musical nature was apparent in her interpretation, which was artless yet artistic; full of feeling, yet never lachrymose. The compliment given her in being chosen to play at the last concert of the season was fully deserved. She was recalled three times, and each time departed laden with flowers. The programme made the welcome announcement that the concerts would be continued during the season of 1885-86 under Mr. Gericke. At this time it seems fitting to review briefly the season just ended. The concerts have continued, as in previous seasons, because of the liberality and public spirit of Mr. Higginson, who has borne a pecuniary loss, greater or less, until the present, when, it is said, the deficit may be overcome. It is still a mooted question as to which class of people Mr. Higginson wished to benefit when he established this series of concerts, charging for each a fee of twenty-five or fifty cents; because his method of disposing of his seats by the season, effectual prevents any popular or general patronage. The most important event connected with this season has been the inauguration of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor. As successor to Mr. Henschel, Mr. Gericke's qualifications for the position have received due attention in this column, and we have never withheld the expression of the admiration felt for him as a well-equipped conductor; one of great magnetism and able to bring his orchestra into a direct and absolute sympathy with his every phase of musical intention. He has great positiveness, an ideal for ever, thing his players are to do, and a way of insisting upon it at rehearsal, until their performance fitly and fairly represents him. As an interpreter he has the tradition of the German classic school, modified by a fervid and vigorous musical sense. He has performed the fifth symphony and the Tannhäuser overture equally well. In choosing what shall be played (for he is subject to no committee) Mr. Gericke is open to the charge of narrowness. What he has played can be easily summarized; symphonies by Beethoven, eight; Mendelssohn, two, Mozart, three; Haydn, two; Schumann, four; Schubert, two; Brahms, one; Volkmann, one. Of these the Volkmann (D minor), Brahms No. 3, and Schubert No. 6 in C were played for the first time in Boston. The list of overtures records a most conservative authorship: Spohr, Beethoven, Mendelssohn,

296

Weber, Cherubini, Gade, Schubert, Dargiel, Goldmark, Volkmann, and Wagner. Of these, the "King Richard III." by Volkmann was new here. The novelties in his list of lighter instrumental selections have been Rubinstein, La Vigne (four phases); Fuchs's, Serenade No. 2, for strings; Herbeck, Tanz Momente. Mr. Gericke has awakened critical discussion by playing a half dozen arrangements, such as: Andante from trio op. 97 of Beethoven, by Liszt; Minuet and Fugue from Quartet in C, opus 59, Beethoven, played by all the strings, etc., etc.; or by entering the field of chamber music to have played in the Music Hall the Beethoven Septette, opus 20. The only composers represented in the 24 concerts of this season, born not "tributary to the Rhine," were St. Saens (Darse Macabre); Berlioz (Le Bal, from Symphonie Fantastique); Boccherini (minuet). Not a formidable list of usurpers (?) This scanning of just what Mr. Gericke has done shows immediately how limited has been the scope of this season's orchestral outlook. We have heard none of the newer things of the French school, nor even a modern Russian or Pole (excepting Rubinstein); not Cowen's new symphony, nor a scrap of anything written by our own countrymen! In a certain way this does not represent progress, particularly as Mr. Henschel was of exceeding catholicity in taste, and sought to make his programmes representative of many schools. In an indirect way has come the statement that Mr. Gericke defends himself from an unwillingness to play anything but German music, by saying that he wishes first of all, and as speedily as is possible, to establish a perfect technique in his orchestra, and that this can best be done by performing the sedate, conservative, easier-outlined and more shapeful composition of the older German school; and the reason seems so good that we want to rest the question till another season, and not bear publicly the fears of many, that Mr. Gericke knows no other schools; or the fairly numerous opinions, that if he does, he has no sympathy with them and considers them beneath notice. It is a serious question for any community answerable for so magnificent an establishment as our Symphony Orchestra, and it will have to be met sooner or later. At any rate we hope Mr. Gericke will become as cosmopolitan as Theodore Thomas. In his choice of soloists Mr. Gericke's axiom must have been: "No man singers, few women singers; must have the violin!" It is true there are too few acceptable men singers available for his concerts, but it is quite too shameful to have heard but one during the whole season, who, with six women singers, six pianists, six violinists (three in succession), one cellist and a female vocal quartet, constitute the entire corps of soloists. We might hope another season for a little more care in the printing of the programme, greater exactness, and a touch of authentic analysis when a new work is given, etc., etc. In conclusion it is hoped that nothing will prevent the fulfilment of the plan to give a series of concerts during next season under Mr. Gericke.

LAST OF THE SYMPHONIES.

Miss Cheney's Remarkable Promise—A Criticism of Mr. Gericke's Programmes—The Prospects for Next Season's Concerts.

The last symphony concert of the season in Music Hall last evening presented an unusually brilliant programme. A Weber overture, a Chopin concerto, and Schubert's great Symphony in C, make a cluster of orchestral dainties which it would be difficult to surpass. All of these works were given with great finish. Miss Amy Marcy Cheney was the soloist. She won the highest opinions by her performance of the concerto. She aroused great enthusiasm, and gave evidences of great talent. Certainly, if she but fulfils the promises of her youth, she will rank among the first of female pianists.

The fourth annual series of orchestral concerts under the patronage of Mr. Higginson is closed. The season, as a whole, has been a satisfactory though not a brilliant one. The concerts have been attended by large audiences. The Friday afternoon rehearsals have been, even more than formerly, especially successful and beneficial to that very large number of amateurs and students who in many instances have found the series of great value to them. Under the circumstances a comparison of the two leaders who have had charge of the orchestra has been inevitable. Despite the fact that Mr. Gericke has worked the orchestra up to a fine pitch of excellence, there are many who regret the departure of Mr. Henschel. There are many who do not think that in the arrangement or matter of the programmes Mr. Gericke has shown the taste or produced the satisfactory results of his predecessor. There have been many new works produced during the year, but hardly one has been of the first importance. Almost every number which has had "new" marked against it on the programme, has been a novelty simply, of secondary musical importance at best, and not infrequently trivial.

The old works produced have been those with which the people of Boston are most familiar. When Mr. Gericke was first imported by Mr. Higginson he was reported as expressing intense surprise when told that Boston had heard most of the great classical orchestral works already! He was evidently laboring under an impression that continental Europe, and more especially cultivated Germany, had a monopoly of the musical culture of the world, but if he had looked up the musical status of the barbarians he was coming among a little more diligently, his work in Boston might have been somewhat more successful.

Nobody has accused Mr. Gericke of being a poor conductor; but he has been charged on various occasions with a lack of catholicity in his selection of works to be produced, and with devoting great space to German composers, and ignoring the rest. There is no doubt that there has been good foundation for such a complaint. The old Philharmonic and Harvard orchestras may not have attained such a high degree of excellence and finish, but it is the opinion of a great many musical people today that they offered more interesting programmes, introduced more valuable new music and did as much good work for the cause of music in the course of a year as the present symphony season has produced. If Mr. Higginson intends to continue his orchestra he ought to enlarge his library.

297

Rumor says, however, that Music Hall is to be turned into a theatre. This may interfere seriously with a symphony concert scheme of any kind, for a first-class theatrical organization is certainly not going to give up one night in a week for the sake of playing in this house when any other house is open. And there will be plenty of houses in Boston next year, from all reports. None the less it is announced that there will be a symphony season of 1885-86, and that the opening concert will be given on October 17.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The character of the programme, its performance, and a crowded audience, united to bring the third series of the Boston symphony concerts to a happy ending Saturday night. The prolonged applause that Herr Gericke received afforded a most practical as well as a most cordial acknowledgment of his success the past year in creating for the Boston symphony orchestra a reputation that neither in Europe nor in America, that neither the Gewandhaus nor the orchestras in Paris, London and Vienna, can easily out-rival. It is but just to Herr Gericke to acknowledge that he has not catered for popular applause; that he has maintained the dignity and independence of his position with a rare degree of firmness and consistency, and at times, when many a conductor less skilful, less familiar with every department of the orchestra, less cultivated as a musician, would have vacillated. Thus has he exhibited the true qualities of a leader. Mistakes he has made, but coming to Boston to conduct and not to be conducted, his mistakes have been his own, and have not resulted from placing too high an estimate upon the whims and caprices of the Boston musical public.

The chief event at the concert on Saturday evening was Miss Marcy Cheney's performance with orchestra of Chopin's F minor concerto. The young lady, who is said to be not more than seventeen years of age, exhibits an ability far beyond her years, has a phenomenally firm, sure, even and refined technique, interprets with exquisite taste, and wins admiration not alone by the marvel of her performance, but by the thoroughly artless and unpretentious manner of its accomplishment. Her temperament proved adequately Chopinesque to enable her to afford a very just as well as a very charming delivery of the composer's F minor concerto, at the conclusion of which it was made evident that an artistic sensation had been created, and the pleasureable excitement of the audience, won for the young artiste several well-merited encores. The remainder of the programme consisted of Weber's overture to Euryanthe, and Schubert's C major symphony, the magnificent performance of which worthily concluded the present series of Boston symphony concerts.

Home Journal

...The work done by the Symphony Orchestra in its fourth season is reviewed on the tenth page. By the way, Theodore Thomas will present more novelties for orchestra in his two concerts here than were played in all the two dozen concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

296

Weber, Cherubini, Gade, Schubert, Bargiel, Goldmark, Volkmann, and Wagner. Of these, the "King Richard III." by Volkmann was new here. The novelties in his list of lighter instrumental selections have been Rubinstein, La Vigne (four phases); Fuchs's, Serenade No. 2, for strings; Herbeck, Tanz Momente. Mr. Gericke has awakened critical discussion by playing a half dozen arrangements, such as: Andante from trio op. 97 of Beethoven, by Liszt; Minuet and Fugue from Quartet in C, opus. 59, Beethoven, played by all the strings, etc., etc.; or by entering the field of chamber music to have played in the Music Hall the Beethoven Septette, opus 20. The only composers represented in the 24 concerts of this season, born not "tributary to the Rhine," were St. Saens (Darse Macabre); Berlioz (Le Bal, from Symphonie Fantastique); Boccherini (minuet)! Not a formidable list of usurpers (?) This scanning of just what Mr. Gericke has done shows immediately how limited has been the scope of this season's orchestral outlook. We have heard none of the newer things of the French school, nor even a modern Russian or Pole (excepting Rubinstein); not Cowen's new symphony, nor a scrap of anything written by our own countrymen! In a certain way this does not represent progress, particularly as Mr. Henschel was of exceeding catholicity in taste, and sought to make his programmes representative of many schools. In an indirect way has come the statement that Mr. Gericke defends himself from an unwillingness to play anything but German music, by saying that he wishes first of all, and as speedily as is possible, to establish a perfect technique in his orchestra, and that this can best be done by performing the sedate, conservative, easier-outlined and more shapeful composition of the older German school; and the reason seems so good that we want to rest the question till another season, and not bear publicly the fears of many, that Mr. Gericke knows no other schools; or the fairly numerous opinions, that if he does, he has no sympathy with them and considers them beneath notice. It is a serious question for any community answerable for so magnificent an establishment as our Symphony Orchestra, and it will have to be met sooner or later. At any rate we hope Mr. Gericke will become as cosmopolitan as Theodore Thomas. In his choice of soloists Mr. Gericke's axiom must have been: "No mansingers, few women singers; must have the violin!" It is true there are too few acceptable men singers available for his concerts, but it is quite too shameful to have heard but one during the whole season, who, with six women singers, six pianists, six violinists (three in succession), one celloist and a female vocal quartet, constitute the entire corps of soloists. We might hope another season for a little more care in the printing of the programme, greater exactness, and a touch of authentic analysis when a new work is given, etc., etc. In conclusion it is hoped that nothing will prevent the fulfilment of the plan to give a series of concerts during next season under Mr. Gericke.

LAST OF THE SYMPHONIES.

Miss Cheney's Remarkable Promise—A Criticism of Mr. Gericke's Programmes—The Prospects for Next Season's Concerts.

The last symphony concert of the season in Music Hall last evening presented an unusually brilliant programme. A Weber overture, a Chopin concerto, and Schubert's great Symphony in C, make a cluster of orchestral dainties which it would be difficult to surpass. All of these works were given with great finish. Miss Amy Marcy Cheney was the soloist. She won the highest opinions by her performance of the concerto. She aroused great enthusiasm, and gave evidences of great talent. Certainly, if she but fulfils the promises of her youth, she will rank among the first of female pianists.

The fourth annual series of orchestral concerts under the patronage of Mr. Higginson is closed. The season, as a whole, has been a satisfactory though not a brilliant one. The concerts have been attended by large audiences. The Friday afternoon rehearsals have been, even more than formerly, especially successful and beneficial to that very large number of amateurs and students who in many instances have found the series of great value to them. Under the circumstances a comparison of the two leaders who have had charge of the orchestra has been inevitable. Despite the fact that Mr. Gericke has worked the orchestra up to a fine pitch of excellence, there are many who regret the departure of Mr. Henschel. There are many who do not think that in the arrangement or matter of the programmes Mr. Gericke has shown the taste or produced the satisfactory results of his predecessor. There have been many new works produced during the year, but hardly one has been of the first importance. Almost every number which has had "new" marked against it on the programme, has been a novelty simply, of secondary musical importance at best, and not infrequently trivial.

The old works produced have been those with which the people of Boston are most familiar. When Mr. Gericke was first imported by Mr. Higginson he was reported as expressing intense surprise when told that Boston had heard most of the great classical orchestral works already! He was evidently laboring under an impression that continental Europe, and more especially cultivated Germany, had a monopoly of the musical culture of the world, but if he had looked up the musical status of the barbarians he was coming among a little more diligently, his work in Boston might have been somewhat more successful.

Nobody has accused Mr. Gericke of being a poor conductor; but he has been charged on various occasions with a lack of catholicity in his selection of works to be produced, and with devoting great space to German composers, and ignoring the rest. There is no doubt that there has been good foundation for such a complaint. The old Philharmonic and Harvard orchestras may not have attained such a high degree of excellence and finish, but it is the opinion of a great many musical people today that they offered more interesting programmes, introduced more valuable new music and did as much good work for the cause of music in the course of a year as the present symphony season has produced. If Mr. Higginson intends to continue his orchestra he ought to enlarge his library.

Rumor says, however, that Music Hall is to be turned into a theatre. This may interfere seriously with a symphony concert scheme of any kind, for a first-class theatrical organization is certainly not going to give up one night in a week for the sake of playing in this house when any other house is open. And there will be plenty of houses in Boston next year, from all reports. None the less it is announced that there will be a symphony season of 1885-86, and that the opening concert will be given on October 17.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The character of the programme, its performance, and a crowded audience, united to bring the third series of the Boston symphony concerts to a happy ending Saturday night. The prolonged applause that Herr Gericke received afforded a most practical as well as a most cordial acknowledgment of his success the past year in creating for the Boston symphony orchestra a reputation that neither in Europe nor in America, that neither the Gewandhaus nor the orchestras in Paris, London and Vienna, can easily out-rival. It is but just to Herr Gericke to acknowledge that he has not catered for popular applause; that he has maintained the dignity and independence of his position with a rare degree of firmness and consistency, and at times, when many a conductor less skillful, less familiar with every department of the orchestra, less cultivated as a musician, would have vacillated. Thus has he exhibited the true qualities of a leader. Mistakes he has made, but coming to Boston to conduct and not to be conducted, his mistakes have been his own, and have not resulted from placing too high an estimate upon the whims and caprices of the Boston musical public.

The chief event at the concert on Saturday evening was Miss Marcy Cheney's performance with orchestra of Chopin's F minor concerto. The young lady, who is said to be not more than seventeen years of age, exhibits an ability far beyond her years, has a phenomenally firm, sure, even and refined technique, interprets with exquisite taste, and wins admiration not alone by the marvel of her performance, but by the thoroughly artless and unpretentious manner of its accomplishment. Her temperament proved adequately Chopinesque to enable her to afford a very just as well as a very charming delivery of the composer's F minor concerto, at the conclusion of which it was made evident that an artistic sensation had been created, and the pleasureable excitement of the audience, won for the young artiste several well-merited encores. The remainder of the programme consisted of Weber's overture to Euryanthe, and Schubert's C major symphony, the magnificent performance of which worthily concluded the present series of Boston symphony concerts. Home Journal

...The work done by the Symphony Orchestra in its fourth season is reviewed on the tenth page. By the way, Theodore Thomas will present more novelties for orchestra in his two concerts here than were played in all the two dozen concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

It would be an interesting innovation in our series of concerts to hear the works of Haydn, Mozart, Bach, and others, given under the conditions for which they were written. A series of ancient concerts in a small hall, with an orchestra of eighteen performers, would draw public attention for their quaintness, if for nothing else, and would give us a fair idea of the music which our forefathers enjoyed.

In the course of Symphony Concerts which Boston has just completed were many works by Haydn and Mozart given by grand orchestra, which sounded almost as full in their scoring as the works of the modern tone colorists. The fact is, that one almost never hears a symphony exactly as the old masters scored it. Schubert has written symphonies which can be very comfortably produced by a band of thirteen performers, without drums or trumpets. Mozart's great G minor Symphony was originally scored for a very small orchestra, without drums, trumpets, or clarinets, the orchestra consisting simply of one flute, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, and the proportionate number of string instruments.

BOSTON.

1885

April 6. At last the Symphony concerts are laid to rest. I may have growled at the series occasionally while it compelled me to sit up till Saturday midnight writing reviews, but now that it is done I feel like the wife whose husband suddenly ceased to give her the Saturday night beating, who longed for her usual excitement. Mr. Gericke has informed me that he is now at work upon the programme for next season. I have again ventured a word in favor of the American muse. It seems to me an imperative duty to foster American composers even if they be not yet on a par with the greatest composers of the old world. If Mr. Gericke waits for the leading American composers to come to him with their scores in their hands, he will wait in vain. The composers of lesser rank will gladly send him their works on approval, but the best ones will never submit to the test. He must seek them out and ask for their works, and while we are in the mood of giving advice, why should we not have Raff's four Season Symphonies, his Lenore Symphony, Rheinberger's Wallenstein Symphony, Goetz's Symphony, and a few other works upon which the moss of age has not yet gathered. But we fear our advice will not be followed.

Lang on the Eighteenth Boston Symphony Concert.

In the outset the speaker had something to say about the French Horn, used with the wood-winds in the quintet two lessons before, because it belongs to them rather than to the brass-wind family. In a large orchestra there are usually four of these horns. They have but few stops, the hand in the bell-mouth being a modifier; but they are capable of both delicate and flaring effects, the latter in a curious tone, as if it were smashed and spread about. The horn sometimes sounds like a bell. In Gounod's Faust it has weird influences. The rapid accumulation of moisture harshens the tone, and so the instrument becomes uncertain, even in the hands of a good player. A competent observer says that in no foreign orchestra is the horn-battery finer than in the Boston Symphony.

Haydn wrote 120 symphonies, and the so-called Twelfth belongs to a series of a dozen written last. An admirer was so determined to have Haydn's aid, he went from Paris to Vienna (no easy trip a century ago) and brought him bodily to London. For sixty years this symphony was played without an important cello part in one movement. The copy in Mr. Lang's hand, being of the old edition, lacked this part. This omission was owing to a copyist's error; but the blunder being detected, through a copy in the Berlin library, the cello part was restored. The scoring calls for two horns, no trombones (as a matter of course), and the flute is so important that the symphony seems designed to give that instrument a leading melodic place. Haydn's Twelfth sounds well on pianos, as Mr. Lang and G. W. Sumner presently showed us. It lacks, however, the sonorous quality found elsewhere in Haydn. It is not thick with Bourdon, like Wagner's works. It uses half-notes but once, and then for modulation, and deals largely with an exquisite mockery of its theme.

Two men may agree in liking one composition, but disagree about the third. Why? Because what one likes in any composition may not be what the other likes. Two friends may like the Beethoven Fifth, yet one of them may see nothing in the Mozart Jupiter. We are on the safe path when we in all find something to enjoy. As it is, most of us come short of the fullest appreciation. One picture, for her friends in pieces and fruit-ly neatly. The to vogue again. a story, each a friend to be faithfully prevents our pre-ich it would be fragment. It is poetic. y expected that twenty years ago, n a "Manual of m its fertile re-nces of the then rattled off essays, a rare fecundity, ng the remainder We welcome him, re, with the hope, ger and supple- m his muse." dget. B. erts, of the 14th ic Hall, Feb. 11 ing, assisted by (Greene, Giese, two Listemanns), Arthur Foote, or- usual felicitous n the interstices programs, whose Winged Music-iless branch, and icicles with a dou-ifest comment on gfried by Zöllner Buck's Chorus of nor solo; Engels-gale, most melo- by Saint-Saëns, judges the best male voices to be or the first time. nn's Dreamy Lake, adjective; Rhein-Zöllner's baccha-to know." NCERT. Bach's Celebrated one movement of

It would be an interesting innovation in our series of concerts to hear the works of Haydn, Mozart, Bach, and others, given under the conditions for which they were written. A series of ancient concerts in a small hall, with an orchestra of eighteen performers, would draw public attention for their quaintness, if for nothing else, and would give us a fair idea of the music which our forefathers enjoyed.

In the course of Symphony Concerts which Boston has just completed were many works by Haydn and Mozart given by grand orchestra, which sounded almost as full in their scoring as the works of the modern tone colorists. The fact is, that one almost never hears a symphony exactly as the old masters scored it. Schubert has written symphonies which can be very comfortably produced by a band of thirteen performers, without drums or trumpets. Mozart's great G minor Symphony was originally scored for a very small orchestra, without drums, trumpets, or clarinets, the orchestra consisting simply of one flute, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, and the proportionate number of string instruments.

BOSTON.

1885

April 6. ^ΔAt last the Symphony concerts are laid to rest. I may have growled at the series occasionally while it compelled me to sit up till Saturday midnight writing reviews, but now that it is done I feel like the wife whose husband suddenly ceased to give her the Saturday night beating, who longed for her usual excitement. Mr. Gericke has informed me that he is now at work upon the programme for next season. I have again ventured a word in favor of the American muse. It seems to me an imperative duty to foster American composers even if they be not yet on a par with the greatest composers of the old world. If Mr. Gericke waits for the leading American composers to come to him with their scores in their hands, he will wait in vain. The composers of lesser rank will gladly send him their works on approval, but the best ones will never submit to the test. He must seek them out and ask for their works, and while we are in the mood of giving advice, why should we not have Raff's four Season Symphonies, his Lenore Symphony, Rheinberger's Wallenstein Symphony, Goetz's Symphony, and a few other works upon which the moss of age has not yet gathered. But we fear our advice will not be followed.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEB.

Lang on the Eighteenth Boston Concert.

IN the outset the speaker had so say about the French Horn, used wood-winds in the quintet two less because it belongs to them rather brass-wind family. In a large there are usually four of these he have but few stops, the hand in mouth being a modifier; but they of both delicate and flaring effects in a curious tone, as if it were spread about. The horn sometimes like a bell. In Gounod's Faust influences. The rapid accumulation ure harshens the tone, and so the becomes uncertain, even in the good player. A competent ob that in no foreign orchestra is the tery finer than in the Boston Sym

Haydn wrote 120 symphonies, called Twelfth belongs to a series written last. An admirer was so to have Haydn's aid, he went from Vienna (no easy trip a century brought him bodily to London. years this symphony was played important cello part in one move copy in Mr. Lang's hand, being edition, lacked this part. This owing to a copyist's error; but being detected, through a copy in library, the cello part was rest scoring calls for two horns, no trom a matter of course), and the flute is tant that the symphony seems de give that instrument a leading me. Haydn's Twelfth sounds well on Mr. Lang and G. W. Sumner showed us. It lacks, however, the quality found elsewhere in Haydn thick with Bourdon, like Wagner's uses half-notes but once, and then lation, and deals largely with a mockery of its theme.

Two men may agree in liking tion, but disagree about the thing. Because what one likes in any may not be what the other likes. may like the Beethoven Fifth them may see nothing in the Mo. We are on the safe path when we something to enjoy. As it is, come short of the fullest appreciation.

sips vinegar, another sparkling water from the same cup.

The very opposite of Haydn's joy in the Twelfth Symphony is the fantastic merriment of Saint-Saëns in the Dance Macabre; which the composer describes as full of sheeted ghosts and rattling bones, not to be faithfully rendered on pianos, though Messrs. Lang and Sumner gave a rattling version of it. Saint-Saëns has written all sorts of compositions, besides being the organist at the Church of the Madeleine. An inveterate Bachist, he always gave Bach selections when asked to play, and was long the solitary Parisian upholder of that master. His transcription (one of many) of an important work by Bach was pirated by somebody in America, and played for twenty years before its transcriber was known. Saint-Saëns is a composer, not a teacher. Operas, symphonic poems, canticles, concertos have come from his pen, some of which Mr. Lang has heretofore produced. His musical life is somewhat like that of Brahms. Haydn's Twelfth Symphony requires but 13 staves to the page; the score of the Dance Macabre demands twenty-three. He uses a Xylophone, which is well described as one fourth pitch and three quarters noise, and is usually too high-pitched for the harmony. Last year the player forgot his xylophone, and even musicians did not perceive the difference when he supplied the deficiency by hammering the back of a chair. Drumsticks clattering might serve as well. The xylophone is somewhat like a glassichord, used by Strauss, only less musical. Saint-Saëns also employs a harp, three kettle-drums, cymbals, and requires a recurrent solo on a violin mistuned so as to suggest diablerie. There is no end to the ingenuity of Macabre compositions, from the clock striking the hour at the beginning, to the lugubrious cock-crowing at the close. A note on the harp, sustained by the horn, makes the bell; as once in the Berlioz Faust, under Lang's direction, the trombone was combined with the gong to produce a similar result. In grotesqueness this Dance is unequalled, and special attention was called to the clarinet and the falling thirds.

Beethoven was a decided opponent of descriptive music. The only illustrations of it in his works are the March in the Eroica, and the Pastoral. In the Sixth Symphony Beethoven added the descriptive hints with great hesitation. Music suggests much by rousing kindred feelings, but cannot properly describe.

300

Beethoven's own words were that he aimed at indication of sentiment rather than portrayal of facts. Except in the birdnotes at the close of the slow movement, there is no imitation. The Pastoral was originally given in conjunction with the Fifth, both for the first time, in a concert lasting five hours. In the 1st movement we have the exhilaration of an arrival of city folks in the country—not so much gayety as freedom and uplifting. The running accompaniment may or may not represent a brook, in the placid Andante. Thirdly, the trumpets call the peasants to a rough dance, the wind instruments having strong play therein. The trumpet recalls them from revelry, but the theme, instead of ending in the dominant, breaks into the storm. This does not begin with pianissimo drum-rolls, in the ordinary way—the tympani are subordinates—but you are made to feel the sultriness in the air by light tremolo passages.

Only part of the Symphony was played on the piano. At the concerts, the Philomela Ladies' Quartet sang.

CONTINUED ON NEXT REEL

END OF REEL
PLEASE REWIND